" There is no propagating this Plant by Art, ſince none have ever ſeen its Seed; which Circum- Has no Seed. " ſtance probably gave riſe to a Fable current among the Tartars, who ſay: that a Bird picks it up, " as ſoon as it is in the Ground, and not being able to digeſt it, it purifies in his Stomach, and " grows in the Place where the Bird dungs. I rather believe that the Stone remains a long " time in the Earth before it takes Root; and this Opinion ſeems confirm'd from the Roots " that are found no longer, but ſmaller, than the little Finger, tho' they have produc'd more " than ten Stalks in as many different Years.

" Tho' the Plant I have deſcrib'd, had four Branches, yet there are ſome that have but Variable in " two the Branches.

" two or three, others again have five, and even ſeven, which laſt are the fineſt of all.
But not in Leaves. " However, every Branch has always five Leaves as well as that which I have deſign'd, unleſs
" the number has been diminiſh'd by ſome Accident. The height of the Plant is proportion-
" able to its Thickneſs and number of Branches; thoſe who have no Berries, are commonly
" ſmall and very low.

Marks of the beſt Roots. " The Root that is largeſt, moſt uniform, and has the feweſt Strings, is always the beſt,
" for which Reaſon that mark'd H is preferable to the other. I cannot tell why the Chineſe have " call'd it Jin ſeng, which ſignifies the Repreſentation of a Man. For my part I never ſaw any Reaſon of its Name. " in the leaſt inclining to human Shape; and thoſe whoſe Trade is to gather it, have aſſur'd
" me, that they as ſeldom find any Reſemblance of a Man in the Jin ſeng, as in other Roots,
" which are ſometimes by Chance of an odd Figure. The Tartars call it with great Reaſon
" Orhota, that is, the Chief of Plants. For the reſt it is not true, that this Plant grows in " the Province of Pe-che-li, on the Mountains of Yung-pin-fû, as P. Martini tells us on the " Authority of ſome Chineſe Authors. But they might eaſily have been deceiv'd, becauſe
" that is the Place where it is brought to when it comes from Tartary.

The Root only in Eſteem. " Thoſe who ſearch for this Plant preſerve nothing but the Root, burying in one Place
" all they can procure of it in the Space of ten or fifteen Days. They take great Care to
" waſh the Root, and clean it well with a Bruſh; then dipping it for a Moment in ſcalding
How preſerved. " hot Water, they dry it in the Smoak of a kind of yellow Millet, which communicates a " little of its Colour to it. The Millet is boil'd with a little Water over a ſlow Fire, and " the Roots being plac'd upon ſmall Sticks of Wood layed croſs-wiſe over the Veſſel, and " cover'd with a Linnen-Cloth, or another Veſſel, by Degrees become dry. They may be
" alſo dry'd in the Sun, or even at the Fire; but tho' they preſerve their Virtue this way,
" they are not of the Colour that the Chineſe admire. When they are dry'd they muſt be " kept cloſe in a dry place, otherwiſe they will corrupt or grow worm-eaten."

Uncommon Animals. With Reſpect to Animals, beſides thoſe already ſpoken of, China produces a great number of Fallow-Beaſts of all ſorts, except Lions, ſuch as wild Boars, Tigers, Buffaloes, Bears, Camels, Stags, Rhinoceroſes, &c. But as theſe kinds of Beaſts are well known, I ſhall only ſpeak of two others, which are peculiar to China, and are ſeldom met with in other Countries.

Kind of Dromedary. The firſt of theſe is a kind of Camel or Dromedary, no taller than an ordinary Horſe; having two Bunches on his Back, cover'd with long Hair, which make a ſort of Saddle. The Bunch before ſeems to be form'd by the Back-bone and the upper part of the Shoulder-bones, being bent backwards, not unlike the Bunch which the Indian Cows have on their Shoulders; the other Bunch joins to the Buttocks. Its Neck is ſhorter than the common Camels, and much thicker, cover'd with thick Hair, as long as that of Goats; ſome of them are of a yellowiſh Dun-Colour, others are a little upon the Red, and blackiſh in ſome Places. The Legs are not ſo long and ſlender in Proportion as thoſe of other Camels, ſo that it ſeems more fit to carry Burdens.

The Musk Roe-Buck. The other Animal is a kind of Roe-Buck, call'd by the Chineſe Hyang-chang-tſe, that is, The Odoriferous Roe-Buck, or The Muſk Roe-Buck. Chang-tſe ſignifies a Roe-Buck, and Hyang properly a Sweet Smell: but it alſo implies Odoriferous, when join'd to a Subſtantive, becauſe then it becomes an Adjective. One of the Jeſuit Miſſionaries, who deſcribes it, relates nothing but what he was an Eye-witneſs of: " I bought one, (ſays he) when it was juſt kill'd, in Deſcription of it. " order to ſell it me; and preſerv'd the Part which they uſually cut to take out the Muſk,
" which is dearer than the Animal itſelf. The thing happen'd as follows:

" As the Muſk-Deer is found in a Chain of Mountains on the Weſt-ſide of Pe-king, while " I was diſcharging the Duty of my Miſſion, in the middle of thoſe Hills, (where there is a " ſmall Church, and Congregation of Chriſtians) the poor Inhabitants of the Village went a hunt" ing, in hopes that I would purchaſe the Game, to carry with me to that City; and when " they had kill'd two, a Male and a Female, they brought them to me, while they were yet
" warm and bleeding. Before we agreed on the Price, they aſk'd if I was for having the Muſk
" as well as the Fleſh (becauſe ſome buy only the latter, leaving the former to the Hunters,
" who ſell it to thoſe that deal in this Commodity) and as it was chiefly the Muſk which
" I wanted, I reply'd, I would buy the whole Animal, and got it for a Crown; then they " immediately took the Male and cut off the Bag, leſt the Muſk ſhould evaporate, and tied
" the Top of it cloſe with a Pack-thread. Thoſe who would keep it out of Curioſity dry it.

Its Muſk how generated. " The Muſk is generated in the inward part of the Bag, and ſticks all round it like a " kind of a Salt. There are two ſorts: but that which is in Grains, and call'd Tew-
" pan-hyang is the moſt precious; the other nam'd Mi-hyang is the leaſt eſteem'd, becauſe it " is too ſmall and fine. The Female produces no Muſk; or at leaſt the Matter which
" ſhe yields having the Appearance of Muſk, has no Scent.

It feeds on Serpents. " The uſual Food of this Animal, as I was told, is the Fleſh of Serpents, which tho' of " an enormous Size, are eaſily kill'd by it; becauſe when they are at a certain Diſtance from
" the Roe-Buck, they are ſuddenly overcome with the Scent of the Muſk, and grow ſo
" feeble that they are not able to ſtir. This is ſo certain, that when the Peaſants go to cut " Wood, or make Char-coal in the Mountains, they have no ſurer way to preſerve them-
" ſelves from theſe Serpents, whoſe Bite is exceeding dangerous, than to carry about them
" a few Grain of Muſk: being thus arm'd they ſleep quietly after their Dinner; and if any " Serpent advances towards them, it is ſtupify'd all of a ſudden, by the Smell of the Muſk,
" and can approach no nearer.

" That

" That which happen'd on my Return to Pe-king, was in ſome Meaſure a Confirmation " that the Fleſh of Serpents is the principal Food of the Muſk-Animal. Part of the Roe-" buck being dreſs'd for Supper, one of thoſe who was at Table happen'd to have an exceeding " Averſion for Serpents, and this to ſo great a Degree, that the bare mentioning of them " in his Preſence would make him extremely ſick. As he knew nothing of what was reported " of this Animal and the Serpent, I was very careful to ſay nothing at all about it, but I obſerv'd " his Countenance very attentively. He took ſome of the Roe-Buck, as others did, with a " Deſign to eat it, but he had no ſooner put a bit in his Mouth, than he found an extraor-" dinary loathing at his Stomach, and would not touch any more. The reſt eat of it very " heartily, he having been the only Perſon that had an Averſion for this ſort of Meat."

Of the Lakes, Canals, and Rivers of China ; as alſo of the Barks, and Veſſels of Burden.

Lakes, Canals, and Rivers of China.

THE great Plenty which China ſo happily enjoys, is owing much to the Goodneſs and Depth of its Soil; but chiefly to the great number of Rivers, Lakes and Canals, wherewith it is water'd: there not being a City, nor even a large Country Town, eſpecially in the Southern Provinces, but what is ſituated upon the Banks of ſome River, Lake, or Canal; whereof as I have had Occaſion to ſpeak at large in ſeveral Places of this Work, I ſhall, to avoid Repetition, only juſt mention ſome few over again to refreſh the Reader's Memory.

Chief Lakes.

Among the Lakes, to be met with in moſt of the Provinces, the Chief are: (1) The Tong-ting Hû, in the Province of Hû-quang, which is eighty Leagues or more in Circumference; (2) The Hong-ſe Hû, one part of which is in the Province of Kyang-nan, and the other in that of Che-kyang; and (3) the Ho-yang Hû, in the Province of Kyang-ſi, otherwiſe call'd the Lake of Zhau-chew, [or Jau-chew.] This laſt being thirty Leagues in Compaſs, is form'd by the Confluence of four Rivers, each as large as the Loire, which come out of the Province of Kyang-ſi. It is alſo ſubject to Hurricans like the Seas of China; for in leſs than a quarter of an Hour the Wind will veer round all the Points of the Compaſs, and ſometimes ſink the largeſt Barks.

Dangerous ſailing on the Lake Ho-yang.

In approaching the moſt dangerous part of the Lake, a Temple appears built on a ſteep Rock; on ſight of which the Chineſe Mariners beat a kind of Braſs Drum, to inform the Idol of their Arrival, and lighting Wax Candles in Honour of it, upon the Fore-part of the Bark, burn Incenſe, and ſacrifice a Cock. To prevent theſe Inconveniences Barks are ſtation'd here on Purpoſe to ſuccour thoſe who are in Danger of being caſt away; altho' it often happens that thoſe who are appointed to give the Aſſiſtance, are the moſt forward to work the Merchants Deſtruction, in order to enrich themſelves with the Spoil, eſpecially if they think they can do it without being diſcover'd. Nevertheleſs, the Vigilance of the Magiſtrates of China is very great: A Mandarin places his chief Glory in aſſiſting the People, and ſhewing that he has a Paternal Affection for them. In tempeſtuous Weather you ſee the Mandarin of Jau-chew, after giving Order not to croſs the Lake, go in Perſon to the Side of it, and there continue all Day long; with Deſign to hinder, by his Preſence, any one from raſhly expoſing himſelf to the Dangers of periſhing, thro' Greedineſs of Gain.

Canals.

Beſides theſe principal Lakes there are many others in the ſeveral Provinces, which, together with a multitude of Springs, Rivulets, and Torrents, that deſcend from the Mountains, have given Occaſion to the induſtrious Chineſe of cutting numberleſs Canals, wherewith all their Lands are water'd. There is ſcarce a Province but what has a large Canal of clear and deep Water, incloſ'd between two Cauſeways, cas'd with flat Stones, or Marble Slabs, laid on the Ground, and faſten'd in Poſts of the ſame Materials, by means of Grooves. The Canals are cover'd with Bridges at convenient Diſtances, conſiſting of three, five, or ſeven Arches, in order to open a Communication between the ſeveral parts of the Country. The middle Arch is always exceeding high, that Barks may paſs with their Maſts up: The Tops of the Arches are well built, and the Piers ſo narrow, that at a Diſtance the Arches ſeem to hang in the Air.

The principal Canal diſcharges itſelf on the Right and Left into ſeveral other ſmall ones; which are divided again into a great number of Brooks, that run to ſo many different large Towns, and even conſiderable Cities. They alſo often form Ponds and ſmall Lakes, whereby the neighbouring Plains are water'd. The Chineſe, not contented with theſe Canals, which are of infinite Conveniency for Travellers and trading People, have dug many others with admirable Induſtry and Art, for the Reception of Rain, to water the Plains cover'd with Rice; for Rice requires to be almoſt continually in Water.

Yun-lyang, or Royal Canal.

But nothing of this Kind is to be compar'd to the great Canal, call'd Yun-lyang, or Royal Canal, which is three hundred Leagues in Length. The Emperor Shi-tſû, who was Chief of the Weſtern Tartars, and Founder of the twentieth Dynaſty of the Yuen, undertook and executed this grand Work, which is one of the Wonders of the Empire. This Prince having Occasion of its being made.

conquer'd all China, and being already Master of Western Tartary, (which extends from the Province of Pe-che-li, as far as the Great Mogol's Empire, Persia, and the Caspian Sea,) resolv'd to fix his Residence at Pe-king, to be, as it were, in the Center of his vast Dominions, that he might govern them with the greater Ease. But as the Northern Provinces were unable to furnish Provisions sufficient for such a large City, he caus'd a vast number of Vessels and long Barks to be built, in order to fetch from the Maritime Provinces Rice, Callicoes, Silks, Merchandizes, and other Commodities necessary for the Maintenance of his numerous Court and Troops.

But finding this Method dangerous, and that Calms detain'd the Provisions too long, and Storms occasion'd many Ship-wrecks, he employ'd, at an infinite Expence, innumerable Workmen, who with incredible Industry carry'd on through many Provinces this prodigious Canal, upon which all the Riches of the South and North are convey'd. After it has cross'd the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shan-tong, it enters that of Kyang-nan, and discharges itself into the great and rapid Whang-ho, or Yellow River; whereon having sail'd for two Days you come to another River, and presently after find the Canal again, which leads to the City of Whay-ngan. From thence passing by many Cities and Towns, it arrives at Yang-chew, one of the most famous Ports of the Empire; and a little beyond it enters the great River Yang-tse-kyang, one Day's Journey from Nan-king. Continuing your Course on this River to the Lake Po-yang in Kyang-si, you cross it, and enter the River Kan-kyang, which divides that Province nearly into two equal Parts, and ascend the Stream as far as Nan-ngan. From thence you go by Land to Nan-hyong, the chief City of Quang-tong, where you embark upon a River, that carries you to Kan-ton: so that you may travel very commodiously, by means of the Rivers and Canals, from Pe-king to the farthest part of China, being about six hundred Leagues by Water. To facilitate the Navigation of this Canal, they commonly allow a Fathom and an half Water; but when the Stream is swell'd and threatens to overflow the neighbouring Fields, they take care to make Trenches in divers Places, in order to keep it within Bounds. There are Inspectors appointed, who visit the Canal continually, accompany'd with Workmen to repair the damag'd Places.

Its Course.

Depth of Water.

Rivers.

China abounds also with navigable Rivers, as appears from the Description already given of the Provinces; wherefore it will be sufficient to speak here of the two great Rivers which run across this vast Empire.

The Yang tse-kyang,

its Course.

The first (call'd Yang-tse-kyang, commonly translated, The Son of the Sea, or Ta-kyang, that is, The Great River, or simply Kyang, The River, by way of Eminence) runs from West to East, rising in the Mountains belonging to the Country of the Tû-fan, about thirty three Degrees of Latitude. It receives different Names, according to the different Places it passes through; and, dividing into several Branches, forms a great many Islands full of Rushes, which serve as Fewel for the Cities round about. First crossing a Skirt of the Province of Yun-nan, it afterwards runs through those of Se-chwen, Hû-quang, and Kyang-nan. Its Stream is very rapid, but after making many Windings and Turnings in those Provinces, (where it loses and resumes its Name of Ta-kyang) as far as the City of Kin-chew, it begins to be slacken'd by the Sea Tide, (which meets it at the City of Kyew-kyang,) and glides along more slowly; thenceforward it is so gentle at all times, but especially at the new and full Moon, as to admit being sail'd upon. It passes next by Nan-king, and falls into the Eastern Sea, over-against the Isle of Tsong-ming.

Depth.

This River is broad, deep, and exceeding full of Fish. The Chinese have a common Saying, That the Sea is without a Shore, and the Kyang without a Bottom; Hay vû-pin, Kyang vû-ti. They pretend that in several places they find no Bottom with a Sounding-Lead, and that in others there are two or three hundred Fathom Water; but it is probable in this they exaggerate, and that their Pilots have judg'd so, only because they found no Bottom with their Lines, which do not exceed fifty or sixty Fathom.

Signification of its Name.

It seems they are mistaken likewise in translating Yang-tse by the Son of the Sea; for the Character us'd in writing Yang, is different from that which signifies the Sea, tho' the Sound and Accent are the same. Among its various Significations that given to it formerly strengthens this Conjecture: for in the time of the Emperor Yu it denoted a Province of China, bounded on the South, by this River, which it is thought took the name thereof, because the Emperor diverted the Waters which overflowed the Province into its Channel.

The Whang-ho, or Yellow River.

Its Course

The second River is call'd Whang-ho, or, the Yellow River: A Name given to it on account of the Colour of its Waters, which are mix'd with yellowish Clay, wash'd off its Banks by the Force of its Stream. It rises about the thirty fifth Degree of Latitude, in the mountainous Country of the Tartars of Koko nor, which having passed thro', it runs for a while along the side of the great Wall, and then taking a sweep round the Lands of the Ortos Tartars, re-enters China between the Provinces of Shan-si and Shen-si. Next it crosses the Province of Ho-nan, with part of Kyang-nan; and after a Course of about six hundred Leagues, discharges itself into the Eastern Sea, not far from the Mouth of the River Yang-tse-kyang.

Altho' this River is exceeding large, and traverses a great Extent of Land, yet it is not very navigable, because it is almost impossible to sail up it, without a strong, as well as fair Wind. Sometimes it makes great Havock in the Places thro' which it passes, where breaking its Banks, it suddenly overflows the Country, and lays whole Villages and Cities under Water; for which Reason they are oblig'd to make long and thick Dikes in certain Places to restrain the Waters. The Lands of the Province of Ho-nan being low, and the Banks liable to be broken down, as

I have elſewhere obſerv'd they us'd to be formerly, they raiſe, by way of Precaution, round moſt of the Cities, at the Diſtance of more than a Quarter of a Mile from the Wall, a ſtrong Incloſure or fort of Bank made of Earth, cover'd with Sods.

Barks on the Rivers and Canals.

The Canals, as well as Rivers, are all cover'd with Barks, of various Sizes; which ſometimes lye ſo cloſe together for more than three Quarters of a Mile, that it is impoſſible to ſqueeze in one more amongſt them. They reckon about ten thouſand which belong to the Emperor, and are wholly employ'd in carrying Tribute and all ſorts of Proviſion from the Provinces to the Court. Theſe imperial Barks, call'd Lyang-chwen, or Barks of the Proviſions, have all flat Bottoms, and are of equal Breadth from Head to Stern. There are others which are appointed to carry Stuffs, Brocades, Pieces of Silk, &c. which are call'd Long-i-chwen, that is, Barks with Dragon-habits; becauſe the Emperor's Arms are Dragons with five Claws, and his Garments and Moveables are always adorn'd with the Figures of Dragons in Embroidery or Painting.

The Imperial Barks.

Each Bark makes but one Voyage in a Year, and carries no more than one fourth Part of its full Burden. They pay the Maſter of the Bark a certain Sum out of the Royal Treaſury, according as the Place from which he ſet out is diſtant from the Court: for inſtance, if he comes from the Province of Kyang ſi, which is above three hundred Leagues from Pe-king, they give him a hundred Taëls. This Sum, tis true, ſeems too little for defraying his Expence; but then he gets what does that and a good deal more, by the Liberty of taking in Paſſengers as well as Goods, which paſs the Cuſtom Houſes Toll-free.

Thoſe for carrying the Quân, &c.

There is a third ſort of Barks, higher and ſmaller than others call'd Tſo chwen, which are appointed to carry the Mandarins to their reſpective Governments in the Provinces, and Perſons of Diſtinction, who are ſent from, or call'd to Court. They have two Decks, upon the firſt of which, there is a compleat Apartment reaching from one End to the other, about ſeven or eight Foot high; its Rooms are painted within and without, varniſh'd, gilt, and extremely neat: but I have given a particular Deſcription of them in another Place, [p. 286.] There a Mandarin may ſleep, eat, ſtudy, write, receive Viſits, &c. In ſhort, has every thing as convenient and neat about him as in his own Palace: Indeed it is impoſſible to travel more agreeably than in theſe Barks.

Several Sorts of private Barks.

There are beſides an infinite number of Barks belonging to private Perſons, ſome very commodious, which are hir'd to the Literati or rich Folks, who have Occaſion to travel; others much larger, made uſe of by the Merchants, for carrying on Trade: and laſtly, there are a prodigious Multitude of Barks where whole Families dwell, having no other Habitation, and live more conveniently than in Houſes on Land. In the ſmalleſt ſort, which have no Cabbins, they make a kind of Tilt or Arch of thin Mats about five Foot ſquare, to defend them from the Rain and Heat of the Sun.

Kind of Galleys.

You ſee likewiſe ſome that may be call'd a kind of Galleys; which are convenient for ſailing upon the Rivers, along the Sea-coaſt, and among the Iſlands. Theſe Barks are as long as Merchant-men of three hundred and fifty Tuns. But as they are ſhallow, and draw no more than two foot of Water; as alſo their Oars are long, and do not extend a croſs the Sides of the Bark like thoſe in Europe, but are plac'd on the Outſide, in a poſition almoſt parallel to the Body of the Bark, every Oar is eaſily mov'd by a few Hands, and the Veſſel made to go very ſwiftly. I ſhall ſay nothing here of certain ſmall Barks, built in Form of a Dragon, and dreſs'd out every Year on a Feſtival-day, whereof an account has been given already [p. 101]

Rafts or Floats on the Rivers.

The Merchants trading in Timber and Salt, who by the way are the richeſt in all China, inſtead of Barks to carry their Goods, uſe a ſort of Rafts, or Floats, made in the following manner: After the Timber, which they cut down in the Mountains, and neighbouring Foreſts, of the Province of Se-chwen, is brought to the ſide of the River Kyang, they take what is neceſſary to make a Raft, four or five Foot high, and ten long. Then boring Holes in both ends of the Pieces of Wood, they run thro' them twiſted Oziers, with which they faſten the reſt of the Timber together, and ſo form a Raft, floating on the River, of any length; which is proportion'd to the Wealth of the Merchants, there being ſome half a League long. The ſeveral Parts of the Raft thus put together, move eaſily any way, like the Links of a Chain. Four or five Men on the Fore-part guide it with Poles and Oars; while others, plac'd all along the ſide at equal Diſtance, help to conduct it. They build thereon, from Space to Space, Booths cover'd with Boards, or Mats, where they put their Moveables, dreſs their Victuals, and take their reſt. In the different Cities which they touch at, they ſell their Houſes along with their Timber; and thus they float above ſix hundred Leagues, when they carry their Wood to Pe-king.

Ships for Sea.

As the Chineſe ſail upon the Sea, as well as Rivers, they have always had pretty good Ships; and pretend to have croſſed over the Indian Seas long before the Birth of Chriſt. But whatever Knowledge they may have had of Navigation, they have not brought it to a greater Perfection than their other Sciences.

Their Bulk and Structure

Their Ships, which they call Chwen in common, with Boats and Barks, are nam'd by the Portugueſe Soma, or Sommes; but for what Reaſon is not known. Theſe Veſſels are not to be compar'd to ours, the largeſt of them carrying no more than from two hundred and fifty to three hundred Tuns. They are properly no other than flat Barks, with two Maſts, and not above eighty or ninety Foot in length. The Fore-part is not made with a Beak, but riſes up ſomewhat like two Wings or Horns, which make an odd Figure; the Stern is open in the middle to receive the Rudder, and ſhelter it from the beating of the Waves. This Rudder, which is about five or ſix Foot broad, may be eaſily rais'd or lower'd by means of a Cable, faſten'd to it from the Stern.

Theſe

Their Maſting. Theſe Veſſels have neither a Mizzen-maſt, Bow-ſprit, nor Scuttles; all the Maſting conſiſts of a Main-maſt, and Fore-maſt, to which they add ſometimes a very ſmall Top-maſt of no great uſe. The Main-maſt is plac'd near the Fore-maſt, which ſtands very forward upon the Prow; the Proportion of one to the other is commonly at two or three, and the Length of the Main-maſt is uſually two thirds of the Length of the Veſſel.

Sails. Their Sails are made of Matts of Bambû, (a kind of Canes common in China) divided into Leaves like a Pocket-Book, and join'd together by Poles, which are alſo of Bambû. At the Top there is a piece of Wood, ſerving for a Sail-Yard; and at the Bottom, a ſort of Plank, above a Foot broad, and five or ſix Inches thick, which keeps the Sail ſteady, when they have a mind to lower it, or hoiſt it up. Theſe ſorts of Ships are no good Sailors; tho' they hold much more Wind than ours, becauſe of the Stiffneſs of their Sails, which do not yield to the Gale: yet as they are not built in ſo commodious a manner, they loſe the Advantage they have over ours in this Point.

Caulking. Their Veſſels are not caulk'd with Pitch and Tar, as theſe of Europe, but with a particular ſort of Gum; which is ſo good, that a Well or two, made in the Bottom of the Hold of the Ship, is ſufficient to keep it dry: for hitherto they have had no Knowledge of a Pump.

Anchors of Wood. Their Anchors are not made of Iron, like ours, but of a hard and heavy Wood, which for that Reaſon they call Tye-mû, that is, Iron Wood. They pretend that theſe Anchors are much better than the Iron ones; becauſe, ſay they, theſe are apt to bend, which thoſe of the Wood they uſe never do: however, they commonly tip both the Flukes with Iron.

Chineſe Sailing. The Chineſe have on Board neither Pilot nor Maſter, the Veſſel being wholly under the Management of thoſe who ſteer her. It muſt be confeſs'd, however, that they are tolerable Seamen, and very good Coaſting-Pilots, but indifferent Pilots in the main Sea. They lay the Head of the Ship upon the Rumb, on which they propoſe to ſail; and without giving themſelves any Pain about the Deviation of the Veſſel, thus hold on their Courſe as they think convenient. This Negligence proceeds, no doubt, from their making no long Voyages, yet when they have a mind they ſail tolerably well.

As the five Jeſuit Miſſionaries, who went from Siam to China, in 1687, (embarking the ſeventeenth of June, on Board a Chineſe Soma, the Captain of which belong'd to Kan-ton,) had Leizure enough, during their Voyage, to examine the Structure of theſe ſorts of Veſſels; the particular Deſcription which they made of them, will give the Reader a moſt exact Knowledge of the Chineſe Navigation.

Deſcription of a Chineſe Ship. The Ship they embark'd in, according to the way of reckoning among the Indian Portugueſe, carry'd nineteen hundred Pics; which at the Rate of one hundred Catis, or one hundred and twenty five Pound a Pic, comes to near one hundred and twenty Tuns: a Tun Weight is computed two thouſand Pounds. The Model of it was tolerably handſome, except the Fore-part, which was flat, and without a Beak. Its Maſting was different from that of our Veſſels, Maſts and Rigging. with reſpect to the Diſpoſition, Number, and Strength of the Maſts. Its main Maſt was plac'd within a ſmall matter where our Fore-Maſt ſtands, ſo that the two Maſts were near to one another. For Stays and Shrouds it had a ſimple Rigging, which reach'd from Star-board to Lar-board, that it might be always faſten'd out of the Wind. It had alſo a Bolt-ſprit and Mizzen-maſt, which was plac'd to the Lar-board. As for theſe latter they were very ſmall, and ſcarce deſerv'd the Name; but to make Amends, the Main-maſt was extremely large in Proportion to the Veſſel; and to ſtrengthen it ſtill more, it was ſupported by two Fiſhes, or Side-beams, laſh'd to it, reaching from the Keelſon up to the ſecond Deck. Two flat pieces of Wood ſtrongly faſten'd by Pegs on the Top of the Main-maſt, and join'd together at the upper ends, extending ſeven or eight Foot above the ſame, ſupply'd the Place of a Top-maſt.

Sails. It had two Sails, the Main and Fore-Sail both made of Matts: the firſt was forty-five Foot in Hight, and twenty-eight or thirty Foot in Breadth; the ſecond was proportionable to the Maſt that carry'd it. They were furniſh'd on both ſides with ſeveral Rows of Bambû, laid along the Breadth of the Sail, near a Foot aſunder on the Outſide, and ſomewhat farther aſunder on the Side next to the Maſt; on which they were ſtrung by means of ſeveral Chaplets, or Rings, that took up about a fourth part of the Breadth of the Sail, reckoning from the Side where there were no Braces. So that the Maſts divided the Sails into two very unequal Parts, leaving more than three Quarters of them on the Side of the Braces; whereby each Sail was diſpos'd to turn upon its Maſt as upon a Hinge, and run without Difficulty towards the Stern, at leaſt twenty ſix Points, when it was neceſſary to tack about, ſometimes bearing upon the Maſt, and ſometimes only upon the Chaplets. The Yard ſerv'd for Rat-lines above; and a great round Pole as thick as the Yards, perform'd the ſame Office below: It likewiſe ſerv'd to keep the Sail ſtraight, which, to prevent its tearing, was ſupported in two Places with Planks, ſuſpended by two Ropes, hanging down from the Top of the Maſt for this Purpoſe. Each of the Sails had but one Brace, one Bow-line, and what the Portugueſe call a Spider; which is a long Parcel of ſmall Tacklings on the Edge of the Sail from Top to Bottom, about two Foot aſunder, whoſe ends are faſten'd to the Brace, where they make a ſtrong Knot.

This ſort of Sail folds and unfolds like a Skreen. When they would hoiſt the main Sail, they made uſe of two Wind-laſſes, and three Halliards or Ropes, which paſs thro' as many Pulleys fix'd at the Head of the Main-maſt. When they were about furling the Sail, they laid laid hold of it with two Iron Hooks, and after loosing the Ropes, they folded the Plates one after another, hauling them down forcibly with the Hooks.

The Rigging being ill-contriv'd, the ordering of it takes up a great deal of Time; wherefore the Chineſe, to ſave Trouble, let the Sail flap to and fro during a Calm. It is eaſy to ſee that the enormous Weight of this Sail, join'd to that of the Wind, which acts upon the Maſt as upon a Lever, would drive the Prow under Water, if they had not prevented this Inconvenience by their Method of ſtowing; for they load Veſſels much more behind than before, to counter-balance the Force of the Wind: hence it happen'd, that when they were at Anchor, the Prow was all above Water, while the Stern lay very deep under it. Indeed there is this Advantage in the Largeneſs of their Sail, and its Situation upon the Fore-caſtle, that they proceed very ſwiftly, when ſteering right before the Wind; nay, can, if we believe them, keep up with our beſt Sailors, and even leave them behind. But then with a quarterly or Side-Wind they cannot hold it, and are driven out of their Courſe: not to mention the Danger they are in of being turn'd about, when they are ſurpriz'd with a ſudden Flurry of Wind. Rigging ill contriv'd and cumberſome.

In fine Weather they carry'd, beſides a Sprit-Sail and a Top-Sail, a Driver, (which was plac'd on the Side of the Sail that had no Braces) Bonnet-Sails, or Drabblers, and a ſquare Sail on the Mizzen-maſt; all of them made of Callicoe.

The Stern was cleft in the middle to make Room for the Rudder, to lie in a kind of Chamber, which ſhelter'd it from the beating of the Sea in ſtormy Weather. This Chamber was form'd by the two ſides of the Poop, which leaving a large Opening outwards, approach'd nearer within, and form'd an accute Angle, the Point whereof was cut off, to give the Rudder ſufficient Room to play. The Stern.

This Rudder hung by two Cables, the two ends of which were wound about a Capſtan plac'd on the higheſt part of the Stern, in order to raiſe or lower it, as Occaſion ſerv'd; then two other Cables (A) paſſing under the Veſſel, were carry'd up to the Fore-part of the Prow, where they were kept tight alſo by the help of a Capſtan, and when ſlacken'd ſerv'd in place of the Hinges, by which ours are faſten'd to the Stern-poſt. To augment the Force of the Steerſman, the Rudder had a Whipſtaff, ſeven or eight Foot long, but without either a Handle or Pulley: there were alſo faſten'd four Tacklings, two to each Side of the Veſſel, and one of each Couple was turn'd ſeveral times over the end of the Whipſtaff, to enable the Steerſman to keep the Rudder in its proper Poſition. The Rudder.

A Rudder made after this manner can ſcarcely be felt by a large Veſſel; partly becauſe the Ropes, by whoſe means it communicates its Motion, eaſily ſtretch, but chiefly by reaſon of its continual Wabbling, occaſion'd by the inceſſant Trembling of thoſe Ropes: from whence ariſes another Inconvenience, namely, that there is all the Difficulty in the World to keep the Veſſel ſteady on the ſame Rumb. They have begun to make Soma, which the Portugueſe call Meſtiſas, becauſe they fix Rudders to them after the European manner, without varying in other Reſpects from the Chineſe form of Building. The King of Siam had ſome of them made, carrying ſeven or eight hundred Tun each, which were much the largeſt that ever were ſeen of the ſort. very inconvenient.

The Pilot made no uſe of a Mariner's Compaſs, but ſteer'd his Courſe by a Card of a very ſimple make. The Rim of the Box was divided into twenty four equal parts, which mark'd the Points or Winds, and were plac'd upon a Bed of Sand; which did not ſerve ſo much for laying them ſoft and ſecure againſt the Agitation of the Veſſel, which every Moment deſtroy'd the Equilibrium of the Needle, as to hold the Paſtils, wherewith they perfum'd them inceſſantly. But this was not the only Regale theſe Compaſſes received from the ſuperſtituous Chineſe, who look'd upon them as ſure Guides in their Voyage; for their Blindneſs was ſo exceeding great as to offer them Victuals by way of Sacrifice. The Card or Compaſs.

The Pilot took great Care to furniſh his Binocle well with Nails, by which it appears how unſkilful this Nation is in Navigation. The Chineſe are affirm'd to be the firſt Inventors of the Mariner's Compaſs, but if this be true, they have made little Advantage of it. They directed the Head of the Ship to the Rumb they deſign'd to ſteer upon, by the help of a Silken Thread, which divided the Surface of the Card in two equal parts, from North to South. This they perform'd in two different manners: for Inſtance, to ſail North-Eaſt, they put this Rumb parallel to the Keel of the Ship, and then turn'd the Veſſel about, till the Needle became parallel to the String; or elſe, which comes to the ſame thing, putting the Thread parallel to the Keel, they made the Needle point to the North-Weſt. The Needle of the largeſt Compaſs was not above three Inches long; at one end there was a kind of Flower-de-Luce, and a Trident at the other. They were all made at Nanga ſaki [in Japan.] How they uſe it in ſailing.

The Bottom of the Hold was divided into five or ſix large Chambers, ſeparated by ſtrong Wooden Partitions. Inſtead of a Pump they had only a Well at the Foot of the Main-maſt, from whence they drew the Water with Buckets. Tho' the Sea ran very high, and the Veſſel was deeply laden, yet thro' the Strength of its Planks, and Goodneſs of its caulking, it ſcarce let in any Water. The Hold.

This Caulk is a kind of Compoſition of Lime, Oil, or rather Roſin, which diſtils from the Tree call'd Tong ſhu, [ſee p. 9] and Ockam of Bambû. The Lime is the principal Ingredient, and The Caulking.

(A) Theſe two Cables, I ſuppoſe, were faſten'd to the lower end of the Rudder.

when the Stuff is dry, one would take it for Lime, and nothing elſe. This ſort of Caulking, beſides being more cleanly, is free from that loathſome Smell of Tar, which reigns on board our Ships, and is intolerable to thoſe who are not accuſtom'd to it. But there is a ſtill more conſiderable Advantage in this ſort of Caulking, in regard their Ships are thereby ſecur'd againſt Accidents of Fire, which ours are expos'd to by the Pitch and Tar.

Anchors. The Anchors were of Wood, except the Sheet-Anchor, whoſe Flukes were cover'd with Plates of Iron.

All the Tackling, as well as the Cables, are made of Ratan Cane, or of Hards of the Cocoa-Tree, call'd by the Portugueſe, Cairo.

Ship's Crew, and Officers. The Ship's Crew conſiſted of forty ſeven Perſons, including the Officers. The Pilot had nothing to do but to ſet the Compaſs, and appoint the Courſe; the Steerſman directed the working of the Ship; and the Captain provided Neceſſaries for the Men without giving himſelf any farther Trouble: and yet every thing was done with ſurprizing Readineſs. This Harmony proceeds from the Intereſt that the Crew has to preſerve the Ship; every one having a Share in the loading (B). The Officers and Sailors, inſtead of receiving any Pay, have the Liberty of putting a certain Quantity of Merchandizes on Board the Veſſel, where each has his particular Apartment; the Space between the Decks being divided into different Cabbins. In ſhort, it may be ſaid in general, that the Chineſe are diligent, attentive, and laborious, wanting nothing but a little Experience to make them very good Sea Men.

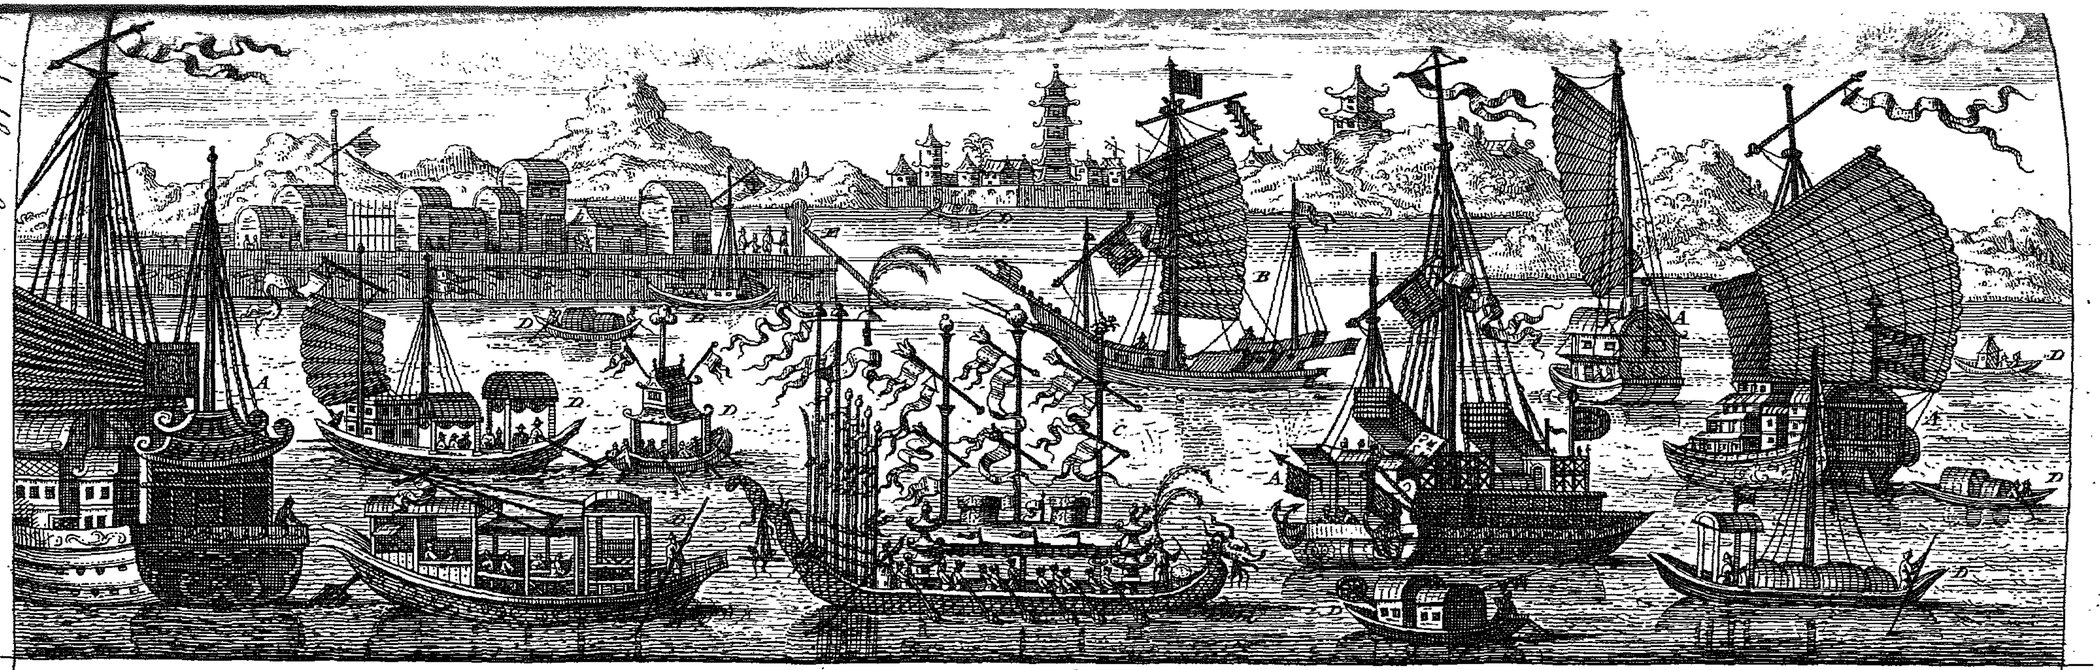
Of the Money which, at different Times, has been current in China.

Gold a Commodity in China. ONLY two ſorts of Metals, viz. Silver and Copper, are current in China, to purchaſe Neceſſaries, and to carry on Trade. Gold is on the ſame Footing as precious Stones in Europe, for it is bought like other Merchandize, and the Europeans, who traffic there, make conſiderable Profit by dealing in it.

Silver not coin'd but cut into Bits. As for Silver, it is not coin'd as in Europe, but is cut into bits, great or ſmall as Occaſion requires; and its Value is rated by the Weight, not the Prince's Image. They generally carry about them, in a neat japann'd Caſe, a pair of ſmall Scales, not unlike the Roman Balance. It is compos'd of a little Plate, an Ivory or Ebony Beam, and a Weight. The Beam, which is divided into minute Parts on three ſides, is ſuſpended by Silken Strings at one of the ends, in three different Points, that they may more eaſily weigh things. This ſort of Ballance is exceeding exact, for any Money from fifteen or twenty Taëls down to a Sous, and leſs, may be weigh'd therein, with ſo great Nicety, that the thouſandth Part of a Crown will ſenſibly turn the Scale.

Money-Scales.

Standard of Silver and its different Alloys. Their Silver is not equally fine: but as we fix the greateſt Degree of fineſt for Gold at twenty four Carats, they divide their Alloy into one hundred parts, which is the Degree of the fineſt Silver. However one meets with Silver, from ninety to an hundred Parts; alſo ſome of eighty Parts: but this is reckon'd the baſeſt Alloy, and will not paſs unleſs the Weight be augmented, till it amounts to the Value of that which is current in Trade.



Cutting their Silver very inconvenient in retale Trade. The Ingots, which are the fineſt Silver, are us'd only in paying large Sums. The Chineſe are very ſkilful in judging at Sight of the fineſt of Silver, and are ſcarcely ever miſtaken. The Difficulty is to make uſe of the Ingots, in the Retale way: for ſometimes they are forc'd to put it in the Fire, and beat it thin with a Hammer, in order to cut it more eaſily into little Bits, and give the Price agreed upon; whence it happens that they are always longer in making the Payment than the Purchaſe. They own it would be more convenient to have, as in Europe, Money of a fix'd Value, and determinate Weight: but then they ſay the Provinces would ſwarm with Clippers and Coiners, whereas that Inconvenience is not to be fear'd, while they cut the Silver, in order to pay for what they buy. As in cutting it ſo often, it is hard to avoid loſing ſome ſmall Particles, ſo you will ſee poor People very buſy in gathering and waſhing the Dirt, that is thrown out of the Shops into the Streets, the Trifle they find being ſufficient to ſubſiſt them.

Copper Money. Copper Money is the only Sort that has any Characters ſtampt thereon, and is of Uſe in Retale Buſineſs: theſe are ſmall round pieces or Deniers, with a hole in the Middle, which they put on Strings by hundreds, to the number of a thouſand. The Metal is neither pure nor hammer'd. Ten of theſe pieces go to a Sous, ten Sous make the tenth part of a Chineſe Crown, call'd Lyang, and, by the Portugueſe, Taëls, which are in Value about a hundred Sous of French Money. Theſe ſmall pieces have been the current Money of China in all times; and the Curious preſerve ſome that were coined in the Reigns of the moſt ancient Emperors, and have either paſs'd from Family to Family, or have been found in the Ruins of Cities and Palaces.

(B) I am rather of Opinion this Harmony is owing to that great Law of Submiſſion, Induſtry, and Good Nature, ingrafted in the Minds of the Chineſe, above all other People. See p. 51, 278, and elſewhere.

What I am going to relate, is taken from an ancient Book, concerning Coins, the Author of which lived under the Dynasty of the Song: it was sent to me by P. Dentrecolles. He treats of the Matter and Form of Coins, their Inscriptions, Value, and the Dynasties in which they were current: he then speaks of uncertain Money, that is, Money, the Time of whose Currency is unknown; foreign Coin introduc'd by Trade; and lastly, the superstitious Coins, or those, concerning which, in Process of Time, the People thro' Folly have entertain'd certain superstitious Notions. Extract from an Author, concerning Coin.

The Word Tsyen, which was formerly us'd to express what we call Money, properly signifies The Water of a Fountain that runs without ceasing, and figuratively, that sort of Metal which continually passes from Hand to Hand: but for a long time past, they have given it the Name of Tsyen; thus they say, Tong-tsyen, Copper Money; In-tsyen, Silver Money; for so they term at Kan-ton the Piasters and French Crowns. Chinese Name for Money.

The Copper us'd for this small Coin being not pure, as I said before, but always mix'd, the pieces of a good Alloy have four parts of Lead to six parts of Copper; which Mixture is the Cause that the red Copper loses its Colour, as well as Sound, and the Money made of it, tho' thick, may be easily broken with one's Fingers. These pieces serve for trifling Expences; but if the Sum laid out be any thing considerable, they give them Strung, in form of a Chaplet or Beads, each containing a thousand. Copper Coin not pure.

The Time was when Gold and Silver Coin were current in China, as well as Copper. The Chinese Author cites an ancient Book, which asserts that under the Reign of Yu, Founder of the first Dynasty, call'd Hya, Gold, and Silver, and Copper were in use; and that under other Dynasties there were Emperors, who permitted the Use of foreign Pieces of Gold and Silver, throughout their Dominions. Gold and Silver Coin formerly.

There was also Money made of Tin, Lead, Iron, and even bak'd Earth, on which Figures and Characters were stamp'd. It is reported, that after the Reign of the Han, a certain Prince caus'd Money to be made of seal'd Earth, compacted with a strong Glew; and taking a Fancy to put down Copper Money, he gather'd as much as he possibly could, amounting to a prodigious Quantity, and burying it very deep in the Earth, caus'd the Workmen employ'd therein to be slain, that none might know where it was hidden. Money of other Metals, and of Earth.

Certain little Shells, call'd Pwey in China, and Koris in the Kingdom of Bengal, have likewise serv'd for small Money, [or Change] several of them going for one of the Copper Pieces: but they did not continue long in use. Koris Shells.

With respect to the Form of Money, it has been of different Figures, under different Reigns. Since the time of the preceeding Dynasty, the Copper Pieces have always been round, and with a square Hole in the Middle: which Hole is edg'd with a Border, rising a little, and was made, that they might be strung, and carry'd about, ready told by thousands; every hundred being separated by a String twisted about the last Piece. It appears from the History of the Dynasty of the Han, which is very ancient, that in those Ages the Money was pierc'd in the same manner. Present Chinese Money round.

According to ancient Authors, besides the round Money, there were current, in the Beginning of the first Dynasty, some call'd Tau, which signifies a Cutlass, as having been of that Shape: Another sort resembl'd the Back of a Tortoise, and for this Reason was nam'd Quey; Lastly, others term'd Pû, were of an extraordinary Form, as represented in the Plate. The round Money was commonly an Inch or an Inch and an half Diameter, and some was twice as large. That call'd Pû and Tau, was five Inches long, and seem to have resembled the Cupans of Japan: But, tho' pierc'd on the Top, it was very inconvenient for Use, and on that account was put down. Ancient Money of various Forms.

At one time there were Pieces so small, that they were call'd Geese Eyes; and so thin, that they swam on the Water, and in handling were in Danger of been broken. It requir'd no less then ten thousand of them to buy a Measure of Rice, sufficient to subsist a Man for ten Days. The first appear'd under the Song, and did not continue long in Use, because People refus'd to take them in the way of Trade. Coin of the Song.

Under the first Dynasty of the Tang, the Banks of the Yellow River having tumbl'd down, the Emperor was inform'd that there were found three thousand three hundred Pieces of Money with three Feet; the Characters impress'd thereon were defac'd, and the Earth had eaten into them. This so very ancient Coin was doubtless current under the first Dynasties of the Hya, Shang, and Chew: for the Emperors of those Times kept their Court not far from that great River. Coin of the three first Dynasties.

But what Mark or Inscription is on this Money? That of Europe is stamp'd with the Head of the Prince; but in China it is otherwise. According to the Genius of that Nation, it would be deem'd indecent and disrespectful to the Majesty of the Prince, for his Image to be perpetually passing thro' the Hands of Dealers, and the Dreggs of the People. None stamped with the Emperor's Image.

The Inscriptions on their Coin are commonly the pompous Titles given by the reigning Princes, to the different Years of their Reign: as for Instance, The Eternally Shining; The Supremely Peaceful; The Magnanimous, &c. The Learned are not deceiv'd by these Inscriptions, so as to take every new Title for a new Emperor; as some Europeans, unacquainted with the Customs of the Empire, have done, and by that means multiply'd the Number of the Emperors. The late Kang-hi is perhaps the only Monarch, who, throughout one of the longest Reigns, never affected to assume such Titles. Usual Inscriptions.

On

Other Marks on Coin. On other Money may be ſeen the Names of the reigning Family, of the Tribunal that preſides over the Mint, or of the City where it was coin'd. Some are mark'd with the Value ſet upon them by the Prince: ſuch, for Inſtance, as Pwan lyang, which ſignifies half a Taël. There is another ſort, whoſe Inſcription is ſingular enough, conſiſting of theſe four Characters: Quey yu ching ti, that is, Money has its Run, and at length returns to the Emperor. With Regard to the Characters on the ancient Money, ſuch as the Pû and Tau, they are difficult to explain; The moſt ſkilful Chineſe ingeniouſly confeſſing that they can neither underſtand nor read them.

Some with Figures. Some of the ancient Coin being cover'd with Figures, are ſuppos'd to have been current in the earlieſt Ages; and that, to avoid the Labour and Expence, they afterwards were content with more ſimple Devices, ſuch as Characters are. There are three ſorts of them engraven, conſiſting of a Mixture of Silver and Tin. One of them, which is round, and weighs eight Taëls, repreſents a Dragon in the midſt of Clouds; on another, which is of a ſquare Form, and weighs ſix Taëls, there is a Horſe galloping; the third is oblong and ſhap'd like the Back of a Tortoiſe, with the Word Vang, that is, King, in every Compartment of it: this laſt weigh'd but four Taëls.

A certain Author attributes the Invention of this Money to Ching-tang, Founder of the Dynaſty of the Shang; the Characters on the Reverſe were defac'd. The Chineſe give a miſterious Senſe to theſe Figures: The Tortoiſe, ſay they, ſignifies thoſe who are attach'd to the Earth; the Horſe, ſuch as are leſs wedded to it, and riſe above it from Time to Time; and the flying Dragon repreſents thoſe who are intirely diſingag'd from earthly Things. There are other ancient Coins to be found, ſtampt with Dragons; doubtleſs, becauſe the Dragon is the Symbol of the Chineſe Nation, as the Eagle was of the Roman.

It is hard to aſſign what was the juſt Value of this ancient Money: tho' in my Opinion it ought to be determin'd by the Nature and Weight of the Metal. It is true that Regard has not always been had to that Rule; The Princes, who fix the Value, having often rais'd or lower'd it, as their own Occaſions requir'd, or the particular Species grew ſcarcer.

Chineſe Weights. But for the better underſtanding the Value of Money, whether ancient or modern, it muſt be obſerv'd, that the Chineſe Pound, call'd Lyang, is ſixteen Ounces; the Lyang nam'd by the Portugueſe Taels, is divided into ten Parts, call'd by the Chineſe Tſyen, and by the Portugueſe Maz; the Tſyen or Maz are divided into ten Fwen, which are equivalent to ten French Sous; and the Fwen or Sous is divided into ten Li of Silver. The Beam of the Chineſe Scales carries theſe Diviſions no farther; and yet with reſpect to Gold or Silver of a conſiderable Weight, the Diviſion is more minute, and almoſt extends to imperceptible Parts: for which Reaſon it is ſcarce poſſible to convey a juſt Idea of them in our Language. They divide the Li into ten Wha, the Wha into ten Se, the Se into ten Fû, the Fû into ten Chin, the Chin, which ſignifies a Grain of Duſt, into ten Yay, the Yay into ten Myau, the Myau into ten Mo, the Mo into ten Tſyun, and the Tſyun into ten Sun.

Value of the ancient Coin uncertain. This being known, it will be yet impoſſible to aſcertain the juſt Value of the ancient Coin: for tho' the Weight is mark'd thereon, ſome of them paſs'd for much more than their intrinſic Value came to. There was a Time when the Scarcity of Species oblig'd the Emperor to raiſe the Value of the very ſmall Copper Pieces ſo exceſſively, that one of them was worth ten of the ſame ſort, current in former Times. This has often occaſion'd popular Tumults, becauſe the Merchants rais'd the Price of Commodities in Proportion.

This Scarcity of Species happen'd either thro' the ſudden Irruption of Foreigners, who loaded whole Barks with this Coin, and carry'd it away; or elſe thro' the Cautiouſneſs of People, who bury'd it in time of War, and dy'd without diſcovering where it was hid. Copper was once ſo ſcarce, that the Emperor caus'd near fourteen hundred Temples of Fo, to be demoliſh'd, and all the Copper Images to be melted down in order to coin them into Money: at other times the People have been ſtrictly prohibited the Uſe of any Veſſels or other Utenſils of Copper, and oblig'd to deliver them in at the Mint.

Paper Money under the Ming, Matters were carry'd ſtill farther in the Beginning of the Reign of Hong-vû, Founder of the twenty ſecond Dynaſty, call'd Ming, when Money was become ſo very ſcarce, that they paid the Mandarins and Soldiers partly in Silver and partly in Paper; giving them a Sheet of Paper ſeal'd with an Imperial Seal, which paſs'd for a thouſand little Copper Pieces, or a Taël of Silver. Theſe Sheets are yet much ſought after, by ſuch as build, who hang them up as a Rarity to the chief Beam of the Houſe; the People and even ſome of the Quality being ſo ſimple as to imagine, that it preſerves it from all Misfortunes.

and the Fwen. Such Money as this could not have any great Run; Shop Keepers could never conſent to give their Commodities for a Scrap of Paper: So that the Quarrels, Law Suits, and other Inconveniences, which happen'd every Day, oblig'd the Emperor to put it down.

It had been introduc'd before with as little Succeſs under the Dynaſty of the Ywen: but Marco Polo is miſtaken in affirming, in the eighteenth Chapter of his ſecond Book, that the Bark of the Mulberry-Tree was employ'd to make the Paper which compos'd this Money; for ſuch Trees are too precious to be deſtroy'd by the Chineſe. In effect it was made of the Bark of the Kû-chû, a Tree of little Value, and full of Pith like the Elder, whereof they make a ſtronger Paper than that of Bambû.

Money, where coin'd. The Copper Money is not hammer'd as in Europe, but caſt, and is coin'd no where at preſent but at Court. Formerly indeed Money was coin'd at twenty two ſeveral Places, but then there there was an expreſs Order for it from the Emperor; and even at a Time when there were Princes ſo powerful that, not contented with the Quality of Duke, they aſſumed the Title of Kings, yet none of them ever durſt claim the Right of coining: the Money current in their Dominions, having always born the Emperor's Mark, however weak his Authority might have been.

Clipping and Coining how puniſh'd.

It is eaſy to judge that there would be many Debaſers of Money in China, if the Silver was coin'd as well as Copper, ſince their ſmall Pieces of Copper are ſo often counterfeited. The Chineſe, who follow this Trade, ſtamp the falſe Coin with the ſame Characters that are upon the true, but neither the Metal nor the Weight is ſo good. If they happen to be detected they ought to be put to Death by the Law: and yet ſome Princes have been contented with ordering the Hand to be cut off, others, with baniſhing the Offender; nay, in the Time of extraordinary Scarcity of this ſmall Money, ſome have wink'd at the counterfeit Coin, till it has been diſperſed all over the Empire, and then confiſcating it, have put it upon the ſame Foot with the Imperial Money. As the very ſmall Pieces are no longer current, ſuch as have any of them beat them out with a Hammer, till they are as broad as the Pieces now in Uſe; and being put upon a String among the reſt, are not perceiv'd by the Merchants. Nay, ſome have gone ſo far as to cut Paſteboard in the ſame Form, and mixt them with the reſt upon the String; and the Deceit is not perceiv'd till they come to lay out the Pieces ſeparately.

Ancient uncertain Coin.

Of the Coins anciently current in China, I have caus'd ſeveral to be engrav'd, of which no certain Account can be given: ſome belong to foreign Countries; but it is hard to determine what Countries, becauſe the Chineſe alter the Names ſo much that there is no Poſſibility of knowing them: for inſtance, they call Holland, Hung mau qua, The Kingdom of red-hair'd Men, becauſe they have ſeen ſome of the Dutch with fair Hair and red Beards. Now, How is it poſſible to find out any Country by ſuch a Mark? (A)

There is other Money whoſe Original is very uncertain: only it is conjectured that they belong'd either to the Tartars of Lyau-tong, who for a time were Maſters of the Province of Pe-che-li; or elſe to ſome great Lords, or petty Kings, who had revolted, and taken the Title of Emperor.

Superſtitious Coins.

In a word, there are certain Coins, with reſpect to which the People at preſent entertain ſuperſtitious Ideas, never thought of in the Ages when they were current. The Characters or Figures impreſs'd thereon, relate to Epocha's of Time, or Hiſtorical Facts, the Remembrance of which is loſt: ſuch is, for inſtance, the Coin ſtamped with the Long-whang and Ki-lin, two fabulous Animals, whereof the Chineſe relate a thouſand Stories. The firſt is a Bird frequently mention'd by us already; and the latter is, according to them, compos'd of different Parts of ſeveral Creatures: it has the Hight and Cheſt of an Ox; the Body is cover'd with broad hard Scales; it has a Horn in the middle of the Forehead, with Eyes and Whiſkers, like thoſe of the Chineſe Dragon. This Animal is the Symbol of the Military Mandarins of the firſt Order.

Kang-hi's Cabinet of Coins.

The late Emperor Kang-hi had a Cabinet wherein he had gather'd all Sorts of Coin, both ancient and modern; plac'd according to the Order of the Dynaſties, by the Care of a Mandarin call'd Tſyang, Preſident of the Academy of the chief Doctors of the Empire. The moſt ancient Coins in this curious Collection, are thoſe current in the Time of Yau. There are thoſe alſo of Ching-tang, the Founder of the Second Dynaſty; and a great Number belonging to the three celebrated Dynaſties (mention'd in the Canonical Book Shu-king) of Hya, Shang and Chew, eſpecially this laſt.

The ancient Coins not counterfeit.

If theſe Pieces of Money are not genuine, but were counterfeited in latter Times, they might as well have forged Money for all the Emperors of the firſt Dynaſties; but we find the Coin belonging to theſe latter Ages wanting, as well as thoſe of the moſt diſtant Times. It is true they have ſupply'd the Deficiency with Paſteboard Money, made according to the Idea the ancient Books give of thoſe old Coin; which indeed are ſo nicely imitated, as well with regard to Proportion of Parts as the Colour of the Metal, that this counterfeit Coin ſeems to be real. This Series of Coins is a concurrent Teſtimony of the Truth of the Chineſe Hiſtory; for who can doubt there was ſuch a Dynaſty, and ſuch an Emperor, ſince the Money coin'd in their Times has been preſerved for ſo many Ages by the Chineſe?

Of the Chineſe Trade.

Domeſtic Trade of China always flouriſhing.

THE Riches peculiar to each Province, and the Facility of conveying Merchandiſe, by Means of the Rivers and Canals, have render'd the domeſtic Trade of the Empire always very flouriſhing. As to its foreign Trade it is ſcarcely worth mentioning; for the Chineſe, finding among themſelves all Things neceſſary for the Support and Pleaſures of Life, ſeldom go far from home. So long as China was govern'd by Emperors of its own, the Ports were always ſhut up to Foreigners; but the Tartars, ſince they became Maſters thereof, have open'd them to all Nations: therefore, to give a full Account of the Chineſe Trade, it is neceſſary to ſpeak, as well of that which they carry on among themſelves, and with their Neighbours, as of that carried on by the Europeans with them.

(A) The Chineſe know Holland by that Name well enough, tho' we don't. So we know their Country by the Name of China: but what Chineſe, as we wrongly call them, could find it out by that Name? It is the ſame with regard to Preſter John's Country, the Mogol's Empire, Tartary, the Iſland of St. Laurence, Newfoundland, and innumerable other Places to which Europeans have given fantaſtic Names utterly unknown to the Natives.

Exceeds the Trade of all Europe together.

The inland Trade of China is ſo great, that the Commerce of all Europe is not to be compar'd therewith; the Provinces being like ſo many Kingdoms, which communicate to each other their reſpective Productions. This tends to unite the ſeveral Inhabitants among themſelves, and makes Plenty reign in all the Cities. The Provinces of Hû-quang and Kyang-ſi ſupply thoſe with Rice that are not well provided; that of Che-kyang furniſhes the fineſt Silk; Kyang-nan Varniſh, Ink, and all Sorts of curious Works; Yun-nan, Shen ſi, and Shan ſi, yield Iron, Copper, and ſeveral other Metals, Horſes, Mules, Furs, &c. Fo kyen produces Sugar, and the beſt Tea; Se-chiwen, Plants, Medicinal Herbs, Rhubarb, &c. and ſo of the reſt; for it is not poſſible to give a particular Account of the Commodities peculiar to each Province.

Is exceeding briſk,

All theſe Riches, which are readily convey'd from Place to Place along the Rivers, are ſold in a very ſhort Time; you may ſee, for inſtance, Dealers who, in three or four Days after their Arrival in a City, ſell ſix thouſand Caps proper for the Seaſon. Trade is never interrupted except on the two firſt Days of the firſt Moon, which they ſpend in Diverſions, and the uſual Viſits of the New Year: At all other Times every Thing is in Motion, as well in the Cities as in the Country. The Mandarins themſelves have their Share in Buſineſs; there being ſome among them who put their Money into the Hands of truſty Merchants, in order to improve it in the way of Trade.

even in the loweſt Branches.

In ſhort, there is not any Family to the very pooreſt of all, but what with a little good Management can find Means to ſubſiſt very eaſily by Traffic. There are many of them, whoſe whole Stock does not amount to above a Crown, and yet the Father and Mother, with two or three Children, are maintain'd out of the Profits of it, procure ſilk Garments for Days of Ceremony and in a few Years Time, enlarge their little Commerce to ſomething conſiderable. Although this may ſeem not very eaſy to comprehend, yet it is no more than what happens every Day: for inſtance, one of theſe ſmall Merchants, who has about fifty Sous, will buy Sugar, Meal, and Rice, and make ſmall Cakes, which he has bak'd an Hour or two before Day, to kindle, as they expreſs it, the Heart of Travellers; which done, his Shop is hardly open before all his Ware is carried off by Country People, who come in Crowds in a Morning to every City, by the Workmen, the Porters, the Children of the Ward, and thoſe who are in Law. This little Trade in a few Hours produces a Profit of twenty Sous, the half of which is ſufficient to maintain his ſmall Family.

Chineſe addicted to over-reaching.

In a word, the moſt frequented Fair affords but a faint Reſemblance of the incredible Crowds of People to be ſeen in the Generality of Cities, who are buſy in buying or ſelling all ſorts of Commodities. It were only to be wiſh'd the Chineſe Merchants were a little more honeſt in their Dealings, eſpecially when they trade with Foreigners; they always endeavour to ſell as dear as they can, and often make no Scruple of adulterating their Goods. Their Maxim is, that he who buys is for getting Things as cheap as poſſibly he can, and would even give nothing at all did the Seller conſent to it; and upon this Principle they think they have a Right on their Side to aſk the greateſt Price, and to take it if the Buyer is ſo ſimple or ignorant as to give it: It is not the Dealer who deceives, ſay they, It is the Buyer who deceives himſelf. The Buyer is under no Compulſion, and the Profit which the Merchant gets is the Fruit of his Induſtry. However, thoſe who act according to theſe deteſtable Principles, are the firſt in praiſing Honeſty and Diſintereſtedneſs in others; ſo that they ſtand ſelf-condemned.

Their Foreign Trade inconſiderable.

Trade flouriſhing at ſuch a Rate, as I have obſerv'd, in all the Provinces of China, it is not at all ſurprizing that the Inhabitants ſhould be ſo negligent of foreign Trade, eſpecially conſidering their Contempt for all other Nations: Thus by Sea they never paſs the Streights of Sonda, their fartheſt Voyages that Way reaching only to Batavia, which belongs to the Dutch; in like Manner on the Side of Malacca, they do not go beyond Achen, and the Limits of their Navigation Northwards is Japan; I ſhall therefore, as briefly as poſſible, mention the Places they trade to in thoſe Seas, as well as the Sorts of Merchandizes which they import and export.

That to Japan.

I. Japan is the Kingdom which they moſt frequent, and commonly ſet Sail for it in the Month of June or July at fartheſt. They firſt go to Kamboya or Siam, where they carry Goods proper for thoſe Countries, freighting themſelves there with ſuch as are in Requeſt at Japan; and at their Return home, find that they have made 200 per Cent. by their Voyage. If they go directly to Japan from the Ports of China, that is, Kan-ton, A-mwi, or Ning-po, then they export the following Merchandiſes: (1) Druggs, ſuch as Jin-ſeng, Birthwort, Rhubarb, Mirabolans, and ſuch like. (2) Areka Bark, White Sugar, Buffalo, and Cow-hides; as for Sugar they gain greatly by it, even ſometimes a thouſand per Cent. (3) All ſorts of Silks, but chiefly Sattins, Taffeties, and Damasks of different Colours, eſpecially black: ſome of theſe Pieces, which coſt but ſix Taëls in China, ſell at Japan for fifteen. (4) Silken Strings for Inſtruments, Eagle and Sandal Wood; there being a great Demand for it, on account of its Perfume, among the Japaneſe, who are continually cenſing their Images. (5) Laſtly, European Cloth and Camlets, which have a quick Sale: and tho' the Chineſe never export any unleſs they can ſell them there at the ſame Price as the Dutch do, yet they affirm they gain fifty per Cent. thereby; which ſhews how conſiderable the Profit of the Dutch muſt be.

The Commodities which the Chineſe Traders load with their Veſſels in Return, are Commodities brought from thence.

(1) Fine Pearls, which coſt more or leſs in Proportion to their Beauty and Bigneſs, gaining ſometimes a thouſand per Cent. by them. (2) Red Copper in Bars, which they buy from three Taëls to four and an half, ſelling them in China for ten or twelve; alſo wrought Copper, ſuch as Scales, Chafing-Diſhes, Perfuming Pans, Baſons, &c. theſe go off at a great Price in their own Country, the Copper being fine and agreeable to the Sight. (3) Sabre-Blades, they coſt but a Piaſter in Japan, and ſell ſometimes for ten Piaſters in China, where they are much eſteem'd. (4) Smooth flower'd Paper, of which the Chineſe make Fans. (5) Porcelain, which is very beautiful, but not ſo uſeful as that of China, becauſe it will not bear boiling Water; it is ſold in Japan much at the ſame Price as China Ware is ſold at Kan-ton. (6) Japann'd Works, which are not to be parallel'd in any part of the World. There is no ſettled Price for them: and the Chineſe ſeldom meddle with them, for fear they ſhould not get them off, but when they do import any, they ſell them extremely dear. A Cabinet not above two Foot high, and but a little more in Breadth, has been ſold in China for a hundred Piaſters. Thoſe who venture moſt to deal in them, are the Merchants of A-mwi and Ning-po; becauſe they carry them to Minilla and Batavia, gaining conſiderably by the Europeans, who are fond of theſe ſorts of Works. (7) Gold, which is very fine, and a certain Metal call'd Tombak, by which they gain fifty or ſixty per Cent. at Batavia.

Could the Europeans depend on the Honeſty of the Chineſe, they might eaſily carry on a Trade with Japan by their means: but they could not poſſibly do any good that way, unleſs they bore them Company, were Maſters of the Cargo, and had a ſufficient Force to prevent their Inſults.

Trade to Manilla.

II. The Chineſe alſo trade to Manilla: but ſcarce any go thither beſides the Merchants of A-mwi, who carry a great deal of Silk, ſtrip'd and flower'd Sattin of different Colours, Embroidery, Carpets, Cuſhions, Night-Gowns, Silk Stockings, Tea, China Ware, Japann'd Works, Druggs, &c. by which they are generally Gainers fifty per Cent, and bring back nothing but Piaſters.

Trade to Batavia.

III. The Trade which the Chineſe carry on the moſt regularly, as finding it moſt eaſy and gainful, is that to Batavia: whither Veſſels ſail every Year from Kan-ton, A-mwi, and Ning-po; putting to Sea towards the eleventh Moon, that is, in December. The Merchandiſes they are loaded with are:

Commodities carry'd thither,

(1) A kind of Green Tea, which is very fine, and of a good Smell, but Song-lo and Bohea Tea are not ſo much ſought after by the Dutch. (2) China Ware, which is ſold as cheap there as at Kan-ton. (3) Leaf-Gold and Gold Thread, which is nothing but gilt Paper; ſome of this is ſold not by Weight, but in ſmall Skains, and is dear, becauſe it is cover'd with the fineſt Gold: But that which the Chineſe bring to Batavia is ſold only by Weight. It is made up in Parcels, with large Hanks of red Silk, put in on Purpoſe to ſet off the Colour of the Gold, and to make the Parcels weigh heavier: The Dutch make no uſe of it, but they carry it to the Country of the Malayans, where they make conſiderable Profit of it. (4) Tútenak [or Tuttenague] a Metal, which partakes of the Nature both of Tin and Iron, yielding a hundred and ſometimes a hundred and fifty per Cent. (5) Druggs, eſpecially Rhubarb. (6) A great Quantity of Utenſils of yellow Copper, ſuch as Baſons, Chafing-Diſhes, great Kettles, &c.

They import from Batavia; (1) Silver in Piaſters. (2) Spices, particularly Pepper, Cloves, Nutmegs, &c. (3) Tortoiſe-Shells, of which the Chineſe make very neat Toys, and among other Combs, Boxes, Cups, Knife-Handles, Pipes, and Snuff-Boxes, after the European Faſhion, which they ſell for ten Sous. (4) Sandal-Wood; alſo red and black Wood, proper for Cabinet-Work, with another red Wood, commonly call'd Braſil-Wood, which ſerves for dying. (5) Agat-Stones, ready cut, whereof the Chineſe make Ornaments for their Girdles; Buttons for their Caps, and a kind of Neck-lace. (6) Yellow Amber in Lumps, which they buy very cheap. (7) Laſtly, European Cloth, which they have alſo at a moderate Price, and ſell again at Japan.

Trade to other Countries.

This is the greateſt Trade the Chineſe drive abroad. They likewiſe go, but very ſeldom, to Achen, Malacca, Ihor, Patana, Ligor, which belongs to the Kingdom of Siam, to Cochin-china, &c. The Trade they carry on at Ihor, is the moſt eaſy and profitable. They would not get even as much as would pay the Expence of their Voyage by going to Achen, if they fail'd of being there in November and December; at which time the Ships of Surat and Bengâl are upon the Coaſt.

Commodities brought from thence.

They ſeldom import any thing elſe from theſe Countries but Spices, ſuch as Pepper, Cinnamon, &c. Birds-Neſts, which are counted Delicacies at the Chineſe Tables, Rice, Camphire, Ratan, (a kind of very long Canes, which they twiſt together like ſmall Cords,) Torches made of the Leaves of certain Trees, that burn like Pitch, and ſerve for Flambeaux when they walk in the Night; alſo, Gold, Tin, &c.

Trade of the Europeans in China.

It remains only to ſpeak of the Trade carry'd on in China by the Europeans; who have the Liberty of ſcarce any Port, except that of Kan-ton, which is open to them at certain times of the Year. Not that they go up as far as the City itſelf, but caſt Anchor at Whang-pû, a Place about four Leagues ſhort of it, in the River; which there is ſo crouded with a Multitude of Veſſels, that it looks like a large Wood. Formerly Cloths, Chryſtals, Swords, Clocks, Striking-Watches, Repeating-Clocks, Teleſcopes, Looking-Glaſſes, Drinking-Glaſſes, &c. were carry'd thither. But ſince the Engliſh come regularly every Year, all theſe are as cheap as in Europe; and Coral itſelf can hardly be ſold there any longer without Loſs: ſo that at preſent there is no trading to Advantage with any thing but Silver in China, where conſiderable Profit may be made, by purchaſing Gold, which is a Commodity there.

Gold of China profitable.

The Gold to be met with at Kan-ton, comes partly out of the Provinces of China, and partly from foreign Countries, as Achen, Cochin-china, Japan, &c. and is all melted over-again in that City, except what comes from Cochin-china; which is commonly the moſt fine and pure that can be, when it is bought of the King of that Country: for that ſold clandeſtinely by the People is not ſo pure, and therefore they take Care to refine it at Kan-ton. The Chineſe divide their Gold by Alloys as they do in Europe. That which is commonly ſold, is from ninety Carats to a hundred, and is more or leſs dear, according to the time when it was bought. It is much cheaper in March, April, and May, than it is from July to January; becauſe this laſt is the Seaſon when there is the greateſt number of Veſſels in the Port or Road of Kan-ton.

Other Commodities imported by Europeans,

There are alſo excellent Drugs to be bought in China, ſeveral ſorts of Tea, Gold-Thread, Muſk, precious Stones, Pearls, Quickſilver, &c. but the Trade carry'd on there by the Europeans, conſiſts chiefly in japann'd Works, China Ware, and Silks, with reſpect to which I ſhall treat more at large in the following Articles.

Of the Chineſe Varniſh.

Places moſt famous for varniſh'd Works.

THOUGH the varniſh'd Works, made at Kan-ton, are neither ſo beautiful nor ſerviceable by a great deal, as thoſe that come from Japan, Tong-king, and Nan-king, Capital of the Province of Kyang-nan: it is not that the Workmen do not employ the ſame ſort of Varniſh and Gilding, but becauſe they fit them up too haſtily; and then if they do but pleaſe the Eye of the Europeans, they are well enough content. To japan a Piece of Work well, it ought to be done at Leiſure, a whole Summer being ſcarcely ſufficient to bring it to Perfection; but the Chineſe have rarely any by them that were made a conſiderable time beforehand; for they almoſt always wait till the Arrival of Ships, before they begin, that they may do them according as the Europeans ſhall direct.

This Varniſh which gives ſo fine a Luſtre to their Works, and makes them ſo much eſteem'd in Europe, is neither a Compoſition, nor ſo great a Secret as ſome have imagin'd; to undeceive whom, it will be ſufficient to give an Account where the Chineſe get it, and afterwards how they uſe it.

The Varniſh-Trees.

The Varniſh, call'd Tſi, is a reddiſh Gum, diſtilling from certain Trees, by means of Inciſions made in the Bark. Theſe Trees are found in the Provinces of Kyang-ſi and Si-chwen, but thoſe of the Diſtrict of Kan-chew, one of the moſt Southern Cities of Kyang-ſi, yield that which is moſt eſteem'd.

When in their Prime.

The Varniſh ought not to be drawn till the Trees are of ſeven or eight Years Growth, for that which is procur'd before, is not ſo fit for Uſe. The Trunk of the youngeſt Tree, from whence they begin to draw it, is a Chineſe Foot in Circumference, and the Chineſe Foot is much larger than the King's Foot in France. It is ſaid that the Varniſh of ſuch Trees is better than that which diſtills from thoſe older, but that they yield much leſs: yet, whether there be any Foundation for this Report, is uncertain, becauſe the Merchants make no Scruple to mix them both together.

Their Shape and Size.

Theſe Trees, whoſe Leaf and Bark are very like thoſe of the Aſh, are ſcarce ever more than fifteen Feet high; and when they are of that Growth, the Trunk is about two Foot and an half in Compaſs. It is affirm'd that they bear neither Flowers nor Fruit, and that they multiply in the manner following:

How propagated.

In the Spring, when the Tree begins to ſprout, they chooſe the moſt promiſing Sprig that proceeds from the Trunk, not from the Branches; and when it is about a Foot long, they coat it with yellow Clay. This Coat begins about two Inches above the Place where it riſes, and reaches four or five Inches lower: It is at leaſt three Inches thick, is laid on very cloſe, and cover'd with a Mat carefully ty'd about it, to ſecure it from Rain, and the Injuries of the Air. It is left in this manner from the Vernal to the Autumnal Equinox, and then they open the Earth a very little way, to examine the Condition of the Roots, which the Sprig uſually ſhoots forth, and are divided into ſeveral Strings. If theſe Strings are of a yellowiſh or reddiſh Colour, they judge that it is time to ſeparate the Sprig from the Tree, and then they cut it dexterouſly without doing it the leaſt Damage, and afterwards plant it. But if the Strings are ſtill white, it is a Sign they are too tender, and ſo they cloſe up the Coat again, and defer cutting the Shoot till the next Spring. But whether it is planted in the Spring, or Autumn, a good deal of Aſhes muſt be put into the Hole, prepar'd for that Purpoſe; otherwiſe the Piſmires, as they affirm, would devour the tender Roots, or at leaſt get out all the Sap, and ſo cauſe them to wither.

The Varniſh when and how drawn off.

The Varniſh is to be procured from theſe Trees only in the Summer Seaſon; for in the Winter they yield none, and that which diſtils in the Spring or Autumn, is always mix'd with Water: beſides, they yield it only in the Night-time, and never in the Day. In order to draw out the Varniſh, they make ſeveral horizontal Inciſions in the Bark, round the Trunk, which are either deeper or ſhallower, according to its Thickneſs. The firſt Row of Inciſions is but ſeven Inches from the Ground, the ſecond is at the ſame Diſtance above the firſt; and thus at the end of every ſeven Inches there is a Row of Inciſions, not only to the Top of the Trunk, but even along ſuch of the Branches as are of a ſufficient Thickneſs to bear it.

They uſe a little Knife with a ſemicircular Blade to make theſe Inciſions, which muſt not be done directly downward, but ſlanting, nor deeper than the Bark is thick. While the Operator makes them with one Hand, he thruſts the Edge of a Shell, which he has in the other, as far in as he can, that is, about half a Chineſe Inch; and this is ſufficient to ſupport the Shell without any thing elſe. Theſe Shells are very common in China, and much larger than our biggeſt Oyſter-Shells. The Inciſions being made in the Evening, next Morning they gather what is run into the Shells; in the Evening they fix them again in the ſame Inciſions, and continue ſo doing till the end of the Summer. The Proprietors of theſe Trees do not uſually draw off the Varniſh themſelves, but let them for the Seaſon at the Rate of two pence half-penny a Foot to Merchants; who hire Labourers to attend, giving them an Ounce of Silver a Month, if they find their own Victuals, which is moſt common, if not, then they have but three half-pence a Day. One of theſe Labourers is ſufficient to take care of fifty Feet of Tree.

Cautions to be taken by thoſe who draw off the Varniſh.

It is neceſſary to uſe ſome Precautions, to ſecure the Labourers from the bad Effects of the Varniſh; ſo that whether the Merchants maintain them or not, they are oblig'd to have a large Veſſel of Oil, wherein has been boil'd a certain Quantity of the Fleſhy Filaments which are found intermix'd with the Fat of Hogs, and remain after the Fat has been melted: The Proportion is one Ounce to a Pound of Oil. When the Workmen go to place the Shells in the Trees, they carry with them a little of this Oil, wherewith they rub the Face and Hands; and in the Morning, when they have gather'd the Varniſh, and return to the Merchants, they rub themſelves more carefully with it. After Dinner they waſh their Bodies with hot Water, prepar'd by the Merchant, wherein has been boil'd a certain Quantity of the following Drugs, viz. the outward rough Shell of Cheſnuts, the Bark of the Fir-Tree, Salt-Petre in Cryſtals, and a Sort of Blits, an Herb eaten in China and the Indies; all which are ſuppos'd to be of a cold Nature. With this Water every Labourer waſhes himſelf very carefully, in a little Tin Baſon; for they will not uſe the common Copper Baſons, wherein the Chineſe uſually waſh their Faces in the Morning, having ſome Objection to that Metal.

During the time they are at work at the Trees, their Heads are cover'd with a Linen Bag, ty'd about their Necks, wherein are only two Holes for their Eyes; before them they wear a ſort of Apron, made of Doe-Skin, which is hung about their Necks with Strings, and ty'd round their Middles; they have alſo Buſkins of the ſame, and long Gloves on their Arms. When they gather this Varniſh, they have a Veſſel made of Neat's Leather, faſten'd to their Girdle; then with one Hand they take out the Shells, and ſcrape them with a ſmall Iron Inſtrument, which they hold in the other, till they have got out all the Varniſh: at the Bottom of the Tree is a Baſket, wherein they leave the Shells till the Evening. To facilitate coming at the Varniſh, the Proprietors take care to plant the Trees not far aſunder; and when the Time of gathering it is come, they lay a great number of Poles from one to another, which faſten'd with Cords ſerve inſtead of Ladders to get up by.

Quantity of Varniſh at one gathering.

The Merchant has always ready at his Houſe, a great earthen Veſſel, plac'd under a ſquare wooden Frame, like that of a Table, ſupported by four Feet. On the Frame is a thin Cloth, (whoſe four Corners are faſten'd to Rings,) lay'd very ſlack, whereon they pour the Varniſh; and when the fluid part has run through, they wring out the reſt, all but a little that remains behind, which is ſold to the Druggiſts, as being ſometimes us'd in Phyſic. They are well enough ſatisfy'd with their Bargain, when a thouſand Trees in one Night yield twenty Pound of Varniſh. After the Gathering is over, the Merchant puts the Varniſh in wooden Buckets, well caulk'd on the Outſide, faſtening on the Covers with ſtrong Nails. A Pound of Varniſh while it is freſh, is valu'd at about forty Sous; and the Merchant gains double or more, according to the Diſtance of the Place to which it is carry'd.

Diſeaſe cauſed by the effluvia of the Varniſh.

The Labourers pay very dear for gathering the Varniſh, if they do not take the above-mention'd Precautions. The Diſeaſe begins with a kind of Ringworm, which in the Space of a Day covers the whole Body, Face and all, for it ſpreads in a few Hours, and grows very red. Soon after the Perſon's Face becomes bloated, and his Body, which ſwells to an extraordinary Degree, ſeems quite cover'd with a Leproſy. To heal a Man attack'd with this Diſtemper, they give him immediately a conſiderable Quantity of the aforeſaid medicinal Water for waſhing with to prevent theſe Accidents, which purges him violently: they afterwards make for him a ſtrong Fumigation with the ſame Water, wrapping him up very cloſe. By this means the Swelling is remov'd, but the Skin is not ſo ſoon heal'd; for it cracks in ſeveral places, from whence proceeds a great deal of Water. To remedy this, they take of the Herb that I call'd above a kind of Blits, dry and burn it; then upon the part moſt affected they put the Aſhes, which imbibing the ſharp Humour, the chopp'd Skin dries and falls off, a new Skin ſucceeding in place of it.

Excellencies of the Varniſh.

The Chineſe Varniſh, beſides the Beauty it gives to the ſmalleſt Piece of Work it is apply'd to, has likewiſe the Property of preſerving the Wood, and hindering the leaſt Moiſture from entring it: Pour whatever Liquor you pleaſe upon it, and only wipe it with a wet Cloth, and there will remain neither Mark nor Smell behind. But then there is a great Art in uſing it: for let it be ever ſo good in its Kind, yet there is ſtill need of a dextrous and careful Hand to apply it. The Workman ought to be Maſter of a great deal of Patience as well as Skill, to find the juſt Temper that the Varniſh requires; for if it be either too thick or too thin, he will make but very indifferent Work of it.

How uſed in Japaning.

The Varniſh is apply'd in two different Manners; the one, which is moſt ſimple, is immediately upon the Wood: After it has been well poliſh'd, they do it over two or three times with Tong-yew, a kind of Oil; and when it is well dry'd, lay on their Varniſh as often. It is ſo tranſparent that the Grain of the Wood appears clearly through it; and therefore if they would conceal the Materials they work upon, they lay on the Varniſh a great number of times, and then it becomes ſo gloſſy that it reſembles a Looking-Glaſs. When the Work is dry, they paint ſeveral ſorts of Figures with Gold or Silver, ſuch as Flowers, Men, Birds, Trees, Mountains, Palaces, &c. over which they lay Varniſh once more, but lightly, both to preſerve and give it a Gloſs.

The other Manner, which is not ſo plain, requires more preparation, for it is laid upon a kind of Maſtic, or Paſte-board, compos'd of Paper, Flax, Lime, and ſome other Materials; which being well beaten together, and glu'd upon the Wood, makes a Ground very ſmooth and firm: on this they paſs the Oil before mention'd two or three times, and then apply ſeveral Lays of Varniſh, letting each dry one after another. Every Workman has his own way of doing things, which are more or leſs perfect according to his Skill. (A)

To reſtore its loſt Colour and Luſtre.

It often happens that by ſpilling Tea and other hot Liquors upon theſe Japan'd Works, they loſe their Luſtre, becauſe the Varniſh grows dull, and turns yellow. "The Means, (ſays "a Chineſe Author) to give it the ſhining Black that it had before, is to expoſe it for a "Night to a white Froſt, or elſe, which is better, to hold it for ſome time in the Sun."

Of the Porcelain or China-Ware.

Porcelain or China-Ware,

PORCELAIN, which is the moſt common Furniture us'd by the Chineſe, and the chief Ornament of their Houſes, has been ſo much ſought after in Europe, and ſtill makes ſo great a Branch of its Trade, that it will not be amiſs to acquaint the Reader with the Manner of making it. Some Authors pretend that it is compos'd of Egg-Shells, or of Shells of a certain Fiſh, bury'd in the Earth for twenty or thirty, or even a hundred Years. But this is mere Invention of ſuch Writers, who have boldly palm'd their own ſilly Conjectures on the World, in many other Particulars alſo, concerning China; of which they have given the moſt falſe, and often the moſt ridiculous Accounts.

made only at King-te-ching in Kyang ſi.

China-Ware is made no where but in one Town of the Province of Kyang-ſi, nam'd King-te-ching, which is a League in Length, containing upwards of a Million of Souls. It is not above three Miles diſtant from Few-lyang, a City of the third Rank, whereon it depends, lying in the Diſtrict of Jau-chew, one of the Cities of the firſt Rank in the Province. As P. Dentrecolles had a Church in King-te-ching, and among his Converts there were ſeveral, who both made China-Ware, and drove a conſiderable Trade in it, he obtain'd from them an exact Knowledge relating to every Branch of this curious Art. Beſides this, he has ſeen every thing himſelf, and conſulted the Chineſe Books that treat on this Subject, eſpecially the Hiſtory or Annals of Few-lyang: for it is a Cuſtom in China for every City to print a Hiſtory of its Diſtrict, comprehending its Situation, Extent, and the Nature of the Country; an Account of the Manners of the Inhabitants, and the Perſons diſtinguiſh'd for Arms, Learning, or Integrity of Life; the extraordinary Events, and eſpecially the Merchandizes and Proviſions which are exported or ſold there.

Curious Account of it by P. Dentrecolles.

Its Inventor unknown.

This Miſſionary has ſearch'd in vain to find out the Inventor of China-Ware, for the Annals ſay nothing of him, nor whether the Diſcovery was owing to Chance or Experience. They only ſay, that it was exquiſitely white, without any Defect; and that whatever was tranſported into other Kingdoms, had no other Name but The precious Jewels of Jau-chew. And lower it is added, The fine China-Ware, which is of a lively ſhining White, and a clear Sky-Blue, comes all from King-te-ching. It is made in other Places, but it is of a quite different Colour and Fineneſs.

Attempts to make it elſewere fruitleſs

In ſhort (not to ſpeak of the other ſort of Earthen-Ware made all over China, but to which they never give the Name of Porcelain) there are ſome Provinces, as thoſe of Kan-ton and Fo-kyen, where they make Porcelain, but Strangers cannot be deceiv'd therein; for that of Fo-kyen is as white as Snow, but has no Gloſs, and is not painted with various Colours. The Workmen of King-te-ching formerly carry'd thither all their Materials, in hopes of being conſiderable Gainers, by reaſon of the great Trade then driven by the Europeans at A-mwi; but they loſt their Labour, for they could never make it there with Succeſs.

The Emperor Kang-hi, who deſir'd to know every thing, caus'd ſome Workmen in Porcelain to be brought to Pe-king, and every thing proper for that Manufacture. They did their utmoſt to ſucceed, being under the Prince's Eye, and yet we are aſſur'd that their Work fail'd. It is is poſſible the Reaſons of Intereſt and Policy had a Hand in the Miſcarriage; but however that be, King-te-ching alone has the Honour of ſupplying all parts of the World with Porcelain; even the Japaneſe come to China for it.

Every thing that relates to China-Ware, ſays P. Dentrecolles (B), (for it is he who ſpeaks in the reſt of this Article) may be reduc'd to the following Heads: viz. The Materials whereof it is compos'd, and how they are prepar'd; the different Kinds of Porcelain, and the Manner of making it; the Oil which gives it the Gloſs, and its Qualities; the Colours which embelliſh it, and the Art of laying them on; the Baking, and Meaſures taken to give it a proper Degree of Heat; laſtly, I ſhall make ſome Reflections on the ancient and modern Porcelain, as alſo on certain things, which render it impracticable for the Chineſe to imitate thoſe Paterns that have been or may be ſent them. Heads treated of in this Article.

But before I begin, it may be proper to undeceive thoſe who imagine that the Name of Porcelain comes from a Chineſe Word. Indeed there are ſome Words, tho' but very few in number, which are both French and Chineſe: Thé [or Tea] for Inſtance, as we call it, is likewiſe call'd Thé in the Province of Fo-kyen, tho' the Name in the Mandarin Language is Cha. Papa and Ma ma, are likewiſe Words, which in ſome Provinces, and particularly at King-te-ching, are in the Mouths of Children, and ſignify Father and Mother. But as for the Name of Porcelain, it is ſo far from being Chineſe, that none of the Syllables whereof it is compos'd, can be either pronounc'd or written by the Chineſe; the Sounds not being to be found in their Language. It is likely that the Word came from the Portugueſe, notwithſtanding that with them Porcellana ſignifies properly a Cup or Porrenger; and that Loça is the Name they generally give to the Ware, which we call Porcelain, and the Chineſe commonly Tſe-ki. Porcelain no Chineſe Word

I. The Materials of China-Ware, and how prepar'd.

THE Matter of Porcelain conſiſts of two ſorts of Earth, one call'd Pe tun tſe, and the other Kau lin: This latter is mix'd with ſhining Particles, the other is ſimply white, and very fine to the Touch. At the ſame time that a great number of Barks aſcend the River from Jau-chew to King-te-ching, in order to load with China-Ware, nearly as many ſmall ones deſcend from Ki-mwen, laden with Pe-tun-tſe and Kau-lin, in form of Bricks; for King-te-ching produces no Materials fit for Porcelain. Porcelain made of two ſorts of Earth.

The Pe-tun-tſe, whoſe Grain is ſo very fine, is nothing elſe but pieces of Rock, dug out of Quarries, and made into that Form. All ſorts of Stones are not proper for Pe-tun-tſe, otherwiſe there would be no Occaſion to go twenty or thirty Leagues diſtant in the next Province to look for it. The Chineſe ſay the right Stones ought to have a greeniſh Caſt. 1. The Pe-tun-tſe.

The firſt Preparation is in the following manner: They break the Stone with great Iron Mallets, and putting the Pieces into Mortars, reduce them to very fine Powder, by help of certain Peſtles, the Head whereof is made of Stone, and capp'd with Iron. Theſe Peſtles work without ceaſing, being put in Motion, either by the Labour of Men, or elſe by means of Water, in the ſame manner as the Hammers of Paper-Mills. They afterwards caſt the Powder into a great Jar full of Water, and ſtirr it up ſtrongly with an Iron Shovel; then having reſted a few Minutes, there riſes on the Surface a ſort of Cream four or five Fingers thick, which they take off, and pour into another Veſſel full of Water. In this manner they agitate the Water in the firſt Jar ſeveral times, ſtill gathering what ſwims on the Top, till there remains nothing but the groſs part, which they take out and pound afreſh. how prepar'd

With reſpect to the ſecond Jar, wherein that is caſt which was gather'd from the firſt, they wait till there is form'd at the Bottom a kind of Paſte, and when the Water appears clear at Top, they pour it gently off, that the Sediment may not be diſturb'd, and throw the Paſte into large Moulds to dry: But before it is quite hard, they divide it into ſmall Bricks, which they ſell by hundreds; and to this Shape, and its Colour, it owes the Name of Pe-tun-tſe. The Moulds wherein this Paſte is thrown, are a kind of large Boxes, whoſe Bottoms are cover'd with Bricks, plac'd upright, ſo as to make an even Surface, over which they lay a thick Cloth; then they pour in the Matter, which they cover ſoon after with another Cloth, and place thereon a ſecond Bed of Bricks, laid cloſe together flatwiſe: All this is done to get out the Water more readily, without loſing any thing of the Subſtance, which as it grows hard, eaſily takes the Figure of the Bricks. Reduced to a Paſte, and then made into Bricks.

There would be nothing to add to this Article, if the Chineſe were not addicted to adulterate their Goods; but People who roll ſmall Grains of Paſte in Pepper Powder, in order to mix them with the true Pepper, are not willing to ſell Pe-tun-tſe unmix'd with groſſer Matter; for which reaſon they are oblig'd to purify it again at King-te-ching, before they uſe it.

The Kau-lin, which is another component part of Porcelain, requires ſomewhat leſs Labour in the Preparation than the Pe-tun-tſe: They find Mines of it in the Heart of certain Mountains, whoſe Surface is cover'd with a reddiſh Earth. Theſe Mines are pretty deep, and the Matter we are ſpeaking of is found in Lumps, which they make into Bricks, in the ſame manner as the Pe-tun-tſe. I do not at all doubt that the white Earth of Malta, call'd St. Paul's Earth, is of much the ſame Nature with the Kau-lin, tho' the ſmall ſhining Particles have not been 2. The Kau-lin. Like the white Earth of Malta.

(B) This Account is taken from the Lettres Edifiantes, where there are two Pieces written by this Jeſuit on the Subject.

Its Quality. obſerv'd in it. The fine Porcelain receives its Firmneſs from the Kau-lin, which is as it were the Sinews thereof; and thus the Mixture of a ſoft Earth gives Strength to the Pe-tun-tſe, which is got from the hardeſt Rocks. A rich Merchant inform'd me that ſome Years ago the Engliſh or Dutch (for the Chineſe Name is common to both (c) Nations) bought a Quantity of the Pe-tun-tſe, and carry'd it into their Country, to make China-Ware; but that having forgot the Kau-lin, their Deſign miſcarry'd, as they afterwards own'd: On which Occaſion the Chineſe Merchant ſaid with a Laugh, that They would have a Body, whoſe Fleſh ſhould be ſupported without Bones.

A third ingredient or kind of Chalk. They have lately found out another proper Ingredient in the Compoſition of China-Ware, which is a Stone, or kind of Crayon, call'd Wha-ſhê, whereof a ſort of Ptiſan is made by the Chineſe Phyſicians, who reckon it deterſive, opening and cooling. They take ſix parts of this Stone, and one of Liquorice, which they pulveriſe; and putting half a Spoonful of the Powder into a Cup of freſh Water, give it the Patient to drink, pretending that this Ptiſan cools the Blood, and allays the internal Heat. The Perſons concern'd in this Manufactory have thought fit to uſe this Stone in the room of Kau-lin; and perhaps thoſe parts of Europe that yield no Kau-lin may furniſh Wha-ſhê. It is call'd Wha, becauſe it is glutinous, and partakes ſomething of the Nature of Sope. The China-Ware that is made with it, is ſcarce, and much Its Qualities. dearer than the other. The Grain of it is exceeding fine, and as for the Painting, if compar'd with ordinary China-Ware, it as far exceeds it as Vellum does Paper; beſides this China-Ware is ſo light, that it ſurpriſes one who is accuſtom'd to handle the other Sorts: It is likewiſe much more brittle than the common, and it is difficult to hit upon the true Degree of baking it. Some do not make uſe of the Wha-ſhê for the Body of the Work; contenting themſelves with making a fine Glue of it, wherein they dip the Porcelain when it is dry, that it may take one Lay before it receives the Colour and Varniſh, by which means it acquires a good deal of Beauty.

How prepared. I ſhall now explain the Manner of working the Wha-ſhê. (1) When they have taken it out of the Mine, they waſh it in River or Rain-Water, to ſeparate the remainder of yellow Earth that ſticks to it. (2) They then break it, and put it into a Tub of Water to diſſolve, preparing it in the ſame manner as the Kau-lin. It is affirm'd that Porcelain may be made with Wha-ſhê alone, prepar'd in this manner, without any Mixture. However, one Uſed either alone or mixed. of my Converts, who had made ſome of this Kind, told me, that to eight parts of Wha-ſhê he puts two parts of Pe-tun-tſe; and that for the reſt he proceeded in the ſame manner as when he made the common China-Ware, with the Pe-tun-tſe and Kau-lin. In this new kind of Porcelain the Wha-ſhê ſupplies the Place of the Kau-lin: but one is much dearer than the other, for a Load of Kau-lin coſt but twenty Sous, whereas that of the Wha-ſhê ſtands in a Crown; ſo that no wonder this ſort of China-Ware ſhould be dearer than the common.

Alſo for painting Figures. I ſhall add one Obſervation more concerning Wha-ſhê: When it is prepar'd and made into little Bricks like the Pe-tun-tſe, they diſſolve a certain Quantity of them in Water; and making a very clear Paſte of it, with a Pencil dipp'd therein trace ſeveral Fancies upon the Porcelain, to which, after it is dry, they give the Varniſh. When it is bak'd theſe Deſigns appear, being of a different White from that of the Body of the Ware, and not unlike a thin Vapour, ſpread over the Surface. The White of the Wha-ſhê is call'd White of Ivory, Syang ya pe.

Another Mineral for painting white. They paint Figures on the Porcelain, alſo with She-kau, a kind of Stone or Mineral like Allum, which gives another kind of white Colour, and is particular in this, that before it is prepar'd it muſt be burnt in the Fire; afterwards they break it, and manage it like the Wha-ſhê: they throw it into a Veſſel full of Water, ſtir it about, and gather the Cream that ſwims on the Top from time to time; and when this is done they find a pure Maſs, which they uſe in the ſame manner as the puriſy'd Wha-ſhê.

The She-kau does not enter into the Compoſition of Porcelain; for nothing yet has been found proper to ſupply the Place of the Kau-lin, and give Conſiſtence to the Ware, but the Wha-ſhê. If, as they tell me, more than two parts of Pe-tun-tſe be put to eight of Wha-ſhê, the Porcelain will ſink down in the Oven, for want of a Body, or rather, becauſe there is not a proper Coheſion of the Parts.

2. The Oil which gives the Gloſs to the Porcelain.

The Oil of Stone or Varniſh, for glazing the Porcelain. BESIDES the Barks loaded with Pe-tun-tſe and Kau-lin, which lye along the Bank-ſide at King-te-ching, there are others full of a whitiſh liquid Subſtance. I knew a great while ago, that this was an Oil which gives the Ware its Whiteneſs and Gloſs, but was ignorant what it was made of; a thing I have ſince learn'd. The Chineſe Name Yew, given to different Sorts of Oil, ſeems not ſo ſuitable to this Liquid, as the Tſi, which ſignifies Varniſh, as I believe it would be call'd in Europe. This Oil or Varniſh is procur'd from a very hard Stone; but this is no ſtrange thing, ſince it is pretended that Stones are form'd of the Salts and Oils of the Earth, which mix and unite intimately together.

Tho'

(c) That is, I ſuppoſe, The Red-hair'd Men. See before p. 333.

Tho' Oil may be gotten from the Stone, whereof the Pe-tun-tſe are made, yet they chooſe this ſort, becauſe it is whiter, and the Spots are of a deeper Green. The Hiſtory of Few lyang, tho' it does not enter into particulars, ſays, the Stone proper for the Oil has Spots of the Colour of Cypreſs Leaves, Pe ſhu ye pan; or red Marks on a browniſh ground, much like the Plant call'd Toad-flax, Ju chi ma tang.

How prepar-ed.

After this Stone has been very well waſh'd, it muſt be prepar'd in the ſame manner as the Pe-tun-tſe: And when the Cream, or pureſt part of the Matter in the firſt Jar, or Veſſel, has been put into the ſecond, to about a hundred Pounds thereof, they add a Pound of She-kau, made red-hot in the fire, and beaten ſmall. This is, as it were, the Runnet which gives it a Conſiſtence, tho' they take care to keep it always liquid.

Oil of Lime and Fern Aſhes.

This Oil of Stone is never uſed alone, but is mixed with another, which is, as it were, the Soul of it, and compoſed as follows: They take large pieces of Quick-Lime, whereon they throw a little Water with their Hands to reduce it to a Powder; over this they ſpread a Lay of dry Fern, and over that again another of Lime. Having thus put on ſeveral Lays, alternately one upon another, they ſet Fire to the Fern; and when the whole is conſum'd, divide the Aſhes between five or ſix new Lays of dry Fern: or if there be more of them the Oil will be ſo much the better.

Heretofore, ſays the Hiſtory of Few-lyang, beſides Fern, they made uſe of the Wood of a Tree, the Fruit of which is call'd Se-tſe. To judge from the roughneſs of the Fruit before it is ripe, and by its little Crown, it ſeems to be a kind of Medlar. They now make no uſe of it, perhaps becauſe it is become exceeding ſcarce; and probably it is for want of this Wood that the China-Ware made at preſent is not ſo beautiful as it was formerly. The nature of the Lime and Fern contributes to the goodneſs of the Oil; and I have obſerv'd that what comes from ſome Places is much more valuable than that which is brought from others.

How prepar-ed and mixed with the former.

When they have gotten a ſufficient quantity of the Aſhes of Lime and Fern, they throw them into a Veſſel full of Water. In a hundred Pounds of it they diſſolve a Pound of She-kau, then ſtirring the Mixture very well, let it reſt till there appears upon the Surface a Skin or Cruſt; which they gather and put into a ſecond Veſſel, repeating the whole ſeveral times. When there is form'd a kind of liquid Paſte at the bottom of the ſecond Jar, they prepare it, pouring off the Water very gently; and this is the ſecond Oil, which is to be mixt with the preceding. In order to have a proper Mixture, the two kinds of Oil ought to be equally thick; for which reaſon they from time to time dip ſmall Bricks of Pe-tun-tſe into both, in order to diſcover by their Surface, when drawn out, whether the Oil be of an equal Conſiſtence. So much for the Quality of theſe two ſorts of Oils: As to the Quantity, the beſt way is to mix ten Meaſures of Oil of Stone, with one Meaſure of that made of the Aſhes of Fern and Lime; thoſe who are moſt ſparing, never put in leſs than three Meaſures. If the Merchants who ſell this Oil are inclin'd to tricking, they may eaſily increaſe the Quantity, only putting Water into it; and to conceal the Fraud, adding She-kau in proportion, which hinders the Matter from being too liquid.

Varniſh of burnt Gold.

There is another kind of Varniſh call'd Tſi kin yew, that is, Varniſh of burn'd Gold: but I ſhould rather call it Varniſh of the Colour of Caſt Braſs, or Coffee, or of a dead Leaf. To make this Varniſh, which is a new Invention, they take common yellow Earth, and manage it in the ſame manner as the Pe-tun-tſe; and when this Earth is prepar'd, they uſe none but the fineſt Matter, which they caſt into Water, and make a kind of Glue of, about the thickneſs of the common Varniſh call'd Pe-yew, made of pieces of Rock-ſtone. Theſe two Varniſhes Tſi-kin and Pe-yew are mix'd together; and as for this purpoſe they ought to be of an equal Conſiſtence, trial is made thereof by dipping a Pe-tun tſe into each ſort, and if the Varniſhes enter the Bricks, they are deem'd fit for incorporating. They likewiſe put into the Tſi-kin, Varniſh, or the Oil of Lime and Fern-Aſhes prepar'd as above, and of the ſame Conſiſtence as the Pe-yew; mixing more or leſs of theſe two Varniſhes with the Tſi-kin, according as they would have it deeper or clearer; to know which ſeveral Trials muſt be made: For inſtance, they put two Cups full of the Tſi-kin to eight of the Pe-yew, and to four Cups full of this Mixture they put one Cup of Varniſh made of Lime and Fern.

Art of gilding and painting with Violet Colour lately invented.

A few Years ago they found the Art to paint with the Tſwi, that is, with the Violet-Colour, and to gild the China-Ware. They have alſo try'd to make a mixture of Leaf-Gold with Varniſh and Powder of Flint, which might be apply'd in the ſame manner as they do the red Oil: but this Attempt did not ſucceed, and they found that the Varniſh Tſi-kin look'd more beautiful and gloſſy. At one time they made Cups, applying the gilt Varniſh on the Outſide, and the pure white within: But they have varied their Method ſince. Thus upon a Cup or Veſſel, which they deſigned to varniſh with the Tſi-kin, they ſtuck on a round or ſquare piece of wet Paper in one or two Places; then having laid on the Tſi-kin, they took off the Papers, and painted the Places with red or blue, varniſhing thoſe Parts alſo when the Ware was dry. Some fill'd up theſe empty Spaces with a blue or black Ground, in order to gild them after the firſt Baking.

3. Manner of making China-Ware.

China Manufactory at King-te-ching.

BEFORE I ſhew the Method of uſing this Oil, or rather Varniſh, it will be proper to give an Account how China-Ware is made: in doing which I ſhall begin with the Work that goes forward in the leaſt frequented Part of King te ching. There, in a Place encompaſs'd paſs'd with Walls, they have built vaſt Pent-Houſes, wherein appears abundance of Earthen Veſſels in rows one above another. Within this incloſure an infinite number of Workmen live and work, each having his particular Taſk. One Piece of China-Ware, before it is fit for the Furnace, paſſes through the Hands of above twenty Perſons without the leaſt Confuſion, they having doubtleſs found that by ſuch means the Work goes on the faſter.

Pe-tun-tſe and Kau lin how purify'd.

The firſt Labour conſiſts in purifying the Pe-tun-tſe and Kau-lin, from the groſs Parts it abounds with when it comes to them. To this end they break the Pe-tun-tſe in Pieces, and throw it into a Veſſel full of Water, ſtirring it about with a large Spatula till it is diſſolv'd: then they let it ſettle a few Minutes; after which they gather what ſwims on the Surface, repeating the ſame in the Manner before mentioned. As for the Pieces of Kau-lin there is no occaſion to break them; for being put into a very clean Baſket, and ſo let down into a Veſſel full of Water, they diſſolve of themſelves, commonly leaving Impurities behind that are thrown away. In a Year's time this Refuſe gathers to a vaſt quantity, making great heaps of white ſpungy Sand, of which it is neceſſary to clear the Place where they work.

Theſe two Materials being thus prepar'd, they muſt be mix'd in a juſt Proportion: For making fine China-Ware, there goes the ſame quantity of Kau-lin as Pe-tun-tſe; for the middle Sort, they put four Parts of Kau-lin to ſix of Pe-tun-tſe; and for the worſt, they allow one Part of Kau-lin to three of Pe-tun-tſe. When ſo far is done, they throw the Maſs into a large hollow Place, well pav'd, and cemented every where: Then they tread and knead it till it grows hard. This Work is very laborious; for the Chriſtians who were employ'd at it ſeldom came to Church, not being able to obtain that Liberty, without getting others to ſupply their Places; becauſe when this Labour ceaſes to go on, all the reſt of the Workmen ſtop of courſe. The Matter being thus wrought, they take Pieces of it and ſpread them on large Slates, where they knead and roll it every way, taking great care that there be no hollow Places in it, or any foreign Matter mixt with it: For a Hair or a Grain of Sand would ſpoil the Ware: and if the Maſs is not well kneaded the China will crack, ſplit, run, and warp. From theſe firſt Elements ariſe ſo many curious Works in Porcelain; which are made, ſome with the Wheel, others in Moulds only, and afterwards finiſh'd with the Chiſel.

Smooth China made with the Wheel.

All the ſmooth Ware are made the firſt way: A Tea-Cup, for inſtance, when it comes from the Wheel is very imperfect, not unlike the Crown of a Hat before it is form'd on the Block. The Workman gives it the Wideneſs and Height requir'd, and parts with it almoſt as ſoon as he has taken it in hand: For he gets but three Deniers [or the value of half a Farthing] for a Board, and every Board contains twenty ſix Pieces. The Foot of the Cup is nothing then but a ſhapeleſs piece of Earth; which is hollowed with a Chiſel, when the Cup is dry, and has receiv'd all the Ornaments intended for it. From the Wheel the Cup paſſes immediately to a ſecond Workman, who places it on its Foot; and ſoon after to a third, who puts it in a Mould, (which is fixt on a ſort of turning Wheel) and gives it the Figures: A fourth poliſhes the Cup with a Chiſel, eſpecially towards the Edges; and to make it of a proper Thinneſs to render it tranſparent, ſcrapes it ſeveral times, moiſtening it a very little if it be dry, leſt it ſhould break. When the Cup is taken out of the Mould, it muſt be roll'd gently thereon, without preſſing it more on one ſide than the other; for elſe it would not be exactly round, or would warp.

It is ſurprizing to ſee with what Swiftneſs theſe Veſſels run thro' ſo many Hands. Some affirm that a Piece of China, by the time it is bak'd, paſſes the Hands of ſeventy Workmen; which I can eaſily believe after what I have ſeen my ſelf.

Ware made in Moulds.

The great Pieces of Porcelain are made at twice: One half is lifted upon the Wheel by three or four Men, each of whom ſupports a Side of it, in order to give it the proper Shape; and the other half being almoſt dry is join'd to it, by means of ſome of the ſame Matter moiſten'd in Water, which ſerves inſtead of Mortar or Glue. When the whole is quite dry, they poliſh the Place where the Pieces were join'd with a Knife, both on the Inſide and the Outſide, which afterwards by means of the Varniſh looks as ſmooth as the reſt. In the ſame manner they apply Handles, Ears, and other parts to the Veſſels.

What has been ſaid, chiefly regards the Porcelain made in Moulds, or by the Hands only: Such are thoſe Pieces that are fluted, or repreſenting ſeveral Fancies; as Animals, Groteſque Figures, Idols, Buſts, beſpoken by the Europeans, and the like. Mould-Works of this ſort conſiſt of there or four Pieces, which are join'd to each other, and afterwards finiſh'd with Inſtruments, proper to hollow and poliſh them, as well as to add ſeveral Strokes, which they do not receive from the Mould. As for Flowers and other Ornaments that are not in Relievo, but as it were engrav'd, they are impreſs'd on the China with Seals and Moulds: They alſo apply Relievo's ready prepar'd, much in the ſame manner as Gold-Lace is put on a Suit of Clothes.

What follows, relating to Moulds, I have lately been an Eye-witneſs of myſelf. When a Model is given them, which they cannot imitate by the Wheel, they take the Impreſſion of it with a ſort of Earth fit for that purpoſe, and then ſeparating the Mould from the Model in ſeveral Pieces, let it dry gently.

How the Moulds are uſed.

When they are about to make uſe of this Mould, they ſet it near the Fire for ſome time: after which putting in a quantity of the Stuff, according to the Thickneſs the China is to be of, they preſs it in every where with the Hand; and then placing it for a Minute or ſo before the Fire, the Figure looſens from the Mould, by the drying up of the Moiſture that held them together. The different Pieces thus work'd ſeperately, are united again with the Stuff made ſomewhat liquid. I have ſeen Figures of Animals thus made that were quite ſolid. They firſt let the the Mass harden, then giving it the Figure propos'd, afterwards finish'd it with a Chisel, or added Parts that were made separately. These sorts of Works are very troublesome to make, and in great request. When the Work is finish'd, it is varnish'd and bak'd; after which they paint it, if it be desir'd, with several Colours, and gild it, baking it a second time. Pieces of Porcelain thus made are sold extremely dear. All these Works ought to be shelter'd from the Cold, for when they do not dry equally, the Parts that are moist crack: To avoid which Inconveniency, they sometimes make Fires in these Laboratories.

How and of what made.

The Moulds, abovemention'd, are made of a yellow fat Earth, which is as it were in Lumps, and as I imagine is common enough, being gotten in a Place not far from King te ching. They knead this Earth, and when it is become very firm, and somewhat hard, they take the proper quantity for the Mould that is to be made, and beat it very much: After they have given it the Figure that is desir'd they let it dry, and in the last place finish it upon the Wheel. The Potter here is well paid for his Labour. To hasten a Work that is bespoken, a great number of Moulds are made, for employing several Companies of Workmen at the same time. If care be taken of these Moulds, they will last a long while; and a Merchant, who has them ready by him for those sorts of Works which Europeans require, can deliver his Goods much sooner and cheaper, and yet gain considerably more by them, than another who has them to make. But if they should happen to crack, or have the least Flaw in them, they are of no farther Service, unless for China of the same Fashion, but smaller Size: For in such a Case they put it upon the Wheel, and repair it, that it may serve a second time.

4. Of the Colours for embellishing the China, and the Art of laying them on.

The Painters of China-Ware no Artists.

IT is now time to embellish the Porcelain, by letting it pass into the Hands of the Painters. These Wha-pey, or Painters of China, are as poor as the other Workmen; and indeed it is no wonder, for, excepting some few, a Prentice in Europe, who had serv'd at the Trade but a few Months, cou'd perform as well. What they do that way is the effect of Practice, assisted by none of the most extensive Imagination, being quite ignorant of all the excellent Rules of this Art; and yet it must be confess'd, they have a knack of painting Porcelain, as well as Fans and Lanthorns, of a very fine Gauze, with Flowers, Animals, and Landskips, which are justly admir'd.

The Painting part is divided, in the same Work-house, among a great number of Operators. It is the sole Business of one to strike the first colour'd Circle, near the Edges of the Ware; another traces the Flowers, which are painted by a third; it belongs to one to draw Rivers and Mountains, to another Birds and other Animals: As for the Figures of Men, they are commonly the worst done of all. But we have no right to rally the Chinese, for their manner of painting certain Landskips, and Plans of Cities, brought illuminated from Europe.

China made of all Colours at present.

The China is made of all Colours, tho' one seldom meets in Europe with any sort, but that with a bright Blue upon a white Ground: However, I believe our Merchants have imported others. The Ground of some is like our Burning-Glasses; that of others is quite red, done either with Oil-red or Blown-red, and frosted with little Points, like our Paintings in Water-colours. When both sorts of Work are done to perfection, which yet is no easy matter, they are vastly priz'd, and extremely dear. In short, there is other China-Ware painted with Landskips, in almost all sorts of Colours, and set off with the Lustre of Gilding: These are very beautiful when one will go to the expence of them; but as for the ordinary China of this kind, it is not compareable to that which is painted simply with Blue.

None used formerly but white.

The Annals of King te ching say, that formerly People made use only of white Porcelain: Perhaps because they had not as yet found Blue in the Neighbourhood of Jau-chew, inferior to that used for the finest Ware; which last comes from far, and is sold very dear. They relate that a China-Ware Merchant, having been ship-wreck'd on a desart Coast, found by accident abundantly more Riches than he had lost; for wandering upon the Shore, while the Sailors were building a small Vessel out of the Wreck, he perceiv'd that the Stones for making the finest Azure or Blue were very common there: Wherefore he carry'd back with him a considerable quantity of them, and tis said, that so charming a Blue was never seen at King te ching. But it seems the Chinese Merchant could never afterwards light upon the Coast, which Chance had before conducted him to.

Lapis Armenus how prepared.

The Azure is prepar'd after the following manner: First they bury it in the Gravel, which is about the Depth of half a Foot in the Furnace, where they calcine it for twenty four Hours; then they reduce it into an inpalpable Powder, in the same manner as they do other Colours, not upon Marble, but in great Porcelain-Mortars, the Bottoms of which are unglaz'd, as well as the Head of the Pestles which serve to beat it. With regard to this Affair, there are some few Remarks to be made: (1.) Before it is buried in the Gravel, of the Furnace, which is done before the Furnace is heated, it must be well wash'd from the Earth that sticks to it. (2.) It ought to be enclos'd in a Box made of Porcelain very well luted. (3.) When it is calcin'd they break it, and passing it through a Searse, put it into a glaz'd Vessel, pouring thereon boiling Water: then stirring it about, they take off the Scum which swims on the Top, and decant the the Water very gently. This way of purifying the Blue with boiling Water muſt be repeated twice; after which they throw the Blue, while it is yet moiſt, and in the condition of a very fine Paſte, into a Mortar, where they grind it for a conſiderable time.

Where found. I have been aſſur'd that this Azure [or Lapis Armenus] is found in Coal-Pits, or among the red Earth that lies near them: It is uſual for ſome of it to appear on the Surface, which is an infallible Sign that if you dig a little in the ſame Place you will find more. It exiſts in the Mine in ſmall Pieces, about the Bigneſs of the middle Finger, but flat and not round. The coarſe Azure is common enough, but the fine is very ſcarce, and beſides is not eaſily diſtinguiſh'd by the Eye; wherefore to prevent being deceiv'd, it is neceſſary to try it. This Proof conſiſts in painting a China Cup, and then baking it. Could Europe furniſh this fine Lyau or Azure, and the beautiful Tſyu, which is a kind of Violet, as a great deal of it would go in a little room, it would be a charming Commodity for King te ching, from whence the moſt lovely Porcelain might be brought back in exchange. I have already (P) ſaid that the Tſyu is ſold for a Lyang and eight Tyen the Pound, that is, for nine Francs; and a Box of fine Lyau, containing only ten Ounces, is ſold for two Taëls, which is twenty Soûs an Ounce.

China-Ink not fit for Paint. They have attempted to paint ſome Veſſels black, with the fineſt China-Ink, but without Succeſs; for when the Ware was bak'd it became very white. Whence it may be preſum'd that the parts of the Ink, not being ſubſtantial enough, were diſſipated by the action of the Fire; or rather that they had not ſufficient ſtrength to penetrate the Lay of Varniſh, nor to produce a Colour different from that of the Varniſh.

Red Colour. The red is made of Tſau-fan, or Copperas; and as the Chineſe may have ſomething particular in their Method of doing it, I ſhall give an Account thereof. They put a Pound of Copperas into a Crucible, which they lute well to another, on the Top of which laſt is a ſmall Opening, cover'd in ſuch a manner that it may be eaſily uncover'd when there is occaſion: Then they put kindled Charcoal all about it, and to make the Reverberation the ſtronger, encloſe it with Bricks. The Matter is not brought to perfection till the very black Smoak ceaſes, and a kind of a ſmall, fine, thin Cloud ſucceeds. Then they take a little of this Matter, moiſten it with Water, and trying it upon Fir-wood, if it produces a bright Red, they take away the Fire which ſurrounds, and almoſt covers the Crucible. When it is quite cold, they find a ſmall Cake of Red at the Bottom of the Crucible: But the fineſt red adheres to the Crucible that is above. A pound of Copperas yields four Ounces of Red, wherewith they paint the China.

Tho' the Porcelain is naturally white, and becomes ſtill more ſo by means of the Oil that is lay'd on it, yet there are certain Figures, that require the laying a particular ſort of white on the China, which is painted with different Colours.

White, Violet, Green, and Yellow. This White is made with a Powder of tranſparent Flint, calcin'd in the Furnace after the ſame manner as the Lapis Armenus. To half an Ounce of this Powder they add an Ounce of powder'd Ceruſe, or White-lead, which alſo enters into the Compoſition of the Colours. For inſtance, to make a Green, to one Ounce of Ceruſe, and half an Ounce of powder'd Flint, they add three Ounces of what they call Tong-wha pyen; which, according to the Information I could get, muſt be the fineſt Scales of hammer'd Copper. The Green thus prepar'd becomes the Mother of the Violet, which is made by adding a quantity of the White, and is the deeper the more there is of the preparation of Green. The Yellow is made by mixing ſeven Drams of prepar'd white, mention'd before, with three Drams of the Copperas Red.

The Colours do not appear till after the ſecond baking. The Colours apply'd to Porcelain after it has been varniſh'd and bak'd do not appear green, violet, yellow, or red, till it has receiv'd the ſecond Baking. The Chineſe Book ſays, theſe ſeveral Colours are laid on with Ceruſe, Salt-petre, and Copperas; but the Chriſtian Potters mentioned nothing to me but White-lead, which is mix'd with the Colour, when it is diſſolv'd in Gum-water.

Red Oil Colours. The red Oil-colour, call'd Yew-li-hong, is made with the Powder of red Copper, and that of a Stone or Flint which has a reddiſh Caſt. A Chriſtian Phyſician told me that this Stone was a kind of Allum, uſed in Phyſic. They beat the whole in a Mortar, mixing with it young Men's Urines and the Oil of Pe-yew; but I could never diſcover the Quantities of theſe Ingredients, thoſe who have the Secret being very careful not to divulge it. They lay this Compoſition on the China before it is bak'd, without employing any other Varniſh; but they muſt take heed while it is baking that it does not run to the bottom of the Cup. They have aſſur'd me that the Ware whereon they lay this Red is not made of Pe-tun-tſe but Kau-lin, of the yellow Earth, prepar'd in the ſame manner as the Pe-tun-tſe. It is very likely that ſuch kind of Earth is moſt proper to take this Colour.

Copper Powder. Perhaps you will be glad to be inform'd how this Copper Powder is prepar'd. It is well known, as I have elſewhere obſerv'd, that they have no coin'd Money in China, but inſtead of it make uſe of Silver in Ingots, many Pieces of which are of a baſe Alloy: however, on certain Occaſions, there is a neceſſity of reducing it to fine Silver; as when, for inſtance, the Taxes, or ſuch like Contributions are to be paid: At which times they have recourſe to Workmen, whoſe ſole Buſineſs is to refine it, by ſeparating from it the Copper and the Lead in Furnaces made for the purpoſe. And of this Copper, which probably retains ſome imperceptible Particles of the Silver and Lead, they make the Duſt.

Before the melted Copper hardens and congeals, they dip a Bruſh ſlightly in Water, and, ſtriking the Handle of it, ſprinkle the Water on the melted Copper. This cauſes a Skin to riſe upon the Surface, which they take up with ſmall Iron Tongs, and plunge into cold Water: whence whence the Copper Powder is made, which increaſes as often as they repeat the Operation. 'Tis my Opinion, that if the Copperas was diſſolv'd in Aqua-fortis, this Powder of Copper wou'd be fitter for the Red I am ſpeaking of: But the Chineſe have not the Art of making Aqua-fortis and Aqua-regia, all their Inventions being exceeding ſimple.

Che-wi-hong or blown-Red.

The other Kind with Che-wi-hong or Blown-red is done in the following Manner: They take a Pipe, and covering one end with a fine Gauze, apply it gently to the red Powder ready prepar'd, which the Gauſe takes up; then blowing thro' the other end upon the China, it appears cover'd over with ſmall red Specks. This ſort of Ware is ſtill dearer and ſcarcer than the former; becauſe the making it is more difficult, if all the neceſſary Rules are obſerv'd.

Other Colours and even the Varniſh blown on.

They blow on the Blue in the ſame manner as the Red, but it is much eaſier to ſucceed therein. The Workmen agree, that if any wou'd be at the Expence, they could likewiſe blow Gold and Silver upon the China, the Ground of which ſhould be black or blue; that is, they cou'd ſpread equally over the Ware a kind of Golden and Silver Shower. This ſort of Porcelain being of a new Taſte, would not fail to pleaſe. They ſometimes blow the Varniſh on. Thus, ſeveral Years ago they made ſome China-Ware, for the Emperor, ſo very fine and ſlender, that they were oblig'd to lay them upon Cotton for fear of breaking them by handling; and as they could not dip them in the Varniſh, without taking them in their Hands, they cover'd them therewith by blowing it on.

I have obſerv'd that in blowing on the Blue, the Workmen, in order to loſe as little as poſſible of the Colour, that does not ſtick upon the China, place the Ware upon a Pedeſtal, with a large Sheet of Paper underneath, which will ſerve for ſome time; and when the Azure is dry, they clear it off the Paper with a ſmall Bruſh.

Chineſe Weights.

But for the better underſtanding the Method us'd by the Painters in mixing their Colours, and thence making new ones, it will be proper to ſet down the Proportion of the Chineſe Weights. The Kin, or Chineſe Pound, is ſixteen Ounces, call'd Lyangs, or Taëls. (A) The Lyang, or Tuël is, a Chineſe Ounce; the Tſyen, or Mas, is the tenth Part of a Lyang or Taël; the Fwen is the tenth Part of the Tſyen or Mas; the Li is the tenth Part of the Fwen; the Hau is the tenth Part of the Li.

Compoſition of Red.

This being premis'd, I ſhall ſhew how they compound the Red which is made with Copperas, call'd Tſau-fan, and uſed upon the Porcelain that is bak'd a ſecond time. To a Lyang or Taël of Ceruſe they put two Tſyen of this Red, and, paſſing both together through a Searce, mix them dry. Then they encorporate them with Water mix'd with common Glue, ſuch as is ſold, reduc'd to the Conſiſtence of Fiſh Glue: This cauſes the Red to ſtick when apply'd to the China, and prevents its running. As the Colours, if laid on too thick, would produce Inequalities in the Ware, they from time to time dip the Pencil lightly in Water, and then in the Colour they are about to paint with.

Of White.

To make a White, they add to one Lyang of Ceruſe, three Tſyen and three Fwen of the impalpable Powder of the moſt tranſparent Flints, calcin'd in the Gravel of a Furnace, as before mention'd; making uſe of Water only, without Glue, to incorporate it with the Ceruſe.

Of Green.

They make a deep Green by adding to a Lyang of Ceruſe, three Tſyen and three Fwen of the Powder of Flints, with eight Fwen, or near a Tſyen of Tong wha pyen. This laſt is nothing elſe but the Droſs of Copper when it is melted; and I have learnt that in uſing it to make the Green, it muſt be waſh'd, and ſeparated carefully from the Grains of Copper mix'd with it, which are not proper for a Green; nor muſt any part of that Metal be us'd, excepting the Scales which fly off in hammering it.

Of Yellow.

As for the yellow Colour, it is made by adding to a Lyang of Ceruſe, three Tſyen, and three Fwen of the Powder of Flints, and one Fwen eight Li of pure Red, that has not been mix'd with Ceruſe: Another Workman has told me, that to make a fine Yellow, he put two Fwen and a half of the ſaid Red.

Of Violet Colour and Green.

A Lyang of Ceruſe, three Tſyen and three Fwen of the Powder of Flints, and two Li of Azure, make a deep Blue inclining to a Violet. One of the Workmen, whom I conſulted, thought that there ſhould be eight Li of the Azure —— The Mixture of Green and White, for inſtance, one part green to two parts white, makes a very bright Sea-Green. —— The Mixture of Yellow and Green, for inſtance, two Cups-full of a deep Green to one of a Yellow, make the Kû-lû Green, which reſembles a Leaf ſomewhat faded.

Of Black.

To make a Black they moiſten the Azure in Water, ſo as it may be a little thickiſh, mixing therewith common Glue macerated in Lime, and boil'd to the conſiſtence of Mouth-Glue. When they have painted with this Black the Porcelain that is to be bak'd over again, they cover the black Places with White; and, in the baking, the White incorporates with the Black, juſt as common Varniſh incorporates with the Blue of common China-Ware.

Deep Violet.

There is another Colour, call'd Tſyu, which is a Stone or Mineral reſembling Roman-Vitriol. According to the Anſwers made to my Queſtions, I am perſuaded that it is gotten out of Lead-Mines; and that carrying with it the Spirits, or rather imperceptible Particles of Lead, it inſinuates itſelf into the China without the Aſſiſtance of Ceruſe, which is the Vehicle of other Colours that are laid on the double-bak'd Ware. Of this Tſyu they make the deep Violet. It is found at Kan-ton, and comes alſo from Pe-king: But the laſt ſort is beſt, being ſold for a Lyang and eight Tſyen a Pound, that is, for nine Livres. The Tſyu will melt, and when it is melted,

(A) Lyang is the Chineſe Appellation, and Taël the Portugueſe. The like is to be underſtood of the Terms that follow.

Uſed to enamel with. melted, or ſoften'd, the Goldſmiths uſe it like Enamel upon Works made of Silver: They will put, for inſtance, a ſmall Circle of Tſyu within the Hoop of a Ring, or elſe filling the Eye of a Bodkin, enchaſe it like Jewel Work. This kind of Enamel will at length wear off; but they endeavour to prevent it, by putting it upon a ſlight Lay of either common or Fiſh-Glue.

The Tſyu, as well as the other Colours I have ſpoke of, is us'd only upon China bak'd a ſecond time. As to the Preparation of Tſyu, they do not calcine it like the Lapis Armenus, but break it, and reduce it into a fine Powder, then throw into a Veſſel full of Water; which having ſtirred about a little, they caſt away when it becomes foul, preſerving the Cryſtal that is fallen to the Bottom. The Maſs thus moiſten'd loſes its fine Colour, and ſeems outwardly inclinable to an Aſh, but recovers its Violet Hue again, as ſoon as the Porcelain is bak'd. The Tſyu will keep as long as they deſire it, and when they go to paint, it is ſufficient to moiſten it with Water; mixing therewith, if they think proper, a little common Glue: A thing which ſome think unneceſſary, but in this Experience muſt teach.

and uſed in Gilding. To gild or ſilver China-Ware, they add two Fwen of Ceruſe, to two Tſyen of Gold or Silver Leaves carefully diſſolv'd; the Silver has a great Luſtre upon the Varniſh Tſi-kin. But the Veſſel that is Silver'd ought not to remain ſo long in the little Furnace [or Oven] as thoſe that are gilt; becauſe the Silver would diſappear before the Gold would be bak'd long enough to attain a proper Luſtre.

A ſort of Colour'd China. There is a kind of colour'd China, which is cheaper than that painted with the Colours I have been ſpeaking of; and, perhaps, the Account I am going to give of it may be uſeful in Europe with reſpect to Earthen-Ware, though we ſhould never attain to the Perfection of Chineſe Porcelain. To make Ware of this Sort, there is no neceſſity that the Materials ſhould be very fine. They take Diſhes that have been already bak'd in the great Furnace, but not varniſh'd, and conſequently are quite white, without any Gloſs, and colour them by dipping each in the Veſſel wherein the Colour is prepar'd, if they would have them all of the ſame Colour; but if they would give them different Colours, like the Ware call'd Whang-lû-wan, which are divided into Squares, whereof one is green, another yellow, &c. they lay on theſe Colours with a large Pencil. This is all they do to this ſort of China, unleſs that after it is bak'd they put a little Vermillion in certain Places; as for inſtance, on the Mouths of ſome Animals: But this Colour is never bak'd, becauſe it diſappears in the Fire, neither is it very laſting. When they apply other Colours, they bake the China over again in the great Furnace, [or Oven,] with other Ware not baked before. But care muſt be taken to place them at the Bottom of the Furnace, and under the Vent-Hole where the Fire is not ſo fierce; becauſe a ſtrong Fire would diſcharge the Colours.

The Colours proper for it. Colours proper for this ſort of Porcelain are prepar'd in the following Manner: To make a Green they take Tong-whá-pyen, Salt-Petre, and Powder of Flints; but in what proportion I cou'd not learn. When they are reduc'd ſeparately into an impalpable Powder, they are to be moiſten'd and incorporated together with Water. —— The moſt common Blue, mix'd with Salt-Petre and Powder of Flints, makes a Violet; ——the Yellow is made by adding, for inſtance, three Tſyen of Copperas-Red to three Ounces of Powder of Flints, and three Ounces of White-lead.—— To make the White, they put four Tſyen of the Powder of Flints to a Lyang of Ceruſe; all theſe Ingredients are to be moiſten'd with Water. This is all that I could learn concerning the Colours of this ſort of China, not having among my Converts any who were employ'd in making it.

Black China-Ware. Black Porcelain has alſo its Value and Beauty, and is call'd U-myen. This Black is of a Lead kind, reſembling that of our Burning-Glaſſes; and the Gold they add makes it yet more agreeable. The black Colour is laid on the China when it is dry, and for this purpoſe they mix three Ounces of Azure with ſeven of common Oil of Stone. By the Tryal one may know exactly the Proportion, according as the Colour is to be more or leſs deep; when it is dry, they bake the Ware; after which they apply the Gold, and bake it over again in a particular Furnace.

The ſhining Sort. The Shining or Looking-Glaſs Black, call'd U-king, is given to the China by dipping it in a liquid Mixture compos'd of prepar'd Azure. It is not neceſſary to uſe the fineſt Azure, but it muſt be a little thickiſh, and mix'd with the Varniſhes Pe-yew and Tſi-kin, adding thereto a little Oil of Lime and Fern-Aſhes: For inſtance, to ten Ounces of powder'd Azure they put one Cup of Tſi-kin, ſeven of Pe-yew, and two of Oil of Aſhes of Fern burnt with Lime. This Mixture carries its Varniſh along with it, and does not ſtand in need of a new one. When this ſort of Black China is bak'd, it ought to be plac'd towards the Middle of the Furnace, and not near the Arch where the Fire is moſt fierce.

Pierc'd China They make another kind of Porcelain in China, which I have not yet ſeen; it is almoſt pierc'd thro' like pink'd Work. In the Middle is a Cup fit to hold Liquor, which makes but one Piece with the Part that is pink'd. I have ſeen other China-Ware, whereon the Chineſe and Tartarian Ladies were painted to the Life; the Drapery, the Complexion, and Features being curiouſly expreſs'd, and at a diſtance appear'd to be enamel'd.

Another ſort of it. It is obſervable, that when the Oil of white Flints only is uſed on the Ware, it becomes a particular Sort call'd Tſwi-ki, being marbled, and full of an infinite number of Veins; ſo that at a diſtance it ſeems as if it had been broken to Pieces, and put together again, exhibiting a ſort of Moſaic Work. The Colour that this Oil gives is a White, a little upon the Aſh-Colour; and if the China be Blue, on applying this Oil, it will appear marbl'd, and as if it were crack'd, when the Colour becomes dry.

I have been ſhewn a kind of Porcelain inclining to an Olive Colour, which is at preſent the Faſhion, tho' I never ſaw it but once. It is call'd Long-tſiuen, and I have ſeen ſome of it nam'd Tſing-ko, which is the Name of a Fruit much like an Olive. They give the China this Colour by mixing ſeven Cups of the Tſi-kin Varniſh with four Cups of the Pe-yew, two Cups or thereabouts of Oil of Lime and Fern-Aſhes, and one Cup of Tſwi-yew, or the Oil made of Flints. The Tſwi-yew cauſes a number of ſmall Veins to appear on the Porcelain, but if apply'd alone, the Ware is brittle, and if ſtruck has no Sound; when mix'd with other Varniſh, the China is full of Veins, will ring, and is no brittler than the common Ware. Olive China.

They brought me another Piece of Porcelain, call'd Yau-pyen, or Tranſmutation: This Tranſmutation is made in the Furnace, [or Oven] and is owing either to the defect or exceſs of Heat, or elſe to other Cauſes not eaſily gueſs'd at. This Piece was not the leſs beautiful or leſs eſteem'd for being merely the effect of Chance: The Workmen intended to make Veſſels of Blown-Red, but a hundred Pieces were intirely loſt, and this which I am ſpeaking of came out of the Furnace like a kind of Agate. If they would run the riſk and Expence of various Experiments, they might at length diſcover the Art of making conſtantly what Chance has once produc'd, in the ſame manner as they have learnt to make the ſhining black China, call'd U-king; to which they were excited by ſuch another Caprice of the Furnace. Tranſmutation China.

When they wou'd gild with Gold, they grind it ſmall, and diſſolve it in a China Cup, till they perceive it ſettle into a kind of a Golden Hemiſphere. They let it dry, and when they want it for uſe, diſſolve it by bits in a ſufficient quantity of Gum-water. With thirty Parts of Gold they incorporate three Parts of Ceruſe, and lay it on the China as they do Colours. How they gild China.

As the Gold thus apply'd, grows dull after a while, and loſes much of its Luſtre, they reſtore it by moiſtening the China-Ware with fair Water, and rubbing the Gilding afterwards with an Agate-Stone. But they muſt be careful to rub the Veſſel always the ſame way, for inſtance, from the right to the left.

As the Edges of the China are apteſt to flaw, to remedy the Inconvenience, they ſtrengthen them with a certain Quantity of powder'd Charcoal made of Bambû, mixing it with the Varniſh, which it renders of an Aſh-Colour grey. Afterwards with a Pencil they lay this Mixture on the Edges of the China already dry, and going to be put on the Wheel. When it is time, they lay the Varniſh on the Edges, in the ſame manner as they do it on the reſt of the Veſſel; and after baking, they appear nevertheleſs extraordinary white. As there is no Bambû in Europe, I believe it may be ſupply'd by Charcoal made of the Willow-Tree, or, what is better, that of Elder, which partakes ſomething of the nature of Bambû. But it muſt be obſerv'd, (1.) That before the Bambû is made uſe of, the green Rind ought to be ſtripp'd off; becauſe 'tis affirm'd that the Aſhes of this Rind will make China crack in the Furnace. (2.) The Workmen muſt take heed not to touch the Ware with Hands ſmeered with Greaſe or Oil; for the Place ſo touch'd will infallibly crack in baking. And ſtrengthen the Edges of Cups.

I ſhall add another Particular, which I have lately taken notice of, and that is, Before the Varniſh is laid on the China, they ſmooth it carefully, taking off the ſmalleſt Inequalities. This is done by means of a Pencil made of very ſmall Feathers, which they juſt moiſten in Water, and ſo paſs it all over the Veſſel with a light Hand: But this Method is taken principally with the fine Porcelain. How they ſmooth China.

When they would apply a Varniſh which gives the Ware an uncommon Whiteneſs, they put thirteen Cups of Pe-yew to one Cup of Fern-Pot-Aſhes, made equally fluid with the Pe-yew. This Varniſh is ſtrong, and ought not to be laid on Porcelain that is to be painted blue, becauſe, after baking, the Colour will not appear thro' it: But the China on which this ſtrong Varniſh is laid, may be expos'd to the intenſeſt Heat of the Furnace. They bake this intirely white, either for the ſake of that Colour, or elſe to gild and paint it of various Colours, and then bake it again. But when they intend to paint it blue, and wou'd have the Colour appear after it is bak'd, they ſhould put only ſeven Cups of Pe-yew to one Cup of Varniſh, or the mixture of Lime and Fern-Aſhes. An extraordinary white Varniſh.

It is proper to obſerve once more in general, that the Porcelain done over with the Varniſh, which contains much Fern-Aſhes, ought to be bak'd in a temperate Part of the Furnace, [or Oven] that is, next the three firſt Rows, about a Foot or a Foot and a half from the Bottom; for if bak'd on the Top, the Aſhes would quickly melt, and run to the Bottom of the Ware. The ſame happens to the Oil-red, the Blown-red, and the Long-tſiuen, becauſe of the Copper Powder, which is an Ingredient of this Varniſh; on the contrary, they ought to bake at the Top of the Furnace, the China done over with the Tſwi-yew Varniſh, which, as I ſaid before, produces a multitude of Veins, making it look as if it was piec'd. Caution in baking varniſh'd Ware.

When they would have the Veſſel intirely blue, they dip it into Lyau, or Azure, prepar'd and moiſten'd in Water to a proper Conſiſtence. As for the Blown-blue, call'd Tſwi-tſing, they uſe the fineſt Azure prepar'd in the manner already explain'd; they blow it on the Veſſel, and when it is dry give it the ordinary Varniſh, either alone, or mix'd with Tſwi-yew if they would have it vein'd. Blue China.

There are Workmen who trace upon this Azure, whether it is blown or otherwiſe, certain Figures with a long Needle, which raiſes up ſo many ſmall Points of the dry Azure as is neceſſary to repreſent the Figure. Then they varniſh it, and when the China is bak'd, the Figures appear painted in Miniature. There is not ſo much Labour beſtow'd, as one would imagine, Figures Engrav'd,

And emboſſed. on China-Ware emboſs'd with Flowers, Dragons, and ſuch like Figures; for after tracing them with an Engraver on the Body of the Veſſel, they only make ſlight Notches about them to give a Relievo, and then lay on the Varniſh.

A peculiar ſort of Colour'd China. There is a kind of China-Ware which is made in the manner following: They firſt lay on the ordinary Varniſh, and bake it, then painting it with various Colours, they bake it again. The Painting is ſometimes reſerv'd till after the firſt Baking with deſign; at other times, recourſe is had to the ſecond Baking purely to hide Defects, by applying Colours to the faulty Places. The Load of Colours on this ſort of China recommends it to a great many People, but one uſually perceives certain Inequalities on it: Whether it be owing to the Unſkilfulneſs of the Workmen, or done in order to give the Painting a Shade, or elſe to conceal the Faults in the Body of the Ware. When the Painting and Gilding are dry, they pile the Veſſels one upon another, putting the ſmaller into the larger, and then place them in the Furnace.

5. Of the Furnaces, [or Ovens] for baking the China.

Furnace or Oven for baking the China deſcrib'd. THE Furnaces of this kind, when ſmall, may be made of Iron, but they are generally of Earth: That which I ſaw was about the height of a Man, and almoſt as big as one of our largeſt Wine-caſks. It conſiſted of ſeveral Pieces of the ſame Matter as the Caſes of the China-Ware are made of, being a ſort of large ſquare Tiles, about half an Inch thick, a Foot and half long, and a Foot broad. They were plac'd one upon another [edgewiſe] and very well cemented; having been ſo order'd before they were bak'd, as when laid together, to ſuit the Roundneſs of the Furnace, [or Oven.] It ſtood about half a Foot from the Ground, upon two or three Ranges of thick but narrow Bricks; with a firm Incloſure of Brick-Work round it, which had at the Bottom three or four Vent-holes. Between this Incloſure and the Furnace was a Space left of about half a Foot, except in two or three Places, which being fill'd up were a kind of Buttreſſes to the Furnace. I believe they raiſe both at the ſame time, otherwiſe the Furnace would have no Support.

The manner of ranging the Veſſels in the Oven. They fill it with the Porcelain that are to be bak'd a ſecond time, pil'd in the Manner juſt now mention'd: In doing which, Care ought to be taken to keep the Parts that are painted from touching one another, for that would certainly ſpoil them. But they may ſet one Cup ſtanding within another, tho' it be painted, becauſe the Edge of the Foot of the Cup that is put in has no Painting; but the Side of one Cup ought never to touch the Side of another: So that when the China cannot eaſily be put one within another, the Workmen diſpoſe them in the following Manner. A Range of Veſſels being plac'd at the Bottom of the Furnace, they cover it with Plates made of the ſame Earth the Furnace is of, or even with Pieces of the Caſes belonging to the Porcelain; for in China every thing is of uſe; on this Covering they put another Range of Ware, and continue pileing them in this manner to the Top of the Furnace, [or Oven.]

Of covering and heating it. When all this is done, they cover the Top with Bricks properly formed, and of the ſame Matter with thoſe the Sides are made of, which jambing one within another, are cemented with Mortar or tempered Earth; only a Hole is left in the Middle, that they may ſee when the China is bak'd. They afterwards kindle a good quantity of Charcoal under the Furnace, and likewiſe upon the Covering, from whence they throw it into the Space between the Incloſure and the Furnace. When the Fire is fierce they look from time to time through the Opening, which is only cover'd with a piece of a broken Pot; and when the Veſſels appear with a Gloſs, and the Colours bright and lively, they firſt withdraw the Fire, and then the China-Ware.

Hint for reſtoring the Art of painting on Glaſs. There comes a Thought into my Head, on occaſion of thoſe Colours which are incorporated with the bak'd and Varniſh'd China-Ware by means of the Ceruſe, to which formerly, according to the Annals of Few-lyang, they added Salt-Petre and Copperas. If Ceruſe were likewiſe uſed in the Colours painted on Glaſs, and the Glaſs afterwards bak'd a ſecond time, might not the Art be recovered that we formerly had of painting thereon, without diminiſhing its Tranſparency? But this Experience muſt determine. Our Loſs of this Secret among us put me in mind of another, which the Chineſe alſo lament the Loſs of; they had the Art of painting Fiſh, or other Animals, on the Sides of a Porcelain Veſſel, which did not ſhew themſelves till the Veſſel was full of Liquor. They call this kind of China-Ware Kya-tſing, that is, Azure put in a Preſs, on account of the manner of placing it. I ſhall communicate what they have preſerv'd of the Art. Who knows but the Europeans may ſupply that Part which the Chineſe have forgot?

A curious Sort of China. The China-Ware to be painted in this manner muſt be very thin. When it is dry they lay on the Colour pretty ſtrongly, not outwardly according to Cuſtom, but on the Inſide; they generally paint Fiſh thereon, as moſt proper to appear when the Veſſel is fill'd with Water. The Colour being dry, they ſpread on it a thin Lay of a kind of very fine Paſte, made of the ſame Earth as the China; ſo that the Azure is cloſe-preſs'd between theſe two kinds of Earthen Plates. When the Lay is dry, they oil [or varniſh] the Inſide of the Veſſel, and ſome time after put it on the Mould and the Wheel. As it has receiv'd a Body on the Inſide, they make it as thin as poſſible on the Outſide without penetrating to the Colour. Then they dip the Outſide in the Oil, and when it is dry, bake it in the common Furnace.

This Work is extremely nice, and requires a Dexterity which the Chineſe, it ſeems, are no longer Maſters of; and yet from time to time they make Attempts to recover this Art of Magic painting, but in vain: one of them aſſur'd me not long ago, that he had made a new Trial, and was very near ſucceeding. But however this be, it may be ſaid that, even at preſent, the fineſt Azure revives upon the China after having diſappear'd; when they lay it on the Ware it is of a paliſh Black, but when dry, and varniſh'd, it is intirely hid, and the Ware becomes white, but the Fire diſcloſes all the Beauty of the Colours, much in the ſame manner as the natural Heat brings from the Cods the fineſt variegated Butterflies.

After all, there is a great deal of Art, in laying the Oil [or Varniſh] on Porcelain, with reſpect both to the juſt Quantity, and the equal Diſtribution of it: China that is thin and ſlender, is done over with it twice very ſlightly, for if the Lay ſhould be too thick, the Ware not being able to ſupport it, would warp immediately; theſe two Lays are equivalent to one, commonly given to the fine Porcelain of a ſtronger make, and are apply'd the firſt by Sprinkling, and the other by Dipping; they take the Cup by the Outſide in one Hand, and holding it ſloping over the Pot of Varniſh with the other, throw into it as much as will ſprinkle it all over; this is repeated to a great number of Cups, and as ſoon as the firſt become dry, they oil them without in the manner following: They put one Hand within the Cup, and applying a ſmall Stick to the Middle of the Foot [with the other] to ſupport it, dip it in a Veſſel of Varniſh, and take it out again immediately.

I have ſaid before that the Foot of the Veſſel is left unfaſhon'd, and in reality it is not put on the Wheel to be hollow'd, till after it has been varniſh'd and dry'd; within the Hollow they paint a ſmall Circle, and often a Chineſe Character, and when that is dry they varniſh the Hollow, which is the finiſhing Stroke; for immediately after it is carried from the Laboratory to the Oven in order to be bak'd.

I have been ſurpriz'd to ſee a Porter carry ſteadily on his Shoulders two long narrow Boards rang'd with China-Ware, and paſs in that manner thro' ſeveral Streets full of People, without breaking any of his Cargo: 'Tis true he carefully avoids joſtling ever ſo little againſt any thing, becauſe he would be oblig'd to make good the Damage; but ſtill it is very aſtoniſhing, that the Porter ſhould himſelf ſo well order his Steps, and every motion of his Body, as to preſerve ſuch a nice Equilibrium.

All the Ware bak'd in Caſes.

The Place where the Furnaces [or Ovens] are preſents another Scene: In a kind of Porch before the Furnaces, ſtands a Heap of Boxes and Caſes, made of Earth, for encloſing the China-Ware. Every Piece how inconſiderable ſoever having its Caſe, as well thoſe with Lids as thoſe without: Theſe Lids, which ſtick but weakly to the lower part during the Baking, are eaſily ſever'd by a little Stroke given them: As for the ſmaller Pieces, ſuch as Tea, and Chocolate-Diſhes, one Caſe ſerves ſeveral. The Workman herein imitates Nature, which to ripen Fruits, and to bring them to Perfection, incloſes them in a Covering, that the Heat of the Sun may only penetrate by Degrees, and that the inward Action may not be too much interrupted by the outward Air, during the Cold of the Night.

Within theſe Caſes is a Bed of very fine Sand, ſpread over where the Cup ſtands with the Duſt of Kau-lin, that the Sand may not ſtick to the Foot of the Cup, which does not touch the Sides of the Caſe. The Top of this Caſe has no Lid; but another Caſe of the ſame Figure, furniſh'd likewiſe with China-Ware, is put within it ſo as to cover it intirely without touching the China-Ware below; thus they fill up the Oven with large Piles of Earthen Caſes, or Boxes: by the Aſſiſtance of whoſe thick Veils the Beauty, and, if I may ſo expreſs it, the Complexion of the China-Ware within them is not tann'd by the Heat of the Fire.

As for the ſmall Ware, inclos'd in large round Caſes, each Piece is ſet on an Earthen Saucer, two Crowns thick, and ſufficiently broad; whoſe Baſe alſo is ſprinkled with the Duſt of Kau-lin. When theſe Caſes are ſomewhat large, they put no China-Ware in the Middle, becauſe it would be too far from the Sides, and ſo for want of Strength, might open and give way, which would endamage the whole Pile. Theſe Caſes are one third of a Foot in height, and part of them are unbak'd as well as the China-Ware; however, they quite fill thoſe which have been baked and ſerve again.

Manner of Caſing it.

I muſt not forget to ſhew how the China-Ware is put into the Caſes; the Workman does not handle it, becauſe that would either break it (for nothing is more brittle) or at leaſt ſoil or dent it; but he takes it off the Board, by means of a little String, faſten'd to the two Prongs, ſomewhat crooked, of a wooden Fork, which he holds in one Hand, while with the other he diſpoſes the two ends of the String croſs-wiſe, and opened, according to the Breadth of the China-Ware; thus incircling it, he lifts it up gently, then puts it in the Caſe upon a little Saucer: All this incredibly quick.

I have ſaid that the Floor of the Oven has half a Foot depth of Gravel, to hold with greater Safety the Piles of China-Ware, which, in the Middle of the Furnace, are at leaſt ſeven Foot high. The two Bottom-Caſes of each Pile are empty, becauſe there the Heat is not ſtrong enough, and beſides Part of them is covered with the Gravel for the ſame Reaſon, the Top Caſe of the Pile is empty likewiſe. The Oven is fill'd in every Part, except immediately under the Vent-hole: In the Middle ſtand Piles of the fineſt China, at the Bottom the coarſer Sort, and at the Mouth that which is ſtrongly coloured. This laſt Sort is compos'd of a Matter wherein there is put as much Pe-tun-tſe as Kau-lin, and varniſh'd with the Oil of a Stone ſpotted red or black, becauſe this Varniſh has a better Body than ordinary. All the Piles are plac'd very near each other, and join together at Top, at Bottom, and in the Middle by Pieces of Earth, placed ſo ſkilfully as to admit a free Paſſage for the Flame on all Sides.

All Earth is not proper to make Caſes for the China-Ware; there are three Sorts uſed; one is yellow, and common enough, of which they make the Bottoms; another is call'd Lau-tû, and is a ſtrong Earth; the third, which is oily, is call'd Yeû-tû. Theſe two laſt are got in Winter from certain deep Mines, impoſſible to be work'd in Summer: If they are mix'd in equal Parts, the Caſes coſt ſomewhat more, but will laſt a long while; they bring ſuch Caſes ready made from a large Village a League from King-te-ching, down the River. They are yellowiſh before Baking, but afterwards of an obſcure Red: When for Cheapneſs they uſe moſt of the yellow Earth for the Caſes, they ſeldom laſt above two or three Bakings ere they break to Pieces. If a Caſe is but ſlightly crack'd, or even ſplit, they bind it with an Ozier Band, which tho' it takes Fire, preſerves the Caſe for this once, ſo that the China-Ware does not ſuffer.

They take Care not to fill the Oven with new Caſes; one half at leaſt muſt have been bak'd before; theſe are plac'd at the Top and Bottom of the Piles, and the unbak'd ones in the Middle. The Hiſtory of Feu-leang ſays, that in former times all the Caſes were bak'd in a Furnace by themſelves, before they were uſed to bake the China; doubtleſs becauſe then, there being fewer Workmen, they had leſs regard to the Expence than the Perfection of the Work.

Structure of the Oven. Let us now come to the Structure of the Ovens or Furnaces; they are plac'd at the further End of a long Porch, which ſerves inſtead of Bellows, and is withal a Warehouſe; it is of the ſame uſe as the Arch in Glaſs-Houſes: The Ovens are larger now than formerly, for then, according to a Chineſe Author, they were only ſix Foot high and ſix broad, but are now two Fathom high, and almoſt four wide: The Arch as well as Body of the Oven is ſufficiently thick, ſo that one may walk upon it without being incommoded by the Fire: This Arch or Vault is not flat on the Inſide, nor does it riſe in point, but grows narrower and narrower as it approaches the great Vent-hole, at the Extremity, through which the Flame and Smoak ariſe.

Beſides this Mouth, the Oven has five or ſix Openings about its Head, like ſo many Eyes, which are cover'd with broken Pots, ſo as to allay the Air and Fire of the Oven. By means of theſe Eyes they judge when the China is bak'd; they uncover the Eye, which is neareſt the great Vent-hole, and with Iron Tongs open one of the Caſes. If the Ware is done enough they diſcontinue the Fire, and keep the Door of the Oven remaining ſhut for ſome time: This Oven has a deep Hearth of equal Extent with itſelf, and a Foot or two wide, they aſcend by a Plank to enter the Range of China in the Oven: When the Fire is lighted, they immediately ſhut the Door, leaving only a proper Opening to throw in thick ſtreight pieces of Wood, a Foot long. At firſt the Oven is heated for a Day and a Night, and then two Men relieving each other, continually throw in Wood. One Baking generally conſumes a hundred and eighty Load. Nay, a Chineſe Book holds this Quantity not ſufficient, affirming that formerly they burn'd two hundred and forty Load, and twenty more, if the Weather was rainy, altho' the Ovens were leſs by one half than they are now. They kept but a ſmall Fire during ſeven Days and Nights, and on the eighth Day made a very briſk one. It muſt be obſerved, that the Caſes containing the ſmaller Ware had been baked before by themſelves.

The old Way of managing that Matter. It muſt be own'd, the Porcelain of the ancient Chineſe is more ſubſtantial than that made in latter Times; they obſerv'd alſo another Thing, now neglected, that is, they did not open the Oven-Door of the large Ware till ten Days after the Fire was out, and of the ſmall, not till five. At preſent indeed they delay taking the large Veſſels out of the Oven a few Days; for if they did not they would crack; but as for the ſmall, if the Fire ceaſes in the Evening, they'll take them out next Morning, it ſhould ſeem, that they may ſave Wood in the next Baking. As the China-Ware is then burning-hot, the Operator, who takes it out of the Oven, makes uſe of long Slings hung about his Neck.

The baking the Ware. They diſcover that the Porcelain bak'd in the ſmall Oven is fit to be taken out, if when looking thro' the Opening above, they ſee that all the Ware is Fire-red to the Bottom, that they are diſtinguiſhable one from another as plac'd in the Pile, that thoſe that are painted look ſmooth, and that the Colours are incorporated with the Ware, in the ſame manner as Varniſh is with the fine Blue, by the Heat of the great Oven. As for the Ware bak'd a ſecond time in the great Oven, this they judge ſufficiently bak'd, (1) when the Flame comes forth no longer red, but whitiſh; (2) when looking in at one of the Openings they ſee thro' the Fire the Caſes red-hot. (3) When after opening one of the top Caſes, taking out a Veſſel, and letting it cool, they find the Varniſh and Colour to their Liking. And laſtly, when they can ſee the Gravel ſhine at the Bottom of the Oven.

The Quantity of Wood. I have been ſurpriz'd that, after the burning at the entrance of the Oven 180 Load of Wood in one Day, on the next no Aſhes ſhould be found on the Hearth. They ſhould be well ſeaſon'd to the Fire that feed theſe Ovens. Tis ſaid they put Salt in their Tea, that they may drink as much as they will without being incommoded; but I can't conceive how this ſalt Liquor ſhould quench their Thirſt.

Difficulty of the Work. Conſidering what I have related, it can be no wonder that China-Ware is ſo dear in Europe, eſpecially when you know yet further, that, beſides the large Gains of the European Merchants and their Factors, few Bakings ſucceed quite well, and, that often the whole is loſt, and they find, when the Oven is opened, both the Ware and Caſes reduced to a Maſs as ſolid as a Rock. Too fierce a Fire, or inſufficient Caſes may ruin all. It is no eaſy matter to regulate the proper Degree of Heat: for the Alteration of the Weather has an immediate Effect, not only upon the the Fire, but on the Quality of the Subject on which it acts, and of the Wood that feeds it. Thus a hundred Workmen are ruin'd for one that grows rich; a hundred ruin themselves by still trying their Fortunes, in hopes to get enough to set up a Merchant's Shop. Besides, the China sent into Europe is almost always made from new Models, often so whimsical, that it is difficult to succeed; and the Europeans refuse it for the least Defect, in which case it must stick on the Master's Hands, because it is not to the Chinese Taste; consequently that which is sold must bear a good Price.

The Gain.

According to the History of King-te-ching, their Gain formerly was much more considerable; but this is to be question'd, because they had not then such Demands for their China from Europe. For my part I believe the present Dearness of the Merchandise, and Poverty of the Merchants, arises from the Dearness of Provisions, and the Scarcity of Wood in the Neighbouring Mountains; add to this, the Workmen are now not so skilful as formerly, and the Mandarins, who employ a great many to make Presents for their Patrons at Court, pay them ill.

Remarkable Pieces of Workmanship.

The Workmen do not undertake all the Models that come from Foreign Countries, they have some impracticable given them in China, tho' at the same time they perform such surprizing Works as Strangers would think impossible. For Instance, I have seen a large Lanthorn, like that of a Ship, all of one Piece of China, thro' which one Candle sufficiently enlighten'd a whole Room. This was made seven Years ago at the command of the Hereditary Prince, who also order'd to be made divers Instruments of Music, particularly a Sort of small Organ, call'd Tseng, about a Foot high, consisting of fourteen Pipes, whose Harmony is agreeable enough; but they attempted it in vain. They succeeded better in making Flutes, Flagellets, and an Instrument nam'd Yun-lo, which is compos'd of divers small round Plates, a little concave, each of a particular Note. They hang nine in a Frame, at different Heights, which they strike like a Dulcimer, and it returns a little Tinkling, which agrees in Concert with other Instruments, and the Singers Tone. I concluded they had the Secret of incorporating a little Metal with these Pieces, to diversify the Sound; but I was mistaken, Metal being so incapable of uniting with the China, that if a Copper Farthing be put on the Top of one of the Piles in the Furnaces, it would, when it melts, pierce all the Cases and Vessels, so that all the Vessels in the Pile would have a Hole in the Middle. Nothing can give a better Idea, than this, of the Effect of the Fire on all things in the Oven, which are affirm'd to be in a State of Fluidity.

Metal incapable of incorporating with China.

I have, notwithstanding, seen Designs of Work perform'd, which were said to be impracticable: These were Urns above three Feet high without the Lid, which rose like a Pyramid a Foot high. They consisted of three Pieces, so artfully put together that the Joining could not be perceived. But I was told, that only eight out of twenty four succeeded well, the rest being spoilt. These Urns were bespoke by the Merchants at Kan-ton for the European Trade; Wares of so high Price not taking in China.

Porcelain Urns.

To come to the Works of the Chinese which are more curious than ordinary; they succeed best in Grotesque Work, and representing Animals: They make Ducks and Tortoises, that will float on the Water. I have seen a Cat painted to the Life; in her Head they had plac'd a Lamp, the Flame of which made the two Eyes, and they assur'd me that the Rats were frighted with it in the Night. They also make abundance of Statues of Kûan-in, a Goddess famous in China. She is represented holding a Child in her Arms, and is invok'd by barren Women desirous of Children. We may compare her to the antique Statues of Venus and Diana, with this Difference, that the Statues of Kûan-in are extremely modest.

Statues of Kûan in.

There is another kind of Porcelain, difficult to make, and therefore very scarce. Its Substance is extraordinary thin, and the Surface exceeding smooth within and without, and yet you see Mouldings on it engraven, as a Round of Flowers, for instance, or such like Ornaments. The Manner they do it is thus: As soon as it is off the Wheel, they clap it on an engraved Mould, whence the Inside takes off the engraven Figures; the Outside of it they work with a Chisel, and make it as fine and thin as possible. Then they varnish and bake it in the ordinary Oven.

The European Merchants require sometimes China Slabs in one Piece, big enough to make the Top of a Table, or Seat, or Picture-frame; but this is impossible; for the largest they can make are but a Foot or thereabouts; if they exceed that, tho' ever so thick, they'll warp. The Thickness also renders these Works somewhat difficult, and therefore instead of moulding them solid, they make two hollow Outsides, which they join, leaving a Vacancy within. They put but one Piece across, making on both Sides two Holes to frame them by, as in Cabinet-Work.

The History of King-te-ching mentions several Works commanded by Emperors, which were attempted in vain. The present Emperor's Father order'd some almost in the Fashion of our Orange-Tree Tubs, therein to breed the Red, Golden, or Silver Fish. These Vessels were to be three Foot and a half over, two Foot and a half high, the Bottom half a Foot, and the Sides a third of a Foot thick. They labour'd three Years together on these Works, and made two hundred Urns, but not one succeeded. The same Emperor order'd Slabs for the Front of a Gallery, each to be three Feet high, two and a half broad, and half a Foot thick; but they could not be made, and the Mandarins of the Province address'd the Emperor to put a Stop to the Work. Yet these Mandarins, knowing the Genius of the Europeans, have sometimes requested me to send for new and elegant Designs, that they might present them as Curiosities to the Emperor. On the other hand, the Christians entreated me not to procure them ſuch Models, becauſe the Mandarins were not ſo eaſy to be put off as our Merchants, when the Workmen tell them the Thing is impracticable; but often cauſe them to be well baſtinadoed, before ſuch a promiſing Project muſt be given up.

The Idol that preſides over Porcelain.

As every Profeſſion has its particular Idol, and as the Divinity is as eaſily communicated here as the Quality of an Earl or Marquis in ſome Countries of Europe, it is no wonder there ſhould be a God of China-Ware: The Pû-ſa (an Idol ſo call'd) owes its Origin to theſe Models, which the Workman cannot ſucceed in. The Story is thus related: One of the Emperors abſolutely commanded them to make him ſome Pieces, after a Model he gave them. They repreſented ſeveral times to him, that it was an impoſſible thing, but their Remonſtrances made him only the more poſitive. For the Emperors are, whilſt alive, the Divinities moſt fear'd in China; and they often believe that nothing ought to oppoſe their Deſires. The Officers doubled their Diligence, and treated the Workmen with all ſorts of Rigour, while, poor Wretches! they were at great Labour and Expence, and received nothing but Blows. At laſt one of them, quite in Deſpair, threw himſelf into the burning Oven, and was conſum'd in an Inſtant. The China-Ware then baking, 'tis ſaid, prov'd perfectly fine, and entirely to the Emperor's liking; this Deſperado paſs'd ever after for a Hero, and became the Idol preſiding over the Porcelain Works. But I don't find his Example was follow'd.

Its Original.

Antient and modern Porcelain compar'd.

Porcelain having been in great Eſteem for ſo many Ages, ſome may deſire to know in what reſpects that of former Times differs from that of the preſent, and what the Chineſe think on this head. They have doubtleſs their Virtuoſo's, who are prejudic'd in favour of Antiquity: Nay, they are all generally inclin'd that way; and yet we find ſome who give the Preference to the modern Works. But it is not with Porcelain as it is with old Medals, which give a light into Antiquity. Old Porcelain perhaps is adorn'd with ſome Chineſe Characters, but not ſuch as ſettle any point of Hiſtory: The Curious therefore can find nothing but Fancy and Colours to give it the Preference.

I was told in Europe that the beſt Porcelain requires to be a long Time buried in the Earth; but this is a falſe Notion, and is laugh'd at by the Chineſe. The Hiſtory of King te ching, ſpeaking of the fineſt Porcelain of old Times, ſays it was ſo catch'd up, that the Oven was ſcarce open, but the Merchants were diſputing for the firſt Lot: ſo far were they from burying it in the Earth. 'Tis true, that in digging on old Ruins, and on cleanſing Wells long out of Uſe, ſometimes fine Pieces are found, which have been hid in troubleſome Times, when People ſeek to ſecure their choiceſt Effects. It is not therefore the being brought to Perfection by burying in the Earth, but its antient Beauty being preſerv'd, that acquires it ſuch Eſteem; for that alone bears ſuch Price in China, that they will give great Sums for the leaſt Utenſil of the commoneſt Sort, that has been uſed by the Emperors Yau and Shun, who reign'd many Ages before the Dynaſty of the Tangs. All that the Porcelain gets by lying long in the Ground, is a Change of its Colour, or, if you will, its Complexion, which ſhews it to be old. The ſame thing happens to Ivory or Marble, but much ſooner; the China-Ware being guarded by its Varniſh againſt Effects of the Moiſture. I have my ſelf found, in old Ruins, Porcelain probably very ancient, and I could not obſerve any thing ſingular in it. If it really had acquir'd Perfection by growing old, it was not, when new-made, equal to the preſent Works. Tis my Opinion, there was then, as now, Porcelain of all Prices.

Porcelain bury'd.

According to the Annals of King-te-ching, there were formerly Urns of the Price of 58 or 59 Taëls each, which is more than 80 Crowns. How much greater the Price in Europe! Theſe Annals add, that for every Urn of this Value an Oven was made on purpoſe, and no Expence was ſpar'd. The Mandarin of King-te-ching, who is my Friend, made Preſents to his Patrons at Court, of old Porcelain, which he had the Art to make himſelf, or rather to imitate that of the nearer times of Antiquity and to do it employ'd a great many Workmen. The Matter of thoſe falſe Kû-tong, or Counterfeits of Antiquity, is a yellowiſh Earth got near King-te-ching, at a Place call'd Ma-ngan-ſhan. They are very thick; the Mandarin gave me a Plate of his making, and it was as heavy as ten common ones.

Old Porcelain counterfeited.

The Faſhion of it.

There is nothing particular in the working on this Sort of China Ware, excepting the Varniſh, which is made of a yellow Stone, and being mixt with a larger Quantity of common Oil dyes the Veſſels a Sea Green; when bak'd they throw them into very fat Broth made of a Capon and other Meats, then bake them again, and lay them in the naſtieſt Puddle they can find, for the Space of a Month or more; after they are taken out they paſs for 3 or 400 Years old, or at leaſt of the preceding Dynaſty of the Mings, when Porcelain of this Thickneſs was the Court Taſte. Theſe falſe Antiques ſo far reſemble the true, that they don't ring when ſtruck, nor yield the leaſt Noiſe if held to the Ear.

A Plate with a Crucifix painted on it.

They brought me from the Rubbiſh of a large Shop a little Plate, which I value beyond the fineſt Porcelain Piece, tho'a thouſand Years old. On the Bottom is painted a Crucifix between the Virgin Mary and St. John. Formerly, they exported (as 'tis ſaid) a great deal of this Sort to Japan, but the Enemies of Religion have hinder'd any of it being made theſe 16 Years.

They are in China almoſt as curious in European Glaſſes and Cryſtals, as the Europeans are in China Ware; but yet this Curioſity has not made them croſs the Sea to ſeek Glaſs in Europe. They find their own Manufacture of more Uſe; for their Porcelain will bear hot Liquor, and you may hold a Diſh of boiling Tea without burning your Hand, if you take it after their Way; which you can't do by a Silver Diſh of the ſame Thickneſs and Figure.

Porcelain compar'd with Glaſs.

The Porcelain has its Luſtre as well as Glaſs; and, tho' it be not ſo Tranſparent, it is leſs brittle; brittle. What happens to Glaſs, when juſt made, happens alſo to Porcelain; and nothing better ſhews the Conformity of their Nature: Good Porcelain hath a clear Sound, as well as Glaſs. A Diamond cuts Glaſs; ſo alſo they uſe a Diamond in reuniting broken Porcelain. They make therewith, as with a Needle, little Holes in the Subſtance of the Ware, in which they twiſt a very fine Braſs Wire, and ſo render it fit for Service again, the Place where it was broken being ſcarce perceptible. This Buſineſs is a Trade in China.

Waſte of Porcelain, of what Uſe.

I have ſaid that there continually arrive at King-te-ching Barks laden with the Pe-tun-tſe and Kau-lin, and that after theſe have been cleanſed, they lay the Droſs that remains along in great Heaps; that there were three thouſand Kilns and Ovens in King-te-ching, and all full of Caſes and Ware; that the Caſes could ſerve no more than three or four Batches, and that a whole Batch is often ſpoil'd. It is natural, after this, to aſk, into what Abyſs do they caſt all that 1300 Years Rubbiſh of Ware and Kilns?

Firſt Uſe.

The very Situation of King-te-ching, and the Manner in which it is built, will anſwer this Difficulty. This City was at firſt no large Place, but is now prodigiouſly increas'd; they build every Day, and there is not an Houſe but is ſurrounded with Walls. The Bricks in theſe Walls are not laid flatways, nor are they cemented like Works of Maſonry in Europe: The Walls in China are more beautiful, but not ſo ſolid. Long and wide Bricks incruſtate, as I may ſay, the Wall: Every one of theſe has another on each Side, of which you only ſee the End even with the Middle one, to which they are the two Spurs. A ſlight Lay of Mortar round the middle one, binds all theſe Bricks together; and the Back of the Wall is laid in the ſame manner. Theſe Walls grow narrower as they riſe, till at Top they are no more than a Brick's Length or Breadth. The Spurs, or croſs Bricks, no where anſwer thoſe on the oppoſite Side, ſo that the Bulk of the Wall is like a ſort of empty Coffer. When they have laid two or three Rows of Bricks on a ſhallow Foundation, they fill up the middle of the Work with Potſheards, over which they throw Earth temper'd like thinniſh Mortar; this binds the whole, and makes of it one Maſs, which incloſes the croſſway Bricks on all Sides, and theſe lock up the middle ones, which only bear upon the Thickneſs of the Bricks that are under them. At a diſtance theſe Walls appear'd to me, at firſt, as tho' they were made of fine grey Stone, ſquar'd, and poliſh'd with the Chiſel; and what is ſurprizing, if they take care to cover them at top with good Tiles, they will ſtand 100 Years. But in truth they don't bear any Timber-work, which is always ſuſtained by maſſy wooden Pillars; they only ſerve for Encloſures to Edifices and Gardens.

Second Uſe.

We ſee already in part what becomes of the Rubbiſh of the Porcelain and the Kilns. The reſt they commonly throw on the Banks of the River, below King-te-ching. Hence in time they gain upon the River; and the Rubbiſh being ſoak'd with the Rain, and trodden by the Paſſengers, the Ground ſoon becomes fit to hold a Market, or to build Streets on. Moreover in great Floods the River drags along with it large Quantities of thoſe broken Pieces; ſo that its Bed is as it were pav'd with them, and affords a very agreeable Sight.

Of the Silk Manufacture.

Of the Silk Manufacture.

GREECE made Italy the rich Preſent of Silk, which in the Time of the Roman Emperors was valu'd at its Weight in Gold. The Grecians were beholden for it to the Perſians; and theſe, according to Authors of moſt Credit, as M. d' Herbelot obſerves, confeſs that they had the Knowledge of Silk-worms, and the Art of breeding them, originally from China. The moſt Ancient Chineſe Writers aſcribe their Diſcovery to one of the Wives of the Emperor Whang-ti, her Name Si-ling, and ſurnamed, for Honour's Sake, Yuen-ſey: But it is difficult to meet with any Memoirs of an early Date that mention the Silk-worm. Before the Time of this Queen, when the Country was but newly cleared, the People were cloth'd in Skins of Animals; which being inſufficient for ſo multiplying a People, Neceſſity render'd them induſtrious, and they bent their Wits to make Cloth to cover themſelves; but they were oblig'd to this Princeſs for the uſeful Invention of Silk.

Silk, by whom diſcover'd.

Empreſſes of China rear Silk-worms.

Since her Time, ſeveral Empreſſes, recorded in Chineſe Authors, have been agreeably employ'd in hatching and breeding of Silk-worms, in feeding them, taking the Silk, and manufacturing it; and an Orchard of the Palace was allotted for a Plantation of Mulberry-Trees. The Empreſs, attended by the Queens and the Prime Ladies of the Court, went in Ceremony to this Orchard, and gather'd with her own Hands the Leaves of three Branches, which her Handmaids bended down within her Reach. The fineſt Pieces of Silk, made by her ſelf, or by her Order, and under her Eye, were devoted to the Ceremony of the grand Sacrifice offer'd to Shang-ti.

There is reaſon to believe that the Trouble the Empreſſes gave themſelves, was chiefly with a politic View to engage, by ſuch great Examples, the Princeſſes, the Ladies of Quality, and all the People in general, to breed Silk-worms; on the ſame Account, the Emperors, to ennoble, in ſome ſort, Agriculture, and to excite the People to ſo painful a Labour, never omit, at the beginning of the Spring, the Ceremony of holding the Plow in Perſon; opening with it ſome Ridges, and ſowing Grain therein. The preſent Emperor ſtill obſerves this Cuſtom.

As for the Empreſſes, they have, for ſome time paſt, not troubled themſelves about Silk: though there is yet to be ſeen, within the Verge of the Palace, a large Square of Houſes, where ſtands the Church of the French Jeſuits, the Avenue to which is ſtill call'd the Way to the Nurſery of Silk-worms for the Diverſion of the Empreſſes and Queens. In the Books of the ancient Philoſopher Mençius, we meet with a wiſe Regulation of the Magiſtracy, which limited the Space appointed for the Mulberry Plantation, according to the Extent of every private Man's Poſſeſſions.

We may well call China the Silk-Country, for it ſeems to be inexhauſtible. Beſides furniſhing the Nations of Aſia and Europe with large Quantities, the Emperor, the Princes, and their Domeſtics, the Mandarins, the Literati, the Women, and in ſhort, the Generality of the Chineſe wear Silk, and are cloth'd in Satin or Damaſk. There is ſcarce any excepted, but the meaneſt of the People and the Peaſants, who wear blue Cotton.

Whence come the fineſt Silks.

Tho' ſeveral Provinces of this Empire furniſh very fine Silks, thoſe of Che-kyang are, without Compariſon, the fineſt and beſt. The Chineſe judge of the Goodneſs of Silk by its Whiteneſs, Softneſs, and Fineneſs. If it feels rough, it is a bad Sign. Oftentimes, to give it a Gloſs, they dreſs it with a Sort of Rice-Water, mix'd with Lime, which burns it, ſo that, when brought to Europe, it won't bear Milling: Tho' nothing takes the Mill better than ſound Silk. A Chineſe Workman will mill this Silk above an Hour together without ſtopping, that is, without breaking a Thread; and 'tis certain, nothing can look finer or neater.

Silk-Mills.

Their Mills are very different from thoſe in Europe, and far leſs cumberſome. Two or three wretched Blades of Bamboo with a Cog-Wheel are enough: 'Tis ſurprizing to ſee with what ſimple Inſtruments they work the fineſt Stuffs.

There is at Kanton another Kind of Silk, that comes from Tong-king, but not comparable to that of Che-kyang, provided this latter be not too damp; of this Silk are made the fineſt Stuffs in the Province of Kyang-nan, where are the greater number of good Workmen, and whence the Emperor is ſupply'd with Silk for his own Uſe, and for Preſents to the Grandees and Lords of the Court. The great Trade they drive at Kanton, which is the Port for all Strangers, does not fail to draw thither a great Number of the beſt Workmen: They could make as rich Stuffs as any in Europe, were they ſure of Vent; but they uſually confine themſelves to the plaineſt Sorts, becauſe the Chineſe chuſe the Uſeful before the Agreeable. They make Gold-Tiſſue indeed, but they don't draw their Gold into Wire, to twiſt with the Thread, as is done in Europe, but gild a long Sheet of Paper, which they cut into very ſmall Slips, and very artfully wrap them about the Silk.

Where the fineſt Silks are made.

Theſe Stuffs look very fine, coming out of the Workman's Hand, but are not laſting, nor fit for Garments, becauſe the Air and Moiſture ſoon tarniſh the Luſtre of the Gold; they are hardly of any Uſe but for Church-Moveables and Ornaments; none but Mandarins and their Ladies wear them, and that but very ſeldom.

The Silks moſt in uſe.

The Silks moſt in uſe among the Chineſe are plain and flower'd Gauſes, which are their Summer Wear; Damaſks of all Sorts and Colours; ſtriped Sattins, black Nan-king Sattins, coarſe Taffeties, or ſmall Mohairs, which are very ſerviceable; and ſeveral other Sorts; ſome like flower'd Grogram; others with open Flowers like Gauze; ſome ſtriped, in a very good Taſte, or maſqueraded, or embroidered with Roſes, &c. Crapes, Brocades, Pluſh, and ſeveral Sorts of Velvet. That of the crimſon Dye is the deareſt, but one may be eaſily deceiv'd in it. The Way to diſcover the Cheat is, to take Juice of Lemon mix'd with Lime, and ſprinkle a few Drops here and there; if it changes Colour, 'tis counterfeit.

Other Sorts unknown in Europe.

In ſhort, the Chineſe make an infinite number of Stuffs that we have no Name for, but there are two Sorts moſt commonly worn among them. (1.) A ſort of Sattin, ſtronger and leſs gloſſy than what is made in Europe; they call it Twan-tſe. Some are plain, others varied with Flowers, Trees, Birds, Butterflies, &c. (2.) A particular Taffety, call'd Chew-tſe, [Suſa] of which they make Drawers and Linings; it is cloſe, and yet ſo ſupple, that tho' it be folded and ſqueezed with the Hand, it will not take the Mark of the Fold; it will waſh like Linen, without loſing much of its Gloſs.

Of the Gloſs of Silks.

The Chineſe Workmen give their Chew-tſe, or Taffety, a Gloſs with the Fat of a River-Porpus, which Creature they call Kyang-chu, that is to ſay, the Hog of the River Yang-tſe-kyang; for in that great River, above 60 Leagues from the Sea, are ſeen Porpuſes, leſs in Bulk indeed than thoſe of the Ocean, but which ſcud along in Shoals, by Ranks, thro' the freſh Water, with the ſame Leaps and Evolutions as in the open Sea.

This Fat is purified by waſhing and boiling; then with a fine Bruſh they ſpread it over the Taffety from Top to Bottom, the ſame Way, and on that Side they would give a Gloſs to. The Workmen burn the ſame in their Lamps at their Work by Night inſtead of Oil. The Smell of it is very uſeful in driving away the Flies, which otherwiſe would damage the Silk.

Shang-tong Silk.

The Province of Shang-tong yields a particular Silk, found in abundance on Trees and in Fields: It makes the Stuff call'd Kyen-chew. This Silk is produced by ſmall Inſects very like Caterpillars; they don't ſhape it into Cods like the Silk-worms, but in very long Threads, which ſtick to ſmall Trees, or Shrubs; theſe Threads are gather'd, and make a coarſer Silk than the Houſe-Worms ſpin: But the Worms are wild, and eat the Leaves of other Trees as well as that of the Mulberry. Such as are not acquainted with this Silk, wou'd take it for a Ruffet Stuff, or a Coarſe Drugget.

Particular Worms for it.

There are two ſorts of Worms which ſpin this Silk: One larger and blacker than ours, call'd Tſiwen-kyen;

Tſien-kyen; the other, which is ſmaller, is call'd Tyau-kyen: The Cods of the firſt are of a ruſſet grey, thoſe of the latter more black, and the Silk has a mixture of theſe two Colours. This Silk is very thick, never cuts, laſts long, waſhes like Linnen, and when good, will not ſtain, even with Oil. This Silk is in great Vogue among the Chineſe, and is ſometimes as dear as Sattin, or their beſt wrought Silks. As they are very dexterous in counterfeiting, they make a falſe Kyen-chew of the Waſte of the Che-kyang Silk; by which, without Care, one may be eaſily deceiv'd.

A Silk Manufactory has been ſet up at Kanton, within theſe few Years, for making Ribbands, Stockings and Buttons, which has had very good Succeſs: The Stockings are ſold for a Taël a Pair, and a dozen of the largeſt Buttons, for no more than Six-pence.

Cauſe of the Plenty and Goodneſs of Silk.

As the Quantity and Goodneſs of the Silk depend very much on the way of breeding and feeding the Worms, from the time they are hatch'd till they ſpin, the Method obſerv'd in China may become as uſeful as it is curious. An Author of Reputation, who lived in a Province abounding with Silk Manufactories, under the Dynaſty of the Ming, has wrote a pretty large Treatiſe on this Subject. Father Dentrecolles ſent me an Extract of it, from which I have taken all the Directions I thought neceſſary for the managing, with Succeſs, ſo fine a Manufacture; concluding, that the new Lights given by the Chineſe on ſo profitable a Work, that employs ſo many Ships, will not be altogether uſeleſs.

Extract of an old Chineſe Book, which teaches how to rear and feed Silk-Worms, ſo as to have Plenty of the beſt Silk.

Silk-worms.

THE Author begins immediately to direct how the Mulberry-Trees, whoſe Leaves the Silk-Worm feeds on, ought to be cultivated; becauſe thoſe Inſects, ſays he, like other Animals, are fit for no profitable Labour, but in proportion as their Food is ſuitable to their Organs and Functions. He diſtinguiſhes two Sorts of Mulberry-Trees; the true one, called Sang, or Ti ſang, which does not produce Fruit ſo large as in Europe; it being cultivated with no other View than to have Plenty of Leaves, which only are uſeful.

Their Food.

Two Sorts of Mulberry-Trees.

The other Sort are ſmall and wild, called Che, or Ye ſang; theſe have neither the Leaf nor Fruit of the Mulberry Tree. Their Leaves are ſmall, rough, roundiſh, terminating in a Point, and their Edges ſcollop'd; their Fruit is like Pepper, one of which grows by the Stalk of each Leaf; their Branches thorny and cluſtering, like a Buſh. Theſe Trees thrive beſt on Hills, where they form a kind of Foreſt.

Field Silk-worms.

There are ſome Silk Worms, no ſooner hatch'd in the Houſe, but they are laid on theſe Trees, where they feed themſelves, and make their Cods. Theſe Field Silk-Worms being more hardy, grow thicker and longer than the domeſtic ones; and tho' their Work is not ſo good, it is valuable and uſeful, as may be judg'd by what I have ſaid of the Stuff call'd Kyen chew. Strings for Muſical Inſtruments are made of their Silk, becauſe it is ſtrong and reſounding.

Wild Mulberry Trees.

'Tis not to be imagin'd that theſe Che, or Wild Mulberry-Trees, require no further Care than to place the Silk-Worms upon them. Several Paths muſt be made in theſe little Foreſts, for the Conveniency of plucking up the Weeds growing under the Trees, and ſo far pernicious, as they harbour Inſects, and eſpecially Serpents that are greedy Devourers of theſe large Worms.

The Paths are alſo neceſſary for the Keepers, who conſtantly traverſe the Woods, in the Day, with a Pole or Gun in their Hands, and at Night beating a Copper Baſon, to keep off the Birds that would prey on theſe Worms.

How to be cultivated.

'Tis to be obſerv'd, that the Leaves not touch'd by the Silk-worms, in the Spring, ought to be pull'd off in the Summer. If they are left on the Trees, the Leaves of the following Spring have venemous and unwholeſome Qualities. A Chineſe Treatiſe on Plants ſhews the Circulation of their Sap in a very clear Light; hence they conclude, that the Sap which circulates from the old Leaves corrupts, by its Rankneſs, the whole Maſs.

To render the Che Trees fitter to nouriſh Houſe-worms, 'tis beſt to cultivate them in the ſame Manner, almoſt, as the true Mulberry-Trees, and eſpecially to plant them but thinly, and ſow the Ground with Millet, to correct the Harſhneſs of the ſmall Leaves, which grow too rank and too chaſtening. The Worms that feed on them ſpin the earlieſt and ſtrongeſt Silk.

Perhaps ſuch Silk-worms might be diſcover'd in Europe, as 'tis probable they were in China, if their Cods were obſerv'd on the Trees where they fix: They ſhould be gather'd before they change into Moth-flies, for when they come out of their Cods they don't leave their Eggs, many of which are loſt by ſeveral Accidents. To have the Male and Female Moth-flies, ſeveral of the pregnated Cods ſhou'd be alſo gather'd, and the Eggs being hatch'd the enſuing Year, ſhould be laid on the ſame Trees again, where their Iſſue would eaſily nouriſh themſelves.

Oak Leaves uſed for Mulberry.

One Obſervation has been made, which, tho' it may be of Uſe, the Chineſe Author has not mention'd: And that is to uſe Oak-Leaves inſtead of Che-Leaves, whereon are fed the Worms that ſpin the Silk of which they make the Kyen-chew. The Emperor Kang-hi made the Experiment periment at Gebo in Tartary, where he had Silk-worms fed on Oak-Leaves; doubtleſs, the young and tender ones.

If any one would hazard the placing of Houſe Silk-Worms on young Oak-Trees, ſome of them would probably uſe themſelves to that ſort of Rural Living, in the ſame manner as we ſee young Gentlemen of nice Education accuſtom'd to the Fatigues and hard Living of a private Soldier. Their Eggs would produce, without doubt, a wild Sort, ſuch as thoſe that ſpin the Silk made uſe of for the Kyen-chew. At leaſt, Tryal might be made, whether the Houſe-worms would reliſh young Oak-Leaves; if ſo, they might be uſed when the Mulberry-Trees are backward.

Of the true Mulberry-Trees. All the Chineſe Authors ſay of the true Mulberry-Tree, may be reduced to the following Articles, viz. to know the good and bad Sort; the manner of improving them by chuſing the Trees, manuring the Soil, ſtripping the Leaves, grafting, and above all pruning them; and laſtly, how to multiply the good Sort.

How to chuſe them. The Mulberry-Trees which ſhoot their Fruit before their Leaves, ought to be rejected, their Leaves being commonly very ſmall and unwholeſome; beſides this Sort periſhes in a few Years.

As to chuſing young Plants, ſuch as have the Rind ſhrivell'd, produce but very ſmall Leaves, and are not to be made uſe of; but thoſe that have the Bark white, few Knots, and large Buds, are always to be choſen. Their Leaves grow large and thick, and the Silk-Worms that feed on them produce firm Cods full of Silk.

The beſt Sort. The beſt Mulberry-Trees are thoſe that give the leaſt Fruit, becauſe the Sap is leſs divided. There is a Method to render them barren as to Fruit, but rich in Leaves, and it is, by feeding Poultry with Mulberries, either freſh pick'd off the Tree, or dried in the Sun; and then taking their Dung, and diſſolving it in Water, the Mulberry Seed is ſteep'd therein, after which they ſow it.

Of the King-ſang Mulberry-Trees. There are in general two Sorts of good Mulberry-Trees, and theſe are nam'd from the Provinces whence they were firſt brought: The one is from King, a Country in the Province of Hû-quang, and therefore named King-ſang; the Leaves of it are thin, ſomewhat pointed, and in Shape a little like the Leaf of a Gourd. The Root is durable, and the Heart of the Trunk ſolid. The Worms fed on its Leaves ſpin a ſtrong Silk, very fit to make the Sha and the Lo-Sha, (which is a kind of Gauze or thick Crape.) The Leaves of King are far the beſt for the Silk-Worms newly hatch'd; for every Age has a ſuitable Food moſt agreeable to it.

Mulberry-Trees of Lû. The Mulberry-Trees of Lû (the ancient Name of the Province of Shang tong) do not bear much Fruit; their Trunk is tall, their Leaves large, ſtrong, firm, round, and full of Juice: the Branches are ſound and vigorous; but the Root and Heart are neither ſolid nor laſting: tho' their Leaves be good for all Ages, they are more proper to feed Silk-Worms a little grown. Of theſe Mulberry-Trees, ſome ſhoot out their Leaves very early; this is the Sort that ſhould be kept near home, the more conveniently to clear the noxious Graſs from their Root, and to dung and water them in dry Seaſons, in order to have near at Hand the firſt Proviſion for thoſe precious Inſects.

The young Trees that have been too much ſtripp'd of their Leaves in their firſt three Years, ſuffer for it afterwards, becoming weak and backward. The ſame happens to thoſe Trees whoſe Leaves and Leafleſs Branches are not clean prun'd. They are in their prime Vigour in the third Year, but begin to decline towards the fifth, when their Roots gall. The Remedy is, in the Spring, to un-earth the Roots, and cut off the moſt entangled, and then cover them with a proper Mould, ſprinkling it with Water.

Art of making Mulberry-Trees young. When the Mulberry-Trees grow old, there is an Art to recover them, by cutting off the exhauſted Branches, and grafting ſound Shoots in their Stead; by which means a Sap glides thro' the whole Body of the Tree, and enlivens it: This Operation ſhould be always made in the Beginning of the ſecond Month, which anſwers to our March.

To prevent theſe Trees from languiſhing, you muſt frequently examine, if certain Worms have not entred and lodg'd their Seed in them. Theſe Worms are kill'd by pouring a little of the Oyl of the Tong Tree Fruit in upon them. Any other ſtrong Oyl would certainly produce the ſame Effect.

The Soil proper for Mulberry-Trees. The Soil proper for Mulberry-Trees ought not to be ſtrong, nor too hard. Ground newly broke up is very good for this Purpoſe. In the Provinces of Che kyang and Kyang nan, whence the beſt Silk comes, Care is taken to mend the Soil with the Mud of the Canals cut thro' the Country, which are clean'd every Year. The Dung of Animals, and even of the Silk-Worms, with Aſhes, is alſo proper Manure. Small Garden Seeds ſown between theſe Trees, are of no Damage to them, provided the Plough does not touch the Roots. But the main and moſt profitable Point is to be very watchful in having the Mulberry-Trees prun'd in a right Seaſon, and by a skilful Hand: This makes them earlier, and more abounding with Leaves: which are thereby better fill'd, and more reliſh'd by the Silk-Worms. The Branches about the Middle of the Tree ought particularly to be lopp'd away, that the Leaves may be pick'd the more commodiouſly. A Leaf-Gatherer, who places himſelf always in the Center of the Tree, will, with this Precaution, gather more in one Day, than another without it could in ſeveral Days, which is no ſmall ſaving; beſides being a readier way to ſupply the hungry Worms.

To gather the Leaves of the extreme Branches they uſe a fork'd Ladder, ſupported by its own Prop, that it may not hurt the Tree. Our Author aſſerts, that a Mulberry-Tree well prun'd is as good, and yields as much, as two others.

The Month of January is the Seaſon for pruning the Mulberry-Trees, which is done in the ſame manner as Vines, particularly Arbour-Vines: It's ſufficient that the Branches which are left have four Buds, the Over-plus ought to be thrown away. Four Sorts of Branches muſt be entirely cut off; 1ſt. Thoſe that hang down towards the Root. 2dly. Thoſe that ſhoot inwards towards the Trunk. 3dly. Of thoſe that are forky, and ſhoot two and two out of the Trunks, one ought to be retrenched. 4thly. Thoſe which grow well otherwiſe, but are too cluſtering, and too much garniſh'd. None but the Branches that ſhoot outward from the Tree are to be ſpared. The following Spring they will be vigorous and flouriſhing, and their forward Leaves will advance the Maturity of the Worms, and the Profit of the Silk. The Seaſon for pruning. Of the Manner of pruning.

Our Author, who lays great Streſs on the Art of Pruning as practiſed in Nan king, near Che kyang, his own Country, inſiſts that the People of the Province of Shang tong, who prune in a different Manner, ought to try this, and not obſtinately practiſe their old Method.

About the Cloſe of Autumn, before the Mulberry Leaves grow yellow, they ought to be gather'd, and dry'd in the Sun, then to be pounded ſmall, and put into large Earthen Pots ſtop'd with Clay, and ſo kept in a Place free from Smoak. In the Spring thoſe beaten Leaves will be like Meal, and proper to be given to the Worms after Moulting. Of the gathering of the Leaves.

In the Provinces of Che kyang and Kyang nan, where the beſt Silk is produced, they are very careful to hinder the Growth of the Mulberry-Trees, and lopp them to prevent their exceeding a certain Height. The Loppings are diligently heap'd together, for more than one Uſe; the Chineſe knowing how to turn every thing to Advantage. 1ſt. Where Wood is ſcarce, they burn them to warm the Water, into which the beſt Silk Cods are put for the more eaſy Winding. 2dly. Their Aſhes make a Waſh for the Cods pierced by the Moth-flies, and ſuch others as are faulty; with the help of this Waſh wherein they ſtew, they open extraordinarily, and become fit to be ſpun to make Ferret-Silk, or be prepar'd for Wad us'd inſtead of Cotton. 3dly. Of the Bark of theſe Loppings they ſometimes make Paper, ſtrong enough to cover an ordinary Umbrella, eſpecially when varniſh'd and colour'd. When the Mulberry-Trees grow old, and their Leaves rank, Care ſhould be taken to renew them: For which end, beſides the Method by grafting, before explain'd, they procure new Plants, either by twiſting together quick and ſound Branches, in ſmall Caſks made of two Pieces of large Bamboo, and fill'd with good Mould; or by bending, at Spring, the long Branches left unprun'd, and ſticking their Ends in manured Soil: In December following, when theſe Branches will have taken Root, they are dexterouſly cut from the Body of the Tree, and tranſplanted in the proper Seaſon. They alſo ſow the Mulberry Seed, which muſt be choſen from the beſt Trees, and from the Fruit that grows about the Middle of the Branches. This Seed ought to be mix'd with the Aſhes of the burnt Branches: Next Day the whole is to be ſtirr'd in Water; when the Water is ſettled, the uſeleſs Seed floats; that which ſinks to the Bottom, ought to be dry'd in the Sun, and afterwards ſowed, mix'd with an equal Quantity of Millet, which aſſiſts the Mulberry-Trees that then love the Shade, and defends them in growing from the ſcorching Heat of the Sun. The Uſe of their Wood. Manner of renewing Mulberry-Plants. By the Seed.

When the Millet is ripe, they wait for windy Weather, and then ſet Fire to it. The enſuing Spring, the Mulberry-Trees ſhoot with a great deal more Strength. The Branches muſt be prun'd away till the Plants are grown to a proper Height, and then the Tops muſt be cut, to make the Branches ſhoot out on the Sides; at length the young Mulberry-Trees are tranſplanted, at the diſtance of eight or ten Paces, in Lines four Paces aſunder; but the Trees of one Line muſt not be placed directly oppoſite to thoſe of the next: Tis likely they neglect Symmetry in this, becauſe otherwiſe the Trees might over-ſhade one another. By Tranſplanting.

'Tis not enough to have cultivated the Mulberry-Trees for the Nouriſhment of Silk-Worms; Apartments muſt alſo be prepar'd for thoſe precious Inſects, ſuitable to the different Conditions, to the Places where, and Times when they ſpin. Thoſe excellent Workers, which of their own Subſtance contribute to the Luxury and Delicacy of our Dreſs and Furniture, deſerve to be treated with Diſtinction; ſince the Riches they yield are in proportion to the Care taken of them, and if they ſuffer or languiſh, their Work will do the ſame. Of the Apartments for Silk-Worms.

Several Chineſe Writers have treated of the Apartments proper for Silk-Worms, ſuch as in ſome Provinces almoſt every Family has, and in which only a ſmall quantity of Silk, proportion'd to their Leiſure and narrow Habitation, is gathered: But this Extract is taken from an Author, who became one of the firſt Miniſters of the Empire, and who fully diſcuſs'd this Matter, having wrote only with regard to large and expenſive, but in the Event very profitable, Manufactories: He ſays, an agreeable Place ought to be choſen for the Apartment of the Silk-Worms; it muſt be on a dry riſing Ground, and near a Rivulet; becauſe it is neceſſary to waſh the Eggs often, and running Water agrees beſt with them. Their Lodgings ought to be retir'd from all Dunghills, Sinks, Cattle, and all Noiſe. Diſagreeable Smells, and the leaſt Fright, make ſtrange Impreſſions on ſo nice a Brood. Even the barking of a Dog, and the crowing of a Cock, put them into Diſorder, when newly hatched. A particular Detail on this Occaſion.

The Room muſt be built ſquare, and may ſerve for other Uſes when the Silk-Worm Seaſon is over. Its Walls ſhould be very cloſe for the ſake of Warmth; the Door South, at leaſt South Eaſt, but never in the North; with a Window on every Side, to receive and have a free Paſſage for the Air, as occaſion requires. Theſe Windows, which are almoſt always kept ſhut, are of white tranſparent Paper, behind which are moveable Matts placed ſo as to admit or ſhut out the Light, as occaſion requires. The Figure of the Chamber.

These Matts are also useful to keep out pernicious Winds, such as the South and South West, which should never enter the Apartments. As a refreshing Breeze is sometimes required, and in such Case, one of the Windows must be open'd, should the Air be full of Gnats and Flies, it would prove very destructive. For as they settle on the Silk-Cases, they make Blemishes, which render the Winding extremely difficult, so that it is best to hasten the Work before the Fly-Season. One ought not to be less careful to prevent the Entrance of small Lizards and Rats, which are very greedy after Silk-Worms; this is done by having active and vigilant Cats.

The Heat necessary for the Chamber.

'Tis very material that the Eggs be hatch'd at once, and that the Worms sleep, waken, feed, and cast their Skins together; for this purpose, a constant and equal Warmth should be kept in their Apartment, by having Fire cover'd in Stoves at the four Corners of the Room, or else by carrying a Warming-Pan up and down the Room, while necessary; the Pan ought to be out of the Room, when they put in the Fire, which should be cover'd with Ashes, for a red or bluish Flame very much annoys the Worms.

The Fire proper for Silk-Worms.

Our Author would, if possible, have the Fuel, which warms the Chamber, to be of Cow-Dung; he advises to lay in a Stock of it during Winter, to moisten it, and to make it into Clods to be dry'd in the Sun: These Clods are laid upon Planks of hard Wood, which must be put into hollow Brick-work; when they set Fire to it, it produces a gentle Heat, which is very proper for the Worms, and they are pleased with the Smell of that Dung; but great Care must be taken to keep the Smoak out of the Chamber, for the Worms cannot bear it; this Fire keeps in a long time under the Ashes, which is no small Advantage. Lastly, to preserve the Place dry, for in case of Dampness, little Profit there can be expected, it is necessary that the Outside of the Door be covered with a double Matt, to keep out the chill Air.

Furniture for the Silk-Worms Nursery.

He next treats of furnishing the Chamber with the necessary Utensils for keeping and maintaining the Silk-Worms: Nine or ten Rows of Shelves must be made by Stories, nine Inches more or less distant from each other; upon these they place Hurdles of Rushes, with wide Meshes, the Holes big enough to receive the little Finger, that the Warmth of the Place may the more easily penetrate them, and that the cool Air may succeed it: These several Stories must be ranged in such a manner, as to form an open Space in the midst of the Chamber, and a free Passage quite round: Upon these Hurdles they hatch the Worms, and here they feed them till they are ready to spin; but then the Scene changes.

Moreover these Hurdles being like a Cradle for these very tender Insects, they lay on a kind of Mattress, call'd the Shnois, that is to say, they spread over it a Bed of dry Straw, chopt small, upon which they put a long Sheet of Paper, softened by gentle handling; when the Sheet is fouled by their Ordure, or by the Remnants of their Meals, that is to say, by the Fibres of the Leaves, which they never touch, they cover it with a Net, having Meshes that afford a free Passage: Upon this Net they cast Mulberry Leaves, the Smell of which immediately draws up the hungry Swarm; then they take the Net off gently, and place it upon a new Hurdle, whilst they clean the old one, that it may serve another time.

You see there are many Precautions to be taken about the Habitation of the Silk-Worms: Our Author adds further, that there should be a Wall, or close Palisade round about the Chamber, and at a little distance from it, especially on the West Side, in case they should be obliged to let in the Air that Way, that the setting Sun might not strike upon the Worms.

The Gathering of the Leaves.

When he treats of stocking yourself with Mulberry Leaves, he advises you to use a wide Bag-Net, which opens and shuts much like a Purse, that the Leaves may not be stuff'd, but may dry in carrying, and not wither.

As the Worms new-hatch'd require a more nice and prepared Food, he says the Leaves must be cut into very small fine Threads; and that for this purpose a very sharp Knife must be used, that it may not squeeze the Leaves in cutting, but leave all the Delicateness of their Taste.

It is often seen that Plants degenerate, and that the Seed is not so good as its Original; it is the same with the Moth-flies, there are some weak and languishing; a good Brood must not be expected from these; and therefore you must make Choice of those that are proper: This Choice is made at two Seasons,

The Manner of distinguishing good Moth-flies from bad ones.

1st. Before they go out of their Cods, and it is then they distinguish the Male Cods from the Female. This is the way to know them; the Cods which are a little pointed, close and fine, and less than the others, contain the Male Moth-flies; the Cods rounder, bigger and thicker, and more clumsy, inclose the Females: In general, the Cods which are clear, somewhat transparent, clean and weighty are the best.

2dly. This Choice is more safely made when the Moth-flies are come out, which happens a little after the fourteenth Day of their Retirement: Those which come out a Day before the others, must by no means be used to multiply the Species; lay hold of those that come out the next Day in Crouds; the latest must be rejected. Another Mark to chuse them by is this, The Moth-flies which have bending Wings, bald Eye-brows, a dry Tail, and a reddish Belly, without Hair, must not be chosen to multiply the Breed.

Of their Multiplication.

When the Choice is made, they bring the Males and Females together; and lay them upon several Sheets of Paper that they may couple: This Paper must not be made of hempen Cloth, but of the Bark of the Mulberry-Tree, and must be strengthened with Silk or Cotton Thread, glu'd on the Backside, because when its Sheets are cover'd with Eggs, they must be dip'd three times in a Water which is proper for them: These Sheets of Paper must be spread on Matts well well cover'd with Straw. After the Moth-flies have been together about twelve Hours, the Males muſt be taken away; if they were to be any longer together, the Eggs which they would produce, being later, would not be hatch'd with the others, which Inconveniency ſhould be avoided: The Male Moth-flies muſt be put in a ſeparate Place, with thoſe which are rejected in the beginning.

The Care to be taken of the Females in the Time of their laying Eggs.

That the Females may lay their Eggs more advantageouſly, it is neceſſary to give them Room, and cover them; for Darkneſs hinders them from too much ſcattering their Eggs. When they have done laying, they muſt be kept covered for four or five Days; after which, all theſe Moth-flies, with thoſe which were ſet aſide, or which were taken dead out of the Cods, muſt be buried deep in the Earth; for it would infect any Animal to touch them. Some aſſert, that if they were buried in ſeveral Places of the Field, it would neither produce Brambles, nor any prickly Shrub for ſeveral Years; others throw them into Fiſh-Ponds, and pretend there is nothing better to fatten the Fiſh.

The Care to be taken of the Eggs.

As to the valuable Seed that remains ſticking upon the Sheets of Paper, ſome of it muſt ſtill be thrown away; for Inſtance, thoſe Eggs which ſticking together make a ſort of Clots: We muſt hope for Silk from the others; and of theſe great Care muſt be taken. Here my Author expreſſes his Surprize, that the Worms being ſo ſenſible of the leaſt Chilneſs, or Moiſture of the Air, their Eggs on the contrary ſhould be found to agree very well with the Water and Snow: Would not one think (ſays he) that they were of two different Natures? He compares the Changes undergone by the Worms, which ſucceſſively become Ants, Caterpillars, and then Moth-flies, to the Changes which in order happen to Plants, by the unfolding of their Parts, which are compact in one Situation, and dilate themſelves in another; ſome of which wither in a Moment, and fall off at the ſame time, that others appear in their full Vigour.

The firſt Care to be taken, is to hang up the Sheets cover'd with Eggs to the Beam of the Room, which muſt be opened in the Front, ſo that the Wind may come in, without the Rays of the Sun ſtriking upon them; that Side of the Sheet, on which the Eggs are laid, muſt not be turn'd outwards; the Fire which heats the Room, muſt neither blaze nor ſmoak; Care muſt be taken likewiſe, that no hempen Ropes come near either the Worms or Eggs: Theſe Precautions are not repeated without Reaſon. When they have let the Sheets hang ſo for ſome Days, they take them down and roll them up looſly, ſo that the Eggs be within the Sheet, and then they are hanged up again in the ſame Manner, during the Summer and Autumn.

The Bath for the Eggs.

The 8*th* of the 12*th* Moon, that is, the end of December, or in January, when there is an intercalary Month, they put the Eggs into cold River-Water, if it is to be got, or in Water with a little Salt diſſolv'd in it, taking care that this Water does not freeze; the Sheets are left therein two Days, and leſt they ſhould ſwim, they keep them down to the Bottom of the Veſſel, by clapping a China-Diſh over them. After having taken them out of the Water, they hang them up again, and when they are dry, they roll them up a little tighter, and incloſe them ſeparately, ſtanding on one end in an Earthen Veſſel; after that, once in about ten Days, when the Sun after a Shower ſhines very bright, they expoſe the Sheet to its Rays in a ſhelter'd Place where there is no Dew; they leave them there about half an Hour, and then cloſe them up in the ſame Manner as before.

First Method.

Second Method.

There are ſome who practiſe a different Method: They put the Sheets into a Lye made of Aſhes of the Wood of Mulberry-Trees, and after their having been there a whole Day, they take them out, and lay them ſome Moments in Snow-Water, or elſe hang them up three Nights on a Mulberry-Tree, to receive the Snow or Rain, provided it be not too violent.

The Effects of the Baths.

Theſe Baths, whether made of a ſort of Lye and Snow-Water, or of River-Water, or Water impregnated with Salt, produce a Silk eaſy to wind, and contribute to render it cloſer, ſtronger, and in its Subſtance leſs porous; their chief Uſe is to cheriſh the internal Heat in the Eggs, in which their prolific Virtue conſiſts.

Care of the Eggs at the time of Hatching.

When the Mulberry-Trees begin to have Leaves, it is time to think of hatching the Eggs; for they are haſten'd or hinder'd according to the different Degrees of Heat or Cold imparted to them: They forward them, if they often ſpread the Sheets abroad, if alſo, in laying them by, they roll them up very looſly; by doing the contrary, they hinder them.

Here follows the Buſineſs of the three Days preceding the hatching of the Worms. It is of great importance that they ſhould all hatch together: When they are ready to come out, one ſees the Eggs ſwell, and their Roundneſs become a little pointed: The firſt of the three Days, about ten or eleven o'Clock, in a clear Sky, a little Wind ſtirring, (as is common at that Seaſon) theſe precious Rolls of Paper are taken out of the Veſſel, ſtretch'd at length, and hung up with the Backſides towards the Sun; they keep them there till they acquire a kindly Warmth, then they are roll'd up cloſe, and ſet upright in the Veſſel, in a warm Place, till the next Day; then they are taken out again, and the ſame Operation repeated.

After the Hatching.

This Day, the Eggs are obſerved to change Colour, and turn of an Aſh-grey: Then they clap two Sheets together, and roll them tighter, tying the Ends. The third Day towards Night, they unroll the Sheets, and ſtretch them on a fine Matt; the Eggs then appear blackiſh: If there are any Worms hatch'd, they muſt be caſt away, becauſe they would never be Worms of the ſame Community; for Experience teaches, that thoſe Worms which are not hatched with the others, never agree with them in the time of caſting their Slough, of waking, of eating, nor, which is the principal, of making Cods: Theſe odd Worms would much increaſe the Care and Trouble, and occaſion Loſs by putting things out of courſe; wherefore they are ſeaſonably baniſh'd: This Separation being made, they roll three Sheets together very looſe, and carry them into a pretty warm Place, ſhelter'd from the South Wind.

The next Day, about ten or eleven o' Clock, they take out the Rolls, open them, and find them full of Worms, like little black Ants, which is what is meant by the Name they give them, He-y; the Eggs not hatch'd in about an Hour afterwards, muſt be thrown away: If amongſt any of theſe new-hatch'd Worms you perceive any with a flat Head, that are ſhrivell'd, and as it were ſcorch'd, of a Sky-Blue, Yellow, or Fleſh-Colour, none of theſe are worth keeping; the good Sort are of the Colour of a Mountain ſeen at a diſtance.

It is adviſable firſt to weigh the Sheet containing the new-hatch'd Worms; then hold it ſloping, and turn'd almoſt upſide down, upon a long Sheet of Paper ſtrew'd with Mulberry Leaves, and prepar'd in the Manner before mention'd: The Smell of theſe Leaves will attract the little hungry Worms; but the moſt ſluggiſh may be help'd down with a Feather, or by gently ſlapping the Back of the Sheet, which being weighed by itſelf, will give exactly the Weight of the Worms; whence they compute, very nearly, how many Pounds of Leaves will be neceſſary to feed them, alſo the Weight of the Cods they ought to produce, barring Accidents.

Way of Management. We come now to treat of the right Management of theſe Worms, and how properly to qualify the Heat of their Nurſery: For this Purpoſe they provide for the Worms a kind Mother, who is careful of their Wants; ſhe is therefore call'd by our Author Tſan-mû, Mother of the Worms. She takes poſſeſſion of the Room, but not till ſhe has waſh'd her ſelf, and put on proper Attire, that hath no ill Smell; ſhe muſt not have eaten for ſome time before, nor handled Wild Succory, the Smell of which is very prejudicial to this tender Brood: She muſt be clothed in a ſingle Habit, without lineing, that ſhe may judge the better, by Feeling, the degree of the Warmth of the Place, and accordingly augment or diminiſh the Fire; but ſhe muſt carefully avoid making a Smoak, or raiſing a Duſt, as it would be very contrary to the Delicacy of theſe little Inſects, which muſt be very nicely managed before the firſt Moulting. Every Day, ſays an Author, is a Year to them, and has in it, as one may ſay, the four Seaſons; the Morning is Spring; the middle of the Day, Summer; the Evening, Autumn; and the Night Winter.

The Matron, or Houſe-keeper.

Particular Rules concerning the Silk-Worms. Here follow general Rules of Practice, founded on Experience, and proper to be obſerv'd. (1.) As long as the Eggs are kept before they are hatch'd, they require much Cold. (2.) When hatch'd, and like Ants, they want as much Heat. (3.) When become Caterpillars, and near Mewing-time, they need a moderate Heat. (4.) After the great Mewing, they muſt be kept cool. 5. When upon the Decline, and growing old, they ought to be warm'd by little and little. (6.) A great Heat is neceſſary when they are working their Cods.

Diſguſts and Antipathies of Silk-Worms. The Delicacy of theſe little Inſects, requires great care to be taken to remove every thing that might incommode them; for they have their Diſtaſtes and Antipathies: They have a particular Averſion to Hemp, wet Leaves, or thoſe heated by the Sun, and, when newly hatch'd, to Duſt raiſed by ſweeping; to the Moiſture of the Earth, Flies and Gnats, the Smell of broil'd Fiſh, burnt Hair, Muſk, Smoak, Breath ſmelling of Wine, Ginger, Lettice, Wild Succory; all great Noiſes, Naſtineſs, the Rays of the Sun, the Light of a Lamp, the quivering Flame of which muſt not ſtrike upon their Eyes in the Night; the Wind that draws through Holes or Chinks, a high Wind, Cold, Heat, and eſpecially a ſudden Change from great Cold to great Heat: With reſpect to their Food; Leaves cover'd with Dew, thoſe dry'd in the Sun or a high Wind, or tainted with an ill Savour, are the moſt common Cauſes of their Diſtempers: It is proper to gather the Leaves two or three Days before-hand, to keep them in a clean airy Place, where there is Room enough; not forgetting during the firſt three Days to give them the tendereſt Leaves cut into little Threads.

Their Diſeaſes.

Their Mewing. At the end of three or four Days, when they begin to turn white, augment their Food in Quantity, but cut it not ſo ſmall: Afterwards when they become blackiſh, they muſt have a greater quantity of Leaves, and as gather'd from the Tree: As they turn white again, and eat with leſs Appetite, leſſen their Meals a little: As they grow yellow, they muſt have leſs Meat ſtill; when they become quite yellow, and are, according to the Chineſe Language, at the Eve of one of the three Sleeps; that is to ſay, when they are ready to mew, then give them nothing: Every Mewing-time they muſt be treated in the ſame Manner, in proportion to their Bigneſs.

The Silk-Worms eat Day and Night. We now come to a more exact Account: Theſe Worms eat equally Day and Night. After they are hatch'd, they muſt have 48 Meals the firſt Day, two every Hour, the next 30, but the Leaves not cut ſo ſmall; the third Day, they muſt have leſs ſtill: Theſe little Inſects then reſemble new-born Infants, who pine, unleſs always at the Nipple: If their Food be not proportion'd to their Appetite, they will be over-heated, which would ruin the fineſt Hopes. Some adviſe to give them at firſt Leaves, which healthy Perſons have kept a certain time in their Boſom, becauſe the Perſpiration of a Human Body is very agreeable to theſe little Worms. At the times of their Repaſts, the Meals muſt be equally ſtrew'd all over: Cloudy and rainy Weather takes away their Stomach: The Remedy is, immediately before their Repaſt to light a Wiſp of very dry Straw, the Flame of which muſt be all alike, and held over the Worms, to free them from the Cold and Moiſture that benums them, or elſe, to remove the Blinds from the Windows, and let in the full Day-light. Theſe ſmall Helps give them an Appetite, and prevent Diſeaſes.

Their Meals, how often.

The Maturity of the Silk-Worms advantageous to the Breeder. But why ſhould they take ſo much Pains to make this little Swarm eat ſo often? It is to haſten their Growth, and to make them ſooner work their Cods, the chief Profit of the Silk-Worms depending thereon. If they come to Maturity in 23, or 25 Days, a Hurdle cover'd cover'd with them, the Weight of which, directly weigh'd, amounted to a Mas, that is, a little more than a Drachm, will produce 25 Ounces of Silk; but if, for want of Care and Food, they come not to Perfection till 28 Days, they'll yield no more than 20 Ounces; and but 10, if they are a Month or forty Days in growing.

When they come to full Growth, give them an eaſy Food, a little at a time, and often, almoſt the ſame as when young: If they digeſt not their Food, at the time they begin to ſpin, the Cods have a ſaltiſh Moiſture, that will render the Silk very difficult to wind: In a word, when they have been hatch'd 24 or 25 Days, the more their Work is deferred, and the more Leaves they conſume, the leſs Silk they produce. The Care then to be taken of them.

After they have caſt their Slough, you muſt give them Leaves cut ſmall, a few at a time, but often: This is like a ſecond Birth, or, according to other Authors, a ſort of Recovery: When the Worms are on the Point of mewing, they are like a Man ſick almoſt to Death by the Change in his Conſtitution; but if he can ſleep a Night, he becomes quite another Thing, and there is no more to be done but to recover his former Strength by a prudent Regimen.

There are other Diſeaſes occaſion'd either by Cold, or too much Heat: To prevent the former, a juſt Heat muſt be kept in their Room. Notwithſtanding, if the Cold has ſeiz'd theſe little Labourers, either for want of the Windows being cloſe ſhut, or becauſe the Mulberry-Leaves were not well dryed; it deſtroys their Appetite, and cauſes a ſort of Flux, for inſtead of Clots they void a watery Slime; in that caſe you muſt burn Cow-Dung near them, the Smell of which will revive them to Admiration. The Diſorders proceeding from Heat are occaſion'd, either by letting the Worms be too long hungry, by the Quality and Quantity of their Food, by an inconvenient Situation; or by the Air without becoming all of a ſudden ſultry hot: In this laſt Caſe they open one or more of the Windows, but never on that Side the Wind blows; for it muſt not come directly into the Room, but round about, that it may be qualified: For inſtance, if it is a South-Wind, they open the North Window, and if the Wind be too hot, they ſet a Veſſel full of Water before the Window: The Room may alſo be ſprinkled with cold Water, taking great care that not a Drop fall on the Worms. Diſeaſes cauſed by Cold. By Heat.

For an Exceſs of internal Heat, they give them the Meal made of Mulberry Leaves, gathered in the Autumn, and reduced to a very fine Powder, as I have before ſhewn: They moiſten a little the Leaves deſign'd for their Repaſt, then ſtrew over this Meal, which ſticks to them; but they abate an Ounce of Leaves for every Ounce of the Meal. Some give the Meal of certain little green Pulſe for a cooling Food, inſtead of the Leaf-Powder; it certainly refreſhes and invigorates thoſe Worms that eat it freely. As to an inconvenient or ſtreight Situation, it often cauſes Over-heatings, and thence proceeds the moſt common and the moſt dangerous Sickneſs among theſe Worms. Tho' while ſhut up in the Egg they may be crowded, as ſoon as they are hatch'd they require a great deal of Room, eſpecially when they are grown Caterpillars, and abound in Moiſture. Theſe Inſects, tho' not cleanly themſelves, ſuffer much by Naſtineſs: Their Clots, which they caſt in abundance, quickly ferment, and heat them conſiderably, if they are not ſeaſonably freed from them, either by ſweeping them off with a Feather, or, which is better, by often removing the Worms from one Hurdle to another. Sickneſs by their Situation.

Change of Hurdles is chiefly neceſſary when they are grown big, and near mewing: But ſeveral Perſons muſt be employ'd, that the Worms may all be removed at the ſame time: They muſt be touched with a light Hand, and not let fall, nor rudely ſet down. This would enfeeble them, and make them ſluggiſh in their Work. Tho' changing the Hurdle is alone ſufficient to cure their Diſorders, for a ſpeedy Relief, ſome throw upon them dry Ruſhes, or Straw, cut ſmall, upon which they ſtrew Mulberry Leaves: They crawl up to eat, and by that means come out of the Clots that over-heat them. The great Benefit of theſe Removals conſiſts in the Frequency and equal Diſtribution of them; doing it gently, and allowing the Worms more Room every time. When they become pretty well grown, the Worms belonging to one Hurdle muſt be divided, and put on three new ones, like ſo many Colonies; afterward into ſix, and ſo on to the number of twenty, or more: For theſe Inſects being full of Humours, muſt be kept at a due Diſtance one from another. But it is of the greateſt Importance to remove them at the critical Moment, when they are of a bright Yellow, and ready to ſpin: An Apartment ſhould be prepared beforehand proper for their Work. How prevented and cur'd.

Our Author propoſes a ſort of rough Piece of Timber-Work, or long Roof, very little ſloping, and the Inſide clear; which muſt be divided all round into many Partitions, each with a Shelf, where they place the Silk-Worms, and where they will afterwards range themſelves, each in his Diſtrict. This Machine ought to have convenient Room for a Man to go in, without diſplacing any thing, that he may keep a ſmall Fire in the middle, to defend the Worms from Moiſture and Cold, which are much to be feared at this time. I ſaid a ſmall Fire, becauſe there muſt be but juſt enough to yield a gentle Heat, which makes the Worms more eager at Work, and the Silk more tranſparent. This numerous Army of Worms, being thus ranged in their Apartment, muſt be ſurrounded with Matts at a little diſtance, which muſt alſo cover the Top of the Machine, to keep off the outſide Air; and becauſe the Worms love to work privately, and in the dark. Nevertheleſs, after the third Day's Work, they take away the Matts from one o'Clock to three, and give the Sun a free entrance into the Room, but ſo that the Rays may not ſtrike upon theſe little Labourers; after which they cover them as before. If it ſhould thunder, they are preſerv'd from the Terror of the Noiſe, and the Lightning, by being cover'd with the Sheets of Paper that were uſed when they were on the Hurdles. To preſerve them from the Terror of Thunder and Lightning.

In ſeven Days the Work of the Cods is finiſhed, and in ſeven more, or thereabouts, the Worms quit their ſilken Apartments, and appear upon their coming out in the ſhape of Moth-flies. When they gather the Cods, it is uſual to put them on Heaps, for it is impoſſible to wind off all the Silk immediately, becauſe they are hindred by other Buſineſs. Nevertheleſs this hath its Inconveniences: For if out of the Heaps of Cods they defer chuſing thoſe to be left for Moth-flies to multiply the Species, the Moth-flies of thoſe ſtifled Cods by being ſqueezed and over-heated will not ſucceed ſo well; the Females eſpecially that had been hurt, would lay none but ſickly Eggs: They ſet therefore the Cods deſigned for multiplication of the Species apart, and lay them upon a Hurdle big enough, and in a cool airy Place.

How to leſſen the Number of Worms without hurting the Breed.

As to thoſe numerous Cods, which you would not have bored, you muſt contrive how to kill the Moth-flies, without damaging the Work. They muſt not be put into the Kettle, but as they can be wound off; for if they were to ſoak too long, it would hurt the Silk. It would be beſt to wind them off all together, if a ſufficient number of Hands could be imploy'd. My Author affirms, that five Men can wind off thirty Pound of Cods in a Day, and ſupply two others with as much Silk as they can make into Skains, that is, about ten Pounds; but as that cannot always be done, he directs three Ways to preſerve the Cods from being bored.

The firſt Way.

The firſt is, to let them lie a whole Day in the Sun, the Heat of which, tho' prejudicial to the Silk, certainly kills the Moth-flies.

The ſecond Way.

The ſecond is reckon'd of uſe to throw an Ounce of Salt, and half an Ounce of Rape-Oil, into the Copper; for the Exhalations, impregnated with the acid Spirits of the Salt, and the ſulphureous Particles of the Oil, are ſuppoſed to make the Cods better, and the Silk eaſier to wind; therefore the Machine with the Cods muſt go very ſtrait into the Copper, the Top of which muſt be cover'd and luted, ſo that no Steam may get out: But if this Bath is not rightly order'd, in which many are miſtaken, a great number of the Flies will bore their Cods: Upon which it is to be obſerv'd, (1.) That the firm and hard Cods have generally the Ball of Silk coarſer, and of conſequence eaſier to wind, which for the ſame Reaſon may be left longer in Balneo Mariæ; the contrary is obſerv'd of the fine and ſlender Cods. (2.) That when the Flies are kill'd in Balneo Mariæ, the Cods muſt be ſpread abroad upon Matts, and cover'd, when a little cool, with ſmall Willow or Mulberry Branches.

The third Way.

The third Way of killing the Moth-flies is preferable to the two former, and as follows: Put the Cods into great Earthen Veſſels, and into every Veſſel throw four Ounces of Salt for each ten Pound of Cods, and cover them with large dry Leaves, like thoſe of Water-Lily; upon theſe Leaves lay ten Pounds more of Cods, ſprinkled with four Ounces of Salt as before, filling the Veſſels with ſeveral Lays; then cloſing the Mouth of it, ſo that the Air may be entirely excluded, the Flies will be ſtifled in ſeven Days; but if the leaſt Air be admitted by any Chink, they'll live long enough to pierce their Cods; for as they are of a ſpungy Subſtance, and readily imbibe the Air, the leaſt Quantity getting in would keep them alive.

In laying the Cods in the Veſſels, the choiceſt muſt be ſet apart; the long, white, and glittering ones yield a very fine Silk; the thick, dark, and of a Blue, like the Skin of an Onion, produce a coarſe Silk.

Seaſon proper for the Worms.

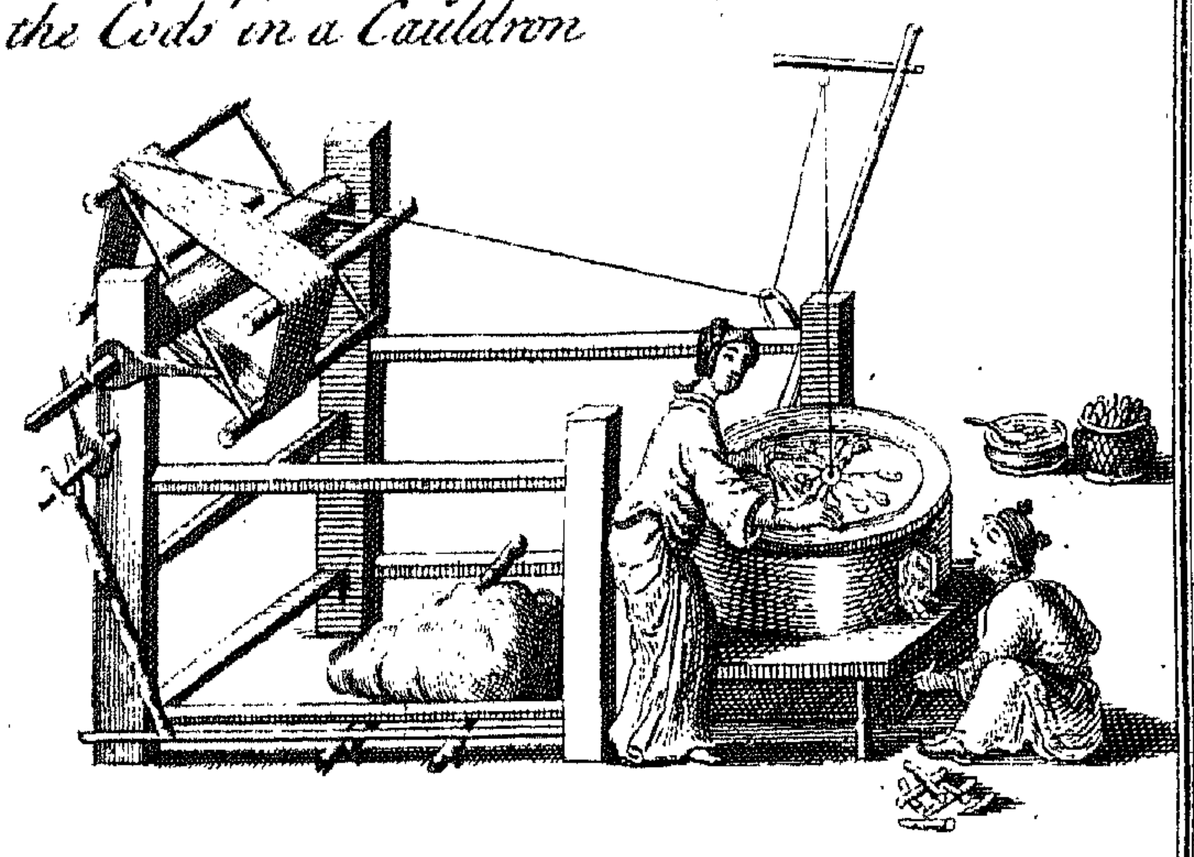
So much for the Method of raiſing Worms in the Spring; and indeed 'tis in this Seaſon that the Generality of the Chineſe are employ'd in this Work. 'Tis true, ſome hatch Eggs in Summer and Autumn, and almoſt every Month after the firſt Spring-Crop: But then they muſt provide Workmen for the purpoſe, who are able to hold out, and Mulberry-Trees to ſupply Food enough for all the Seaſons, which the Trees would hardly furniſh; beſides, if they are exhauſted in one Year, they decay, and fail entirely the Spring following.

Autumn better than the Spring.

Therefore, according to my Author, it is beſt to hatch but few Worms in Summer, and only to provide Eggs for Autumn: He cites indeed an Author who adviſes to raiſe Worms in that Seaſon, which begins towards the 15*th* of Auguſt; but he allots for their Food the Leaves of thoſe Branches only, that may be ſpared without hurting the Tree. He prefers Autumn to the Spring, for raiſing Worms;

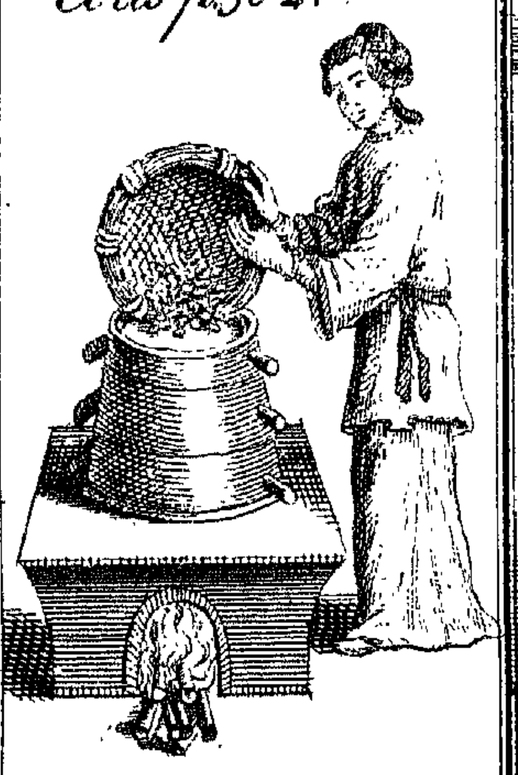
Reaſons why.

(1.) Becauſe the Spring being the Seaſon for Rain and Winds in the Southern Parts, the Profit expected from the Labour of theſe Worms is more uncertain; but in Autumn, the Weather being generally ſerene, there is leſs Hazard of Succeſs. (2.) Tho' the Worms cannot have ſuch tender Leaves for their Food as in the Spring, yet this is fully compenſated by their having nothing to fear from the poiſonous and mortal Stings of Gnats and Muſkettoes.



The Silk-Worms bred in Summer muſt be kept cool, and the Windows cover'd with Gauz to keep out the Gnats: Thoſe raiſed in Autumn are to be kept cool at firſt, but after their Mews, and when they ſpin, they muſt be kept warmer than in the Spring, becauſe of the cold Air of the Nights. When theſe autumnal Worms turn Moth-flies, they might lay Eggs for the next Year; but the ſureſt Way is to make Proviſion in the Spring, becauſe thoſe of Autumn do not always anſwer.

Eggs how to preſerve.



If you keep the Summer Eggs to be hatch'd in Autumn, firſt incloſe them in an earthen Pipkin, which muſt afterwards be ſet in a large Pan of cold Spring Water, as high as the included Eggs; if the Water be higher, the Eggs will periſh; if lower, many of them will miſcarry for want of Strength. If they are ſlow in Hatching, they either die, or make a very bad ſort of Cods. If all theſe Directions are well obſerv'd, the Eggs will hatch in twenty one Days. Inſtead of cold Water, ſome adviſe to ſet them in the Shade of ſome very buſhy Tree, incloſed in an earthen Pipkin never bak'd.

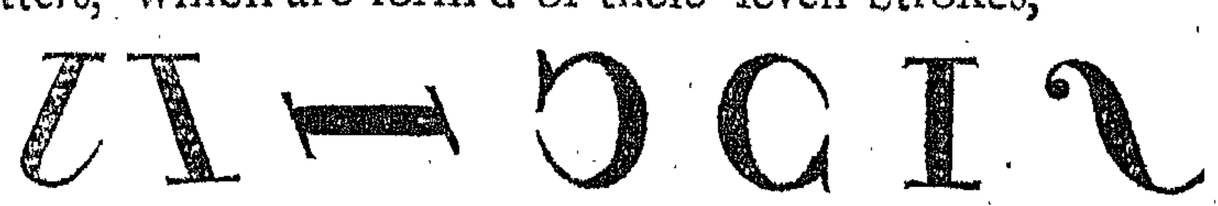
This Plate representing the SILK MANUFACTURE is gratefully inscribed to S.r Nathanael Curzon Bar.t K.t of the Shire for the County of Derby, and his Lady; both subscribers to this Work, by their Humble Servant Edw: Cave

NB. Some of these explanations are on the French or Dutch Plate.

When the Silk-worms are ready to ſpin, they may be plac'd in ſuch a Manner, that inſtead of making Cods, as they naturally do when left to themſelves, they will make a Piece of Silk flat, thin, and round, like a large Wafer: This is done by laying the Worms when they ſpin on the Top of a Cup exactly cover'd with Paper. And ſeveral Advantages would ariſe from a Work thus order'd; (1.) Theſe round and flat Pieces are as eaſy to wind as the Cods. (2.) They are all pure Silk, having none of that viſcous Matter the Worm emits in the Shell, upon being long enclos'd in it, which the Chineſe call the Urine; and which, ſoon as the Worm has done ſpinning, is taken away to prevent its damaging the Silk. (3.) You need not hurry in winding the Silk, as you muſt when it is in the Cods; for in this way, that Work may be deferr'd as long as you pleaſe, without Danger. Care of the Worms when they ſpin.



When the Silk is wound off, they immediately ſet upon manufacturing it. The Chineſe have very ſimple Inſtruments for this Work: But 'tis hardly poſſible from Words to form a juſt Idea of Things, which the Eye is the proper Judge of. The Figures on the oppoſite Plate repreſent the various Utenſils that ſerve in managing the Worms, with the ſeveral Tools and Inſtruments by which they work, to ſuch Perfection, thoſe fine and beautiful Pieces they ſend us.

Of the Chineſe Language.

IN order to give a true Idea of the Chineſe Language, I ſhall here explain the Nature of it; afterwards I ſhall ſhew how the Chineſe Words muſt be pronounc'd, and how written in European Characters; Laſtly, I ſhall finiſh with a compendious Chineſe Grammar. The Chineſe Language.

The Chineſe has no reſemblance with any dead or living Language, that we are acquainted with: All other Languages have an Alphabet of a certain Number of Letters, which by their various Combinations form Syllables and Words: This has no Alphabet, but as many Characters and different Figures as there are Words. Nature of it.

The only Conformity it has with the Languages of Europe is, that as our Alphabet is made up of twenty four Letters, which are form'd of theſe ſeven Strokes, Agrees with thoſe of Europe in one Point only.

viz. The A of the three firſt; the B of the ſixth and fourth repeated; the C of the fifth alone; the D of the ſixth and fourth; the E of the ſixth and the third tripled; the O of the fourth and fifth join'd; the Q of the O and the ſeventh Stroke, &c. ſo all the Chineſe Characters are formed, properly ſpeaking, only of the ſix following Strokes,

The Chineſe have two different Languages: Firſt the Vulgar, proper to the common People, which varies according to the different Provinces: The other is call'd the Mandarin Language, and is nearly what the Latin is to us, amongſt Eccleſiaſticks and the Learned. Two Languages in China.

But the Analogy between the Chineſe Language and others is ſo ſmall, that this Compariſon is not exact: The Mandarin Language is properly what was formerly ſpoken at Court, in the Province of Kyang nan, and propagated among the Polite of the neighbouring Provinces. Hence this Language is beſt ſpoken in the Provinces adjoyning to Kyang nan, but by ſlow degrees was introduc'd into all Parts of the Empire, to the great Conveniency of the Government. It ſeems barren, for it has not above three hundred and thirty Words, all Monoſyllables, indeclinable, and almoſt all end with a Vowel, or the Conſonant N, or Ng. Vulgar. Mandarin.

Theſe few Syllables are, notwithſtanding, ſufficient to diſcuſs all manner of Subjects; becauſe, without multiplying Words, the Senſe is varied, almoſt to Infinity, by the Difference of Accents, Inflections, Tones, Aſpirations, and other Changes of the Voice: And this Variety of Pronunciation, to thoſe that are not well vers'd in the Tongue, is a frequent Occaſion of miſtaking one Word for another: For example, the Word Chu ſounded drawling out the u, and raiſing the Voice, ſignifies Lord, or Maſter; but pronounced in an even Tone, with u long, means a Hog. When expreſſed quick and light, it ſignifies a Kitchen; but ſounded in a ſtrong and maſculine Tone, remitted towards the end, it intends a Column. In like manner, the Syllable Po, according to its different Accents, and ways of Pronunciation, has eleven different Meanings. It ſignifies, Glaſs, to boil, to winnow Rice, prudent, liberal, to prepare, an old Woman, to break or cleave, inclin'd, as little as may be, to water, a Slave or Captive. Whence we may conclude that this Language, which appears ſo barren, and confined by the ſmall Number of Monoſyllables that compoſe it, is nevertheleſs very copious and ſignificant. Again, the ſame Word, variouſly compounded, ſignifies an Infinity of different Things; Mû, for Inſtance, by itſelf ſignifies a Tree, Wood; but when compounded has many other Significations; Mû-leau, ſignifies Wood prepared for Building; Mû-lan, ſignifies Bars or wooden Grates, Mû-hya, a Cheſt; Mû-ſyang, a Preſs; Mû-tſyang, a Carpenter; Mû-ewl, a Muſhroom; Mû-nu, a kind of ſmall Orange; Mû-ſing, the Planet Jupiter; Mû-myen, Cotton, &c. This Word may be joyned to ſeveral others, and has as many different Significations as Combinations. One Word of divers Significations.

Thus

Method of joyning Monosyllables.

Thus the Chineſe, by differently ranging their Monoſyllables, make ſet Diſcourſes, and expreſs themſelves very clearly, and gracefully, almoſt in the ſame manner as we form all our Words out of the different Combinations of the twenty four Letters of our Alphabet. In ſhort, they ſo naturally diſtinguiſh the different Tones of the ſame Monoſyllable, that they comprehend its Senſe, without the leaſt reflecting on the various Accents that determine it.

We muſt not imagine, as ſome Authors have related, that they ſing in ſpeaking, and make a ſort of Muſic; this would be ſhocking, and very diſagreeable to the Ear: Theſe different Tones are ſo nicely ſounded, that Strangers find it difficult to perceive their Difference, eſpecially in the Province of Kyang nan, where the Accent is moſt perfect. We may form a judgment of it from the guttural Pronunciation in the Spaniſh Tongue, and by the different Tones in the French and Italian: Theſe Tones are hardly diſtinguiſhable, nevertheleſs they have different Meanings, which gave riſe to that Proverb, The Tone is all.

The Chineſe uſe Figures to expreſs their Thoughts.

The Art of joyning theſe Monoſyllables is very difficult, eſpecially in Writing, and requires a great deal of Study: As the Chineſe have only Figures to expreſs their Thoughts, and have no written Accents to vary the Sound, they are oblig'd to have as many different Figures or Characters, as there are Tones giving ſo many various Meanings to the ſame Word.

Beſides there are Characters which ſignify two or three Words, and ſometimes entire Sentences: For inſtance, to write theſe Words, Good morrow, Sir, inſtead of joyning the Characters for good, and morrow, with that of Sir, a different one muſt be uſed, which by it ſelf expreſſes theſe three Words; and this is what ſo greatly multiplies the Chineſe Characters: It is not therein as in our European Languages, in which the Context, or the different Placing, or Accenting, ſhew the various Significations of the ſame Word.

Difference between Words us'd in Speech and Writing.

This Method of joyning the Monoſyllables is indeed ſufficient to write ſo as to be underſtood, but it is mean, and uſed only by the Vulgar. In Compoſition, the polite and maſterly Stile is quite different from what is ſpoken, tho' the Words are the ſame; and a Man of Letters would make himſelf ridiculous, if he was to expreſs himſelf in writing, in the ſame manner that he uſually talks. In writing you muſt chuſe purer Words, more lofty Expreſſions, and certain Metaphors, not commonly uſed, but adapted to the Subject treated of, and the Books you compoſe. The Characters of Cochinchina, Tong king, and Japan, are the ſame as the Chineſe, and ſignify the ſame Things, tho' theſe Nations in ſpeaking do not always expreſs themſelves alike; ſo that notwithſtanding the Languages are very different, yet they very well underſtand each other's Writing, tho' not their Speech, and their Books are in common. Their Characters are in this reſpect like the Numeral Figures, which are uſed by ſeveral Nations under different Names, but their Meaning is every where the ſame.

The Learned therefore muſt not only be acquainted with the Characters uſed in the common Affairs of Life, but they muſt alſo know their various Combinations, and the various Diſpoſitions, which of ſeveral ſimple Strokes make the compound Characters; and as the Number of Characters amounts to 80,000, he who knows the greateſt Number, is alſo the moſt Learned, and can read and underſtand the greateſt Number of Books. By this one may judge how many Years muſt be taken up to learn ſuch a vaſt Number of Characters, to diſtinguiſh them when they are compounded, and to remember their Shape and Meaning. It muſt nevertheleſs be acknowledged, that provided a Perſon knows 10,000 Characters, he may expreſs himſelf in this Language, and read a great Number of Books. The generality of the Learned underſtand but 15,000, or 20,000; and few Doctors above 40,000.

Their Vocabulary.

This prodigious number of Characters is collected in their Vocabulary, called Hay-pyen; and as in Hebrew there are radical Letters which ſhew the Origin of Words, and ſerve to find thoſe derived from them, when look'd for in their Dictionary, according to the Order of theſe radical Letters; ſo likewiſe the Chineſe have their radical Characters: For inſtance, the Characters of Mountains, Trees, Man, the Earth, a Horſe, &c. under which may be ſought all that belongs to Mountains, Trees, Man, the Earth, and a Horſe. And farther, you muſt learn to diſtinguiſh, in every Word, thoſe Strokes or Figures which are above, beneath, on the Sides, or in the Body of the radical Figure.

Beſides this great Vocabulary, there is a ſhorter, containing only 8,000 or 10,000 Characters, which is uſed to read, write, underſtand or compoſe Books: If they want any Words, not in this ſmaller, they have recourſe to their great Dictionary. Our Miſſionaries, in like manner, have collected all the Terms, that may ſerve to inſtruct the People in the Myſteries of the Faith, and that are uſed in Converſation, and in common as well as difficult Books.

Manner of the antient Chineſe Writing.

Clement of Alexandria attributes three Sorts of Characters to the Egyptians; the firſt Epiſtolary, or fit for writing Letters, like thoſe of our Alphabet; the ſecond Sacerdotal, proper only for the Sacred Writings, in the ſame manner as the Notes for Muſic; and the third Hieroglyphical, uſed only for public Inſcriptions on their Monuments: This was done two Ways; one by proper Images, or ſomething that came near the Things they would repreſent; as when they expreſſed the Moon by a Creſcent; the other by Ænigmatical Figures and Symbols; as a Serpent bent round with the Tail in its Mouth, to ſignify the Year, or Eternity. The Chineſe have always had a like variety of Characters. In the beginning of their Monarchy, they communicated their Ideas by drawing on Paper the natural Images of the Things they would expreſs; for inſtance, a Bird, Mountains, Trees, wavy Lines, to expreſs Birds, Mountains, a Foreſt, and Water.

This

This Method of explaining their Thoughts was very imperfect, and required Volumes to expreſs a few Things. Beſides, an infinite number of Objects could not be repreſented by Drawing; ſuch as the Soul, the Thoughts, the Paſſions, Beauty, Virtues, Vices, the Actions of Men and Animals, and many others which have neither Body nor Shape; for this Reaſon, they changed by degrees their old Manner of Writing; they compoſed more ſimple Figures, and invented many others to expreſs thoſe things that do not come within the Verge of the Senſes. Its Inconvenience.

Nevertheleſs theſe more modern Characters are truly Hieroglyphical; firſt, becauſe they conſiſt of ſimple Letters, which retain the Signification of the primitive Characters: Formerly, for inſtance, they repreſented the Sun by a Circle ⊙, and called it Ge; now they repreſent it by this Figure, 日 which is alſo named Ge. Secondly, becauſe Human Inſtitution has affix'd to theſe Figures the ſame Ideas, that the firſt Symbols naturally repreſented; and every Chineſe Letter has its proper Signification, which it always preſerves, tho' join'd with others. Tſay, for inſtance, which ſignifies Misfortune, Calamity, is compos'd of the Letter Myen, a Houſe, and the Letter Ho, Fire; becauſe it is the greateſt Misfortune to ſee one's Houſe on Fire: By this ſingle Example it may be perceiv'd, that the Chineſe Characters are not ſimple Letters like ours, which ſignify nothing by themſelves; but ſo many Hieroglyphicks, which form Images, and expreſs the Thoughts. The Chineſe Letters have each a proper Signification.

The Style of the Chineſe in their Compoſitions is abſtruſe, conciſe, allegorical, and ſometimes obſcure to thoſe who are not well vers'd in the Characters. It requires Skill to make no Miſtakes in reading an Author; they ſay many Things in a few Words; their Expreſſions are lively, animated, and intermix'd with bold Compariſons, and noble Metaphors. To expreſs, for inſtance, "Let none dare think of deſtroying the Chriſtian Religion, which the Emperor has approv'd by an Edict", they would write, "The Ink that wrote the Edict of the Emperor in favour of "the Chriſtian Religion, is not yet dry, and you go about to deſtroy it." They affect, eſpecially, to inſert in their Writings, Sentences and Paſſages taken from the five Canonical Books; and as they compare their Compoſitions to a Picture, they alſo compare thoſe Sentences to the five principal Colours us'd in Painting; in this their Eloquence chiefly conſiſts: Laſtly, they value themſelves extremely in writing neatly, and drawing their Characters truly; and there is great regard had to this, in examining the Compoſitions of Candidates for Degrees. Style of the Chineſe. Way of Writing.

They even prefer a beautiful Character to the moſt finiſh'd Picture; and it is common to ſee a Page of old Characters, if well drawn, ſold very dear. They honour their Characters in the moſt common Books, and if by chance they find any printed Leaves, they gather them up with Reſpect; they think it would ſavour of ill breeding to make a prophane Uſe of them, to trample them under their Feet, or even to throw them away in a careleſs manner. Joyners and Maſons, for the generality, will not venture to tear a printed Sheet that they find paſted againſt the Wall, or Wainſcot, for fear of committing a Fault.

We may diſtinguiſh then three Sorts of Languages in China; that of the common People; that of the polite People; and that of Books: Altho' the firſt, indeed, is not ſo elegant as the two others; yet we ſhould not imagine it altogether inferior to our European Languages, ſince it has certainly none of thoſe Defects, that are ſometimes aſcrib'd to it in Europe. The Europeans who come to China, and who are not yet Maſters of the Language, find equivocal Meanings, where there is not the leaſt ſhadow of them: For want of taking ſufficient Pains, at firſt, to pronounce the Chineſe Words with their Aſpirations and Accents, they are able to underſtand but imperfectly what the Chineſe ſay, and find it difficult to make themſelves underſtood: But the Fault is apparently in themſelves, and not in the Language. We are told in ſome Relations, that the Learned in converſing often trace Characters with the Finger, on their Fan, upon their Knees, or in the Air; if they do, this muſt be out of Vanity or Cuſtom, rather than Neceſſity; or becauſe the Word they would expreſs, may be ſeldom uſed, like our Terms in Navigation, Muſic, and Surgery. Divers Sorts of Languages in China. The firſt Kind.

Next above this vulgar and rude Language, which is pronounc'd a hundred Ways, and uſed in Compoſitions of the loweſt Claſs, there is a more poliſh'd and refin'd Dialect, in which they have an infinite number of Hiſtories and Novels, written with the utmoſt Elegance: Here they have Wit, Manners, lively Deſcriptions, Characters, and Contraſts. Theſe little Works may be eaſily read and underſtood; and thro' them all is obſerved a Purity and Politeneſs, equal to the beſt Writings of Europe. The ſecond Kind.

After theſe two manners of Expreſſion, the firſt for the common People, who are leſs careful in ranging their Words; and the ſecond, which ſhould be the Language of the Mandarins and the Learned; comes a third Language, that of Books which are not written in a familiar Style; and in this there are many Degrees of Superiority, before they can arrive to the Majeſtick and Sublime Brevity of the Books called King. This Language is no longer uſed in common Diſcourſe, but is only written; it could not be eaſily underſtood without the Help of the Letters, but it is read with Pleaſure, and runs in a neat and flowing Style: Each Thought is generally expreſſed in four, or in ſix Characters: One finds nothing to ſhock the niceſt Ear; and the variety of the Accents, artfully managed, affords a Sound altogether ſoft and harmonious. The third Kind.

The Difference between theſe Books and thoſe call'd King, conſiſts in the Matter they treat of; which is neither ſo ſolemn nor ſo elevated; and in the Style, which is neither ſo conciſe nor ſo grand. In ſublime Subjects no Pointing is uſed: The Learned, for whom only theſe Compoſitions are deſign'd, are left to judge where the Senſe concludes; and the Skilful among them are never miſtaken in this Particular.

The Copiousness of the Chineſe Language.

Voſſius was in the right to ſay, that the Copiouſneſs of the Chineſe Tongue proceeds from the multitude of Characters: We may add, that it proceeds alſo from the various Meanings that are given them; and from the Ligatures that are made by joining them together, moſt commonly two and two, frequently three and three, and ſometimes four and four. There was a Dictionary made by Order of the late Emperor, that at the firſt Compiling contained ninety five Volumes, moſt of them very thick, and in a ſmall Character: Yet this Work did not comprehend all the Language, ſince it was found neceſſary to add a Supplement to it in twenty four Volumes. There is no other Language in the World, that would not be exhauſted in many fewer Volumes: There is therefore no Language more abundant than the Chineſe, or that can boaſt of having reigned three or four hundred Years in the ſame State in which it continues at preſent.

A Parallel between the Chineſe and European Languages.

Doubtleſs, all that we have ſaid upon this Subject will appear ſtrange to Europeans, accuſtomed to the twenty four Letters of our Alphabet; but perhaps the Surprize will be leſſen'd on Reflection, that our Language, and all others, have an infinite number of Marks, which ſtand for Words, that may be written with the twenty four Letters; every Art and Profeſſion having its own proper Characters. And beſides our twenty four Letters, which we diverſify, many Ways, into Capitals, differing from the common Letters; into Roman, Italick, &c. we have alſo Variations for Writing, as Round-Hand, Secretary, Court, Text, and Italian; we have the Cyphers, or Figures of Arithmetick; we have ſeveral ſorts of Punctuations, as the Period, the Comma, the Apoſtrophe, the Accents, the Parentheſis, the Points of Interrogation and Admiration, with many others, which are ſo many Characters we uſe to mark the Pauſes of the Diſcourſe, the Pronunciation, the Continuation, &c. Our Aſtronomers have Characters for the twelve Signs; for the various Aſpects of the Moon and Stars: Geometricians have their Figures; Muſicians their Minims, Crotchets, Quavers, and Semi-quavers, &c. In a word, there are few Arts or Sciences which have not ſome Characteriſtical Figures proper to them, that ſerve to expreſs certain Ideas.

The Chineſe have moreover an ancient Sort of Language and Character, which is uſed at preſent only for Titles, Inſcriptions, Seals, and Devices; and in which there are ſome Books, that the Learned muſt underſtand: They have alſo a common Running-Hand which they uſe for Deeds, Contracts, Obligations, and Acts of Juſtice, as we have a particular Character for Law-Buſineſs. Laſtly, they have a Letter which requires a particular Study, on account of the Variety of Strokes, and Abbreviations, or Interweavings, which render it difficult. The chief Uſe of this Character, is to write any Thing for Diſpatch.

What relates to the Manner of pronouncing the Chineſe Words, and writing them juſtly in European Characters, will farther illuſtrate what has been ſaid concerning the Genius of this Language; [Of which in another Place.]

Of the Paper, Ink, Pencils, and of the Printing and Binding of Books in China.

Boards uſed inſtead of Paper.

IN the moſt remote Ages of their Empire, the Chineſe had no Paper, but wrote upon Boards, and broad pieces of Bambû. Inſtead of a Pen or Pencil, they made uſe of a Style, or Bodkin of Iron: They wrote alſo on Metal; and the Curious of that Nation ſtill preſerve ſome Plates, on which there are Characters very neatly traced: It is a great while however ſince the Uſe of Paper was found out. Their Paper is ſo fine, that many Europeans have thought it was made of Silk; not conſidering that Silk cannot be beaten into ſuch a Paſte, as is neceſſary to make Paper.

The Invention of Paper.

Its Matter.

The Chineſe make their Paper of the Bark of the Bambû, and other Trees. The Bambû is a Tree pretty much like a long Reed, being hollow, and divided by Knots into Joints: But very different in other reſpects; it being much larger, ſmoother, harder, and ſtronger. They only uſe the ſecond Skin of the Bark, which is ſoft and white; this they beat in clear Water: The Frames they make uſe of to take up this Matter, are long and broad; ſo that they have Sheets ten or twelve Foot long, and ſometimes more; they dip every Sheet into Allum-Water, which ſerves inſtead of Size; and hence they call it Fan-Paper, becauſe Fan in China ſignifies Allum; this Allum hinders the Paper from ſoaking in the Ink, and gives it ſuch a Luſtre, that one would think it was ſilvered over, or varniſhed. This Paper is white, ſoft, and compact, without having the leaſt Roughneſs that can ſtop the Pencil, or ſeparate the Hairs. As it is made of the Bark of a Tree, it cracks more eaſily than that of Europe: It is apt to take Moiſture, the Duſt ſticks to it, and the Worms inſenſibly get into it, if proper care be not taken to preſerve it: To prevent theſe Inconveniences, they are obliged to beat their Books often, and as often expoſe them to the Sun.

How to preſerve it from Worms.

Beſides the Paper made of the Bark of Trees, they have ſome made of Cotton; and this is the whiteſt, fineſt, and moſt uſed. It is not ſubject to the Inconveniencies juſt now mentioned; for it keeps as well, and is as durable as the European Paper.

Extract of a Chineſe Book on the Subject of Paper.

The little I have ſaid of the Chineſe Paper in general, will be confirm'd by the exact Account I am entring upon; in which I ſhall inſert nothing but what is extracted from a Chineſe Work, that that appeared under the preſent Dynaſty: It is a curious Collection, and eſteemed amongſt the Learned: It treats of the Invention of the Chi, that is, of Paper; of what Matterials it is made; of its Qualities; of its Form; and of the different Sorts of it.

This Chineſe Author takes notice firſt, that the Invention is very ancient; but confeſſes, that it is not known, preciſely, in what Century they ſhould place its Original. The Characters Kyen, and Tſe, which they made uſe of in former Ages inſtead of Chi, to ſignify the Matter on which they wrote, confirm, by their Figure, what this Author advances; namely, that in ancient Times, after having, as it were, poliſhed the little pieces of Bambû, and rendered them more limber, by the help of the Fire, but without taking the Rind off; they then delineated Letters thereon with a fine Graver; and of theſe little Plates, threaded one after another, they made a Volume: Theſe Books were laſting, and capable, by their Solidity, of withſtanding the Injuries of the Weather; but were cumberſome however, and unfit for Uſe.

Its Origin uncertain.

The ancient Chineſe Manner of Writing.

Upon Wood.

They had afterwards recourſe to another Method: It is certain that ever ſince the Dynaſty of the Tſin, before Chriſt, and by conſequence under the following Dynaſty of the Han, they wrote upon pieces of Silk or Linen. For this Reaſon it is that the Letter Chi is compoſed ſometimes of the Character Se, which ſignifies Silk, and ſometimes of the Character Kin, which ſignifies Linen. They uſed to cut the Piece of Silk or Linen bigger or leſs, according to the Form they had a mind to give their Volume.

Upon Pieces of Silk or Linen.

At length, in the Year 95 of the Chriſtian Æra, under the Tong han, that is, under the Han, who had removed their Court into a more Eaſterly Province than the Han their * Predeceſſors, in the Reign of Ho-ti, a great Mandarin in the Palace, whoſe Name was Tſay-lun, invented a better Sort of Paper, which was called Tſay-hew-chi, Paper of the Lord Tſay. This Mandarin by boiling the Bark of different Trees, and of worn-out Pieces of Silk, and old Hempen Cloth, made a liquid Conſiſtence, and reduced it to a ſort of thin Paſte, of which he made different ſorts of Paper. He made ſome alſo of the Knots of Silk, which they called Flaxen Paper: Soon after, the induſtrious Chineſe brought theſe Diſcoveries to Perfection, and found out the Secret of poliſhing their Paper, and giving it a Luſtre.

Æra of Paper in China.

The Matter of which it is made.

Another Book, intitled, Sû y kyen chi pû, which treats of the ſame Subject, ſays, that in the Province of Se-chwen the Paper is made of Hemp; that Kau-tſong, the third Emperor of the great Dynaſty of the Tang, cauſed an excellent Paper to be made of Hemp, on which all his ſecret Orders were written: That in the Province of Fo kyen, it is made of ſoft Bambû: That in the Northern Provinces they make it of the Bark of the Mulberry-Trees: That in the Province of Che kyang, it is made of Wheat or Rice-Straw: That in the Province of Kyang nan, they make a Parchment of the Skin that is found in the Cods the Silk-Worms ſpin; which they call Lo wen chi; and which is fine, ſmooth, and fit for Inſcriptions, and Cartridges; In fine, that in the Province of Hû-quang, the Tree Chu, or Ko-chu, furniſhes the principal Material for Paper.

Speaking of the different Sorts of Paper, our Author mentions one Kind, of which the Sheets are three, and ſometimes five Chineſe † Chang in Length; he mentions thoſe who have found the Secret of dying it of different Colours; and particularly he treats of the Manner of ſilvering it, without uſing any Silver; an Invention the Honour of which is given to the Emperor Kau-ti, of the Dynaſty of Tſi, and which I will treat of preſently. He has not omitted the Paper of Korea, which he ſays is made of the Cods the Silk-Worms ſpin; and he reports that the Koreans paid their Tribute to the Emperor in their Paper, even from the ſeventh Century, under the Government of the Tang.

Form of the Chineſe Paper.

What I have mentioned here, ſufficiently proves that the Invention of Paper is of great Antiquity in China. Chwe-wen, a Chineſe Author, who writ in the Time of the Han, aſſures us, that in the earlieſt Ages they had a Secret of uniting the Knots of Silk and Cotton, which they could not wind off, nor ſpin, and making a Conſiſtence of it, on which they writ with Eaſe. This Secret was partly loſt during the Revolutions of the State, and ſeems not to have been recovered till under the Dynaſty of the Tſin.

Chwe wen's Opinion of this Affair.

It is certain that the Chineſe Paper has one Advantage over that of Europe, in that the Sheets are made of an extraordinary Length, and being moreover full as white, is much ſofter and ſmoother. The Pencils, which the Chineſe write with, would not bear the leaſt Roughneſs of the Paper, becauſe that would render it very difficult to make ſome of their fine Strokes.

Advantage of the Chineſe Paper over that of Europe.

When we ſay of the Chineſe Paper, that it is not laſting, and that it is apt to crack; the Meaning is, that the Paper made of Bambû has theſe Defects. This is certainly true in one Senſe; for it is apt to crack when it is ting'd with Allum, as it always is to make it fit for our Uſe; becauſe without this Preparation, it would not bear our Ink: But when that is omitted, be it ever ſo thin, it may be handled and folded all manner of Ways, without any danger of cracking it.

The Conſumption of Paper in China is ſo great, that it is not ſurprizing they make it of all ſorts of Materials: For beſides the prodigious Quantity that is uſed by the Learned, and Students, who are almoſt innumerable, and to furniſh the Shops of Tradeſmen, it is inconceivable how much is conſumed in private Houſes. One ſide of their Room is nothing but Saſhes, cover'd with Paper; on the reſt of the Walls, which are plaiſter'd over, they paſte white Paper, by which means they preſerve them white and ſmooth. The Cieling is made of Frames cover'd with with Paper, on which they draw divers Ornaments. It has indeed been juſtly ſaid, that the Chineſe Apartments glitter with that beautiful Varniſh which we admire in Europe, but then it is alſo true, that in the greateſt part of the Houſes there is nothing to be ſeen but Paper. The Workmen of this Country have the Art of paſting it very neatly, and the Chineſe take care to renew it every Year.

Preparation of the Matter to make Paper.

It is only the inward Bark of different Trees that is uſed to make Paper: But the Bambû has this Particularity, as well as the Shrub that bears Cotton, that not the Bark only, but the whole Subſtance of the Plant is uſed, by help of the following Preparations.

Woods employ'd for this Purpoſe.

Out of a Wood of the largeſt Bambûs, they ſelect Shoots of a Year's Growth, which are about the Bigneſs of the Calf of a large Man's Leg: They ſtrip them of their firſt green Rind, and ſplit them into ſtrait Pieces of 6 or 7 Foot long: It is remarkable, that the Trunk of the Bambû being compos'd of long and ſtrait Fibres, it is very eaſy to cleave it length-ways, but very difficult to cut it acroſs: They bury the Pieces thus cleft in a Pond of muddy Water, that they may grow as it were rotten, and be ſoften'd by this Maceration. In about a Fortnight, they take theſe pieces of Bambû out of the Mud; and then waſh them in clean Water, ſpread them in a large dry Ditch, and cover them with a great quantity of Lime. In a few Days they take them out again, and having waſh'd them a ſecond time, they reduce them to a ſort of Threads, which they expoſe in the Sun to dry and whiten; then they throw them into large Coppers, where they are throughly boil'd: And laſtly, they are reduced by Peſtles to a fluid Paſte.

Of the Bambû.

Of the Hau teng, or Ko teng.

The Chineſe Author adds, that upon Mountains, and in uncultivated Places, they find a Plant that ſhoots in long and ſlender Tendrils like a Vine, the Rind of which is very ſmooth, and ſlippery to the Touch. This is expreſſed in the Name of it, Hau-teng. It is alſo call'd Ko-teng; becauſe it produces little ſouriſh Pears, of a whitiſh Green, that are good to eat. Its Branches, which are about as big as the Shoots of a Vine, run upon the Ground, or twine about Trees: According to our Author, they make uſe of this Plant in the following Manner.

Its Preparation.

They take ſeveral Shoots of it, which they ſoak four or five Days in Water, when there comes out of it an unctuous ſizy Juice, reſembling a ſort of Glue or Gum. They mix this gummy Water with the Paſte of which the Paper is made, ſomewhat in the ſame manner as Painters temper their Colours; Care being taken not to put in too much, nor too little of it: The juſt Medium in this Caſe is taught by Experience. Perhaps for want of Ko teng, the Berries of Miſſelto might be uſed, which are naturally viſcous; or the inner Bark of Holly, which being rotted, and pounded in a Mortar, is reduced to Bird-Lime.

Its Uſe.

When they have mixed the Juice of Ko teng with the cleft Bambû; beaten in ſuch a manner, that it is like a thick clammy Water; they pour this Liquor into large deep Reſervoirs, which muſt be made with four Walls breaſt-high, and the Sides and Bottom ſo well cemented, that the Liquor cannot run out, nor ſoak in. Then the Workmen being placed at the ſides of the Reſervoir, take up with their Moulds the Surface of the Liquor, which almoſt inſtantly becomes Paper. Doubtleſs, the mucilaginous and glewy Juice of the Ko teng binds the Parts, and very much contributes to make this Paper ſo compact, ſoft, and gloſſy; which Qualities the European has not, when firſt made.

The Mould different from thoſe of Europe.

The Mould uſed to take up the Sheets of Paper, the Frame of which is eaſily taken to Pieces, or rais'd, or lower'd, is not made with Wire, as thoſe of Europe, but with Threads of Bambû. They are little thin Slips, which they draw ſeveral times through Holes made in a Plate of Steel, whereby they render them as fine as Wire: Then they boil them in Oil till they are thoroughly ſoaked, that the Moulds may enter lightly into the Water, and not ſink deeper than is requiſite to take up the Sheets of Paper.

How to make Sheets of an extraordinary Length.

When they would make Sheets of an extraordinary Size, they take care that the Reſervoir and Mould be large in Proportion. They fix up a Pulley, and run through it ſeveral Strings, the Motion of which ſhould be extremely free: Theſe Strings ſuſtain the Frame, and at the Moment that they pull it up, the Workmen plac'd on the Side of the Reſervoir aſſiſt to take the Sheet off, working together in a regular Manner.

Manner of drying the Sheets.

The Chineſe Author gives us a Way of drying the Sheets juſt taken off. There muſt, ſays he, be a hollow Wall built, the Sides of which ſhould be well whiten'd. At one End of this Wall they contrive an Opening, and, by means of a Pipe convey thither the Heat of a neighbouring Furnace: At the oppoſite End, there muſt be a ſmall Vent to let out the Smoke. By help of this Sort of Stove, they dry the Sheets of Paper almoſt as faſt as they take them off.

Of the different Sorts of Paper.

The Paper which is made of Bambû is neither the only, nor the beſt, nor the moſt common Sort made of Trees in China; they uſe in this Art many other Trees, eſpecially thoſe which have the moſt Sap; as Mulberry-Trees, Elms, the Body of the Shrub which produces Cotton, Hemp, and divers other Plants, the Names of which are unknown in Europe. Firſt of all they ſcrape off lightly the thin outſide Bark of the Tree, which is greeniſh; then they take off the inner Rind in very long thin Slips, which they blanch in Water, and in the Sun, and afterwards prepare them in the ſame Manner as the Bambû.

Of the Paper moſt in Uſe.

But the Paper moſt in Uſe, is that made of the inner Rind of the Tree called Chu-kû, otherwiſe Kû-chu; which Paper is therefore called Kû chi. When its Branches are broken, the Bark peels off in long Slips, like Ribbands. To judge of this Tree by its Leaves, one would take it for a wild Mulberry-Tree, but its Fruit is more like that of the Fig-Tree.

This

This Fruit grows to the Branches without any Stalk; if it is pluck'd before it is perfectly ripe, it yields a ſort of milky Juice from the Place where it grew to the Branches, juſt like the Fig: There are, indeed, ſo many Particulars, in which it agrees with the Fig and the Mulberry-Tree, that it might be thought a ſort of Sycamore; nevertheleſs, it is more like a kind of Strawberry-Tree, called Adrachne, which is of a moderate Height, and the Bark of which is ſmooth, white, and glittering; apt to crack in the Summer, for want of Moiſture. The Tree Chu kû, as well as the Strawberry-Tree, grows upon Mountains, and in ſtony Places. Its Preparation.

The Chineſe Herbal teaches the Manner of raiſing the Tree Chu kû, that it may afford a great quantity of this uſeful Bark, and in the Perfection requiſite for making Paper. At the Vernal Equinox, ſays it, you muſt take the Kernel of this Tree, and having waſh'd it, mix it with the Seed of Seſamum, which the Portugueſe call Gergelin, and ſcatter them together at random about the Ground. The Gergelin will ſprout out with the firſt Shoots of the Chu kû; but you muſt take care not to cut it in the Autumn nor in the Winter; you muſt ſtay till the next Spring, and then ſet Fire to the Field; that very Year you will ſee the Plants of Chu kû increaſe conſiderably, and at the end of three Years it will be fit to cut, and make Paper of. Its Culture.

To harden the Paper, and make it bear Ink, the Chineſe dip it in Allum-Water: To expreſs this Operation, the Europeans have invented the Word Faning, becauſe the Chineſe Word Fan ſignifies Allum. Their Method of doing it is this: They take ſix Ounces of Fiſh-Glue, very white and clean, this they cut very ſmall, and throw it into twelve Porringers of clean Water, which they afterwards boil. It muſt be ſtirr'd all the while, that there may be no Lumps: When the whole is reduced to a liquid Subſtance, they throw into it three quarters of a Pound of Allum, white and calcin'd, which they melt and incorporate with it. This Mixture is poured into a great wide Baſon, a-croſs which they lay a ſmall Stick ſmooth and round; then they ſhut the Edge of every Sheet in another Stick, which is cleft from one End to the other, and the Parts made to ſtick well together. In this Manner they dip the Sheet, gently, drawing it out as ſoon as it is wetted, by ſliding it over the round Stick. When the whole Sheet has paſs'd ſwiftly through this Liquor, which makes it white and more compact, the long Stick that holds the Sheet by the Edge, is ſtuck in a Hole in the Wall, where the Sheet hangs to dry. This is all the Art which the Chineſe have to give their Paper its Body, Whiteneſs, and even Luſtre: A Chineſe Author pretends, that this Secret came from Japan. Manner of Faning the Paper. Ingredients for doing it.

This is a proper Place to mention another Secret, which the Chineſe have, of ſilvering Paper, with a very little Charge, and without uſing Leaf-Silver: Take ſeven Fuen, or two Scruples, of Glue, made of Neats Leather, three Fuen of white Allum, and half a Pint of clean Water; ſimmer theſe over a ſlow Fire, till the Water is conſumed, that is, till there ariſes no more Steam; Care being taken to keep this Mixture very clean. Then they ſpread, upon a very ſmooth Table, ſome Sheets of the Paper made of the Cotton-Tree, which is called Se lyen chi, daubing over it with a Pencil, in an equal Manner, two or three Lays of the Glue. It is eaſy to perceive when this Glue is apply'd in a proper Conſiſtence, and does not run; if it does not lie even, do it over again: Then take Powder of Talc, prepared in the manner I ſhall immediately explain, which ſift through a fine Sieve, or a piece of threaded Gauze, ſpreading it uniformly upon the Sheets prepar'd as above. After this they hang the Sheets in the Shade to dry; which effected, they lay them again upon the Table, and rub them gently with clean Cotton, to take off the ſuperfluous Talc, which ſerves again for the ſame purpoſe. With this Powder diluted in Water mixt with Glue and Allum, you may draw any Figures at Fancy upon the Paper. Though I have mention'd only that Paper which is made of the Cotton-Tree, it muſt not be underſtood as if the others were excluded: All Sorts of Paper may be ſilver'd, if they are ſmooth, and if Talc is made Uſe of, prepar'd in the following Manner. The Secret of ſilvering Paper. Ingredients for that Purpoſe.

Take fine Talc that is tranſparent, and as white as Snow. Talc comes from the Province of Se-chwen, but that which is brought by the Muſcovites is the beſt. The Chineſe call this Mineral Yun moa che, which ſignifies the Stone pregnant with Clouds, becauſe every Flake which they break off, is a kind of tranſparent Cloud. When you have made choice of the beſt Talc, it muſt be boil'd in Water about four Hours; after it is taken off the Fire, you muſt leave it in the Water a Day or two; then take it out, waſh it well, put it into a Linen-Bag, and break it to Pieces with a Mallet: To ten Pound of Talc, thus broken, add three Pound of white Allum. All this muſt be ground in a little Hand-Mill, then ſifted through a Silk Sieve, and the Powder put into Water juſt boiled up. When the Powder is ſunk to the Bottom, and the Water become clear again, you muſt pour off all that you can. The Matter which remains at the Bottom, being expoſed to the Sun, makes a hard Conſiſtence, which muſt be pounded in a Mortar, till reduced to an impalpable Powder. This Powder muſt be ſifted again, and then uſed as before explained. Preparation of the Talc to ſilver the Paper. How to chuſe it.

In finiſhing this Article, I muſt not omit a pretty remarkable Manufacture, which is carried on in the Out-parts of one of the Suburbs of Peking, where they renew old Paper, to anſwer the great Demand for that Commodity. Theſe Workmen get together all the old Paper they can find, which they have the Art of reſtoring to its original Beauty and Uſefulneſs. It matters not whether the Paper has been wrote upon, or whether it has been paſted upon Frames, or againſt the Walls, or has ſerv'd for other Purpoſes; all anſwers their End; and they purchaſe it out of the Provinces at a very moderate Rate. Theſe Workmen occupy a pretty long Village, the Backſide of their Houſes being built againſt the Burying-Places, and every Houſe having an Incloſure of Walls that are well whitened. Here in each Houſe may be ſeen great Heaps Renewing of old Paper.

of old Paper; and if there happens to be a pretty deal of fine Paper amongſt theſe Heaps, they ſort it. They put theſe Pieces of old Paper into great Baſkets that are made flat and cloſe; and in theſe carry them near a Well, upon a little paved Place, which has a ſmall Deſcent. Here they waſh the old Paper with all their Strength, rubbing it with their Hands, and ſtamping on it with their Feet, to get the Filth out of it, and ſo reduce it to a ſhapeleſs Maſs: Then they boil this Conſiſtence, and after having beaten it till it is fit to make Paper, they pour it into a Reſervoir. The Sheets of this Paper are but of a middling Size. When they have taken up a pretty large Pile, they carry it into the neighbouring Incloſure, where, ſeparating each Sheet with the point of a Needle, they ſtick them up wet againſt the Wall, which is very ſmooth and white. As ſoon as the Heat of the Sun has dry'd all the Sheets, which it does in a very little time, they take them off, and collect them together.

Of the Chineſe Ink.

The Invention of Paper had been of little Service to the Chineſe, if they had not at the ſame time invented a ſort of Ink, wherewith to draw their Characters upon it. The Ink they uſe is made of Lampblack, which they get by burning ſeveral ſorts of Matter, but chiefly Pine-wood or Oil. They mix Perfumes with it, to correct the ſtrong and diſagreeable Smell of the Oil. They incorporate together theſe Ingredients, till they come to the Conſiſtence of a Paſte, which they put into divers wooden Moulds. Theſe Moulds are well and variouſly wrought, in order to print upon the Paſte what Figures they pleaſe. The uſual Impreſſions are of Men, Dragons, Birds, Trees, Flowers, and the like. The Form of the Lump is commonly that of a Truncheon, or of their Writing-Tables; and one of the Sides is almoſt always covered with Chineſe Characters. The beſt Ink is made at Whey chew, a Town in the Province of Kyang nan: There are many things to be obſerv'd in the making of it, and it has ſeveral Degrees of Goodneſs; according to which it is dearer or cheaper. The Europeans have endeavoured to counterfeit this Ink, but without Succeſs. Painters, and thoſe who delight in Drawing, know how uſeful it is for tracing their Sketches, becauſe they can give it what Degree of Shade they pleaſe. They make uſe of a red Ink alſo in China; but this is of little Requeſt, except for the Titles and Inſcriptions of Books. As to other Particulars, every thing which relates to Writing, is ſo reputable among the Chineſe, that even the Workmen employ'd in making the Ink, are not look'd upon as following a ſervile and mechanical Employment.

Of its Compoſition.

Figures which they print in their Ink.

How to make the beſt Ink.

Æra of the Invention of Ink in China.

The ſame Author, whom I have juſt now quoted in the Article of Chineſe Paper, and who furniſhes me with what I am further to ſay concerning their Ink, affirms, that this latter has been invented Time out of Mind, but that it was many Years before it attained its preſent Perfection.

Its firſt Age.

At firſt they uſed to write with a ſort of a black Earth; and indeed the Character Me, which ſignifies Ink, has in its Compoſition, at the Bottom, the Character Tû, which ſignifies Earth, and at the Top, that of He, which ſignifies Black. According to ſome, they drew a black Juice out of this Earth, or Stone: Others ſay, that after having wetted it, they rubb'd it upon Marble, and they got from it a black Liquor: Others again, that it was calcin'd, and after being reduc'd to a very fine Powder, was made into Ink. In fine, according to our Author, the Uſe of this Ink is ſo ancient, that the famous Emperor Vû vang, who is well known to have flouriſhed 1120 Years before the Chriſtian Æra, took from hence this Moral Reflection. " As the Stone Me, which they make uſe of to blacken the engraved Letters, can never become white; ſo a Heart defiled with Iniquity, will always retain its Blackneſs.

Pieces of Ink ſent in Tribute.

Under the firſt Emperors of the Dynaſty of the Tong, that is about the Year 620 of the Chriſtian Æra, the King of Korea, ſending his annual Tribute to the Emperor of China, preſented him with ſome pieces of Ink, which were made of Lampblack, gathered by burning old Pine-Trees, and incorporated with Size made of Hartſhorn, to give it a Conſiſtence. This Ink had ſuch a Luſtre, that it look'd as if it had been varniſh'd over; which tended to raiſe the Emulation of the Chineſe.

Æra of modern Ink.

They endeavour'd to imitate the Art of the Koreans, and ſucceeded after ſeveral Eſſays: But they did not attain the Perfection deſired, till near the end of the ſame Dynaſty, about the Year of Chriſt 900, for it was not till about that Time they firſt made the excellent Ink, which is uſed at preſent.

Of the Imperial Ink.

In the Year 1070 of the Chriſtian Æra, under the Reign of Shin tſong, they made an Ink with further Improvement, which was called Imperial, Yu me, becauſe it was uſed in the Palace. The Lampblack in this Ink was more expenſive, and much finer than before: It was not made by burning Pine-Trees only, as formerly; but by burning Oil in Lamps with many Funnels, the Smoak whereof was gathered by a brazen Concave, which condenſing it, made the Lampblack deſired. In making it up, they added a little Muſk, to give it a pleaſant Odour. Our Author does not ſay what Oil was uſed, nor how they contriv'd to get the moſt Lampblack, and of the beſt Qualities, from the Oil; for all which there are certain Rules to be obſerv'd: Perhaps they made uſe of the Oil of Gergelin. Olive-Oil, or the Oil of Walnuts, which are not us'd in China, would certainly do better.

Drugs uſed in the Chineſe Ink.

The firſt Receipt.

Another Chineſe Book, intitled The Method of making Ink, gives a Receipt to make a good Sort, in which there are ſome Ingredients that cannot eaſily be known in Europe. 1ſt. ſays he, Take ten Ounces of Lampblack made from Pines. 2d. Of the Plants Ho hyang, and Kan ſung. 3. Add Juice of Ginger. 4. Of the Pods or Shells called Chu hya tſau ko. Boil theſe four Ingredients in Water: When the Virtues of the Vegetables are thus extracted, the Liquor muſt be ſtrain'd off: This Liquor, already thickened, being ſettled and clarified, muſt be ſet again on the Fire to give it the Conſiſtence of a Paſte; and in every ten Ounces of this

Mixture,

Mixture, there muſt be diſſolved four Ounces of the Glue, call'd O kyau, in which there have been incorporated three Leaves of Gold, and two of Silver: When all theſe Ingredients are thus prepared, they then mix with them the ten Ounces of Lampblack, to give a Body to the whole. This Compoſition muſt be beat a long while with a Spatula: And then, laſtly, they put it into Moulds, to make it into Cakes; ſoon after which they bury the Ink in cold Aſhes, where it remains five Days, if in the Spring; three, if Summer; ſeven, if Autumn; and ten, if Winter: And this is the laſt Operation it goes through.

Theſe Intelligences are very imperfect, becauſe it is difficult to find out, by the Chineſe Names, what the Plants are. One of our Miſſionaries has ſent me his Conjectures concerning them, which may help to diſcover them, if there were any ſuch in Europe; or at leaſt, to ſubſtitute others in their Room, capable of giving the Ink a Body, a good Scent, and a Luſtre.

Of the Ho hyang.

1. According to the Chineſe Dictionaries, Ho hyang is an aromatic medicinal Plant. It has the intrinſic Qualities of the Sû ho, another Plant from which they extract a Sort of Oil, that is ſold at Peking; and which the Dealers often mix with the Balſam of Peru, to augment its Quantity. This Oil, extracted from the Sû ho, ſeems to be the liquid Storax, which is a viſcous Matter, of a greyiſh Colour, of a ſtrong aromatick Odour, and which has the Conſiſtence of a thick Balſam. Its Properties.

Of the Kan-jung.

2. The Kan jung is a Plant which enters in divers Compoſitions of Perfumes. It is of a temperate Nature, and ſweet to the Taſte; for ſo the Name Kan denotes. Its Leaves are very fine, and of a cloſe Contexture. They add, that this Plant is an excellent Remedy for the Cholic, and other Diſtempers in the Bowels.

Of the Tſû ya.

3. Tſû ya receiv'd its Name becauſe the Fruit of this Shrub very much reſembles a Boar's Tuſk, in Shape, Length, and Thickneſs. To this they add the two Characters, Tſau ko, which ſignify a ſort of black Horn, and would induce one to take it for the Fruit of the Carob, or Locuſt-Tree, the Shape of which reſembles a Horn, and is of a dark red Colour. We may obſerve, however, that the Chineſe Fruit is not ſo long as that of the Carob-Tree, and that, inſtead of being flat, it is almoſt round, full of little Cells, containing a marrowy Subſtance, of a ſharp and unpleaſant Taſte.

4. Inſtead of the Glue of O kyau, which is made of the Skin of a black Aſs, and a particular Water found only in one Place of the Province of Shan tong, another ſort of ſtrong Glue might be uſed, as for inſtance that which we call Taurina.

5. The Bed of cold Aſhes, in which they bury their Ink newly made, ſerves to extract from it all that the Glue might leave in it too hard or binding.

Second Receipt.

I add to this firſt Receipt another, both eaſier and ſhorter, taken from the Chineſe, and which perhaps may ſuffice to make the Ink of a good Black, which is looked upon as an eſſential Property. Burn, ſay they, Lampblack in a Crucible, and hold it over the Fire till it has done ſmoaking: In the ſame Manner burn ſome * Horſe-Cheſnuts, till there does not ariſe the leaſt vapour of Smoak: Diſſolve ſome Gum Tragacanth; and when the Water in which the Gum is diſſolv'd becomes of a proper Conſiſtence, add to it the Lampblack and Horſe-Cheſnuts, and ſtir all together with a Spatula: Then put this Paſte into Moulds; and take care not to put too much of the Horſe-Cheſnut, which would give it a violet Black.

Third Receipt.

A third Receipt, much more ſimple, and eaſier to be put in Practice, has been communicated to me by P. Contancin, who had it from a Chineſe, as ſkilful in this Matter as any one can be expected to be; for we ought not to ſuppoſe that the ingenious Workmen diſcover their Secret; on the contrary, they take the greateſt care to conceal it, and make a Myſtery of it, even to thoſe of their own Nation.

They put five or ſix lighted Wicks into a Veſſel full of Oil, and lay upon this Veſſel an Iron Cover, made in the ſhape of a Funnel, which muſt be ſet at a certain Diſtance, ſo as to receive all the Smoak. When it has received enough, they take it off, and with a Gooſe's Feather gently bruſh the Bottom, letting the Soot fall upon a dry Sheet of ſtrong Paper: It is this that makes their fine and ſhining Ink. The beſt Oil alſo gives a Luſtre to the Black, and by conſequence makes the Ink more eſteemed and dearer. The Lampblack which is not fetch'd off with the Feather, and which ſticks very faſt to the Cover, is coarſer, and they uſe it to make an ordinary ſort of Ink, after they have ſcraped it off into a Diſh.

What makes it fine and ſhining.

When they have, in this Manner, taken off the Lampblack, they beat it in a Mortar, mixing with it Muſk, or ſome odoriferous Water, with a thin Size to unite the Particles. The Chineſe commonly make uſe of a Size, which they call Nyew kyau, Size of Neats Leather. When this Lampblack is come to the Conſiſtence of a ſort of Paſte, they put it into Moulds, which are made in the ſhape they deſign the Sticks of Ink to be. They ſtamp upon the Ink, with a Seal made for that Purpoſe, the Characters or Figures they deſire, in blue, red, or gold Colour, drying them in the Sun, or in the Wind.

Where the beſt Ink is to be had.

We are aſſured, that in the City of Whey chew, where the Ink is made which is moſt eſteemed, the Merchants have great Numbers of little Rooms, where they keep lighted Lamps all Day; and that every Room is diſtinguiſhed by the Oil which is burnt in it, and conſequently by the Ink which is made therein. Nevertheleſs many of the Chineſe believed, that the Lampblack, which is gathered from the Lamps in which they burn Oil of Gergelin, is only uſed in making

* Without doubt, they mean the Horſe Cheſnut-Tree, or the true Cheſnut made into Cakes, which comes from Leau tong.

a particular Sort of Ink, which bears a great Price; but conſidering the ſurpriſing Quantities vended at a cheap Rate, they muſt uſe combuſtible Materials that are more common, and cheaper.

Opinion of the Chineſe concerning Lampblack.

They ſay that Lampblack is extracted immediately from old Pines, and that in the Diſtrict of Whey chew, where the beſt Ink is made, they have Furnaces of a particular Structure to burn theſe Pines, and to convey the Smoak thro' long Funnels into little Cells ſhut up cloſe, the Inſides of which are hung with Paper: The Smoak being conveyed into theſe Cells, ſticks to every Part of the Wall and Cieling, and there condenſes itſelf. After a certain Time they open the Door, and take off a great quantity of Lampblack. At the ſame time that the Smoak of theſe Pines ſpreads itſelf in the Cells, the Roſin which comes out of them runs through other Pipes, which are laid even with the Floor.

It is certain that the good Ink, for which there is a great Demand at Nan king, comes from the Diſtrict of Whey chew, and that none, made elſewhere, is to be compared with it: Perhaps the Inhabitants of this Diſtrict are Maſters of a Secret, which it is hard to get out of them. Perhaps alſo the Soil and Mountains of Whey chew furniſh Materials more proper for making good Lampblack, than any other Place: There is a great number of Pine-Trees; and in ſome parts of China, theſe Trees afford a Roſin much more pure, and in greater Plenty, than our Pines in Europe. At Pe-king may be ſeen ſome pieces of Pine-wood which came from Tartary, and which have been uſed for above theſe ſixty Years: Nevertheleſs, in hot Weather, they ſhed a great quantity of big Drops of Roſin, reſembling yellow Amber. The Nature of the Wood which is burnt, contributes very much to the Goodneſs of the Ink. The Lampblack which is got from the Furnaces of Glaſs-Houſes, and which the Painters uſe, may perhaps be the propereſt for imitating Chineſe Ink.

As the Smell of the Lampblack would be very diſagreeable, if they were to ſave the Expence of Muſk, which they moſt commonly mix with it; ſo by burning ſuch Druggs, they perfume the little Cells, and the Odours mixing with the Soot, which hangs on the Walls like Moſs, and in little Flakes, the Ink they make thereof has no ill Scent.

How to know the Goodneſs of Ink.

We have ſeveral Obſervations from the ſame Chineſe Author, whom I have quoted, that ſhould not be omitted. 1. To diſtinguiſh the different Degrees of goodneſs of Ink newly made, take a Veſſel varniſh'd with the fineſt Varniſh, called Twan quang tſi: Having wetted the ends of the ſeveral pieces of Ink, rub them upon the varniſh'd Veſſel: The Proofs being dry, hold the Veſſel to the Sun; and if you ſee that the Colour of the Ink is entirely like that of the Varniſh, that Ink is of the fineſt Sort. It is much inferior if the Black be of a bluiſh Hue; but if it be Aſh-colour'd, it is the leaſt valuable of all.

How to preſerve Chineſe Ink.

2. The Way to preſerve the Ink from any Damage, is to ſhut it up in a cloſe Box, in which muſt be put ſome perfectly ripe Mugwort: But, above all, it muſt never be expoſed to the Rays of the Sun, which would make it crack and fall in Pieces.

Ink kept for Ornament in the Cloſets of the Curious.

3. They ſometimes keep in Cabinets, for a Curioſity, Sticks of Ink finely adorned and gilded; and if any one of theſe Sticks happens to break, the manner of joyning the two Pieces together, ſo that there ſhall be no Marks of its having been broke, is, by making uſe of the ſame Ink, firſt reducing it into a Paſte upon the Marble, and then rubbing the broken Pieces with it, and ſqueezing them together. When you have done, leave the Stick of Ink a whole Day without touching it, and you will find it as whole and firm as ever.

How to uſe their Ink.

4. When they deſign to write, and would finiſh delicately the Strokes of the Pencil, before they temper the Ink upon the Marble, Care muſt be taken that the Marble be well waſh'd, ſo that nothing of the Ink uſed the Day before may remain upon it; for if ever ſo little of it be left, it fouls the Marble they make Uſe of, and ſpoils the freſh Ink: Further, the Marble muſt not be waſhed either with hot Water, or Water raw out of the Well, but with Water that has been boil'd, and is grown cold again: The beſt and moſt proper Stones for preparing the Ink are called Twan ſhe.

Chineſe Ink in Phyſick.

5. When the Ink has been preſerved a long Time, it is then never uſed for Writing, but becomes, according to the Chineſe, an excellent and refreſhing Remedy, good in the Bloody Flux, and in the Convulſions of Children. They pretend, that by its Alkali, which naturally abſorbs acid Humours, it ſweetens the Acrimony of the Blood. The Doſe, for grown Perſons, is two Drachms, in a Draught of Water or Wine.

The Chineſe uſe no Pens in Writing, but a Pencil.

The Chineſe, in Writing, make no Uſe of Pens, like the Europeans, nor of Canes or Reeds, like the Arabians, nor of Crayons, like the Siameſe; but of a Pencil made with the Hair of ſome Animal, and particularly of the Rabbet, which is the ſofteſt. When they would write, they have upon the Table a little poliſh'd Marble, with a Hollow at one End to contain Water; they dip their Stick of Ink in it, and then rub it upon that Part of the Marble which is ſmooth; and according as they lean, more or leſs, upon the Ink when they rub it, it becomes more or leſs black. When they write, they do not hold the Pencil obliquely, as Painters do; but perpendicularly, as if they would prick the Paper. They write from the Right to the Left. In like Manner they end their Books where we begin ours, and our laſt Page is with them the firſt.

People of Learning and Study delight in keeping their Marble, Pencils, and Ink very neat, and placed in good Order; juſt as our Warriors pique themſelves in preſerving their Arms well poliſhed and ranged. The Pencil, Paper, Ink, and the little Marble, the Chineſe call Sſe pau, which ſignifies, The four precious Things.

There

There are in China a prodigious Number of Books, becauſe they have had the Art of Printing from Time immemorial, tho' in Europe that Art is ſtill almoſt in its Infancy. But the Chineſe Printing is very different from that of Europe. As our Alphabet conſiſts of a very ſmall Number of Letters which, by their different Combinations, can form the largeſt Volumes, we have no need of a great Number of Characters, ſince thoſe uſed for the firſt, may be taken aſunder, and uſed for the ſecond Sheet: On the contrary, the Number of Chineſe Characters being almoſt infinite, it is impoſſible to caſt in Metal ſuch a prodigious Multitude; and if they were caſt, the greateſt part would be but ſeldom uſed.

Printing of long Standing in China.

Here follows an Account of their manner of Printing. They get their Work tranſcrib'd by ſome excellent Writer, upon a fine, thin, and tranſparent Paper. The Engraver paſtes every Leaf upon a Plate or Block of the Apple or Pear-Tree, or of any other Wood that is but hard and ſmooth, and with a Graver follows the Traces, and carves out the Characters by cutting down the reſt of the Wood. Thus he makes as many different Blocks as there are Pages to print, working off as many Copies as are required, the Blocks being always in a readineſs to work off more, without the Trouble of compoſing. There is not much Time loſt in correcting the Proofs, ſince as the Graver works on the Strokes of the Copy itſelf, or the Original of the Author, he cannot poſſibly make any Error, if the Writing be exact.

Manner of Printing in China with fixed Characters.

This manner of Printing is convenient, becauſe they print the Sheets only as they ſell them, and do not run the Riſque, as in Europe, of ſelling but half the Copies, and ruining themſelves by uſeleſs Expences. Moreover, after having taken 30,000 or 40,000 Copies, they can eaſily retouch the Plates, and make them ſerve for many more Impreſſions.

Why convenient.

They can print Books in all ſorts of Languages, as well as in Chineſe. The Beauty of the Character depends upon the Hand of the Copyiſt; the Skill of the Engraver being ſo great, that it is not eaſy to diſtinguiſh that which is printed from the written Copy; ſo that the Impreſſion is good or bad, according to the Ability of the Writer employ'd. This muſt be underſtood principally of our European Characters, which are engraved and printed by the Chineſe; for as to the Chineſe Characters which are engraved, the Skill of the Engraver often corrects the Defects of the Writer.

Proper for Books in all Languages.

The Chineſe nevertheleſs are not ignorant of the manner of Printing in Europe; they have moveable Characters as well as we, with only this Difference, that whereas ours is of Metal, theirs are only of Wood: By the Help of theſe they correct The preſent State of China, which is printed at Pe king every three Months. It is reported, that at Nan king, and Sû chew, they print in this manner ſome little Books, and that as neatly and correctly as thoſe which are engraved by the beſt Hands. There is no Difficulty in believing this, becauſe it only requires a little extraordinary Labour and Care.

The Manner of Printing with moveable Characters.

In Affairs that require Diſpatch, as when an Order comes from Court, which contains many Articles, and which muſt be printed in one Night, they have another Method of Engraving. They cover the Block with yellow Wax, and trace out the Characters with a ſurprizing Quickneſs.

In urgent Affairs.

They uſe no Preſs as in Europe; their wooden Plates, and unallum'd Paper would not bear it. But when once the Blocks are engraved, the Paper cut, and the Ink in readineſs, a ſingle Man, with his Bruſh, and without fatiguing himſelf, may print every Day near ten thouſand Sheets.

The Uſe of Preſſes unknown in China.

The Block which is in Uſe, muſt be ſet level and firm. They have two Bruſhes; one harder than the other, which is to be held in the Hand, and may be uſed at both ends. They dip this Bruſh in the Ink, and rub the Plate with it, but ſo that it may not be too much, nor too little moiſten'd: If it be too much, the Letters will be obſcured; if too little, the Characters will not print: When the Plate is once in order, they can print three or four Sheets ſucceſſively, without dipping the Bruſh in the Ink. The ſecond Bruſh muſt paſs gently over the Paper, preſſing it down a little, that it may take up the Ink: This is eaſily done, becauſe not being dipt in Allum-Water, it imbibes it inſtantly. You muſt only preſs more or leſs, and paſs the Bruſh over the Sheet oftner, or fewer times, according as there is more or leſs Ink upon the Plate: This Bruſh muſt be oblong and ſoft.

How they place their Plates.

The Ink which they uſe for Printing is a Liquid, and therefore much more convenient than that which is ſold in Sticks: To make it, you muſt take Lampblack, pound it well, expoſe it to the Sun, and then ſift it through a Sieve: The finer it is, the better. It muſt be tempered with Aqua-vitæ till it comes to the conſiſtence of Size, or of a thick Paſte, Care being taken that the Lampblack may not clot. After this it muſt be mixt with a proper Quantity of Water, ſo that it may be neither too thick, nor too thin. Laſtly, to hinder it from ſticking to the Fingers, they add a little Neats-Leather Glue, probably of that Sort which the Joyners uſe. This they diſſolve over the Fire, and then pour on every ten Ounces of Ink almoſt an Ounce of Glue, which they mix well with the Lampblack and Aqua-vitæ, before the Water is added to them.

Their Printing Ink.

They print but on one Side, becauſe their Paper is thin and tranſparent, and cannot bear a double Impreſſion without confounding the Characters with one another. Hence it is that every Leaf of the Book is folded, the Fold being at the edge of the Book, and the Opening at the Back, where they are ſown together; ſo that their Books are cut at the Back, whereas ours are cut at the Edges. And to put the Sheets together, there is a black Line drawn upon the Folds of the Sheets, which teaches to place them right; as the Holes made by the Points in our printed Sheets direct the Binder how to fold them truely, that the Pages may anſwer each other.

They cover their Books with a neat ſort of Paſteboard of a grey Colour, or elſe with fine Sattin, or flower'd Silk, which does not coſt much. There are ſome Books which the Binders cover with red Brocade, interſperſed with Gold and Silver Flowers. Tho' this Manner of Binding is inferior to ours, it is nevertheleſs neat and convenient.

Of the Manner in which the young Chineſe purſue their Studies; of the ſeveral Degrees they take; and the various Examinations they undergo before they attain the Doctor's Degree.

Of the Education of the Chineſe.

FROM about five or ſix Years of Age, according to the Capacities of the Children, and the Care that Parents take of their Education, the young Chineſe begin to ſtudy the Letters; but as the Number of the Letters is ſo very great, and without any ſuch Order as they have in Europe, this Study would be very ungrateful, if they had not found out Means to make it a ſort of Sport and Amuſement.

Of teaching the Elements of their Language.

They have choſen for this purpoſe about 100 Characters, which expreſs the moſt common things, and which preſent themſelves moſt frequently to the Senſes; as the Sky, the Sun, the Moon, Man, certain Plants and Animals, a Houſe, and the moſt common Utenſils; they get all theſe Things engraved in a coarſe Manner, and put the Chineſe Characters for them underneath: And theſe Figures, tho' very aukwardly repreſented, do yet quicken the Capacities of Children, fix their Imagination, and help their Memories. This Collection may be called, The Alphabet of the Chineſe.

Which may be call'd their Alphabet.

One Inconvenience, however, occurs in the Method, which is, That Children imbibe an infinite number of chimerical Notions in their tender Years; for to repreſent the Sun, they make a Cock within a Circle; the Moon they ſignify by a Rabbet pounding Rice in a Mortar: A ſort of Demon with fiery Bolts in his Hand, ſomewhat like the ancient Repreſentation of Jupiter, ſtands for Thunder. The Brutes, and their Myau, or Pagods, have their Place amongſt theſe Figures; ſo that the poor Children, in a manner, ſuck in with their Milk all theſe extravagant Whimſies: I have lately been informed, however, that this Method is now grown out of Uſe.

The Book which they put next into the Hands of Children, is called San tſe king; 'tis a conciſe Work, containing what is neceſſary for a Child to learn, and the Method of teaching it. It conſiſts of ſeveral ſhort Sentences, of three Characters, ranged in Rhymes, to help the Memories of Children. There is alſo another Book, the Sentences of which are of four Characters: As likewiſe a Catechiſm made for the Chriſtian Children, the Phraſes of which are but of four Letters, and which for this reaſon is called Sſe tſe king ven.

Characters of the Alphabet very numerous in China.

In a word, the Children muſt learn all theſe Characters by degrees, as the European Children do our Alphabet; with this Difference: That as we have but four and twenty Letters, they have many thouſands. They oblige a young Chineſe to learn at firſt four, five, or ſix of them in a Day, which he muſt repeat to himſelf from Morning till Night, in order to rehearſe them regularly to the Maſter twice a Day. If he is often deficient in his Leſſon, he is chaſtiſed. The Puniſhment is uſually in this Manner: They make him get upon a little narrow Bench, on which he lies down flat on his Belly, and there he receives eight or ten Blows upon his Drawers, with a flat Stick ſomewhat like a Lath. During the time of their Studies, they oblige them to ſuch a cloſe Aſſiduity, that they have very ſeldom any Holidays, except a Month at the beginning of the Year, and five or ſix Days about the middle of it.

When once they can read the Sſe chu, * they are not ſuffered to read any other Books till they have got theſe by heart, without miſſing a Letter; and, what is moſt difficult and ungrateful, they muſt learn theſe Books without underſtanding ſcarce any thing of them; it being the Cuſtom not to explain to them the Senſe of the Characters, till they know them perfectly.

How they teach them to form their Letters.

At the ſame time that they learn theſe Letters, they are taught how to form them with a Pencil. At firſt they give them great Sheets, written, or printed in large red Characters; and the Children do nothing with their Pencils, but cover the red Strokes with Black, which accuſtoms them to trace the Strokes. When they have learnt to make them in this manner, they give them others, which are black, and not ſo large; and laying upon theſe Sheets another Sheet which is blank and tranſparent, they draw the Letters upon this Paper, in the Form of thoſe underneath: But they oftener uſe a Board covered with White, varniſhed, and divided into little Squares, which make different Lines, whereon they write their Characters, and efface them with Water when they have done, to ſave Paper.

In

* Theſe are the four Books that contain the Doctrine of Kong fu tſe, or Confucius, and Ming tſe, or Mencius.

In fine, they take great Care to improve their Hands; for it is a great Advantage to the Learned to make their Characters well: They pay much regard to this Qualification, and in the Examination, which is made every three Years for the Degrees, they commonly reject thoſe who write ill, eſpecially if their Writing be not exact; unleſs they give great Proofs of their Ability in other Reſpects, either in the Language, or in compoſing good Diſcourſes. Care of the Chineſe in forming their Letters.

It is reported that a certain Candidate for the Degrees, having uſed, contrary to order, an Abbreviation in writing the Character Ma, which ſignifies a Horſe, had the Mortification of ſeeing his Work, tho' excellent, rejected; and was obliged to bear this Piece of Raillery from the Mandarin, That a Horſe could not walk well without four Legs.

When they know Characters enough for compoſing, they muſt learn the Rules of the Ven chang. This is a Compoſition reſembling that ſort of Theſes which the European Scholars make before they enter upon Rhetorick; with this difference, that the Ven chang muſt be more difficult, becauſe its Senſe is more confin'd, and its Style peculiar. They give for a Subject but one Sentence, taken out of the Claſſic Authors, which they call Ti mû, The Theſis; and this Theſis is ſometimes but one ſingle Character.

To find out whether the Children improve, the following Method is practiſed in many Places: Twenty or thirty Families, who are all of the ſame Name, and who conſequently have one common Hall of their Anceſtors, unite together, and agree to ſend their Children, twice a Month, into this Hall to compoſe: Every Head of a Family, by Turns, gives the Theſis, and provides, at his own Expence, the Dinner for that Day, which he takes care to have brought into the Hall: He likewiſe judges of the Compoſitions, and determines who has ſucceeded the beſt. If on the Day of Compoſing any one of this little Society abſent himſelf without a ſufficient Cauſe, his Parents are obliged to pay about twenty Pence; which is a ſure means to prevent any one's being abſent. Domeſtic Compoſitions.

Beſides this Diligence, which is private and voluntary, all the young Scholars are obliged to compoſe together, before the inferior Mandarin of Letters, called Hyo-kwan. This is done at leaſt twice a Year, once in the Spring, and once in the Winter, throughout the whole Empire: Twice, I ſay, at leaſt; for beſides theſe two general Examinations, the Mandarins of Letters examine them pretty frequently, to find what Progreſs they have made in their Studies, and to keep them in Exerciſe. There are ſome Governors of Cities who take the like trouble on themſelves, with regard to Men of Learning that live near them, whom they ſummon every Month to their Tribunal, and there make them compoſe, giving Rewards to thoſe who ſucceed the beſt, and bearing the Expence of their Entertainment for that Day. Publick Compoſitions.

It is not ſurprizing, that in a State where they have profeſſed Learning for ſo many Ages, and where they prefer it to all natural Advantages, they ſhould take ſo much pains to educate their Youth. There is not a City, Town, nor almoſt any little Village, in which there are not School-Maſters to inſtruct Youth in the Sciences; People of Fortune have Tutors for their Children, who teach them Letters, accompany them, and form their Manners; who inſtruct them in the Ceremonies, the manner of Saluting, the Compliments and common Civilities, the manner of Viſiting, and, when of a proper Age, the Hiſtory and Laws of their Country: Infinite is the Number of theſe Preceptors, becauſe amongſt thoſe who put up for the Degrees, there are very few that obtain them. Of the Perſons who preſide over the Education of Children.

In the Houſes of Perſons of Quality, thoſe that are entruſted with this Province are generally Doctors, or at leaſt Licentiates. In Families of a lower Rank, they are Bachelors, who continue the courſe of their Studies, and go to the Examinations in order to arrive at the Doctor's Degree. The Employment of a School-Maſter is accounted honourable, the Children's Parents maintain them, make them Preſents, treat them with a great deal of Reſpect, and every where give them the upper hand. Syew ſeng, Our Maſter, Our Doctor, is the Name they give them; and their Pupils have the higheſt Reſpect for them as long as they live.

Tho' there are no Univerſities in China, as in Europe, there is no City of the firſt Order, which has not a great Palace ſet apart for the Examinations of the Graduates: And in the Capitals, this Palace is yet bigger. A Miſſionary gives this Deſcription of the Edifice, in the City in which he was; and, as far as the Place will permit, they are all built after the ſame Manner: It is incloſed, ſays he, with high Walls, the Entrance is magnificent, and before it is a large Square, 150 Paces broad, and planted with Trees, having Benches and Seats for the Captains and Soldiers, who keep Centry in the Times of Examination. One enters at firſt into a great Court, where the Mandarins place themſelves with a Corps de Garde, at the end of which there is another Wall, with Folding-Gates. As ſoon as you enter, there is a Ditch full of Water, which you muſt paſs over upon a Stone-Bridge, to come at a third Gate, at which Guards are planted, who let no body enter without an expreſs Order from the Officers. When you have paſſed this Gate, you diſcover a great Square, the Entrance to which is by a very narrow Paſſage. On both Sides of this Square, are a vaſt number of little Chambers, cloſe together, four Foot and an half long, and about three and an half broad, to lodge the Students; in theſe Chambers are ſometimes to the Number of ſix thouſand. Their Want of Univerſities, how ſupply'd.

Before they enter the Palace to compoſe, they are ſtopped at the Gate, and ſearched with the greateſt Exactneſs, that they may not carry in any Books, or Writings; nothing being allow'd there but Pencils and Ink. If any Fraud were to be diſcovered, the Offenders would not only be turn'd back, but very ſeverely puniſhed, and excluded from the Degrees of Literature. When every body is entred, they ſhut up the Gates, and the publick Seal is ſet upon them.

There

There are Officers of the Tribunal to over-look every thing that paſſes, and to prevent them from going out of their Chambers, or ſpeaking to one another.

At the end of the narrow Paſſage which I mentioned, a Tower is erected upon four Arches, and flank'd with four Turrets, or a Sort of round Domes; from which, if any Diſturbance be perceived, the Drum is immediately beat to give notice, that the Diſorder may be remedied. Near this Tower there are divers Apartments, and a great Hall well furniſhed, in which thoſe aſſemble who preſide at the firſt Examination. At the going out of this Hall you enter another Court, in which there is another Hall reſembling the firſt, but more magnificently furniſhed; with divers Apartments for the Preſident, and principal Officers. There are alſo Galleries, a Garden, and many little Apartments for the Mandarins, Secretaries, and inferior Officers; and laſtly, every thing which is requiſite for lodging commodiouſly the whole Retinue of the Examiners.

When they think the young Students are fit to appear at the Examination of the inferior Mandarins, they ſend them thither on the appointed Day. For the better underſtanding of what follows, we muſt recollect what has been ſaid already; namely, that China contains fifteen great Provinces, every Province including many great Cities, which have the Title of Fû; and that theſe Cities have many others of the ſecond and third Order, that depend on them, ſome of which are called Chew, and others Hyen: There are no Cities of the firſt Order, that have not in their Diſtrict a Hyen, and ſometimes two, for the Word Hyen ſignifies much the ſame as what we call a Bailywick.. It is by the Hyen that they gather the Taxes, and even diſtinguiſh the Learned; for Example, they ſay, Bachelor of ſuch a Hyen. Nevertheleſs, it muſt not be thought that Learning flouriſhes alike in all the Provinces, there being many more Students in ſome than in others. The Mandarin, who is at the Head of a whole Province, is called Fû ywen. He that governs a Fû, is called Chi fû: They likewiſe call him Fû tſun; that is, the illuſtrious Perſon of the Fû, or City of the firſt Order. He who has only the Government of a Hyen, has the Title of Chi hyen, or Hyen tſun. Agreeable to this Subordination, there are in Kyen chang fû, one Chi fû, and two Chi hyen, and in the Capital Fû, there is a Fû ywen, that is a Viceroy. So that the Monarchical Government is eſtabliſhed not only over the whole Empire, but in every Province, in every Fû, and in every little Hyen.

Examinations of the Candidates for Degrees.

To return to the Examinations: As ſoon as the young Students are thought capable of paſſing thoſe of the Mandarins, they muſt begin with that of the Chi hyen, in whoſe Juridiction they were born; for Example, in the Diſtrict of Nan ching hyen, which is in the Juriſdiction of Kyen chang fû, there are more than eight Hundred, who go to compoſe before the Chi hyen of this City. It is this Mandarin that gives the Theſis, and examines theſe Compoſitions himſelf, or orders them to be examined in his Tribunal, and who determines which is the beſt: Of the eight hundred Students, there are about ſix hundred named; they ſay then, that they have Hyen ming, that is, that they are inſcrib'd to the Hyen: There are ſome Hyen in which the Number of Students amounts to ſix thouſand.

Theſe ſix hundred muſt afterwards appear at the Examination of the Chi fû of Kyen chang, who makes a new Choice; and of theſe ſix hundred, there are not above four hundred who have Fû ming, that is, who are named for the ſecond Examination. Hitherto they have no Degree in Literature, and therefore are called Tong ſeng.

In every Province there is a Mandarin who comes from Pe king, who is but three Years in his Office; he is called Hyo tau, or in the fineſt Provinces, Hyo ywen; and is generally a Perſon who hath Intelligence with the great Tribunals of the Empire: Formerly, he gave Preſents underhand, and thoſe very conſiderable, to be choſen; but the preſent Emperor has remedied this Abuſe by very ſevere Orders. He muſt make two Examinations during his three Years: The firſt Examination is called Swy kau, the ſecond Ko kau; for this purpoſe he is obliged to make a Circuit thro' all the Fû of the Province.

Honours which they render to Confucius.

As ſoon as the Hyo tau arrives in a Fû, he goes to pay his reſpects to Confucius, whom all the Learned look upon as the Doctor of the Empire: Then he himſelf explains ſome Paſſages in the Claſſick Authors, and the ſucceeding Days examines. When the four hundred Tong ſeng of Nan ching hyen, * who have Fû ming, go to compoſe in the Tribunal of the Hyo tau with the other Students, that come from all the Hyen which are ſubordinate to that Fû, if the Number of them is very great, they are divided into two Companies.

The greateſt Precautions are now uſed, to prevent the Mandarin's knowing the Authors of the Compoſitions; but theſe Precautions are ſometimes rendered vain by the Intrigues of the Parties. The Hyo tau nominates but fifteen Perſons, out of the four hundred, for example, that are in a Hyen; thoſe who are thus nominated, take the firſt Degree, and are therefore ſaid to enter into Study Tſin leau hyo, and are called Syew tſay: They then wear the Formalities, which conſiſt of a blue Gown, with a black Border all round it, and a Silver, or Pewter Bird, upon the Top of their Caps: They are no more liable to be baſtonadoed by the Order of the common Mandarins, but have a particular Governour, who puniſhes them if they do amiſs. Of the fifteen who are nominated, moſt of them are deſervedly choſen. Sometimes indeed, there is Favour ſhewn; but they who are thus elected, what Protection ſoever they may have, muſt not be without ſome Merit: For if it ſhould ever appear that Favour was the Motive of their Choice, the Envoy of the Court would be ruined both in his Reputation and Fortune.

One

* What I ſay of this Hyen muſt be underſtood proportionably of all the others.

One may ſay much the ſame Things concerning the Tong ſëng of War: The ſame Mandarins who examine for Learning, examine for the Army: Thoſe who are Candidates here, muſt ſhew their Ability in ſhooting with the Bow, and Riding; and if they have before applied themſelves to bodily Exerciſes, which require a great deal of Strength and Vigour, they muſt ſometimes give Proofs of it; for example, by lifting a large Stone, or ſome heavy Burden. But tho' this may be ſerviceable to them, yet it is not altogether eſſential; and to thoſe who have made any progreſs in Learning, they give certain Problems to be ſolved, reſpecting Incampments, and Stratagems of War; which contribute to their Preferment. It is proper to know, that the Warriours as well as the Learned, have their Claſſic Authors, which they alſo call by the Name of Keng, They were compoſed purpoſely for their uſe, and treat of the Military Diſcipline. Of the Examinations for War.

The Hyo tau is obliged by his Office to make the Tour of his Province, and to aſſemble in every City of the firſt Order, all the Syew tſay who are dependant upon it; when, after being informed of their Conduct, he examines their Compoſitions; recompenſes thoſe who have made great Proficiency in their Studies, and puniſhes thoſe whom he convicts of Negligence and Careleſneſs. Sometimes he enters into a Detail, and divides them into ſix Claſſes: The firſt contains a very few, of thoſe who have remarkably diſtinguiſhed themſelves; to whom he gives, as a Reward, a Taël, and a Silk Scarf: Thoſe of the ſecond Claſs receive alſo a Silk Scarf, and a ſmall matter of Money: The third Claſs hath neither Reward nor Puniſhment: Thoſe of the fourth receive the Baſtonado, by command of the Mandarins: The fifth loſe the Bird with which the Cap is adorned, and become but half Syew tſay: Thoſe that have the Misfortune, to be in the ſixth, are entirely degraded; but there are few to whom this happens: In this Examination, one ſhall ſometimes ſee a Man of fifty or ſixty Years of Age baſtonado'd, whilſt his Son, who compoſes with him, receives Applauſe and Rewards: But as to the Siew tſay, or Batchelors, they do not receive the Baſtonado for their Compoſitions alone, unleſs there be alſo ſome Complaint made of their Morals and Behaviour. Obligations of the Hyo tau.

Every Graduate who does not come to this Triennial Examination, runs the Riſque of being deprived of his Title, and ranked with the common People. There are but two Caſes, in which he may lawfully be abſent; either Sickneſs, or Mourning for the Death of a Parent. The old Graduates, who upon their laſt Examination appeared to be ſuperannuated, are for ever after excuſed from attending theſe Examinations; preſerving nevertheleſs, the Habit, Cap, and all the Prerogatives and Honours of their Degree. Caſes in which the Graduates are excuſed from appearing at the Examinations.

To attain the ſecond Degree, that of Kyu gin, they muſt paſs a new Examination called Chu kau, which is but once in three Years, in the Capital of every Province of the Empire. All the Siew tſay are obliged to attend at it. Two Mandarins come Expreſs from the Court, to preſide at this Examination, which is made by the great Officers of the Province, and by ſome other Mandarins, as their Aſſiſtants. The firſt of the two Mandarins ſent from the Court, is call'd Ching chu kau, and muſt be Han lin, that is, of the College of the chief Doctors of the Empire: The other is called Fû chu. In the Province of Kyang ſi, for inſtance, there are at leaſt ten thouſand Syew tſay, who are obliged to be at this Examination, and who fail not to attend. Amongſt theſe ten thouſand, the Number of thoſe who are nominated, that is, who obtain the Degree of Kyu gin, is no more than ſixty: Their Gown is of a browniſh Colour, with a blue Border four Fingers broad: The Bird upon the Cap is of Gold, or Copper gilt; and the Chief of them has the Title of Kay ywen. It is not eaſy to obtain this Degree by corrupting the Judges; and if any Intrigues are carried on for that Deſign, they muſt be managed with great Secrecy, and have their beginning at Pe king. Obligation and Order of ſeveral Examinations.

When they arrive at this Degree, they have but one Step more to take, to be Doctors: They muſt go the next Year to Pe king, to be examined for the Degree of Doctor; and the Emperor is at the Charge of this firſt Journey: Thoſe who after having paſſed this Examination once, are contented with being Kyu gin, either becauſe they are too far advanced in Years, or becauſe they have a moderate Fortune, are excuſed from coming any more to this Examination, which is made at Pe king every three Years. Every Kyu gin is qualified to bear any Office: Sometimes they obtain Employments merely by Seniority in this Degree; and ſome of them have become Viceroys of Provinces: And as all Offices are beſtow'd in conſideration of the Perſon's Merit, a Student, who is the Son of a Peaſant, has as much Hope of arriving to the Dignity of Viceroy, and even of Miniſter of State, as the Children of Perſons of the firſt Quality.

Finally theſe Kyu gin, as ſoon as they have obtained any publick Employment, renounce the Degree of Doctor. But all the Kyu gin, that is, Licentiates, who are not in any Office, go every three Years to Pe king, as I have ſaid before, to be preſent at the Examination there; which is called the Imperial Examination: For the Emperor himſelf gives the ſubject of the Compoſitions, and by the Attention he gives, and the exact Account that is rendered him, is ſuppoſed to be himſelf the Judge of them. The Number of Licentiates who come to this Examination, amounts very often to five or ſix thouſand; and of this Number about three hundred, whoſe Compoſitions are judged the beſt, are advanced to the Degree of Doctor. Sometimes this Degree hath been given but to 150. The three principal ones are called Tyen tſë men ſëng, that is, The Diſciples of the Son of Heaven: The Chief of theſe is called Chwang ywen, the next Pang ywen, and the laſt Tan wha. From the other Doctors, the Emperor chuſes a certain Number, to whom they give the Title of Han lin, that is, Doctors of the firſt Order: The others are called Tſin ſë. Of the Imperial Examination.

Who ever can obtain this glorious Title of Tsin ſe, either in Literature, or the Army, may look upon himſelf as a Man firmly ſettled, and needs not fear Want: For, beſides that he receives an infinite Number of Preſents from his Relations and Friends, he is in a fair Way to be employed in the moſt important Poſts of the Empire, and every body courts his Protection: His Friends and Relations never fail to erect, in their City, magnificent triumphal Arches to his Honour, on which they inſcribe his Name, the Place where, and the Time when he received his Degree.

The Number and Goodneſs of Books under the Emperor Kang hi.

The late Emperor Kang hi, towards the latter end of his Reign, obſerved that there were not ſo many new Books printed as uſual; and thoſe which were publiſhed, had not that degree of Perfection he could have wiſh'd, for the Glory of his Reign, and which might make them worthy to be tranſmitted to Poſterity: He perceived that theſe chief Doctors of the Empire, enjoying quietly the Rank to which they were raiſed, and the Reputation for Learning which they had obtained, neglected their Studies, in expectation of gainful Employments. To remedy this Negligence, as ſoon as the Examination for Doctors was ended, he took upon himſelf, contrary to cuſtom, to examine theſe chief Doctors, who ſo piqued themſelves upon being Judges and Examiners of others. This Examination gave great Alarm, and was followed by a Judgment ſtill more ſurpriſing: For ſeveral of theſe chief Doctors were ſhamefully degraded, and ſent back to their own Provinces. The Dread of ſuch another Examination, keeps thoſe Chief of the Learned, cloſe to their Studies. The Emperor prided himſelf upon this extraordinary Examination, becauſe one of the moſt learned Men of the Court, who was employed in looking over the Compoſitions, agreed exactly with him in his Judgment, condemning all the ſame that his Majeſty had rejected, excepting one Piece, which the Mandarin judged of a doubtful Merit.

He remedies this Negligence.

Compariſon of the Degrees taken by the Learned in China, with thoſe taken by the Learned in Europe.

It appears from what I have mentioned, that the Compariſon that has been made between theſe three Degrees, which diſtinguiſh the Learned in China, and the Batchelors, Licentiates, and Doctors of Europe, is not altogether juſt. 1ſt. Becauſe theſe Names in Europe, are known ſcarcely any where but in Univerſities and Colleges; and the Licentiates have no greater Acceſs than others to People of Faſhion; whereas here, theſe three Degrees comprehend all the Nobility and polite People of China; and furniſh almoſt all the Mandarins, except ſome few Tartars. 2d. Becauſe in Europe, a conſiderable Progreſs in the ſpeculative Sciences, and an exact Knowledge of Philoſophy and Theology, is requiſite in order to be made a Doctor; whereas in China, nothing more is required than Eloquence, and the Knowledge of their Hiſtory and Laws.

Father Dentrecolles's Researches on this Subject.

To give a yet more perfect Idea, of the great Care taken by the Chineſe to form their Youth, and to make the Sciences flouriſh in their Empire, I ſhall inſert here ſeveral Extracts of Chineſe Books, which treat of their Eſtabliſhment of the publick Schools. It was Father Dentrecolles who made this curious Enquiry, and communicated it to me. There can be no better Means of informing Ourſelves concerning China, than by China itſelf: For we are ſure to come at a true Knowledge of the Genius and Cuſtoms of that Nation, if we purſue this Method.

Extract of a Chineſe Book, entitled, The Art of making a People Happy, by eſtabliſhing public Schools.

I HYO,

Seminaries of Education in China.

ANTIENTLY, in China a Place called Shu, was alotted for a certain Number of Families; and another called Tſyang, for a larger Diſtrict. Theſe two Places were Seminaries for educating the Youth of the Empire, and forming them to the Sciences. The Literati of the moſt conſpicuous Merit, were compleated in the Academy of Tſyang. The Country Schools produced thoſe Geniuſes that are qualified for Perfection in the Sciences. And to this Day, they whoſe Knowledge has gain'd them Admittance into the Hall of Confucius, have begun by the loweſt Exerciſes of the young Students.

By whom and when inſtituted.

The Emperor Hong vû Founder of the preceding Dynaſty of Ming, being perſuaded of how much Importance to his State it was, to aid and encourage Youth to Literature; in the ſecond Year of his Reign ordained, that publick Schools ſhould be built in all the Cities of the 1ſt. 2d. and 3d. Rank. And ſix Years after, that he might make the Benefit more general, he founded Schools for the Country. His Order addreſt to the Mandarins of the reſpective Provinces was in theſe Terms:

"At preſent we ſee at Court, and thro' all the Cities, Schools erected for teaching the Sci"ences. Our Intention is, that the People in the Country ſhould likewiſe ſhare in theſe great "Advantages, and in that wonderful Change which Study, no doubt, will produce among our "Subjects. For this effect, you the Mandarins are to cauſe Schools to be built in the Coun"try, and to take care to furniſh them with able Maſters. Theſe Maſters being cloathed with "Authority, and Men of Merit, every one in the Empire will be willing that Literature
"ſhould become the firſt and chiefeſt Employment of our Youth, and that they endeavour to "excel in it."

Thus

Thus after the Reign of the Oriental Tartars, Learning began to revive under the laſt Dynaſty. I ſhall firſt ſpeak of the Schools in the Country. If 25 Families require one of them, we ſhall find that the Diſtrict of a City of the third Order, will require a hundred, yet the Royal Appointments for the Profeſſors, are ſufficient only for thoſe of two Villages. How ſhall we remedy this? My Thoughts are as follows.

Our Schools at preſent, I mean the Country Schools, are a good deal different from what thoſe named Shu or Tſyang were formerly. Our Anceſtors had the Subjects of their Studies regulated, and the manner of teaching in all Schools was uniform. Children began to ſtudy at eight Years of Age, at which time they read the [*] Kin tſe to inſtruct them in Chronology. And the Book of the five Parts of the Empire, for Geography.

Method of ſtudying in them.

They then were taught Arithmetic, and to inſtruct them in their private Deportment, made to read, the Manner in which they ought to behave to a Father, a Mother, their Relations and Domeſtics; and in their Public; their Behaviour to Magiſtrates, to Seniors, and to their Equals. Such were the Books that were put into the Hands of the Youth, in the lower Form or the Syau hyo.

At the Age of 15, they paſt thro' the higher Sciences, or Ta hyo; they learned all the Paſſages, by which the Books of our ancient Sages are become ſo valuable; the Rites and Ceremonies of the Empire, with what ever relates to Princes and Magiſtrates; whatever forms a Man of Honour, and a Polititian; in ſhort, what ever relates to good Government in general.

At firſt they applied themſelves to the eaſieſt Studies, and when they were Maſters of the Rudiments, they advanced, by inſenſible Degrees, to higher Attainments; till at the end of a certain Number of Years, they became very able Men. It was in the Schools of the reſpective Diſtricts, that they were thus form'd by little and little. At laſt the Students of different Places or Shû, were tranſplanted into the Tſyang or common School of the Diſtrict; and they there compleated themſelves by Conferences, by the Lectures of the firſt Maſters, and by a mutual Emulation.

Virtue, a Science.

Theſe excellent Methods new modell'd the Wit, the Underſtanding, and in ſhort, the whole of the Man. Virtue, thus as it were becoming a Science, renders Multitudes happy; and hence it was, before they were aware, that the ſo much deſired Change was of a ſudden wrought among all the Members of the State, ſo as to render the whole Empire perfect.

Its great Effects.

At preſent, the Children of Men of Fortune and Quality, have the means of Studying, without uſing them; and the Poor are deſtitute of them who moſt wiſh for them. When the Parents are Great and Rich, and deſign to beſtow a liberal Education upon their Children, they take a Tutor into their Houſes, where they aſſign him an Apartment; nor will their Pride ſuffer them to allow the Children of their poor Neighbours, to reap any Benefit by his Leſſons. And from hence it is, that the wiſe Regulations for public Schools, either for City or Country, are much neglected.

Diſadvantages and Abuſes in Study.

The Mandarins know well enough, how much the Manners of the Age require to be reformed; but one would think, that they did not look upon this as a very preſſing Affair. The true Obſtacle is, that they want the neceſſary Aſſiſtances, to build and endow theſe Schools in the Country. Thus, that proper and uſeful Deſign is laid aſide; and hence the Doctrines of our Claſſic Books are not practiſed; ſo that the good Cuſtoms of our Anceſtors daily decay, and in time will be entirely ruined. Let us prevent this Misfortune.

Means of removing them.

What I am going now to propoſe, appears to me of Conſequence, for the effectual Re-eſtabliſhment of theſe Schools. Let the Literati of Fortunes, and the rich People who are in Poſts, make it their Pleaſure to unite; and each in his own Country promote this noble Undertaking. Let the Mandarin of the Place, put himſelf at their Head; after which, where will be the Difficulty of erecting public Buildings for Learning? It ought likewiſe to be conſidered, that theſe Schools are principally opened for the Children of poor People, who, without ſuch Helps, can make no Progreſs in Letters.

By theſe Methods young People, however poor, if their Genius leads them to Learning, may give themſelves up intirely to it. Miſery commonly prevails moſt in the Country. Cities conſiſt chiefly of Merchants, Tradeſmen, Graduates, and People who either have been in Imployments, or live nobly. In the Country, moſt of the Inhabitants either labour or cultivate the Ground, keep Flocks, or are imployed in ruſtick Labours.

Method of making a Proviſion for a School.

A Computation muſt be made how many poor People there are in the Diſtrict of a City, for inſtance, of the third Order, and how many rich; upon this Computation the Plan of a School muſt be formed. When it is known how many large Burroughs, and Places frequented either by the Commerce, or by the Fairs held in them, are without the City, and how many Habitations and Houſes are joining to each other; one may judge from thence how many Schools there ought to be. As for ſingle Houſes diſperſed up and down, if the Inhabitants of them have a mind that their Children ſhould ſtudy, they muſt even draw nearer the School, and provide their Children Places in it.

Plan of it.

The Form and Order in which I would have ſuch a School built, is as follows; The Building ſhould have firſt a ſpacious Entry; and over the Gate ſhould be written in large Characters this Inſcription, I HYO, that is, The College of Piety. Laſtly, the whole Ground neceſſary, muſt be ſurrounded with a good Wall; that the Students, may not have the Liberty of going out, or other People of coming in.

* A Cycle of Time by a Calendar of 60 Years.

After

After the Gate and firſt Court, there muſt be a Hall for the Teng, Aſſemblies or Leſſons, adorned with three Ranges of Pillars; and at a juſt Diſtance a ſecond Hall, where ſhall be placed the Picture of our moſt Wiſe and Ancient Maſter, that the Student may come every Morning and Evening and honour him in that Quality. Two Lodgings are to be built at the Side of this Hall. The Profeſſor is to live in the one, and the other is to ſerve for receiving Viſits; beſides a Warderobe is to be built where the Moveables of the Houſe are to be kept. The Kitchen may be on the Eaſt, and an open Space may be reſerved in form of a Garden. The Building being once finiſhed, it may be furniſhed with Stools, Tables, Arm-chairs, Porcelain and Hangings; in ſhort, with every thing that is neceſſary. All this will require a good deal of Expence, but the People of Quality are to ſupply it by voluntary Contributions. He who is the principal Superintendant of the School, is to chuſe for the Stewart of the Houſe, an aged, wiſe, and virtuous Man.

Qualifications of Maſters.

As for the Profeſſor, the choice muſt fall upon a Man of an unblemiſh'd Reputation, full of Probity, and with Talents both to inſtruct and improve Youth; provided he is poſſeſt of ſuch Qualities, no matter for his Riches. He muſt be preſented to the Mandarin of the Place, who is to examine him and to judge of his Abilities. The School is then to be opened with Solemnity, and the Youth muſt have Notice to be preſent, and be exhorted to be ſubmiſſive to him.

Duties.

The Scholars are to acknowledge their Maſter by the Reverence due to his Quality, and they may make a Preſent to him, tho' he cannot exact one from them: However that is an ancient Cuſtom. Wen hong, famous in the Province of Se Chwen, when he aſſembled the Youth of the Country every Day to be inſtructed, introduced the Cuſtom of offering ſomething to the Maſter.

It appears to me that this Practice ought to be kept up: And that none ſhould grudge a ſmall Expence, eſpecially when it is well placed. It helps a poor Profeſſor, ſuch as moſt of theſe Maſters are, to paſs his life eaſily, and to aſſiſt his Family, from which he is ſometimes at a good Diſtance.

Indeed, he ought rather to have a regular Appointment to truſt to; for which reaſon in founding a School, a certain Extent of Land ſhould be purchaſed, whoſe Revenue ſhould be apply'd to the Payment of the Maſter and Officers of the Houſe.

and Exerciſes of the Students.

He is regularly to give out the common Exerciſes of their Studies. In the Morning he is to make them recite by heart the Paſſage of the Book which had been preſcribed as a Leſſon the Night before; he is then to give out a new one, and to proportion it to the Capacity of the Scholar. It is of Importance that he pronounces the Letters in a diſtinct clear Voice, giving each its full Emphaſis. Beſides, in Reading he is to mark the different Pauſes, where the Senſe of the Period is more or leſs compleat.

After the Scholars have breakfaſted they are to apply to Writing. The Maſter in ſetting their Copies ought to form every Letter according to the Number of Strokes, and the Model in the laſt amended Chyang Yun. He is to guide the Pencil, ſo that the Letter may have its exact Figure and Beauty; and by theſe Copies the Scholar is to write.

Moreover, tho' the Buſineſs here is to know how to manage the Pencil, it muſt not be imagin'd that this Art is learn'd in Haſte, or at Random, or that it is an eaſy Matter to form a well proportion'd Letter. It is neceſſary in the Beginning to accuſtom the Scholar to be exact, and to labour to attain to Perfection on that Head.

When the Copy is finiſh'd, every Scholar ought to bring his Writing to the Maſter, who is to run it over, and to mark the faireſt Letters with a little Circle, and to mark with a Daſh thoſe that are faulty, that they may learn to correct them another Time.

When Books are to be explain'd, the Maſter is to begin by briefly ſumming up the Subject of the Chapter to be explain'd. Then taking it by Parts he is to give; 1. The proper Signification of each Character. 2. The Senſe of the whole Period. Above all Things it is neceſſary that the Maſters convey clear and preciſe Ideas, and ſuch as may continue diſtinctly upon the Memories of the Children.

When the Explication is over, he is to call each of the Students, and to make them paſs by his Table in Silence, that the Awe of him may be better imprinted on their Minds. Next Day, before he proceeds to a new Explication, he muſt take an Account of the foregoing. The paraphraſes of the learned Chang ko laû, is the Work that can beſt inſtruct the Scholar in the true ſenſe of claſſic Books, which are there explained very clearly even to the leaſt Letter.

The Scholars Exerciſes in the Afternoon.

When the Hour of Explication is over it is commonly Mid-day, and then they go to Dinner; after Dinner, as in the Morning, the Exerciſes begin by a recital of the preſcrib'd Leſſon, after which a new one is given out. Then they are to fall to the Exerciſe of Tſo twi (†) the ſubject of Twi tſe is propoſed, which ought to be more or leſs lengthened, according to the Progreſs the Scholar has made.

But before this Work they receive a Book to read, which contains many Models of theſe Sort of Compoſitions, and inſtructing them to know in what Senſe the Words and Characters muſt to be taken, and how they ought to be placed according to the different Accents, that they may receive the neceſſary Cadence. By exerciſing themſelves in theſe Works, their Style may may be formed to Petitions, Ordinances, Letters and other Compoſitions, where the familiar Style cannot have Place.

Every Morning and Evening, when the Scholars enter and leave the School, they ought to preſent themſelves before the Picture of the Ancient Maſter (†) Syen tſë, and to do him Reverence. When they come home, they ought to make the ſame Reverence to their Parents and to the Aged. (*) Theſe are the Duties of Civility to which young Perſons ought to be formed, in order, that both at home and abroad, they may acquire that Air of Politeneſs ſo ſuitable to the Literati. Duties of Civility in the Students.

The Leſſons they have got by heart in five Days, they ought to repeat upon the ſixth; on which Day they are to be preſcrib'd no new Taſk, but are to conſider all theſe Leſſons and reduce them to writing, without the help of a Book. Such as do it faultily, ought to be puniſhed. Theſe Days of Repetition are the ſame thing to the Students, as the great Examinations are to the Literati.

But the principal Study of Youth ought to be the Eſteem, Love and Practice of Virtue; to know, to combat, and to vanquiſh their own Failings; to reform, and to work a thorough Change upon their Natures: Theſe are the grand Studies. And, that none may be deceiv'd in the Meaning of theſe general Terms, it is as follows. A young Man, at home, muſt be perfectly ſubmiſſive, and abroad, perfectly compos'd. Does he meet one of greater Age or Quality? Let him ſhew a great deal of Reſpect: Is he among his Companions and Equals? Let him win them by his Modeſty, and a genteel Complaiſance; let no haughty Air, or any Negligence of Manners be ſeen in his Deportment, and no Expreſſions of Ill-nature be heard in his Talk. Let Anger never make any alteration in his Countenance; and Sincerity, Honeſty, and Uprightneſs always prevail, in his dealings among Men, and in his Commerce in the World. This is actually to reform and to perfect one's ſelf. Virtue, a neceſſary Study for Youth, as is the Uprightneſs of Heart and Mind.

Our ‡ I King informs us, that to endeavour to correct thoſe who know not the Ways of Juſtice, and have gone aſtray, is the buſineſs of a wiſe Man. This Text acquaints us that as Youth is a Time of Ignorance; ſo the great Science in which Youth ſhould be educated, is the Science of an upright Heart and a diſintereſted Mind, which are directly oppoſite to and diſtant from falſe Sects and dangerous Maxims. What excellent Subjects would not ſuch an Education form! and how worthy of our Sages, would ſuch an Exerciſe be! What then can one think of a Maſter, who neglecting to reform his Pupils from the Errors and Corruptions of the Age, applies all his cares to burthen their Memory with a Load of uſeleſs Leſſons? Unacountable Abuſe!

This Diſorder might be reform'd, if the Mandarins, who are the ‖ Paſtors as well as the Governors of the People committed to their Charge, would rightly conſider it. As for inſtance, when Buſineſs calls them, as it frequently does, into the Country, where they are oblig'd to Viſit ſeveral different Places of their Diſtrict, if they would take the Trouble to viſit the Schools, to obſerve the Progreſs of the Scholars and the Method of the Teachers; and beſtow ſome Mark of Diſtinction upon the fineſt Capacities among the former, and of Liberality upon the moſt painful and diligent among the Latter; What good Conſequences would not attend this? The Fathers, the Mothers, and the elder Brothers, when they knew of a Mandarin's coming, would ſpur their Children or younger Brothers up to ſtudy. And the Maſter, after ſuch an Honour, would have a great deal more Zeal and Authority to make himſelf heard and obey'd; and thereby form Pupils diſtinguiſh'd both by Learning and Virtue. How attainable.

REMARKS on the ſame SUBJECT.

THE I hyo, or Schools founded and endowed by the Liberality of the Prince, Mandarins, or other wealthy People zealous for the public Good, as far as I can learn, are pretty rare in China; but the common Hyo or Schools are ſo frequent, that there is ſcarce a Village without at leaſt one. And a young Man who has not ſtudied, is a living Monument of the extream Poverty of his Parents. Public Schools rare in China.

It is a Proverb in China; There are more Maſters than Scholars, and more Phyſicians than Patients.

Teaching is the Employment of all the numerous Crowds of poor Literati; for as the greateſt Honours and the higheſt Mandarinate is attainable by Letters, there is not a Family that does not make one of the Children ſtudy, in hopes that he may ſucceed as well as others; but as they are frequently diſappointed, they at laſt find themſelves reduc'd to the Neceſſity of Teaching. Teaching, the buſineſs of Poor Literati.

Schoolmaſters often to enlarge their Income, make up a ſmall Collection of Noſtrums, and thus act in the double Capacity of Schoolmaſter and Phyſician. Or elſe, they betake themſelves to the latter, when Age has incapacitated them for the former; ſo that all of a ſudden they become old Phyſicians.

The Literati who teach, if they have Genius, learn at the ſame time; that they may attain a higher Degree. For, as ſoon as in the Examinations they become Syew tſay or Doctors, however poor they were before, they inſtantly emerge from their Miſery. All their Kindred contributes to their Subſiſtence; they have a Right to demand Favours from the Mandarins; and are in hopes to become one themselves within a certain Number of Years. If they repair to Court, and there get to be Preceptor to some Mandarin's or great Man's Son, their Advancement is yet more quick and more sure: This is a Course that many of them take.

Respect of the Chinese for their Preceptors.

The Quality of Master, or Syen seng, is never effaced with respect to the Scholar. He, (says the Proverb) who has been once look'd upon as Master, ought all the rest of his Life to be look'd upon as Father. It undoubtedly was upon this Maxim that the famous Minister of State, Paul Syu, the great Protector of our Holy Religion, put himself his and whole Family into deep Mourning, as if it had been for his own Father, when he heard of the Death of the Missionary who had instructed and baptised him.

Upon these Principles too, whenever the Scholars become Mandarins, their Master, or, in his room, his Sons, have a Right to visit them, and to demand a mark of Acknowledgment, which is never denied. Even a Viceroy, in Presence of the great Mandarins of his Province, will yield, without any Scruple, the first Place to the Syen seng, who had given him his earliest Instructions; tho' perhaps he lives poor, and in some Village, while his Pupil mounts to the highest Distinction. This is the Foundation of the great Honours that even Emperors pay to Confucius, who is the first Syen seng of the Empire.

The Chinese Authors very much extoll the Office of a Schoolmaster to Youth. It is, (says one of their Sages) the most compleat and the most important Employment; for the good or bad Fortune of a Family depends upon the Education of the Children, and the Faults of the Scholars affect the Character of the Master.

The following Passage is contained in a pretty Modern Author, approved of by two of the first Doctors about Court. "To apply to the Education of Youth is a very high Point of the Virtue Te kyi ta: Will the Creator of the Universe fail one Day to reward it? Tsau we ngan te pu me yew?" The same Author has several Observations which I shall take notice of, viz.

First OBSERVATION.

IT is wrong to shew Contempt, as People sometimes do, for those who have taught us the first Elements. The Pains they take are very great, and incomparably more discouraging, than those required in directing the Studies of such as are more advanced.

Diseases incident to School-masters.

REMARK.] In reality, we see a great many Schoolmasters who become asthmatic and consumptive, by being obliged both to study and to teach; tho' their Entertainment is better than they can have at their own Houses; the Parents of their Scholars providing them with all Necessaries. Besides, the continual Bawling either of the Master or the Scholars is uneasy; for the Chinese learn their Books by reciting them aloud, and are surpris'd to see us study without opening our Lips, or using any Motion; they accompanying always the Sound of their Voice with a slight Motion of the Body, or at least of the Head.

Second OBSERVATION.

Bad Choice of Masters to what owing.

A few People dwell together, that they may be near the Master who teaches their Children; and because they are not in a Condition to be at Expences, any of the Literati serves their turn; thus the Generality of Masters are very ignorant.

REMARK.] They are, however, good for somewhat; for they have a Method of teaching certain Books. Besides, they shew the Scholars how, and when to make a handsome Reverence; to give and take a Dish of Tea genteely; to contract a certain Air in his walking, the Manner of his Bonnet, and the handling of his Fan, which distinguishes the Chinese Students.

Third OBSERVATION.

Particular Duty of a Master.

He commends the Practice of a certain Professor, who always enquired of the Parents of his Scholars, whether they designed to compleat the Education of their Children as Scholars, or if they intended them only for Merchants or Tradesmen, such as themselves, that he might adapt his Lessons to their several Views, and his Scholars neither lose their Time nor he his Pains.

Method of Educating Poor Children.

REMARK.] The Children of poor People are commonly assisted in quickly procuring a small Stock of Characters, for writing their Accounts, by means of a Book, where the most ordinary Occurrences of Life are coarsely drawn, and below each Figure is the Character or Name of the Thing represented.

The Chinese curious in founding the Inclinations.

The Chinese, for their Diversion, commonly sound the Inclinations of their Children. Whenever they can use their Hands, they lay before them a Book, a Ballance, and Arms; and according to the Choice of the Child, they judge (A) him born with a Genius for Learning, Trade, or War.

Fourth OBSERVATION.

The Capacity of the Scholar is to be consulted, and it is not to be over-loaded with Study. Tho'

(A) This Custom has very little Foundation in Reason. The Choice of the Children probably will fix upon what most attracts their Eyes. Perhaps it may only prevail among the lower Rank of People, who we find by Du Halde's Accounts in other Places of this Work are as much addicted to Superstitions as any in the World.

Tho' they could learn 200 Characters in a Day, teach them but 100; otherwiſe you will diſcourage them. Do not puſh them on to too hard Taſks, for that is to make them do amiſs. Capacities of Children to be conſulted.

REMARK.] As to the Memory of the Chineſe, ſays Father Dentricolles, I have been more than once ſurprized, to hear the little Chriſtians about ſeven or eight Years of Age, repeat pretty long Books from one End to the other. Science in China, conſiſts principally in the Exerciſe of the Memory; and in committing to it many Books. A Mandarin, one Day ſeeing my ſmall European Library, whiſpered to another Mandarin, Do you think that he can repeat ſome of theſe Books to us? Theſe Gentlemen frequently enquired of us, by what Secrets they might attain a happy Memory. I believe a great many ruin theirs by their Exceſs at firſt ſetting out upon their Studies. Prodigious Memory of the Chineſe.

Fifth OBSERVATION.

Above all things young People muſt be prohibited from reading Romances, Comedies, Verſes, or obſcene Songs; theſe ſort of Books ſoften and corrupt the Heart inſenſibly, and contribute to the Loſs of good Manners. It is a ſhameful Thing ever to have read them with Pleaſure; a bad Diſcourſe, if it enters into the Ear of a young Scholar, remains, all his Life after, in his Heart. Books prohibited to Young Children.

REMARK.] The Emperor Kang hi prohibited the Sale of Books that are contrary to good Manners, ſuch as certain Romances capable to corrupt Youth. The Mandarins inſpect the Shops of the Bookſellers, who, for all that, do not ſtick to ſell them privately.

Extract of a Treatiſe upon the ſame Subject, made by Chu hi, one of the moſt celebrated Doctors in China, who lived under the Nineteenth Dynaſty called Seng.

CHU HI begins with pointing out the true End of Study, which is Virtue: To this it is, ſays he, that a Scholar ought to apply all his Forces; in the ſame Manner as he who draws a Bow, aims ſtraight at the Mark, and fears nothing ſo much as to ſhoot wide. To learn Children Characters, to make them repeat whole Books, and to give them an outward Air of Politeneſs, without ever troubling them with any Endeavours to reform their Manners, is generally what is called Affection for Children; but at the bottom it is hating them: Parents may perhaps be very well ſatisfied with ſuch a Maſter; but do not ſuperior Beings, without our perceiving it, keep an Account of ſo criminal a Negligence, to puniſh it in due Time? Conſequence of the Education of Youth.

The famous Hyu, when he was a little Scholar, aſked one Day of his Maſter, What was the End of his Studies? The Latter anſwer'd, That he might riſe to the honourable Degree of Syew ſay, or Doctor. What, reply'd the young Hyu, is there nothing more propoſed? The Maſter immediately perceived the elevated Views of the Child, and went to his Parents; Your Son, ſaid he, has a Soul greater than ordinary; ſo promiſing a Scholar requires a more able Maſter than I am; take care to provide one for him. The End of Study.

At preſent, when we ſay that a Man can, if he will, become as virtuous as our firſt Emperors Yau and Shun, it is look'd upon as a Paradox; the Difficulty diſcourages to ſucceed. But does any renounce the Goods of Fortune, becauſe of the Pain that attends the acquiring of them? If young Men are commonly entertain'd with the Example of our antient Sages, and if they are accuſtomed frequently to think of them, they will become what they were. It is in virtue of ſuch an Education that a Maſter is called a ſecond Father; but a Maſter ought to remember, that as a Workman is employ'd becauſe of his Skill, ſo when he is charged with the Education of a Youth, it requires all his Cares and Application. Another of Government.

The Advice given by an Emperor upon his Death-bed to his Succeſſor, ſhould be inculcated among Youth: " Never ſay this or that Fault is a ſlight one, therefore I will indulge my ſelf in " it; or, this Act of Virtue is inconſiderable, therefore let me omit it."

Youth is averſe to Conſtraint; they therefore ought to be inſtructed in ſuch a Manner as not to diſcourage them. If the Bundle of Thorns which is wrapp'd round the young Tree, to defend it from Cattle, is too thick, and binds it too hard, it cruſhes it. Inſtructions and Reprimands ſhould come like the vernal Winds and Rains, whoſe Influence promotes the gentle Growth of the Plants. A Maxim in Education illuſtrated.

Leſſons and Precepts formerly were in Verſe, and in Form of Songs, that they might enter more eaſily into the Minds of Children, and ſerve for Diverſions adapted to their Age, thereby making them inſenſible of the Toil of Studying. Our antient Kings had introduced that Method of Teaching: We think that there is little in it; but it is of very great Importance. This Method is alter'd; do Things go better? Account of Antient Leſſons and Precepts.

Chu hi deſcends into ſeveral other little Details: " When Children, ſays he, repeat their " Leſſons, cauſe them to do it in ſuch a Manner, that they may have printed on their " Minds

" Minds, what they pronounce with their Lips: ſay nothing to them that can be conſtrued " to favour (*) falſe Sects: Take Care to give them an Antidote againſt that Poiſon." He then adviſes to give them Rewards, which ought to be done the firſt and fifteenth of every Month: Theſe Rewards ſhould conſiſt of Pencils and Paper for Writing.

Chu hi ſpeaks next of the long Vacation which begins at the twentieth of the laſt Month of the Chineſe Year, and continues to the twentieth or thereabouts of the (†) firſt Month. This long Vacation is preceded by a general Examination of the Scholars; now excepting this there are but few in the Courſe of the Year; the few that are fall on the Feaſts, and other Chineſe Holidays in different Months. The Birth-Day of the Syen ſeng, or the Profeſſor, is another Feaſt for the Scholars, who that Day make him their Preſents of Congratulation. The Evening Claſs ends every Day by a ſhort Hiſtory. This Practice is very commendable. At laſt, before the Scholars are diſmiſs'd, a ſmall varniſh'd Board is expoſed, which contains an uſeful Inſtruction in the Commerce of Life in four Verſes; theſe every one tranſcribes, and reads three Times with a loud Voice: Then the School breaks up for that Day.

And of the Chineſe Holidays for Schools.

Chu hi has an entire Chapter upon the Care with which young Students ought to ſhun, 1. Too many Engagements, 2. Play, 3. Wine, 4. Gallantry, 5. A ſoft and effeminate Life. He then paſſes to many Ko ſi, that is to ſay, Things to be lamented, with reſpect to the Neglect of Studying: viz.

Faults to be ſhunn'd.

1. Hiſtory informs us, that formerly the Paſſion for Study was ſo great, that a poor Man reduced to dig the Earth for his Livelihood, carried his Book to the Field with him, that he might ſnatch a leiſure Moment for Study, amidſt his hard Toils. What matter of Shame is this to thoſe who live at their eaſe, and have all the Conveniencies of Studying, yet feel no Ardour for it?

and to be lamented.

2. Our Anceſtors went cheerfully a great Way to ſearch out a Maſter: Now-a-days we have Maſters at hand, and yet neglect to profit by them.

3. Formerly, Men were oblig'd to be at the prodigious Pains of tranſcribing whole Books; yet they willingly underwent the Labour; but at preſent, tho' by means of the fine Art of Printing, the Bookſellers Shops and Libraries are overſtock'd with Books, Perſons neglect to uſe them.

4. For want of Explanation, People were formerly oblig'd to ſpend three Years upon the Study of one Book; and were thirty Years in underſtanding the Canonical Books. At Preſent, the Labours of the Learned have rendered all theſe Studies attainable in the Flower of a Man's Age; yet we ſee Perſons ſpending the Bloom of their Life in Idleneſs and Indolence.

5. How many unhappy Perſons are born deaf and blind? We bewail their Misfortune, and juſtly. Yet, when young Men in the free Exerciſe of their Senſes, and with a lively, penetrating Underſtanding, abuſe theſe precious Gifts; what worſe could befal them, tho' they were depriv'd of both Eyes and Ears?

6. What Age or Condition of Life is exempted from Pain? Yet a young Fellow free from all Trouble or Hardſhip, ſhuns a ſlight Pain, ſuch as that of reading, while his Father, perhaps, is earning a Livelihood for him with the Sweat of his Brows.

7. How many People born to humble and mean Imployments are ſo unhappy as to be ignorant even of the Names of our Canonical Books, Shi and Li? Ye alſo, Young Gentlemen, Sons of the Literati, and of the Doctors, ye place not the Glory of a Man of Learning, as your Fathers did, in the Knowledge of Books, but in clothing yourſelves in Silk, and in aſſuming great Airs; without minding that by your Ignorance you will ſink your Family into Obſcurity.

8. Thoſe who lived in the firſt times wanted Places, where they might, apart from Hurry and Noiſe, read and compoſe; but now there are Edifices built on purpoſe, in Cities, in the Country, where Maſters invite and wait upon Scholars; yet theſe Advantages are ſlighted, Men are amuſed with Trifles, and are as vain as Women in their Ornaments and Dreſſes, both for the Body and Head; and yet they affect the Name of Literati, and without bluſhing allow People to give them the Title of Doctor.

9. All the Duties of civil Life are circumſtantially ſet down in Books; yet young Men neglect to learn them; having no Taſte, and ſhewing no Ardour for any thing, but vain Amuſements: And thus the fine Leſſons of Morality periſh and are uſeleſs. In ſhort, an ignorant Man, inſenſible of his own, is not a Degree above the moſt ſtupid Beaſts.

REMARK.] We have ſeen above, that Children, when they firſt begin to Study, have a Story proper to encourage them to read, to open their Genius, and to animate them to Virtue, explained to them every Day; I ſhall give ſome of the little Hiſtories, which will let the reader into a Taſte of the Chineſe Learning, and their Induſtry in the Education of Youth. Theſe different Paſſages of Hiſtory are collected into one Volume. Some of them reach as far back as the firſt times of the Empire: Moſt of them are of the antient Dynaſties: And only three of them are of the latter Ages. At the Top of every Page of the Book is a kind of Print, wherein the Story is repreſented, doubtleſs, to fix it in the Imaginations of the Children and to aſſiſt their Memories. They take care to write the Name and Sirname of the Perſon mention'd, the Place of his Birth, and under what Reign he lived.

(*) Chu hi, under the Reign of the Song, was a profeſs'd Enemy to the modern idolatrous Sects, who oppos'd the primitive Literary Sects.

† The Beginning of the Chineſe Year is the Time of their great Rejoicings, which continue till ſome Days after the Feaſt of Lanthorns; this always happens upon the fifteenth of the firſt Moon.

Extract

Extract of a Chineſe Book, containing a Collection of Stories that they read to Children.

REMOTE as the Chineſe Antiquities are, the Author cannot go much farther back than he does in the beginning of this Work, where he ſpeaks of the Piety of Shun. This Shun recommended himſelf by an abſolute Submiſſion to very rigorous Parents. The Emperor Yau, informed of his Piety, excluded his own Children from the Throne, becauſe he thought they wanted Virtues to deſerve it, in favour of Shun who was a poor Labourer. Examples of Stories read to Children. Example 1.

2. A good Old Man, under the Dynaſty of the Chew, had a Son about 70 Years of Age, who, that he might divert his Father, and baniſh from him the Ideas of his Infirmities, counterfeited the Part of a young Child before him, by putting on a Dreſs of different Colours, and imitating Children in their Plays and Cries, jumping about him, ſtumbling deſignedly, and rolling about on the Ground; being ſatisfied if he could make the old Man laugh, for whom he likewiſe provided all the Neceſſaries of Life. Example 2.

3. Under the ſecond Reign of the Han, a young Child called Whang hyang, having loſt his Mother when he was but 9 Years of Age, had almoſt died of Grief. He however redoubled his Affection for his Father. In the Summer time he, a long time every Day, fann'd the Bolſter and Mattreſs upon which his Father was to lie: And during the Winter he always lay down in the Bed before his Father, that he might warm the Place of the Bed in which his Father was to ſleep. The Mandarin of the Country hearing of the tender Concern of the young Child, was ſo charm'd with it, that he cauſed a public and a laſting Monument of this filial Piety to be erected, to excite Youth to excel therein. Example 3.

4. In the Times of the Emperors Tſin, another Child about 8 Years of Age, whoſe Name was U mwen, gave a yet greater Proof of filial Tenderneſs. His Parents were ſo poor, that they could not even command a Coverlet to defend them in the Summer from the Flies, which at that time are ſo troubleſome in Houſes. The young U mwen ſtript himſelf naked to the Waiſt, and ſtood by the Side of the Bed, expoſing his delicate Skin to the Flies without driving them away: When they are fill'd with my Blood, ſaid he, they will let my Parents be at reſt. To ſuch a Degree did his Affection reach. Example 4.

5. Min ſun loſt his Mother when he was very young. His Father took another Wife, by whom he had 2 Children; Min ſun was every Moment very ſeverely treated by this Step-Mother, but never complained. He one Day fell in a Swoon at the Feet of his Father, who then knew the Cauſe of it, and was going to diſmiſs the unnatural Step-Mother, but Min ſun hindered him. My Father, ſaid he, there are 3 Children of us in the Houſe, I am the only one who ſuffers, but if you ſend your Wife away, we muſt all three ſuffer. The Father was touch'd with theſe Words; and the Step-Mother being inform'd of them, became an affectionate Parent to Min ſun. Example 5.

6. We have another Paſſage, by which (to ſpeak in the Chineſe Phraſe) we ſee that Virtue forces the moſt ſavage Hearts to admire and to love it. It has ſome Reſemblance to the Story of Pylades and Oreſtes. Example 6.

Two Brothers, of which one was called Chang hyau, and the other Chang li, omitted nothing that could contribute to their Mother's Subſiſtence. A Famine of Bread happened to afflict the Land. The elder Hyau returning one Day from the Fields, where he had been gathering ſome Roots, unhappily fell into the Hands of certain famiſh'd Robbers, who were ſo inhuman as to kill and eat all they met with. As they were juſt about to give the fatal Blow to Hyau, Gentlemen, ſaid he, weeping, I have left a very aged Mother at home, who is dying of Hunger; allow me to carry to her theſe Roots I have gathered, and I ſwear to you that I will inſtantly return to you, for then I ſhall feel no Unwillingneſs to part with Life. The Barbarians were touched, and permitted him to go upon the Terms he propos'd. When Hyau came home he told what had befallen him. His Brother immediately went ſecretly and delivered himſelf up to the Robbers. He whom you allowed, ſaid he, to go to his Mother's Aſſiſtance is my Brother, and is far above me in Merit, tho', as you ſee, I am plumper than him; therefore kill me inſtead of him. The elder Hyau finding his Brother gone, immediately ſuſpected his Deſign, and ran to the Place of Rendevous: 'Twas I who paſt my Promiſe, ſaid he, and I am come now to fulfil it: Pay no Regard I beg of you to what my Brother ſays. Theſe Men, tho' thirſting for Blood, yet ſtruck with the filial Piety and fraternal Affection of the two young Men, ſent them back without doing any Harm to either the one or the other.

7. The Matron Ly, underſtanding that her Son, ſitting upon his Tribunal, had been ſo far tranſported with Paſſion, as to cauſe a Soldier to be beaten to Death, and that a Mutiny was ſpreading among the Troops for ſo violent an Action: She immediately left her inner Apartment, and repaired to the Place of Audience, where the Sentence had been pronounced and executed. The Mandarin inſtantly riſing in Reſpect, ſhe advanced and placed herſelf in his Seat, commanding him to throw himſelf upon his Knees, and reproaching him for his Cruelty in theſe Terms: What, my Son, ſaid ſhe, has the Emperor entruſted you with Authority Example 7.

only to abuſe it, as you do? Then turning towards the Executioners of Juſtice, Let my Son be ſtript, and let his Shoulders be beaten; in right of a Mother I command this Puniſhment to be inflicted. The Subaltern Officers immediately threw themſelves at her Feet, and begged for his Pardon. Thus the Authority of a Mother appeaſed the Mutiny of an Army, corrected the haughty and paſſionate Temper of her Son, and preſerved in her Family the diſtinguiſhed Poſt, which he was upon the point of forfeiting by his Imprudence.

Example 8. 8. The Mother of one Wey pe yû was not ſatisfied with barely threatning. For when her Son was grown up to a Man, if he committed any Fault, ſhe applyed the Rod with her own Hand to his Shoulders, which the obedient Son always expoſed to her humbly, and without repining received the Chaſtiſement. One Day, as ſhe was whipping him, he wept, and roared out. Ha, my Son, ſays the Mother, do you begin to complain, and impatiently to ſuffer my Correction? No, my Mother, anſwered he, it is not on that Account I cry: But becauſe, the laſt time you gave me the Chaſtiſement I deſerved, your Blows made me ſmart; but now I ſcarce feel them, and thereby ſee that your Strength is diminiſhed, and that makes me cry out. This ſubmiſſive Anſwer being made public, did a great deal of Honour to Wey pe yû.

Filial Piety in China diſintereſted. REMARK.] It is not the Hopes of ſucceeding to a great Eſtate, that renders the Chineſe ſo ſubmiſſive to their Parents, eſpecially to their Mothers who can make no Teſtament. Beſides, we have a good Proof that this filial Reſpect is rooted in the Heart: Becauſe in China it ſubſiſts even after the Death of their Parents; but in Europe they are ſoon forgot.

Example 9. 9. Under the Reign of the Song, One called Kew hay kang, whoſe Father had been a great Mandarin, in his Youth loved Pleaſures and Diverſion: He ſpent a great deal of his Time in taking the Air on Horſeback, or in hunting with his Hawks and Falcons. His Mother frequently reproved him upon this Score. One Day loſing all Patience, ſhe threw at him the firſt Thing that came into her Hands, and thereby happened to wound him in the Foot: He immediately underſtood how diſpleaſing his Conduct had been to his Mother, and altered his Courſe of Life, applying himſelf to Learning, which afterwards raiſed him to great Employments. After the Death of his Mother, he never either ſaw or touched the Scar of his wound but he was melted, and broke out into Sighs and Sobs, regretting ſo good a Mother, who had the Reformation of his Life, and the Amendment of his Manners, ſo much at Heart.

Example 10. 10. The Reply of Sye chang, who was but 8 Years of Age, was much applauded in a Company of learned Men. His Father led him by the Hand into an Aſſembly of the Literati, where himſelf aſſiſted. The young Child had a grave, ſerious, modeſt Air, far beyond what is common at theſe Years. One Day in a Circle of learned Men where he was, one thought fit to ſay to his Father, Indeed your Son will be another Yen whey. This Yen whey was one of the Diſciples of Confucius, and ſo much eſteemed for his Virtue, that he was look'd upon to be a Diſciple worthy of ſuch a Maſter. Sye chang immediately replied; We do not now-a-days ſee another Confucius, and how can we hope to find another Yen whey?

Example 11. 11. The famous Yang ſyew was of a very mean Extraction: He is repreſented in the Prints of the Books we are talking off, as being ſo poor, that having no Money to pay for Schooling, nor for either Pencils or Paper, by which he could learn to write, his Mother traced the Characters upon the Sand with a Rod, and thereby made him read and copy them.

Example 12. 12. Fan Shun Gin paſs'd whole Nights in Studying, and became by his Application great Mandarin. His Widow, in order to animate her Children to Study, uſed to ſhow them the Teſter of the Bed, on which their Father lay before he became Doctor: Obſerve the Roof of this Bed ſaid ſhe, how it is all black with the Smoak of the Lamp; your Father even abridg'd himſelf of Sleep that he might ſtudy; and thereby raiſed himſelf to be Miniſter of State.

REMARK.] It frequently happens that the Children or the Grand Children of the Mandarins, fall into the primitive Obſcurity and Meanneſs of their Fathers, while others by an obſtinate Application make great Fortunes.

Example 13. 13. Se ma yung, ſo famous in Learning, applyed ſo cloſely to his Studies, that when he was 7 Years of Age, he would forget either to eat or drink, and ſeem'd to be inſenſible of Cold and Heat. At fifteen Years of Age he was Maſter of moſt Books. That he might hinder himſelf from ſleeping, he made uſe of a wooden Cylinder for a Pillow: Whenever he was overpower'd with Sleep, the Book dropt out of his Hand, and his Head repoſed upon the Pillow, which being hard and ſmooth was apt to ſlip, and thereby awaked him with the leaſt Motion it made.

Example 14. 14. Another named Sun kin, who was called the Doctor of the Shut Door, or Pi hu, becauſe he rarely went out, that he might not be ſurpriſed by Sleep on his Studies, hung from the top of the Cieling a Cord, to which he tied his Hair; and thus he reſiſted the Attacks of Sleep.

Another, who was very poor, in the midſt of Winter uſed to read by Moon-light. Another, called Che yng, wrapt ſome Glow-Worms up in a piece of very thin Gauze, and applying the Gauze to the Lines of his Book, he ſtudied part of the Night.

REMARK.] In ſhort, it is not by ſpending a few Years in Books, that a poor Scholar can better his Fortune: His Application muſt be indefatigable. This is well enough expreſs'd by the following Story.

Example 15. 15. Li pe, who, under the Reign of the Han, became one of the firſt Doctors of the Court, addicted himſelf to his Studies from a Child: He came one Year to a general Examination of the Province, in which meeting with bad Succeſs, he deſpair'd of ever obtaining the Degree of Syew tſay.

He

He therefore reſolved to give up Learning, and to turn his Views to another Object. While he ruminated on this, he met with an old Woman, who was rubbing an Iron Peſtle to and fro upon a Whetſtone. What do you pretend to do with that Peſtle? ſaid he to her. I want, anſwered ſhe, to grind it down till it becomes ſo ſharp as to be fit for embroidering. Li pe begun then to reflect, and to conceive this Myſtery: And inſtead of holding on his Way to his Houſe, he returned to his ancient Place of Study; to which applying himſelf with new Ardour, he at laſt arrived to great Employments.

REMARK.] The Author, from whom the above Examples of filial Piety and Application to Study are extracted, ends this Book by relating Paſſages of Hiſtory upon the different Virtues proper to a Man of Honour. Some are as follow:

16. Under the Reign of the Song, a Philoſopher called Fan chun ſhwen ſaid to his Diſciples: All my Science is comprehended in underſtanding and practiſing theſe two Words, Uprightneſs, Sweetneſs; and yet I ſee that a great deal ſtill remains for me to learn and practiſe. There are, few, added he, however dull they naturally are, who don't ſhew abundance of Wit whenever they blame others. In the ſame manner, the moſt underſtanding, when they would excuſe their own Faults, betray a great deal of Ignorance. We muſt, in order to act well, reproach ourſelves for our Faults with the ſame Diſpoſitions of Heart we ſhow when we reproach others, and to pardon the Failings of others in the ſame manner as we pardon our own. By conſtantly obſerving this Conduct, we ſhall arrive at a high Degree of Wiſdom and Virtue. Example 16.

17. In the Times of the Song, there was another Sage Mandarin whoſe Name was Fan, but his Surname Chung yen. He had no Attachment to Riches: His Pleaſure was to ſhare them with the Poor, eſpecially thoſe of his own Kindred, which was very numerous. That he might render his Favours to them more laſting, he purchaſed large Eſtates, whoſe Revenues were to be for ever employed in the Subſiſtence of the Poor, but thoſe of his own Family preferably to others. Beſides, he would not allow his Steward to enquire whether the Relations were remotely or nearly allied to him. All we Fan, ſaid he, who are in the Provinces of Kyang nan and Kyang ſi, are deſcended from the firſt Fan who ſettled in theſe Parts; we are all one Family. For an hundred Years paſt I am the only one who have made a Fortune, that is to ſay, our Fathers for an hundred Years paſt have heap'd up nothing but Virtues. The Fruits of the Virtues of ſo many particular Perſons begin to diſcover themſelves in one, and I have been raiſed to Employments. If I and my Children ſhall pretend to ingroſs my Riches, without ſharing them with our poor Relations, with what Face after my Death can I appear before my Anceſtors? And at preſent ſhould I not bluſh to enter into the Tſe tang of my Family? that is, the Hall or the Place where the Pictures of Anceſtors are preſerved. Example 17.

18. Under the Dynaſty of the Tang, who reign'd about the Commencement of the Chriſtian Æra, Kung y was famous in one Reſpect; he ſaw his Deſcendants even to the ninth Generation, compoſing as it were but one Family, all in perfect Harmony and Union. The Emperor Kau tſong wanted to ſee this Miracle, and as he was going to Tay chang honoured the Houſe of Kung y with his Preſence. He called for the good old Man, and aſked him by what means he preſerved Peace and Union among ſo many Children and Grand-Children, Cung y ordered Paper, Pencil and Ink to be brought him, and he wrote down above a hundred times the Letter Giu, which ſignifies, Patience. He then preſented his Paper to the Emperor; thereby ſignifying that the Diviſions of Families proceeded from the Uneaſineſs entertained, when one ſaw another better provided for, better cloath'd, treated, careſs'd, attended, honoured, or more happy and eaſy than himſelf. But Patience, if you know how to inſpire and to uſe it, prevents theſe Diſorders, and eſtabliſhes Peace and Harmony. Example 18.

19. The ſame Thing was ſeen in the Family of Li wen ching, under the Song. This Family had more than 300 Perſons, Sons, Grandſons, and Great-Grandſons, living at once in the ſame Houſe, and eating at the ſame Table, and ſubſiſting in common upon the Eſtate and Fortune of the Family. Thoſe of it that were Mandarins, ſent all the Superfluity of their Eſtates to be depoſited in the common Stock, which ſupplied the Neceſſities of the whole Family. Example 19.

20. Whang wen, when he was old, was advanced to the higheſt Employments. Every time that he receiv'd his Salary he threw his Eyes to the Ground with a Sigh; then turning to his Domeſtics, This Money, ſaid he, that I receive, is the Subſtance and Blood of poor People, and I regret that I am to live on it. Example 20.

21. Chang chi pe, after he was a great Mandarin, alter'd nothing, neither in his Table nor his Dreſs, nor the Furniture of his Palace; and kept his Domeſtics to a very modeſt Behaviour. You are miſtaken, would his Friends ſay to him, if, by ſhunning Expences, you think to acquire the Reputation of an honeſt Miniſter; for your Frugality will paſs for ſordid Meanneſs. Believe me, my Friends, reply'd he, Fortune is inconſtant; I am in Poſt to-day; to-morrow I may be turn'd out of it. The Tranſition from Want to Plenty is eaſy; but if a Man in this Condition accuſtoms himſelf to Luxury and Merry-making; how ſhocking muſt it be for him to return to his primitive Obſcurity! Our Life is but as it were one Day; let us do our beſt to make it uniform and regular. Example 21.

22. Syu mwey and Yang yu lived in great Friendſhip together, even before they were raiſed to Employments. Syu owed the Beginning of his Fortune to Yang, who loſt his own Poſt: He was reduced a Degree lower, and appointed to go a great way off to a Mandarinate of an inferior Order, which was a wretched Poſt, it was found, that he was but ill look'd on at Court; ſo that he ſaw himſelf abandon'd by all his Friends, and every one dreaded to have any Converſation with him. Syu mwey never abated his Friendſhip for him. When Yang departed, no Body appear'd to bid him Farewel but Syu mwey, who attended him without the City to the firſt Reſting-Place, which was about a League from the Walls; there they parted with great Demonſtrations of Friendſhip. This faithful and intrepid Friendſhip, which, one would think, might have been Syu mwey's Ruin, came to the Ears of the Miniſter, who ſoon after gave him a conſiderable Promotion, without the other's knowing to what he owed his ſudden Riſe. When he thank'd the Miniſter, Sir, ſaid he, I never had the Honour to appear in your Preſence, and yet you load me with Favours. The Miniſter anſwer'd in a few Words: I have given you a Poſt, being perſwaded that one who ſo well anſwers the Services and Friendſhip of Yang, will never fail to anſwer the Favours of his Prince.

Example 23. 23. Ly wen pe, by his Merit and Learning, rais'd himſelf to the firſt Dignities of the Court, to which he introduc'd his Mother. One Day returning from the Palace to his own Houſe, he enter'd the Apartment of his Mother, in his Habit of Ceremony, to enquire about her Health; and finding her placed upon a Stool ſpinning, as ſhe is repreſented in the Prints of the Book; Ha! what, Madam, ſaid he, do you ſpin now that you are become Miſtreſs of the Family of a Grandee in the Court? At theſe Words ſending forth a deep Sigh, ſhe ſaid; Is the Empire then upon its Decline? I ſee that the Government is intruſted to Mandarins, that talk like young and unexperienc'd People, who would inſpire a ſoft and an idle Life. Stay a Moment and hear me: While the Body labours, the Mind is employ'd and collected; and the Underſtanding being intent upon its Duty, the Heart is form'd to Virtue: But without Virtue, it gives itſelf up to the greateſt Irregularities. Do we not ſee that the Inhabitants of a rich Country are never induſtrious; but thoſe who live in a barren poor Country are active, dexterous, and laborious? Did you forget, when you talk'd to me in ſo inadvertent a Manner, that our antient Empreſſes wrought with their own Hands upon Diadems and upon Saſhes for the Uſe of the Princes and Emperors, and that it was the Cuſtom to ſet the Wives of the Mandarins a Taſk to be wrought by their own Hands? I thought you would have been the firſt to put me in mind of theſe antient Examples, and yet you ſay to me, Why do you work? Rather quietly enjoy the Pleaſures of Life, ſince I am now a Grandee of the Court. My Son, this Language makes me tremble for our Family, and dread leſt the Memory of your Father be extinguiſhed in you. Think of this.

Example 24. Caſting of Nativities banter'd. 24. It is told, by way of Jeſt on Caſters of Nativities, that Hong vû, who from a mean Extraction was raiſed to the Throne, cauſed his Empire to be carefully ſearch'd for a Man born in the preciſe Moment, and under the very ſame Aſpect of the Stars, with himſelf; both theſe Circumſtances met in a poor Country-man, who was brought to Court. The Emperor ſurpriz'd to ſee him ſo very poor, underſtood that this honeſt Man ſubſiſted by means of 15 Bee-hives he had. After all, ſaid the Emperor, there is ſome Reſemblance betwixt his Fate and mine: I am Emperor of the 15 Provinces, and have juſt as many Kings depending upon me as he has upon him; for every Bee-hive has its King, and that King furniſhes this Man, his Emperor, with an annual Tribute, upon which he ſubſiſts. The Concluſion however is, That all Caſters of Nativities are Impoſtors.

REMARK.] The moderate Literati, by ſuch Raillery as the foregoing, turn the falſe Sects to Ridicule: The common Literati treat them with Contempt, and even with Abuſe. Let us return to the Author from whom I have extracted what relates to the Method of Study among the Chineſe.

Extract of a Chapter upon the particular Examination of the young Students, who are Syew tſay, or Candidates for that Degree.

THE Governor of the City ſhall from time to time aſſemble the Literati in his Juriſdiction, in order to paſs an Examination, in which he himſelf ſhall preſcribe the Subjects of their Compoſitions. Theſe Aſſemblies and Examinations anſwer two Ends: The firſt is the promoting of Learning by the Regard ſhewn to it; the ſecond is, the conducting the Literati in that Point of Rectitude and Perfection, which ought to be the principal Fruit of their Studies. For in fine, by means of theſe repeated Examinations, they take a Pleaſure in their Duty, eſpecially when they perceive the Mandarins of the Place, whom they look upon as their Fathers, are pleaſed with their Compoſitions, at the ſame time honouring thoſe with their Friendſhip who excel in Genius, and yet more in their good Manners.

As for the Literati only in Name, who for a ſordid and frequently unjuſt Gain, ſpend whole Days in running over the Audiences, inſtead of Studying; ſuch will have reaſon to be aſhamed at the little Progreſs they have made, and this Shame will make them quit theſe unworthy Avocations.

cations. These are the Advantages of Monthly Examinations. But at present this antient Practice is almost lost among the Learned. It is of Consequence to revive it vigorously.

Students how to be treated, when examined.

For this Effect, the Governor of the City must order the Mandarins of the Literati, to name a Day in every Month, when these Assemblies shall be held in the Hall of Lessons, or the Min lun tang (an Apartment in the Building of Confucius) where the Subjects of the Composition are to be prescrib'd, and the Examinants are to labour all that Day under the Eye of the Mandarin; if the College of the City is in possession of a Land Estate, a Collation to be bestowed upon the Literati on the Day of Examination, must be furnished out of the Revenues. At every Table there must be two Dishes of Meat and two of Pulse. Four are to eat at one Table. At the Collation in the Evening, they are to be allowed two little Pots of Wine for every Table. I reflect that the Students at one of these City Examinations, cannot be fewer than some dozens: Thus the Expence of an Assembly will mount to very near two Taëls, and as in the 6*th* Month, by reason of the great Heat, and in the 12*th*, by reason of the great Cold, there is no Academy, all the Expences of a Year for these Entertainments, cannot be less than twenty Taëls. This Sum is not so considerable, but that the Governor of a City may save it out of his Expences. It belongs to him to make public Intimation beforehand, of the Day of the Assembly and Examination, and to give Advice of it to the Mandarin of the Literati; and at the same time invite him to be present. All young Students, capable to compose a piece of Eloquence, are to be admitted to this Examination.

Pieces of Merit, how distinguish'd.

The Composition being ended, and the Pieces read and examined, the different Degrees of their Merit must be fixed: Those who are judged perfect are to be placed out of the common Rank; and to keep up the Emulation, the finest first-rate Pieces are to be pick'd out and engraved upon a Plate and printed, to the end that this commendable Exercise even but of one Day, may not remain without Advantages and Rewards.

Rewards to be bestowed after Examinations.

Moreover, the Mandarin must not fail to bestow particular Praises upon such as join to a fine Genius, a polite and regular Life. If these are already rich, he is to give them some honourable Testimony under his own Hand. If they are poor, he shall join to his Praises a pecuniary Gratuity, whereby they may entertain themselves. This Conduct will cause those who are most negligent to reproach themselves, and be ashamed of their Backwardness. They will animate themselves, and by endeavouring to attain the Perfection of others, they may come to make a great Figure in Learning. I see no way more effectual than this, for promoting Literature; of which the Governors of the Cities will have the Glory; for thus they can plan out and smooth a Way, to conduct, as it were by the Hand, the Students of their District.

REMARK upon the Preceding CHAPTER.

THESE Examinations are call'd particular, to distinguish them from the general ones, which a Mandarin of a City of the second or third Order, holds once a Year; and are succeeded by another, held by a Mandarin of the first Order, upon whom these Cities depend. This double annual Examination is held in one District, that the young Students may be chosen who are admitted to compose that Year before the Mandarin of Letters, who is sent expressly from Court, with power to confer the degree of Syew tsay, or Batchelor, upon a certain Number in every City according to the Extent of its District, or rather the Number of its Students.

The Tau of the City Zhau chew is Governor, or rather Intendant of two other Cities of the first Order; and all his Office, being to judge in important Affairs, when he is most at Leisure he also regularly holds these particular Examinations; and by this he piques himself in imitating the Wisdom of past Ages. Besides, these Tau, or Superintendents of three Cities, as populous as a large Province in France, commonly have no Opportunity of amassing Riches: And if they are not powerfully supported at Court, they have no Chance to better their Fortune but by a strict Virtue. This is a vast motive for a Chinese to make a Shew of Virtue and Public Spirit.

Complaint against the Syew tsay.

A Complaint is made in the former Chapter, and with good reason too, that the Syew tsay are only imployed in attending Audiences and soliciting Causes at the Tribunals. This is all the way of living that most of them have, unless when they receive Favours from the Mandarin, to whose Person they have free Access by reason of their Degree. They afterwards drive a kind of Trade with these Favours among the meaner kind of People. Many of them do not value the Degree of Literati, any farther than it enables them to carry on this Commerce. Mandarins, either of very great Authority, or very great Integrity, are above these Solicitations, and refuse the Visits and Requests of the Graduates. The other Mandarins, either from Weakness or Fear, keep in with them, least they should discover their secret Injustices to their Superior Mandarins. Thus both their Pens and Tongues are dreaded.

Regulations on that Head.

The present Emperor, well aware of the bad Consequences of this Irregularity, applyed the most effectual Remedy to hinder these Graduates from intermeddling in any Affair, or from appearing before the Tribunals but in very important Causes. 1st. They were obliged to have four Persons to appear to their Character and their Conduct. 2d. They could not present any Request even relating to their own Affairs, to the Governor of a Place, unless it was revised and approved of by the Mandarin of the Literati, who, if he conniv'd with them, was sure to lose his Employment.

Foundation of Government; and PERFECT Government is founded upon the wholeſome Cuſtoms introduced in a State. To attain this end, we muſt endeavour to correct the Heart of Man. But by what means? By giving him a true notion of the Doctrines of the Sages. It is not to be imagined, that he is to go very far in ſearch of this Knowledge, or that it is impoſſible, or even difficult, to acquire it. No out of the Way or extraordinary Paths are propoſed, or ſuch, as a Man has Difficulty to enter into, or to tread. All this Doctrine is reduced to the Duties of Prince and Subject; Father and Child; elder and younger Brother; Huſband and Wife, and the reciprocal Tyes betwixt Friend and Friend. Let theſe Obligations be perfectly fulfilled there ſhall be neither Defect nor Exceſs. What more is required? But without Study, one cannot conceive the Reaſon by which theſe Maxims are regulated, and if the Rules are not underſtood, the Virtues can never be practiſed. Beſides, what is underſtood by the Word Reaſon, is properly the Attribute of Tyen [or Heaven]; who as it were ſhares and communicates this Light to Man. In Tyen this is called Reaſon; in Man Virtue or Talents; and the Practice of it is what we call Juſtice.

The Lights of this Reaſon in a great many are obſcured by their Wills, and the Corruption of their Hearts. Reaſon when once 'tis clouded by Self-love, immediately confounds the Virtue of a Man's Heart, which thenceforth loſes its Purity: And the inward Virtue being thus tainted muſt infallibly affect the Practice of all Duties. Thus do we wander from Juſtice; and on that Account the I King, one of our canonical Books, ſays very well, "The Study of a wiſe Man is to grow in Wiſdom, and to add Acquirements to Acquirements, he muſt pant for Inſtruction, and apply himſelf to examine whatever he learns: He loves to impart his Lights to another: But he keeps himſelf as it were within an Apartment from which he never ſtirs: His Science is not barren, and Piety regulates his Conduct."

the Neceſſity of Inſtructions.

In effect, the want of Inſtruction, prevents our growth in Virtue: And if we are not pious we never can be perfect. There is therefore reaſon in what the Text ſays; That we muſt begin with learning, and go to the Bottom of our Leſſons, and thence proceed, as from their Source, the Actions of a Life regulated by Piety. The Order neceſſary to be held is, firſt, to excell, and to be perfectly accurate in the Theory of Wiſdom; then to enter into the Bottom of the Heart, and to take care that all the Virtues there are pure and unmixt: In fine, to regulate all our Behaviour, ſo as no Action nor any Function of our Senſes may be out of order. But in ſhort, it is impoſſible for a Man, tho' poſſeſt of the Inclinations of the Sages, to attain to that ſtate of Perfection and that Wiſdom, I ſpeak of, without a vaſt Application and Labour.

Moral Maxims.

The ſame I king mentions. "Fidelity in the ordinary Virtues, Accuracy in our common Diſcourſe; and a perfect Integrity free from Vanity and Corruption." What do we underſtand by ordinary Virtues: if they are not thoſe which regard Sovereign and Subject; Parents and Children; elder and younger Brothers; Huſbands and Wives; and laſtly Friend and Friend? What common Diſcourſe does our I King ſpeak of, but what regards the ſame Relations? Set aſide theſe Obligations and this Doctrine and there is an end of civil Life, the Practice of Virtue, and the Name of Science. As for the Words of the Text Vanity and Corruption, the true Senſe is as follows: Would you have that Reaſon or Tyen li, which is imparted from Tyen [or Heaven] always to enlighten you with its pureſt Beams? Take Care that no Self-love obſcures it. In the ſame manner to perſevere in perfect Integrity, is the ſame thing as to have pure Virtue: But in order to have it ſuch, it muſt be preſerved from all Adulteration, with which our Wills, when maſtered by our Paſſions, would inſenſibly daſh it. This and no other is the true Senſe of this paſſage of the Text.

Let us ſurvey the Maxims and Doctrine of our great Men, ſuch as Yau, Shun, Yu, Tang, Ven vang, Chew kong, Kong tſë, [or Confucius,] and we ſhall ſee that they are all of my opinion in this Point.

The Emp. Yau's Charge to his Son.

Yau, devolving the Empire upon Shun, Above all things, ſaid he, keep in the juſt Mean: This juſt Mean conſiſts in running into no Exceſs of any kind. Shun, when he left the Government to Yu, gave him this excellent Leſſon: The ground of Man's Heart is ſubject to a thouſand Dangers and Errors. The center of Truth is a point almoſt imperceptible; apply in good earneſt to the Practice of this Maxim; preſerve a juſt Mean in all things. By the Heart of Man is underſtood his Inclination and Affection for ſenſible Objects; and by the center of Truth, the Integrity of Mind. The attention that Shun requires is a rigorous Examination of the moſt ſecret Thoughts. When we make ourſelves Maſters of this Point, we attain to Integrity; and when once we poſſeſs that, we never allow it to be affected with any intereſted Views, which regard the ſenſible Objects that awake the Paſſions.

On

On this Account the Text ſays, " the Center of Reaſon, which ought to guide us by its Rays, is delicate and ſubtile." If a Man has once learned to ſurmount the Dangers of his Heart and Self-love, he is then in a condition to keep a juſt Mean in his Actions; without leaning either to the one Hand or the other: And thus he will be Faultleſs and Perfect: Shun in reporting this great Leſſon which he had received from Yau; Keep a Mean; teaches likewiſe how this high point of Perfection may be attained. The juſt Mean, a Point of Perfection.

REMARK.] The Author then explains the Maxims of other great Men: He ſhews eſpecially that in the main they are all the ſame, and reduceable to what he had advanced in the beginning of his Diſcourſe, which is too long to give entire: What is already Tranſlated, may afford the Reader an Idea of the Relation betwixt the Philoſophy of the Chineſe, and that of the Greeks and Romans. That we may more clearly comprehend this, it were to be wiſh'd that we could do Juſtice in our Language to the Beauties of the Chineſe Stile, which is lively, conciſe, and ſublime in all its Compoſitions. All we have Tranſlated here is contained in 23 Lines, each Line conſiſting only of 22 Characters, which, taken ſeverally, preſents to a Chineſe Eye, a Metaphor very animated, but too bold for our Expreſſion. Surprizing Conciſeneſs of the Chineſe Language.

A Tranſlation of a Chapter containing a Plan and Regulations for an Academy, or a Society of learned Men.

WHAT is propoſed in the Deſign of an Academy is to inſtruct Men in the Knowledge of their own Nature, and thus to become the followers of our antient Sages. To attain to this, a Man muſt apply entirely, methodically, and conſtantly, to come to a ſettled and a thorough Knowledge of things, and not take up with empty Appearances, or be ſatisfied with the Reputation and the Honours of a learned Man. I have thoroughly examin'd antient Regulations of Academies of this kind; and obſerve there are three that have been eminent; to which, we may add one of a modern Date. I ſhall here collect all the Regulations that appear to me of greateſt Conſequence. This Labour of mine will ſave the trouble of turning over a great many Books, through which theſe Regulations are diſperſed. The Mandarins, my Colleagues, profiting by my Collection, may have the Glory of eſtabliſhing in their ſeveral Diſtricts theſe admirable Regulations, and of engaging wiſe and knowing Perſons in ſo excellent a Project. Theſe Academies may one Day furniſh Perſons of the greateſt Merit, and notwithſtanding my own Inſufficiency, I flatter myſelf that I have not a little contributed to this already; and I reflect with Pleaſure, that the Profeſſors, educated in theſe Societies, may inſenſibly introduce a Reformation of Manners into all degrees of Men. How raviſhing is this Thought to me! And it is with the moſt profound Veneration that I here communicate theſe different Regulations, I have extracted from the Writings of our wiſe Maſters; every one may pick out of the Collection which I here give, what he judges moſt agreeable to the Plan I propoſe. I ſhall reduce theſe Regulations to the Number of twelve. The End. and Plan of an Academy; with the

1. The Qualifications neceſſary to an Admiſſion unto this Academy, are an Eſteem and Zeal for the true Doctrine *. In order to attain to Knowledge and Virtue, a Man muſt have a high Idea of the Doctrine of our Sages, and apply all his Studies to tread in their Footſteps, their Works tending all to influence a right Practice. The Virtue of the Academics ought to ennoble the Place where they meet. Thus the Heads of the Academy muſt admit none into their Body, but ſuch as have a Zeal and Ardor to be accompliſhed Literati, and to become the faithful Tranſcripts of the Maſters who have gone before, and ſhining Examples to the Students who ſhall follow after them. Whoever ſhall be convicted of ſpeaking favourably of the Sects of Fo or Lau, or ſhall be ſo raſh as to advance that their Doctrine is at the Bottom, the ſame with the Zhu kyau or the Literary Sect; tho' ſuch may make a public Profeſſion of the Doctrine of the Empire, they are always to be looked upon as ſecret Abettors of theſe Hereſies, and conſequently as infected Members, which are to be excluded from this Body. 1ſt Rule and Qualifications of the Members.

REMARK.] The two Sects of Fo and Lau, advance that all things have begun by, and are reſolved into Nothing, or a Vacuum. The Idolatry they likewiſe practiſe towards Fo and Lau, leads the Perſon, who ſearches to the Bottom of their Myſteries, to Atheiſm. Thoſe in China who aſſert, that the Literary Sect, and thoſe of Fo and Lau are the ſame, San kyau y kyau, make an Idol of Confucius, whom they rank with thoſe of Fo and Lau; but theſe Perſons are very rare and in great Deteſtation with the Literati; whenever the Mandarin has notice of any ſuch, he is ſure to puniſh them. The Principles of the Sects Fo and Lau.

2. The ſecond Qualification required in the Members, is a fair Character, and a ſincere Application to all their Duties. The Men of Learning, who in their private Life are perfectly obedient to their Parents, reſpectful to their elder Brothers, reſerved in their Speech, ſincere in their Manners, uniform and regular in their Conduct, ſcrupulouſly attached to the ancient Doctrine, and in ſhort, generally praiſed by their Relations, Friends and Neighbours, are worthy Candidates for Admiſſion into this Body. Second Qualification.

* In Oppoſition to the Hereſies I twan; eſpecially the idolatrous Sects of the Bonzas, and the Tau ſie, which for a long Time have over-run China.

3. Theſe

Third Qualification of the Candidates.

3. Theſe Literati muſt be retired and diſintereſted: All buſtling, intriguing and tumultuous Spirits, ſuch as diſregard the Character of a Man of Honour, ſuch as are always running before the Tribunals, dipping themſelves in a hundred things which are frequently unjuſt; employing or ſuggeſting a thouſand Falſehoods, without knowing how to ſpeak a word of Truth; great Speakers, Blabs, and thoſe whoſe conduct ſo much hurt the Literary Sect, ſuch as want to enter into the Academy only to gain themſelves a Name, and being puffed up with a vain Eloquence, think to domineer over every body elſe: All theſe ſort of People ſhall be excluded from taking Places in the Academy.

The Examination they are to undergo.

4. Thoſe, who are admitted, ought to undergo a ſtrict Examination. When one is a Candidate for that Society, he muſt be preſented by one of the Seniors, who ſhall make him known to the Syndic; and this laſt is to mention him to the Preſident of the Academy, who ſhall make the neceſſary Enquiries about the Truth of the Informations given by the Introducer: If he finds them well ſupported and favourable, he ſhall conſent to his Inrollment. The new Member is then to give in his Name and Surname to the Preſident, who is to appoint the Day of his coming to take Place in the Aſſembly.

How rotten Members are to be cut off.

5. It may happen that the Virtue of ſome may be but ſhort-liv'd, and that they may diſhonour themſelves by failing in the moſt eſſential Duties, and by their Behaviour taint the Body of which they are Members: Whoever then in the Aſſemblies ſhall ſet the Statutes at nought; whoever, without Doors are Vain, Proud, Diſſolute, Railers, Cheats, in one word, all who make the falſe Maxims of the Age the Rules of their Conduct: The Members of the Academy are to hold a Council upon ſuch Brethren, to expunge their Names, and for ever to exclude them from their Body. Beſides, ſuch of the Academy as were their Introducers and their Sureties muſt be examined; that the Members may by theſe means ſee what Weight their Teſtimonies ought to have in time to come.

Of the Building for the Academy.

6. The Mandarin is to chuſe a large ſpot of Ground of a wholeſom and agreeable Situation, on which the Houſe of the Academy is to ſtand. Then the Materials for the Building are to be got together, and according to the Funds they have, the Plan of the Building to be more or leſs magnificent. The Picture of Confucius ſhall be placed in the Chong Tang, or Middle Hall, which is next to that of the Aſſemblies: After which ſhall follow a Court, and the Hew tang, or third Hall, which ſhall ſerve as a refreſhing Place, and the common Eating-Room of the Members. As to the Expences of their Entertainment, it ſhall either be generouſly defray'd by the Rich and the diſtinguiſhed Members, or every one ſhall defray them in his turn; or rather they ſhall all join together to raiſe a ſmall ſtock of Money, wherewith they may purchaſe ſome Lands adjoining to the Academy: By this means, nothing will be wanting to the Eſtabliſhment, and it may ſubſiſt for a long time.

Of its Government.

7. As to the Government of the Academy, what occurs to me as moſt proper to give it a Luſtre is this: When all the Members of the Aſſembly are met together for the firſt time, the Mandarin of the City ſhall repair in Perſon, and in State, to the Place appointed for their Meeting, with a Billet of Viſit, and his Preſents of Silks. When he is upon the Threſhold, he muſt invite the Members to enter in a very civil manner; then the Perſon moſt diſtinguiſhed by his Merit ſhall be elected, and eſtabliſhed Whey tſun, that is, Preſident or Head of this Learned Society: The Whey chang, or Syndic, who ought to be an elderly and a polite Man, ſhall be next in Authority to the Preſident. This laſt ſhall have under him, as Aſſeſſors in his Employment, two Perſons equally active and able, but not ſo old as the Syndic: Theſe ſhall be called Whey ching. The Syndic ſhall likewiſe have two Aſſiſtants who muſt be healthy middle aged Men; and above all things their Capacities muſt be proportioned to their Employments: Their Title ſhall be Whey tſan; and their Office, to receive with Civility, ſuch Strangers as ſhall come to the Academy. The Aſſeſſors of the Preſident and the Syndic ought to act in Concert, as to what relates to the Affairs of the Society: Laſtly, two young, intelligent, active, wiſe, and induſtrious Perſons ſhall be choſen: Their Title ſhall be * Whey tang; and their Office, to carry Meſſages and Orders, and to execute abroad the ſeveral Commiſſions of the Aſſembly.

Days of Aſſembling.

8. Two Aſſemblies muſt be held every Month, and the Day of Meeting appointed beforehand. The Members are all to meet at the ordinary Place, where they are to hear a Diſcourſe delivered. This Exerciſe is to begin about ten o'Clock in the Forenoon, and to laſt till four in the Afternoon, when they ſhall break up.

Ranks of the Members determin'd by Seniority.

9. The Members who aſſiſt at the Aſſemblies, are to take their Places in the Hall according to their Seniority. But the firſt Seats muſt be aſſigned to the Strangers, who honour the Academy with their Preſence. As to the Members themſelves, their Seniority muſt determine their Ranks, and no Regard is to be paid either to their Nobility, Riches, or their other Prerogatives as Members. A conſiderable Advantage will accrue from this Regulation, which is, that it will prevent any from being preſented as Candidates, who are haughty, proud, intoxicated with their own Merit, full of themſelves, and conſequently, far from being willing to apply themſelves earneſtly and with a docile Heart to the Search of Truth.

10. The Subject to be treated of in the following, muſt be ſettled in every preceding, Aſſembly. The Preſident is to propoſe three ſeveral Subjects upon which they are to compoſe. The firſt, is to concern the Claſſic Books: The ſecond, upon the Nature and Heart of Man and upon Hiſtory: The laſt Subject ſhall be upon Ceremonies, Eloquence, and good Government. Theſe Subjects being fixed by the Preſident, he ſhall confer with the Syndic and other Officers, in order to eſtabliſh the Fundamental Point of Doctrine upon every Subject. Five Days immediately before before the Day of general Meeting of the Assembly, he shall communicate the Result of their Conferences to all their Members. This Precaution will put them in a condition to go to the bottom of the Subject, and to handle it knowingly and distinctly: When they arrive at the Hall they shall confer together, and propose their Difficulties to one another; and this is the Way to advance and profit in Science.

Openness of Heart necessary.

11. Great openness of Heart must be used in carefully remarking, and faithfully communicating their different Views. Wisdom must be sought for only in the Heart of Man, it is there she resides, discovering and proving herself by her Actions. It would be right for the Members candidly to communicate to each other, what they have been employed in during every Day betwixt one Assembly and another, and even their Vices, and most secret Sentiments. For this end, they must set every thing down on Paper; and these Memorandums may be called the Journal of what they have learned or done during such and such Days. As to their Actions, they are faithfully to write down the Bad, or Whey qua, in their Journal, as well as the Good, or Whe shen. Afterwards, on the Day of Assembly, when the exercise is over, every one is to pull out his Memoirs and impart them to another, that by this means they may furnish matter for an useful Dissertation. This Examination being continued for some time, their Abilities and Inclinations for good, will encrease, and the Defects both of the Head and Heart will dwindle to almost nothing. This is a Point of the utmost consequence to you, the other Literati, both with respect to your Perfection in the Sciences, or your Acquisition of Virtue, which demands all our Cares and Application. But if ye use any Sophistry to exagerate the Good, or even to conceal the Bad of your Lives, what will these Exercises avail you? One can only learn from such a Practice to become an habitual Rogue. Such People will never improve, and we may conclude from their proceeding, that they will for ever remain in their Ignorance and Imperfections.

Rules of Morality for the Members.

12. The different rules for the Morals of the Members are as follows. 1. As to what relates to those who are of a lower Class, either by their Station or by their Merit; they ought, because of their Meanness, to apply themselves in rooting up all the Pride of their Heart. 2. That they esteem the true (*) Apathy: And that thus they endeavour to disengage and cleanse their Heart from all bad Affections. 3. It is perseverance in Virtue that gives it its true Merit. Let us then banish from our Hearts all Indolence. 4. Free-will is peculiar to Man; consequently, let us banish all Transports, all Impetuosity, and over Eagerness. 5. Peace and Tranquillity of Mind is a great Jewel; let us not then suffer our Minds to waver and to rove. 6. Uprightness is the Soul of Conversation, and Commerce: That we may attain to this, we must be upon our Guard against Trick and Artifice. 7. The Soul must be elevated and consequently impartial. 8. The desires of the Heart must be moderated; then let us combat our Concupiscence. 9. Our Expences ought to be regulated, therefore we should use no Ostentation. 10. As a peaceable Temper is the Beauty of our natural Dispositions: The opposite Vice, which we ought to cut off, is Anger. 11. Man is chiefly made for Society: He therefore ought totally to exclude all Envy. 12. It is the Property of Science always to endeavour after Improvement; therefore let us look upon a Heart, which is easily bounded and limited, as an Evil.

Necessity of exhibiting the Subjects to be treated of.

These are the twelve moral Rules which include Perfection. I add, that when the Subjects, of which they are to treat in the Assembly, are proposed five Days before; they ought to be exhibited upon a varnished Tablet, hung up in the Hall of Conferences. In the mean time, Advice must be given to the Literati, and to the Graduates without Doors, even tho' they are at some Distance: In order that being instructed in the Subjects, they may prepare themselves, if they design to assist at the Assembly; and thereby be riper to judge of what is said, and readier to propose their own Opinions upon the Subjects in question.

Of the Chinese Literature.

Learning preferr'd to Arms in China.

AS Letters are more esteemed all over the Empire than Arms, and as the first Dignities in the Body Politic are only bestowed upon learned Persons; Science has been always cultivated in China, but we dare not affirm, with Success; at least, if we may judge by their Books, and the Qualifications of their learned Men; which may proceed from the small regard had to reward such as excel in abstracted Sciences, and perhaps from the length of Time requir'd, to attain to a competent Knowledge of the Language, whose Figures and Characters are almost infinite; they being as different, as the Terms and Names of the Things to be expres't.

Division of their Sciences.

Their Sciences may be reduced to six principal ones, namely, the Knowledge of their Language which we have already taken notice of; Moral and natural Philosophy; the Mathematics; especially Astronomy; Medicine; History; and Poetry.

The profound and almost uninterrupted Peace which they have enjoyed, and the little commerce which they have with other Nations, from whom they are precluded by expres's Prohibitions from going out of the Empire, and from admitting any Stranger into it, have attached them so much to these Studies and Arts, that contribute to the Conveniencies of Life.

* The Apathy of the Bonzas, which extends to every Thing, is condemn'd.

The Sciences most valued in China.

The Sciences most ſought after among the Chineſe, are, the perfect Knowledge of their Language, Laws, Hiſtory, and moral Philoſophy, becauſe theſe are the means of attaining to the higheſt Poſts: None can be received as a Doctor without underſtanding the Language; and being able to form their Characters perfectly well, and to compoſe an elegant Diſcourſe upon the principal Maxims of their Morality and Government, which are always extracted from the Books they call Canonical.

The Mathematics their moſt antient Study.

Theſe Books have given occaſion to an infinite Number of Commentaries, which imploy them for many Years, in order to improve them in the knowledge of Politics and Morality: This laſt is indeed the Science moſt proper for Man, as it directly regards his Conduct, and the means of rendering him perfect, according to his State and Condition in Life.

It appears that, ſince the foundation of their Empire, the Chineſe have applied to the Study of Mathematics, and particularly of Aſtronomy; and that ſkilful Perſons have at all times been maintained by their Emperors, for making Obſervations and calculating Eclipſes, and have always been puniſhed and rewarded according to their different Succeſs. In after times, Superſtition increaſed their Application to this Study; moſt of them being perſuaded that Events depended upon the Aſpect of the heavenly Bodies, and that there are happy and unhappy Times, and that it is of Importance to every one to obſerve the Variation and the Difference of theſe Times, to determine the Junctures proper for undertaking Voyages, Treaties, Negotiations and Marriages, for waiting upon Governors and Emperors, in order to obtain Favours; and for many other Things. Every Year a Calendar is publiſhed at the Emperor's Expence, in which, the ſubaltern Officers of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, that they may raiſe its Price, never fail to inſert the lucky and unlucky Days diſtinguiſhed according to the Principles of their judicial Aſtrology.

The State of Medicine among them

Neceſſity having introduced Medicine into China as into other Nations, they have a great Number of Treatiſes upon that Subject; but what they are moſt remarkable for, is, their Knowledge of the Pulſe, by which they can diſtinguiſh Diſeaſes and their proper Cures.

of Hiſtory,

As to what concerns their Hiſtory and Poetry, the one ſerving only for Curioſity, and the other for Diverſion; few Perſons apply themſelves to either of theſe, becauſe it is not by them that a Man can riſe, and make his fortune. However, their Hiſtory and their Annals are almoſt as ancient as the Times immediately ſucceeding the Deluge, and they have been continued to the preſent Times, by different, but moſtly contemporary, Authors.

and Poetry.

With reſpect to their Poetry, beſides their ancient Books, ſome of which are in Verſe, the Poems of Kiu i wen are extremely delicate and ſweet. Under the Dynaſty of the Tang, Li tſau pe and Tû te mwey, did not yield to Anacreon and Horace: In ſhort, in China, as formerly in Europe, the Philoſophers are Poets, and among all their celebrated Writers, Tſeng nan fong is the only one who has not written in Verſe; for which reaſon he is compared to the Flower Hay tang, which would be perfect, were it not inſipid.

The Chineſe Love for Learning.

As the Chineſe have a Spirit and Turn for the Sciences, and as moral Philoſophy is that by which a Man can moſt readily raiſe himſelf, they apply more to it than to any other. There are a great Number of Licentiates and Batchelors all over the Empire, ſometimes upwards of 10,000 in one Province. And the Number of Candidates for Degrees at a moderate Computation, amounts to two Millions: In the Southern Provinces there is ſcarce a Chineſe but can read and write.

Characters of their Authors.

Beſides this, they have a good many Books that treat of natural Philoſophy, where there are very refin'd Reaſonings upon the Nature, Properties and Effects of different Things. The Errors which are found in theſe Works, proceed rather from the ſmall Commerce they have with other Nations, than from any Defect of Penetration in the Authors. This want of Commerce has rendered them very ignorant in Coſmography, for they ſcarce know of any Country beſides their own. Thence proceeded the extravagant Notions that obtained amongſt them, before the Europeans had inſtructed them in the State of the World. It is true that, in their Maps, they exhibited the fifteen Provinces in their due Extent. But as for other Kingdoms, they place them at random round their Empire in very ſmall Spaces without diſtinguiſhing them either by Longitude or by Latitude.

in Coſmography.

Their Authors numerous.

In ſhort, if we except the Europeans, I don't believe there is any People that have publiſhed ſo many Books, as the Chineſe, upon all ſorts of Subjects, upon Agriculture and Botany, upon the liberal, military and mechanical Arts, particular Hiſtories, Philoſophy and Aſtronomy, &c. They have likewiſe Romances, Comedies, Tragedies, Books of Knight-errantry, eloquent Diſcourſes, and a great many other Treatiſes upon miſcellaneous Subjects. Their learned Men having a great deal of Facility and Inclination for compoſing Books; we ſee vaſt Numbers publiſhed by them. The Bonzas have likewiſe their Treatiſes upon the Worſhip of their falſe Divinities, which they take care to ſpread as they ſee occaſion, in order to abuſe the Credulity of the People, and to increaſe their own Revenues.

The five Books ſacred

But nothing is more reſpected by the Chineſe than the five Books which they call U king, or ſo much revered by them both for their Antiquity, and the Excellence of the Doctrine which, they ſay, they contain: Theſe are to them, their ſacred Writings, for which they entertain the moſt profound Veneration. The other Books, which are of the greateſt Authority in the Empire, are only Interpretations.

Eſteem they have for Confucius.

Amongſt the Authors who have wrote beſt upon theſe ancient Originals, Confucius is the moſt Celebrated: And the Chineſe accordingly regard him as the firſt of their Sages; as their Doctor; as their Legiſlature; as their Oracle; and as the Teacher of Emperors and Kings. They give a conſtant Application to the Principles and Maxims that this Philoſopher has delivered, and are collected into four Books upon Ancient Laws, which they look upon as the Rules and Source of perfect Government. The Damage it ſuſtain'd: How repair'd

As we muſt give a ſlight Idea of theſe Books, I ſhall begin with the five Ancient Books, which the Chineſe by way of excellence call the five Volumes. I ſhall afterwards give an Abridgment of the Work of Confucius and his Diſciple Mencius. The preſent State of their Canonical Books,

Of the Books King, or the Chineſe Canonical Books of the firſt Order.

THE Letter King ſignifies a Doctrine, ſublime ſolid, and invariable, becauſe founded upon immoveable Principles. The Books containing this Doctrine are of a ſuperior Order, and have been admired by the Chineſe of all Ages, Sects, and Opinions. As theſe Books are of the firſt Claſs, and of the greateſt Authority; they are the Source of all Science and Morality among the Chineſe. The Canonical Books of the firſt Order.

But theſe precious Monuments of their Antiquities were almoſt all deſtroyed at one Blow, by order of an Emperor named Tſin ſhi whang; about 200 Years after the Death of Confucius, and 200 before the Birth of Chriſt. This Prince, much celebrated by his Valour, and more by the vaſt Wall which he built in order to guard his Dominions from the Irruption of the Tartars, formed a Reſolution of extinguiſhing Science, and of permitting no Books in his Empire, except what he judged abſolutely neceſſary, ſuch as thoſe upon Agriculture, Medicine, &c. He ordered all the reſt to be burnt on pain of Death, and carried his Cruelty ſo far, as to puniſh ſeveral Doctors capitally. almoſt all deſtroy'd.

Some pretend, that this Prince, notwithſtanding this Order, was no Enemy to the Sciences, or even to the Books he ordered to be deſtroyed. They found their Opinion upon his having for his Preceptor Lyu pû wey, of whom they have an excellent Work remaining, who loved Antiquity too well to inſpire his Pupil with a Contempt of it. And beſides that, Ly ſiĕ his Miniſter of State, an underſtanding and polite Perſon, would have been far from giving him any Advice that tended to ruin the Government, and to introduce Ignorance and Barbarity into the Empire.

They think that this Prince was induced to iſſue out this barbarous Decree, from the political View of ſecuring to himſelf the peaceful Poſſeſſion of his Throne. The Students of theſe Days impatient under a Prince, who had a deſign to render himſelf arbitrary, abuſed the Facts, delivered in the Shu king, and were always crying up a Ching tang who expell'd the infamous Kye, and a Vû vang who dethron'd the Tyrant Chew. Thus they blew up the Fire of a Revolt on all Sides. The new Monarch reſolving to chaſtiſe their Inſolence, and judging that nothing was more valuable in an Empire than Peace, deprived theſe Literati of Books, which in ſuch Hands as theirs, create only Diſturbance in a State. The I king as it was leſs intelligible was judged more harmleſs, and therefore eſcaped the common Fate. upon what Pretences. The I king excepted.

Science had then been abſolutely extinct in China, had not many Literati, at the hazard of their own Lives, preſerved theſe dear Monuments from the general Conflagration. Some digged Holes, in the Walls of their Houſes where they buried them, until the Storm ſhould blow over. Others concealed them in the Tombs, thinking them more ſafe there. Zeal of the Chineſe Literati for the Preſervation of Literature, Immediately after the Death of this Prince, Literature revived among the Chineſe, who ſought to repair the great Loſs it had ſuſtained. The Books hid in Tombs and in the holes of Walls were brought to Light, tho' much damaged by the Damps and Worms. But the old Literati having Learned them by Heart in their Youth they found means of ſupplying what was difficult in one Copy by what was legible in another; and applied with the greateſt Care to reſtore them to their genuine State. preſerves it in China.

The Succeſs in ſome meaſure was anſwerable; but they could never entirely make up all the Gaps. Thus there were always ſome Deficiencies which they endeavoured to ſupply, by inſerting Pieces foreign to the Subjects of the Originals. The Literati are agreed as to ſome of theſe Chaſms, but divided as to others; their Criticiſm conſiſting, in thoroughly examining the Doctrine of the Antients, and comparing it with what they believed to be Interpolations.

The I king; the firſt Canonical Book of the firſt Order.

THE Work here treated of is purely Symbolical, being a ſeries of Images of this viſible World, expreſſive of the Properties of Creatures, and the Matter of which all Beings are formed. Fo hi, who was the Inventor of this, is looked upon as the Founder of their Monarchy, but the time in which he began to reign is very unſettled among the Chineſe. He formed to himſelf a particular Method of Hieroglyphicks, which have no relation to Words, but The I king a Symbolical Work. By whom invented.

but are immediate Images of Things and Thoughts, or at leaſt Symbols arbitrary, and of Human Inſtitution, ſubſtituted for theſe Images; and this was the beginning and original Inſtitution of the Chineſe Characters. In ſhort, his Deſign was to point out by ſenſible Signs, the Principles of all Beings, in the ſame Manner as the Lines and Notes of Muſic do the Tone and alteration of the Voice.

This Work is a mere Riddle, it conſiſting only of ſome Lines; that according to the variety of their Situations and Diſpoſitions, form Figures which, by their different Combinations, ſignifies different Things. Fo hi ſeems to have intended to teach his Deſcendents whatever relates to Heaven, to Earth, and to Man. From a Conſideration of the Affinity and admirable Connection among theſe three Beings, he has deſcribed them by eight Figures, each compoſed of three Lines, part intire, and part broken, but in all, producing eight different Combinations. This Number multiplied by it ſelf produces 64 different Figures, which are diſpoſed into different Methods, in order to expreſs in a rude Manner, by theſe different Combinations, the Nature and Properties of every Being, their Motion, their Reſt, their reciprocal Oppoſition, and even the Order and Union which reigns among them. This will be better comprehended by the Delineation which I here give of this ſymbolical Syſtem.

Unriddled by Confucius.

Such is the Table of Figures invented by Fo hi. It is a Labyrinth which exerciſed the ableſt Men in China till the times of Confucius, who decyphered it. The 64 Figures are compoſed each of ſix Lines; the Sum of theſe Lines anſwers to the Days of the Chineſe intercalary Year, which are 384. The Emperor Ven vang, who attempted this Riddle, lived not till 1800 Years after Fo hi; by the different Changes, which he wrought among theſe Lines, he pretended to give an Account of the reciprocal Tranſmutations of the eight firſt Principles. His Son Chew kong went upon the ſame Deſign, and extended his Scheme much beyond his Father's. He conſidered theſe Lines with reſpect to the Connection and Relation which the firſt have with the Middle ones and the laſt. And, according as they were more or leſs perfect, he drew Conſequences, and found out Alluſions; but they give no greater Light into the Subject. Thus, both the one and the other only more perplexed this Ænigma by new Ænigmas equally obſcure. Confucius appeared four hundred Years after, and unriddled not only the myſterious Lines of Fo hi, but the equally dark Interpretations of theſe two Princes; he referred all their Doctrine, partly to the Nature of Beings, eſpecially of the Elements, and their Properties; and partly to Morals, and to the Manner of right Governing Mankind; he therefore applied theſe Figures not only to Natural but to Moral Philoſophy; being perſuaded, that theſe ſymbolical Lines contained Myſteries of great Importance to the Government of States. As ſoon as the Heaven and the Earth were produced, ſaid Confucius, all other material Beings exiſted; after other Beings exiſted, Male and Female were produced; when Male and Female came into the World, Man and Wife followed; then Father and Son. The Relation of Father and Son produced that of Prince and Subject; and theſe, "Subordination and reciprocal Duties. "Heaven is the Emblem of the Perſon and Virtues of a King: And the Earth is the Sym- "bol and Image of Subjects." It may ſuffice to give here an Explication of one of the ſixty four Figures, to ſhew in what manner the Chineſe Interpreters have extracted the Principles of Morality from them.

In what Manner.

His Method of Interpretation.

The more elevated, ſay they, one is above others, the more he ought to be upon his Guard againſt Haughtineſs, Arrogance and Pride; and the more he ought to ſtudy Moderation and Modeſty. This is taught us in the fifteenth Figure, which is as follows:

The Explanation of the 15th of the 64 Figures of Fo hi.

It contains two Figures, the lower is compoſed of one uninterrupted Line, and two interrupted Lines, which denote and ſignify the Mountains. A Mountain is a Symbol of Elevation, but its Root is in the Earth, that is to ſay, Humility. In the ſame manner the Earth deſigned by the three upper Lines which are broken, is the Image and Symbol of a high Virtue joined with Humility, which includes within it immenſe Riches, and only manifeſts its Power, by admirable Fruits and Effects, both ſalutary and uſeful to the Welfare of Mankind.

Fo hi the Author of the Figures.

Thus we ſee, Fo hi was Author of the Figures; Ven vang, and his Son Chew kong, were Authors of the Texts; and Confucius, of the Commentaries upon them: Theſe Commentaries are called Twen and Syang, and are the only ones which Critics and able Interpreters attribute to Confucius. The Diſciples of that Philoſopher affirm, that when their Maſter had finiſhed theſe Commentaries, he was but indifferently ſatisfied with them: And that when he came to be old, he wiſhed to live ſome Years longer, that he might put the laſt Hand to, and new model his Work.

Tho' this Monument be the moſt ancient of all the Canonical Books, if we conſider only its Source and Original, I mean the Figures of Fo hi, yet the Explications of it were made a long time after, and the Interpreters rather deſerv'd the Name of Authors, than of Interpreters; for this Book is full of Obſcurities, and contains a great many Things hard to be underſtood.

In proceſs of Time, this Obſcurity occaſioned a Multitude of Errors and Superſtitions, and the more unintelligible the I king was, the more Myſteries it was thought to contain. Hence the true Doctrine of the Text, which includes excellent Principles of Morality and Politics, was altered, falſified, and interpolated, with abſurd, contradictory, and impious Interpretations: Theſe Monuments of Chineſe Antiquity falling into the Hands of blind Doctors, whoſe Underſtandings were clouded with the Infidelity and Idolatry at that time reigning in the Empire, they wreſted the Senſe to vain Prognoſtics, Divinations, and Magic: And this is the Reaſon why they have been called The Book of Lots.

Theſe Alterations are attributed to a Doctor called King fang, and another of the celebrated Literati, called Chin when. We may add to them another Doctor of an equally diſtinguiſhed Merit, whoſe Name is Tſyau ſhin, who, as an excellent Critic obſerves, taught his Diſciples a Doctrine which he impoſed upon them as one extracted from the I king. The School of Confucius always deteſted theſe empty Explications, by which the Texts are abuſed, in order to form frivolous Predictions, and to eſtabliſh Magic and Divinations.

One

One Thing is certain, that all the Chineſe, and eſpecially the Literati, have the utmoſt Reſpect and Eſteem for this Book. And many ancient and very able Authors, in their Writings, expreſs their Regret for having loſt the ſubſtantial and real Meaning of it, while they retain, to ſpeak properly, but a ſuperficial one. —— The Man, ſay they, who knows the I king, knows every thing.

Eſteem of the Chineſe for this Book.

Before the Empire was founded by Fo hi, according to what is related in their great Chronicle, there were no Characters, of which that Prince could compoſe an I king; as Ven vang, Chew kong and Confucius did, a long time after: Thus when one would ſtudy the I king of Fo hi, it is ſufficient to meditate upon his Tables alone, abſtracted from, and ſtript of all Sorts of Characters, and all phyſical and moral Gloſſes, contenting himſelf with mathematical Axioms, naturally reſulting from the regular Combinations of the Author's Lines: If one would know the Doctrine of the Claſſical Book compoſed by Ven vang, Chew kong and Confucius, he muſt then have leſs regard to the natural Doctrine of the Tables, than to the enigmatical Alluſions, that each of them have annexed to each of theſe Symbols; and ſo judge of the Doctrine of theſe four Philoſophers, by what each has himſelf put down, and not by what others have inſerted in After-ages.

State of Literature in the early Ages in China.

Method of ſtudying the Works of the Commentators.

As then, before Fo hi, Characters were not known, little Cords with ſliding Knots, each of which had a particular Idea and Signification, were uſed in Commerce and Buſineſs. Theſe are repreſented in two Tables, by the Chineſe call'd Ho tû and Lo ſhu. The Invention of Characters was owing firſt to Fo hi, and afterwards to the Emperors Shin nong and Whang ti: When they had invented, one after another, a good Number, they then attempted to make Books.

The firſt Colonies who inhabited Se chwen, had no other Literature beſides ſome arithmetical Sets of Counters made with little knotted Cords, in imitation of a String of round Beads, with which they calculated and made up all their Accompts in Commerce: Theſe they carried about with them, and ſometimes uſed them as Belts for girding in their Cloaths. In ſhort, having no other Characters, they neither knew how to read or write. As for what paſs'd, therefore, in that Time, we have no Accounts of it, either from Annals or any written Tradition.

Original of Books in China.

King Fo hi then was the firſt, according to this Opinion, who by means of his Lines occaſioned the Invention and the Idea of that kind of hieroglyphical Characters, peculiar to the Chineſe. The two ancient Tables of Ho tû and Lo ſhu taught him the Art of Combinations, the firſt Eſſay of which was the drawing up his linear Tables, limiting himſelf to the Rules preſcribed by the Art of arithmetical Combinations, and letting the Tables remain ſtraight, and according to their natural Order. Ven vang firſt put them out of this Order, that he might enigmatically expreſs the terrible Diſorders of the World, turn'd upſide down under the Tyrant Chew.

Fo hi, the firſt Inventor of Characters in China.

It is an ancient, conſtant, and univerſally received Tradition, that Fo hi by this Work rendered himſelf the Father of Science and good Government in China; and that it was from the Idea of the Ho tû and the Lo ſhu that he drew up his linear Table. I here give a Deſcription of them, that I may, if poſſible, render ſo ancient and obſcure a Monument eaſy to be underſtood.

Lo 書洛 shu

Tradition informs us, that theſe ancient Figures called Ho tû and Lo ſhu, from whence we are aſſured that the I king took its riſe, are the Words of the Spirit of Heaven addreſſed to Kings; that the firſt Kings received them from Heaven, and ſpread them all over the Univerſe, that thereby the Mandarins might learn to govern the People well, and the People to reflect upon their Duties. The white Notes ſignify the odd Number, which, among the Chineſe, is the Symbol of what is perfect, as well as this Line ———. The black Notes ſignify the even Number, which is the Symbol of what is imperfect, as is the Line broken and interrupted in this Manner — —. The Ho tû ends at ten, and the Lo ſhu at nine. The Chineſe attribute that which is perfect to Day, Heat, the Sun, Fire, the Heaven, &c. What is imperfect, they attribute to Night, Cold, the Moon, Water, Earth, &c.

The Ho tû and Lo ſhu, according to the Chineſe, have a divine Original.

Their Meaning explain'd.

Altho'

Tho' it is a conſtant Tradition in China, that Fo hi drew up theſe linear Tables from the Idea of the Ho tû and the Lo ſhu; yet to give the greater credit to his Figures, he affirmed, that he ſaw them upon the Back of a Dragon which aroſe from a Lake. This is the ſo much celebrated Dragon that is ſince become the Device of China, and the Ornament for the Habits of the Emperor and the principal Chineſe, with this Difference, that there is none beſides the Emperor who can wear it with five Claws, excepting ſuch as are judged to have a right from the Emperor to wear it; as for inſtance, when he makes any one a Preſent of a Piece of Imperial Silk. If others wear a Dragon with five Claws, they are guilty of acting contrary to the Laws of the Empire, and will certainly be puniſhed.

Original of the celebrated Chineſe Dragon.

But what chiefly contributes to the great Authority of the I king is, in the firſt Place, the univerſally received Opinion, that this Monument eſcaped the general Conflagration of ancient Books under the Emperor Tſin chi whang; whoſe only View was to extinguiſh the Memory of the three firſt Imperial Families, becauſe their great Actions condemned his Conduct. This Remark is made by Kong in ta in his Prolegomena to the I king; is reported by Li ſſi in his Lives of illuſtrious Perſons; obſerved by the Commentators upon ancient Hiſtory, and ſupported by conſtant Tradition.

Reaſons why the I king is in ſo great Veneration with the Chineſe.

In the ſecond Place, what gives the Chineſe a vaſt Veneration for this Book, is, the great Encomiums that have been made upon it in all Ages, by the ableſt and beſt Writers of the Empire; who praiſe it as the moſt Ancient of their Books, becauſe invented by Fo hi, to whom, however, they attribute only the Figures.

Others pretend, that it is filled with moſt excellent Precepts and the wiſeſt Maxims of Government, as may be underſtood by the Explications which Ven vang and Chew kong have given upon every Figure; but becauſe Fo hi, by the Combination of his Lines, was the firſt who taught the method of compoſing Chineſe Characters, they ſay, that his Book is as it were the Root from whence theſe Characters ſprung, and that it is the Principle and Source of all the Sciences: And as his Figures, according to their firſt Inſtitution, denote the Heaven, Earth, Water, Mountains, &c. they affirm that the I king contains the Heaven and the Earth: And that it is not only the Source of the other King, but that it gives a Knowledge of all Things both viſible and inviſible: In ſhort, that to apply to the Study of other Books and neglect that of the King, is to ſeek after the Stream and neglect the Fountain.

The I king the Source of the other King.

Of the Shu king, or the ſecond Canonical Book of the firſt Order.

Meaning of the Word Shang ſhu.

THIS Monument is likewiſe called Shang ſhu, that is to ſay, The Book ſpeaking of ancient Times. It is divided into ſix Parts, whereof the two firſt contain the moſt memorable Events of the Reigns of Yau, Shun, and Yu. Theſe firſt Princes are looked upon as the Legiſlators of the Chineſe Nation. Yau, who reigned near a hundred Years, is celebrated for his great Piety, Juſtice, Clemency, Wiſdom, and the great Care he took to eſtabliſh a right Form of Government in his State.

The Contents of its two firſt Parts.

As in his time, ſay the Chineſe, more Regard was had to Virtue than to any other Quality; this Prince not finding in his Son the Talents neceſſary for good Government, declared upon his Death-bed Shun, one of his Subjects, his Succeſſor, giving him his ſecond Daughter in Marriage.

The Character of Shun.

Shun is praiſed for his Patience, Submiſſion, filial Piety, and the Affection he entertained for his Brother, who was a very vicious Perſon. He imitated Yau in his Choice of a Succeſſor. When he was dying, not judging his Son qualified for wiſely governing the People, he caſt his Eyes upon his Miniſter Yu, who had done him very important Services during the Courſe of his Reign, and had been very aſſiſting to him by his Councils in the Government of his State.

The Inſtitutions of theſe two Princes.

Theſe two Princes appointed the Ceremonies to be obſerv'd in Sacrifices; and divided the Empire into Provinces, whoſe Bounds were determined with regard to the celeſtial Conſtellations: They regulated the Tribute to be payed by the People to the Prince; and made a great number of other Ordinances, very uſeful for the Inſtruction of the Grandees, for the Relief of the People, the Reformation of Manners, and the Tranquillity of the Public.

It was this Yu who, in the time of his Predeceſſor, had the care of recovering ſome Lands of the Empire, which had been overflowed by the Waters of the Sea. In ſhort, theſe three Princes are the Heroes of the Chineſe Nation. The Doctrines taught and practiſed by them raiſed them to the Throne: And the Examples and Precepts left by them, are ſo many Oracles: which the Chineſe hear with Reſpect, and regard as indiſpenſable Laws.

Remarkable Juſtice of the People.

This Emperor, willing to imitate the Examples of his Predeceſſors, deſigned to leave his Crown to one of his Subjects called Ye, who had aſſiſted him to ſupport the Weight of Government; but the People oppoſed this, as being an Injury done to his Son, who was worthy of Empire. His Son accordingly ſucceeded him, and the Crown continued in his Family till the Reign of the Emperor Kye. This Prince's Vices and Cruelties rendering him deteſted by his Subjects, he was the laſt Emperor of this firſt Family, which gave to China ſeventeen Monarchs, who reign'd ſucceſſively for 458 Years.

The Family of Yu extinguiſh'd by the Tyrant Kye.

The third Part of the Shu king contains the Tranſactions under the ſecond Imperial Family, of of which Ching tang is the Head. This Prince took poſſeſſion of the Empire 1776 Years before the Birth of Chriſt. The Emperor Kyé being extremely odious both to the People and to the Grandees, by his Vices and Cruelty, and the Empire being threatned with approaching Ruin, the Princes and Miniſters intreated Ching tang to deliver them from his tyrannical Yoke. Ching tang much againſt his Inclination, yielded to the continual Remonſtrances and Prayers of the People. He declared War againſt the Tyrant Kyé, to whom he gave a total Defeat, and obliged him to go into voluntary Exile to Nan ſhau, where he died three Years after his Defeat.

Who is defeated and dethroned by, Ching tang, whoſe Affection for his Subjects induces him to devote himſelf for their Safety.

This new Emperor diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Piety, and his Love for his Subjects. It was he who after ſeven ſucceſſive Years of general Barrenneſs, which dried up even Rivers and Fountains, and was followed by a Peſtilence and Famine, offered himſelf as a Sacrifice for his People, and begged of Heaven to remove its Anger, and put a ſtop to the public Calamity.

After having faſted for three Days, and ſhaved his Beard as a mark of his Grief, he went into a Chaiſe drawn by white Horſes, which in China is the colour of Mourning: And being followed by all his Court, he repaired to a little Hill called Sang lin. There diveſting himſelf of his royal Robes, and putting on a Lamb's Skin, with his Feet and his Head bare, he looked upon himſelf as the only Cauſe of his People's Calamities, and making a humble Confeſſion of his Faults, he extended his Hands to Heaven, conjuring it to accept of him as a Victim, and willingly offering himſelf to Death for the deliverance of his People. He had ſcarce ended his Prayer when the Skies were over-caſt with Clouds, and all the Fields of the Empire were watered by a general Shower, which was followed by a plentiful Crop. In memory of this Action a kind of Muſick was inſtituted called Ta whe, which ſignifies a ſignal Mercy obtained from Heaven.

An Argument drawn from his Hiſtory in favour of Chriſtianity.

When the Idolaters ſhew any difficulty to believe the Myſteries of the Incarnation and Paſſion of our Saviour, we deſire them to look into this Paſſage of their Hiſtory. "You admire, (we ſay "to them) and you propoſe as a Model to all Princes, the Example of one of your Emperors, "who diveſting himſelf of his Dignity, became the public Victim, and offered himſelf a Sacri- "fice for his Subjects; but how much more ought you to admire the Wiſdom and infinite Love "of J. C. who being cloathed with our Fleſh, made himſelf a real Propitiation to ſatisfy the "Divine Juſtice, and to obtain the Salvation of all Mankind by ſhedding his own Blood." This Argument drawn from their own Hiſtory, is more convincing to them than the moſt ſolid Reaſonings.

Contents of Part the 3d.

A Maſon recommended to an Emperor in a Dream.

This third part of the Shu king contains the wiſe Ordinances of this Emperor, the fine Inſtructions which the Ko lau Tſong whey gave to him and to his Son Tay kya, and the other wholeſome Regulations of a Ko lau named Fû ywe, whom the Emperor Kau tſong, having ſeen his Figure in a Dream, cauſed to be ſearched for every where, and who was at laſt found among a company of Maſons. This Prince made him his prime Miniſter, and appointed great progreſs in Virtue by following the wiſe Counſels of ſo ſingular a Perſon, whom he regarded as a Preſent ſent from Heaven.

The Empire continued in the Family of Ching tang for 600 Years, till the Reign of Chew, who revived all the Tyranny and barbarous Cruelty of the infamous Kyé. So that it is now become proverbial for the Chineſe to call a bad Man, a Kyé, or a Chew, in the ſame manner as we in Europe, when we ſpeak of an infamous and tyrannical Prince, call him a Nero, or a Diocleſian.

Contents of the three laſt Parts.

The three laſt Parts contain the Hiſtory of the Tranſactions under the third Race, whoſe Founder was Vû vang; together with the wiſe Maxims and glorious Actions of the firſt five Princes of that Family, which ſat upon the Throne during 873 Years, and the Reigns of thirty five Emperors, in as flouriſhing a Condition as any other Family ever did.

Account of Vû vang.

Vû vang its Founder, was King of a part of the Province of Shen ſi; he took up Arms againſt the Tyrant Chew, conquered him, and was proclaimed Emperor by the unanimous Voices of both the Grandees and the People. His firſt Care was to pay his Homage to the ſupream Being, to re-eſtabliſh Peace and Tranquillity in the Empire, and to procure Plenty to his Subjects, who had ſo long groaned under the Tyranny of his Predeceſſor: He opened the Priſons, and ſet at liberty all the Priſoners; he carefully enquired after Men of Merit, who had renounced their Employments and Dignities in the late Troubles, to gain repoſe in Obſcurity and a private Station. Theſe he loaded with Honours, and intruſted with his Confidence.

His Love for Merit,

His Royal Liberality extended chiefly to thoſe who had always been diſtinguiſhed by their Wiſdom, their Honour and their Probity, and under him theſe happy Times revived, when Virtue was the ſtep to Dignity and Riches; he took the Virtuous into his Councils and made them his Miniſters. He re-eſtabliſhed the Weights and Meaſures, and brought the Laws and Conſtitutions of the Empire to Perfection: He reſtored the Luſtre of the noble Families who deſcended of Whang ti, one of the Founders of the Chineſe Monarchy, and of Shun, and Yau, and Yu, the firſt Legiſlators of the Empire; all theſe Families Chew endeavoured to extinguiſh by keeping them in Obſcurity.

Wiſdom, Virtue and Juſtice.

Theſe illuſtrious Perſons ſaw themſelves, all of a ſudden, under the Protection of this new Emperor, re-inveſted in their former Dignities, and adorned with additional Titles of Honour. In ſhort, he was very careful to increaſe filial Piety, and to perpetuate the Memory of deceaſed Parents, by enjoining their Children to pay to them after Death the ſame Honours and Duties which they paid them when alive.

Particular Account of Chew-kong.

Next follow the wiſe Precepts of Chew kong the Brother of the Emperor Vû vang, whom Honour, Wiſdom and other Virtues have rendered for ever famous. The Emperor, when he died, intruſted him with the Tutelage of his eldeſt Son, and the Government of the Empire during during his Minority. The Invention of the Needle, or the Mariner's Compaſs, is attributed to him. The Ambaſſadors of Tong king and Kochinchina, when they came to pay their Tribute to the new Emperor, had ſuffered a great many Fatigues in their Paſſage, by their not being acquainted with the Courſe they ought to have held, upon which Chew kong gave them a Mariner's Compaſs, which guided them on their Return, and procured them a happy Voyage.

Who is reckoned the Inventor of the Marriner's Compaſs.

In ſhort, in the Shu king, which among the Chineſe is of very great Authority, we find Vice puniſhed, and Virtue rewarded, together with a great many fine Inſtructions for the good Government of a State, and wiſe Regulations for the public Weal: Alſo the Principles, the Rules and the Models of the Morals of the firſt Heroes, who have governed their Empire, and for whoſe Memory that Nation has always preſerved an extraordinary Regard. We ſhall give ſome Extracts of this Book, which P. Premare, an ancient Miſſionary in China, has collected, who aſſures us, that they are tranſlated with all the Exactneſs and Faithfulneſs imaginable.

Some Extracts from the Shu king, in a Dialogue upon the Maxims of the antient Kings.

WHEN a King, ſays Yu, knows how difficult it is to be a good King, and when a Subject knows how much it coſts to fulfil all his Duties faithfully; the Government is perfect, and the People make a ſwift Progreſs in the ways of Virtue.

Maxims of Government and Obedience.

That is certain, replied the Emperor, and I love to be diſcourſed with in this manner. Truths, ſo well grounded, ought never to be concealed. Let all wiſe Men be diſtinguiſhed, and not one of them ſuffered to remain in Oblivion; then all the Kingdoms of the World will enjoy a profound Peace. But to reſt entirely upon the Sentiments of wiſe Men, to prefer them to his own; to treat Orphans with Kindneſs; and never to reject the Suit of the Poor, are Perfections only to be found in a very wiſe King. (*)

In effect, ſays Pe i, the Virtues of a wiſe King are of a boundleſs Extent, and of an indefatigable Activity; he acts, he concerts, he penetrates all; in Peace he adorns, and in War ſubdues, all: The auguſt Heaven tenderly loves him, and makes him the Executor of its Decrees; it gives him all that is contain'd within the four Seas, and confirms him Maſter of this lower World.

You may add, ſays Yu, that thoſe who obey him are happy; and that it is a great Unhappineſs to diſpleaſe him: For as the Shadow follows the Body, and the Echo, the Voice, ſo Rewards attend Virtue, and Puniſhments the Crimes.

You reaſon well, replied Pe i, he muſt then watch inceſſantly, and dread Vices that are more ſecret and refined; he muſt carefully avoid ſenſual Pleaſures, and be cautious in uſing even thoſe that are leſs criminal. He muſt conſtantly advance the truely wiſe, and directly expel the worthleſs; doing nothing without Caution, and forming no Deſign but what he can avow to the World; never abandoning Juſtice in Complaiſance to the People, nor the People, to follow his own Views; in one Word, he muſt carefully examine his moſt minute Inclinations, and maturely weigh his ſlighteſt Actions. This is the way to attract the Love and Homage of all the People in the Univerſe.

Ah Prince! anſwer'd Yu, addreſſing himſelf to the Emperor, ah Prince! all this well deſerves our Conſideration. Perfect Government ſprings like a Tree from its Root, and its firſt Principle conſiſts in furniſhing the People plentifully with the Means of Subſiſtence, viz. Water, Fire, Metals, Wood, Land and Grain. Theſe we may call the ſix Magazines from which Plenty proceeds. To regulate the Deſires of the Heart, to promote Commerce, to put a great Value upon every thing that contributes to Life; theſe are the three Points neceſſary to the Union of the People, and to keep them at Eaſe. The Sum of theſe Nine very important Articles have an admirable Connection among themſelves: Order them to be put in Verſe, that the People may ſing nothing elſe. Reform your Subjects, by rewarding Virtue: But prevent them by puniſhing Crimes from relapſing to Vice: Excite them by fine Songs upon theſe nine principal Articles, and nothing ſhall be able to ſhake the foundations of your Empire.

Draw near, Yu, ſaid the Emperor, you are the Man whom I want, and I deſign to appoint you my Succeſſor in the Empire.

Alas! replied Yu, the little Virtue which I have, will bend and ſink beneath that burden: And the People who know me well, will never approve of your Choice. But you have Kau yau: He is truly wiſe, and poſſeſs'd of all neceſſary Qualifications. He has inſpired the Love of Wiſdom into all the People, who feeling its effects, carry him in their inmoſt Heart. Reflect a little; think how much he deſerves, and how little, I. Raiſe him, ſince he appears ſo worthy, and drop me as a uſeleſs Perſon: Virtue alone ought to be your Guide in an Affair of ſo much Conſequence.

Encomium of the wiſe Kau yau.

I know, ſays the Emperor, that Kau yau is very proper to maintain my Laws, I make him the Truſtee of my Juſtice. Learn then, perfectly the five kinds of Puniſhments, in order worthily to maintain the chief Articles of my Laws. Begin always by Inſtruction that you may not be obliged obliged to punish; propose, as your chief Aim, strongly to engage my People to tread in that true Mean where Virtue resides, and by so doing you will fulfil all my Views.

Character of a good Magiſtrate.

(*) Interpreters conjecture that the antient Emperor Yau, is meant here, but there is nothing to authoriſe this opinion in the Text, which mentions only Ti, that is to ſay Maſter, or Sovereign Lord.

Then, says Kau yau, I must be as perfect as you are, I must never run into Excess of any kind; I must be civil to the Grandees, and kind to the People: I must not always treat my Children with Favours, and never with Punishments. I must excuse Faults committed thro' Inadvertence, however great they are; but severely punish the Faults proceeding from Malice, however trifling. I must chastise slightly Crimes that are not well proved; and reward Services of doubtful Importance, rather above, than below, their Value. I must hazard the not executing the Law in all its Rigour, rather than to put one innocent Person to Death. These, great Emperor, are part of the Virtues we admire in you; all your Cares tend only to preserve the Lives of your Subjects: And in this you perfectly answer their Vows: This is sufficient, there is no occasion for a criminal Judge, in order to execute the Laws of so good a King.

Make me, replies the Emperor, like the Person you speak of; learn me to follow your Lessons so well, that my Example may be as an impetuous, yet kindly, Wind, which carries along with it all Hearts; so that real Happiness may be diffused through all the Parts of my Empire †.

When a King is solidly Virtuous, says Kau yau; he thus enters into all the good Counsels that are given him, and always acts in Concert with the wise Ministers he has chosen.

Nothing is so true, says the Emperor; but explain yourself a little more circumstantially.

A good King, replies Kau yau, has no Passion so predominant as to advance more and more in the Study and Practice of Wisdom, so that he puts no Bounds to so useful an Exercise. By this fine Example, he first instructs all his royal Family; this is afterwards communicated to all his Subjects, and in the End, spreads among the most distant People. Of so great Importance it is for a King to be Virtuous! Character of a good Prince.

Yu applauds, and respectfully receives, these Words, which are so full of Wisdom.

All may be reduced to two Points, says Kau yau, To know the Characters of Men, and to render the People happy.

Is that all? (interrupts Yu) Our good King, how perfect soever he is, will find a great deal of Difficulty in this. To know the Characters of People thoroughly, is never to err in the Choice of those we employ. To render a People happy is to load them with Favours, and entirely to gain their Love. When a Prince has so great Qualities as these, what Dread needs he have of such a Wretch as When tew? What difficulty will he find to subdue such a Rebel as Myau? And what harm can a Sycophant and a Hypocrite like Kong kong do him?

Nevertheless, says Kau yau, you may add, that there are Nine Virtues which a Prince ought well to know, in order to make them familiar to him: It is not enough that he has a general Notion, that such a Man has such and such a Virtue: He must moreover know what Proofs that Man has given of his really possessing it. You ask what these Nine Virtues are? Good Government to what reduceable.

* I require, continued Kau yau, a Greatness of Soul, neither haughty nor insensible; a noble Indifference, but without Inactivity; a charming Goodness, but without Indolence or Coarseness; a Genius delicate, but industrious and laborious; a Humanity and Politeness attended with Resolution and Courage; an Uprightness of Mind, which knows how to temper Severity with Mercy; a Understanding that comprehends the greatest, yet neglects not the smallest Matters; a Mind firm, but neither stubborn nor fierce. In short, a Magnanimity and which yields only to Justice: These are the Nine Virtues upon which a Prince ought to regulate himself, that he may distinguish the different Characters of Men: For this is the greatest good Fortune a King can wish for, that he may reward the Virtuous. Nine Virtuess necessary to a Sovereign.

Three at least of these Virtues are required in a Grandee of the Court, to enable him to govern his Family rightly; and a Tributary King must have six, in order to render the State, entrusted to him, happy. But an Emperor ought to possess all the Nine, that he may adapt the Employment of every Man under him to his Capacity and Merit; that the Great and Small may meddle only in their own Affairs, and no Workmen be unseasonably employed. If he is intent upon the five most necessary Things, it will be easy for him to succeed.

A King ought well to understand how to teach his Subjects to imitate him in his Pleasures: Therefore, he is obliged to keep a Watch over himself, lest he should fail in any Point of those numerous Affairs that daily occur to him. The subaltern Officers ought likewise to watch without any Relaxation, reflecting that Heaven devolves its Power upon the King, and that the King intrusts his with them, and that consequently they are in its Place, that whatever they do may be considered as the Work of Heaven ‡. Evil Consequences of a bad Example in a King.

It is Heaven that puts the immutable Laws of Society in order. Draw me up the five Laws and let them be inviolably regarded. It is Heaven who determined the different Duties that are to be observed by Men. Regulate the Five Duties, and let every one conform himself to them, according to his Rank and State: But let them always add a sincere and a cordial Respect, by The Justice and Impartiality of Heaven.

(†) What regards the raising Yu to the Throne is omitted here. But it is agreed, that the Shu king has suffer'd many Alterations; that the half of it is lost; and that what escaped the Flames and the Worms has been patch'd up in the best manner they could. It was therefore thought most natural to place the Advancement of Yu, after he himself had told how he drain'd off the Waters.

(*) It is in such Passages as these, where we see the sublime Brevity of Style in these antient Books. Eighteen Letters convey a clear Idea of these nine Virtues, with the Quality each Virtue ought to have to prevent its degenerating into Vice; and all this in a Manner so lively and so fine, that it must suffer by a Translation into any European Language.

(‡) The antient Commentaries, Ching i, say upon this Place: The Laws, Rites, Rewards and Punishments come all from Heaven. Its Will is to reward the Good, and to chastise the Bad; for nothing but Good or Ill is rewarded or punish'd by Heaven. When it chastises or rewards, neither Great nor Small can escape its Justice.

equally ſhunning Hypocriſy and Pride. It is Heaven which advances the Virtuous; ſo there are different Poſts in the five different Diſtricts of the Empire. Heaven rewards the Guilty; ſo there are five Puniſhments for five different Degrees of Guilt. Oh, how numberleſs are the Cares that good Government requires! Heaven hears and ſees all, but it is by the Voice of the People that it judges of Kings. Heaven is always terrible, but an oppreſt People rouſes it to Vengeance. It chaſtiſes great and ſmall without Diſtinction, but Kings have a thouſand times more to dread than other Men. What I have told you, Sir, is the pureſt Truth, but the main Point is to reduce it to Practice.

The Emperor declar'd with a loud Voice, that he could not wiſh for any thing more true or more juſt than all he had heard. For which reaſon Kau yau reſumed the Diſcourſe, and ſaid with great Modeſty: I know well that my Underſtanding is very limited, but I am conſcious that I have no other View or Deſire but to employ it all in aſſiſting you rightly to govern your Subjects.

The Emperor then turning to Yu; Draw near, ſaid he, and in your turn give me ſome wiſe Counſels.

The good Offices done by Yu to China.

What can I ſay, replies Yu, or what can I add to the Diſcourſe of Kau yau? For my Share, I have only one thing at Heart, which is, to employ myſelf conſtantly without a moment of Relaxation. How can that be, aſks Kau yau? The Waters, replies Yu, if I may ſo ſpeak, roſe to the Heavens, and overflowed the higheſt Mountains, ſo that the People miſerably periſhed. In the midſt of this frightful Deluge mounted upon four different Vehicles (*) I began, with cutting down the Woods, following the Chain of Mountains: After which, Pe i and I taught Men to eat Fleſh. I likewiſe made the great Rivers to run into the four Seas, and the Brooks to diſcharge themſelves into the Rivers. Hew tſi and I next taught Men the uſe of Corn, and the Art of tilling the Ground: I afterwards let them into the Advantages of Commerce; by means of which, all the People had whereon to ſubſiſt, and the Univerſe enjoyed Peace.

You have great Reaſon, interupts Kau yau, to ſay that you give yourſelf no Reſpite; but proceed to diſcourſe upon this fine Subject.

The Happineſs of Man conſiſts in Virtue.

All depends, continued Yu, upon the Care with which a Sovereign watches over his own Perſon. I allow it, ſays the Emperor. Then, anſwers Yu, place your Happineſs in Virtue alone. Beware of the leaſt thing that can diſcompoſe this valuable Happineſs; and above all, ſuffer no Miniſters about you, but ſuch as are of conſummate Integrity and unſhaken Sincerity. Thus, when you command, you will be inſtantly and joyfully obeyed; becauſe you will command nothing, but what the People will ardently wiſh for. Thus, you will find yourſelf loaded with the moſt illuſtrious Bleſſings of (‡) Shang ti, and you will have the Glory to execute his Will in the new Order which he ſhall eſtabliſh.

Behold, ſays the Emperor, a Miniſter who loves me; and I, in return, love a Miniſter who is ſo worthy of Eſteem. Draw near then, Yu, and hear me attentively. (†)

The Praiſe of Yu.

Your Labours to remove the Deluge have touched me. You are faithful, and your Merits are great; you are wiſe in my Eyes, and indefatigable in whatever concerns the public Good; in your private Character, you are modeſt; and notwithſtanding what you have done, you entertain a very humble Opinion of yourſelf: I ſay it again, you are wiſe, and do not boaſt of your Talents; no Perſon can diſpute your Abilities, yet you don't vaunt of your fine Actions; and all muſt yield to you the firſt Rank: I ſeek only after Virtue, and I praiſe only good Works. I entruſt into your Hands the Government of the World: Aſcend my Throne and Reign. Remember there is nothing to fear but one (§) Paſſion, and (‖) right Reaſon is of infinite Delicacy. It muſt be pure, it muſt be ſimple, and always preſerve a juſt Mean. Do not amuſe yourſelf with groundleſs Stories, and never undertake a Deſign without thoroughly weighing it.

Neceſſity of reciprocal Love betwixt the Prince and Subjects.

What is more amiable than a good King? What has he to fear except the People? Whom will the People honour if not their King? But how can he maintain himſelf without the Aſſiſtance of the People? Apply yourſelf then with all your Ability, watch Night and Day in the Duties of your Charge: Surpaſs, if it be poſſible, the Deſires and Expectations of your Subjects: Take particular Care of the Poor and the Miſerable, and by that means your Reign will be eternal. The Order which I have laid before you will give peace to the World: And through you, I will ſubdue all mine Enemies. Obey it, then, and you need ordain no other.

(*) The Chineſe endeavoured to gueſs what theſe Vehicles were. The Text ſays Tſe tſay; it is true, the Letter Tſe ſignifies four; but it is very difficult to explain what the other Letter preſents to the Eyes, it is Kyu, a Chariot, Tſay, of Afflictions, and Sufferings. The Reader is left to judge how ſuch a Machine could aſſiſt Yu in carrying off the Waters.

(‡) It is not, ſays the antient Commentary Ching i, the People alone that reward this Good King, for Shang ti loads him likewiſe with Favours to reward his Virtue.

(†) This is the Paſſage omitted, of which we have taken notice, and which is ſupplied in this Place. This Diſcourſe of the Emperor is in blank and miſcellaneous Verſes; moſt of them being without Rhymes, and ſome of them of unequal Meaſure. If all the Shu king is not in Verſe, a great many Paſſages, like the preſent, are imbroidered with it.

(§) The Text ſays, Jin ſin, that is to ſay, the Heart of Man. This is not properly Paſſion, but it is the Inclination by which we are byaſs'd; and is as it were the inward part of the Mind.

(‖) The Text ſays, Tau ſin that is to ſay, the Heart of Reaſon, tho' it is not properly Reaſon; but the Superior part of the Soul, which enclines to the pureſt and righteſt Reaſon.

The Speech which Chong whey is ſaid to have made to the Emperor Ching tang. (*)

O Prince! what do you ſay? It is the (‡) Tyen which gives life to Men: As they are (†) ſubject to a thouſand different Paſſions; if they had not a Maſter to keep them in their Duty, they could not live in Peace: But Heaven ſends them a very wiſe King, and by means of him, renders them good and happy.

The infamous Kyé, extinguiſhed all the lights of Reaſon; and the poor People fell as it were into a flood of Fire. But Heaven has given you all the Prudence and neceſſary Force to deliver the Univerſe from its Evils. Finiſh what the great Yu ſo well began; follow his Footſteps, and reſpectfully obey the Orders of Heaven. The King of Hya is blameable, becauſe he employed the Name of the moſt High to authoriſe his unjuſt Commands. Heaven has chaſtiſed him and committed the Empire to you, that you may reſtore the World to its primitive Happineſs.

You know that the cruel Kye had likewiſe ſome wiſe Men about his Perſon, but moſt of his Counſellors were as worthleſs as himſelf. In that fatal time, we found ourſelves mingled with all theſe wicked Wretches, like a little good Grain ſow'd in a Field full of Tares. How could we ſhun the dangers that encompaſſed us? there was no Man but trembled for himſelf, and Innocence was a good handle to be ſuſpected. How much then have you, Sir, to dread, who are adorned with ſo many Virtues? Fame proclaims them aloud every where: You are look'd upon as a very wiſe Prince, and far remov'd from all baſe Pleaſures, as being entirely diſintereſted, beſtowing Poſts only upon the moſt Virtuous; and always proportioning the Reward to the Merit. It is well known, that you, with pleaſure, prefer the Opinion of another to your own; and that you attribute to others, all the good you yourſelf do: That you never excuſe, but are always ready to correct, yourſelf. In ſhort, there is ſeen in you a greatneſs of Soul, worthy of the Empire of the World, join'd to a paternal goodneſs and tenderneſs for your People. So many Virtues have gain'd you the Hearts of all. For this Reaſon, the petty King Ko having rejected brutally your Preſents, you was oblig'd to march againſt him; and, by that means, begin your juſt Conqueſts. Was you in the Eaſt? The People of the Weſt impatiently expected you. Was you ſettling peace in the North? The Barbarians of the South ſighed for you; and every one cryed out in a mournful Voice, Why did he not firſt come to our Aſſiſtance. Nothing was heard but People ſaying one to another, Let us wait for our good King; whenever he ſhall appear we ſhall receive new Life. Thus, Sir, you ſee how great the People's Affection was for you.

Maxims of Government

One muſt have no ſcruple to be a King, but he muſt labour to render himſelf a good King. With this View diſtinguiſh the Wiſe, and aſſiſt the Worthy: Load thoſe, whoſe fidelity is approved, with Glory; and aſſiſt thoſe who have only upright Intentions: Set Tutors over ſuch of the petty Kings as are weak: Abridge thoſe of Power who make a bad Uſe of it: Deprive ſuch as break into good order, of their Crown; and thoſe, whoſe Crimes render them unworthy to reign, of their Lives. Thus you will curb the Bad, and guard the Good. And all theſe Kings doing their Duty, you will cauſe Virtue and Peace to reign all over the World.

Advantages of good Conduct in a Prince.

As ſoon as a Sovereign endeavours to make a daily Progreſs in Virtue, all the People will have Hearts only to love him: But if he imagines that he has done enough, he is deſpis'd and abandon'd even by his neareſt Relations. Apply yourſelf with all your Heart to the exerciſes of the greateſt Virtues, that your Subjects may find in you a finiſhed Model. Let Juſtice regulate all your Actions, and the pureſt Reaſon ſerve as a curb upon your Appetites. A good (‖) King leaves Riches enough to his Children, when he leaves them the example of his Virtues: I have always heard it ſaid that it is the part of a King, to look upon others, as being able to teach him ſomewhat; for he who loves to be taught, enriches himſelf. On the contrary, a ſure Method for a Prince to deſtroy himſelf, is to believe that others can do him no Service: For it is a narrow way of thinking, for a Man to believe himſelf ſelf-ſufficient. Endeavour to end as happily as you have begun: Remember that Heaven is juſt; that it elevates the Good, and chaſtiſes the Bad. Follow the Laws exactly, that you may be ſure of eternal Happineſs.

(*) This Ching tang dethron'd the Tyrant Kyé, in whom the Family of the Hya was extinct.

(‡) Heaven.

(†) The ancient Commentary Ching i ſpeaks thus, The Tyen produced Man, and gave him a Body and a Soul. Every Man then has a viſible and material Body: and a ſpiritual intelligent Soul. Man being formed in this Manner, Tyen aſſiſts him. I don't mean ſimply, that Tyen after it had given him a Body and a Soul, gave him ſeveral Laws; but that it likewiſe aſſiſts him in a more particular manner. For Man ſpeaks, thinks, acts, diſtinguiſhes the Good from the Bad, and the Bad from the Good: He ſtands in need of Food and Raiment: Sometimes he is in Plenty, ſometimes in Want, and by Turns in Motion and in Reſt. But to keep himſelf ſtrictly juſt amidſt all theſe, he muſt have the Aſſiſtance of Tyen: For there is within a ſtrait Road, which if he follows he is happy; if he forſakes it unhappy. For which Reaſon Heaven unites itſelf to Man, and conſtantly aſſiſts him to tread in this Path that conducts him to Immortality.

(‖) This Thought is not formally in the Text; but it is the Senſe of all this Harangue, and the Interpreters make uſe of it to connect what goes before with what follows.

Inſtructions which (*) I yun gave to the young Tay kya.

Encomium of Virtue.

HEIR of Ching tang! Do not preſume too much upon the preſent Protection of Heaven, for the continuance of its Favours depends, in ſome meaſure, upon yourſelf. You ought not to reckon that Happineſs is to continue for ever. The conſtant Practice of Virtue can alone ſecure your Crown: But if you abandon Wiſdom, you will infallibly forfeit whatever Heaven has beſtowed upon you.

You have an illuſtrious Example of this in the King Kyé: He deviated from the Path of Virtue to Impiety and Cruelty. The ſupreme Tyen rejected him, and afterwards look'd all over the Earth in ſearch of ſome one, who was worthy to reign inſtead of this unhappy Prince: As ſoon as ſuch a one was found, it determin'd to enlighten and conduct him. But that which Tyen loves and looks for, is a pure and conſtant Virtue. This is what it requires in a new King, whom it deſigns to give to the World.

Ching tang and I only were of that Character. As we were both equally devoted to Virtue, Heaven lov'd us, and carried us in its Heart. For this reaſon, it gave us the Government of the whole World. Having, thus, both Heaven and the People on our Side, we eaſily overthrew the Empire of the Hyá; not that Heaven entertain'd an irregular Affection for us, but ſuch as it entertains for pure and ſolid Virtue. It was not becauſe we caballed for the ſuffrages of the People, but becauſe the People could not reſiſt ſo much Virtue. When one is entirely devoted to Wiſdom, he is always ſucceſsful, always ſatisfied, and always happy: But when one is Virtuous by halves and by ſtarts, he inſtantly proves the Reverſe of this. Happineſs or miſery then depends upon Man himſelf; becauſe the rewards or puniſhments of Heaven depend upon his good or bad Actions.

Heir of Ching tang! The Empire you poſſeſs is but new; let your Virtue be new likewiſe. Endeavour by inceſſantly reforming yourſelf, that there may be no difference between the firſt and the laſt Day of your Reign. Raiſe none to Poſts, but ſuch as have Wiſdom and Talents. But as for your firſt Miniſter, he ought to be a Perſon accompliſhed in all Reſpects; becauſe, it is he who is to render you ſolidly Virtuous, and he is to be the Channel through which your Virtues are to be communicated to all your People. It is hard to find a Man ſo perfect; you therefore are to uſe the utmoſt Pains to enquire after him; to the end that the Miniſter and the King, having the ſame Deſires and the ſame Zeal, they may form, by a ſtrict and intimate union, (‡) one undivided whole.

True Virtue never pins itſelf down to the Opinions of a ſtrange Maſter; ſhe hears no Dictates but thoſe of ſolid Good, which does not always enjoin the ſame thing; in following its Leſſons, you directly act according to the different Circumſtances; but ſtill with a ſtrict attachment to Uniformity, without which, there can be nothing good. Then all the People ſhall cry; "How pure and how perfectly uniform is his Heart? He is worthy of the Empire he has received; and will render his Subjects eternally happy."

The Hiſtory and Converſation of the Emperor Kau tſong and his Miniſter Fu ywe.

THE Emperor anſwers the Grandees by a ſhort Note under his own Hand, in which he tells them. "Ever ſince I ſucceeded to the Empire of the World, I have ſtill feared that I had not all the Virtues requiſite for right Government; for which reaſon, hitherto I have never ventured to give any Order. But my Thoughts being employed during the ſilence of the Night, only upon the Means of worthily diſcharging my Duties; It ſeemed to me the Lord delivered to me, from his own Hand, a faithful Miniſter: This is the extraordinary Man that is to ſpeak to you in my Stead."

Hiſtory of a Miniſter given by Heaven.

The Emperor then cauſes the Picture of the promiſed Miniſter to be drawn, according as he appeared to him, and omitted nothing to make a Diſcovery of him, tho' conceal'd in the moſt remote Corner of the Empire. A Man employed in building a little Grotto at the foot of the Mountain Yen, was found by the Meſſengers, who thought he perfectly reſembled the Picture which they had in their Hands. As ſoon as the Emperor ſaw him he immediately knew

(*) It is pretended that I yun aſſiſted Ching tang to dethrone Kyé. Tay kya is ſuppoſed to be the Son of Ching tang, and it is ſaid that I yun ſhut him up in his Father's Tomb for three Years; But it is certain that in the Body of the Text no mention is made of Tay kya, but of Tſé wang, which only ſignifies, a young Prince in his Minority. Nor can we anſwer for the bold Action imputed to I yun. The Text perhaps only intimates, that I yun ſent the young Prince to be inſtructed at the Burying Place, and upon the Tomb of Ching tang. Whatever Truth is in all this, it is added that this Piece contains the laſt Councils which I yun gave him, when he retired from the Court, to lead a private Life in repoſe and ſolitude.

(‡) This Idea of a good King and a perfect Miniſter forming one undivided Whole, was ſtrongly imprinted upon the Heart of him or them who wrote theſe Books. They alledge as Inſtances of it, Yau and Shun, Shun and Yu, Wú wang and Chew kong. But this does not extend farther.

knew him, and in preſence of all his Court, made him his firſt Miniſter; ſpeaking to him in theſe Terms.

Fail not to adviſe me every Day, and very frequently to reprove me, that thus, you may help me to acquire true Wiſdom. Conſider me as a piece of unhammered Iron, and that you are to ſhape and to poliſh me. Conſider that I am to paſs a broad and a dangerous Torrent; and that you are to ſerve me both for Bark and Oars. Conſider me as a dry parcht piece of Ground, and that you are to be the kindly Shower that is to refreſh, and render it fertile. Open therefore your Heart, and pour into mine all the Riches your's contains. But be ſure not to ſpare me: For if the Medicine is too weak, the Diſeaſe can never be removed. Unite all ye who approach my Perſon, and unanimouſly endeavour to correct me. So that as the worthy Heir of the Virtues of Ching tang, and the Imitator of our ancient Kings, I may be able to make my Subjects happy. Acquit then yourſelf faithfully of the Taſk I impoſe upon you, and never relax in your Endeavours, till I am ſuch a Prince as I ought to be. The Emperor Kau ſong's great Deſire to be reprov'd for his Faults.

Fû ywe anſwers the Emperor thus: As a Piece of Wood becomes ſtraight by following the Line, ſo Kings become Virtuous by following the wiſe Councils that are given them. When a king is Virtuous, his firſt Miniſter is, of himſelf, induced to do his Duty: But if, beſides this, a Prince earneſtly deſires to be adviſed, who will venture to diſobey his glorious Commands? His Miniſter's Anſwer.

A good King is in place of Heaven, and treads the Path that is mark'd out to him. In obedience to its Supreme Will he divides the Empire into different Kingdoms. He eſtabliſhes their Kings in whom he can confide; placing about them able Perſons to aſſiſt them in the Government of their States: Far from minding his own Pleaſures, he thinks himſelf born only to make the World happy: We can ſay of Heaven alone, that it (†) ſees and hears all Things by itſelf, and of good Kings alone, that they endeavour as much as they can in this to imitate Heaven. For which reaſon, their great Officers are always full of Submiſſion and Reſpect: And the People ſecurely taſte the Sweets of Peace.

Shame can only come to Kings by their iſſuing forth unjuſt Orders: And the Rebellions of the People only proceed from their Princes making War upon too ſlight Grounds: Beſtow no Reward but upon Merit. Cloaths had better be locked up in a Cheſt, than given away without any reaſon: Before you puniſh any one, examine yourſelf well. A King who perfectly fulfils theſe four Points, is truly enlightened; and every thing conſpires to render him happy: The Repoſe or the Diſtractions of your Empire, depends upon thoſe whom you place in Poſts. Give not therefore the ſmalleſt Employments away in Complaiſance to a Subject, whom you know is incapable to bear it: And never truſt any thing of Importance to a bad Man, however great his Qualifications may be. Examine ſeriouſly before you act, whether or not the Action you go about, is good in itſelf; and tho' it is good in itſelf, examine if it be proper at ſuch and ſuch a time, and in ſuch and ſuch Circumſtances. The Man who imagines that he has Virtue, poſſeſſes but a very ſmall Degree of it; and he who boaſts of his Ability, loſes all his Merit.

A great Foreſight is requiſite in all things, as being the means of averting Misfortunes. Favours laviſhly diſpoſed beget Contempt, and the Man who does not bluſh to be told of his ſmall Faults, can never be guilty of great ones. All conſiſts in the due Regulation of your Heart, for if that is right your Government will be perfect. As to what concerns the Ceremonies, you are not to neglect outward Pomp, but you muſt not entirely take up with that, becauſe all exterior Appearances muſt proceed from the bottom of the Heart. In this caſe, too much Meanneſs occaſions Contempt, and too much Show, Perplexity: So that both theſe Exceſſes are to be equally avoided.

I am charmed, cries the Emperor, with all that I have heard, and henceforth my only care ſhall be to conform my Life to it. If I had not you to give me wholeſome Advice, I ſhould not know how to demean myſelf ſo as to require Virtue. Inſtance of Docility in an Emperor, Fû ywe reſpectfully knocked the Earth with his Forehead, and reſum'd the Diſcourſe. The Difficulty, ſays he, does not lye in knowing, but in practiſing good. Love Virtue, Sir, you will find nothing more ſweet, and then you will reſemble the ancient Kings your Anceſtors. If I dont continue to ſpeak to you as I have already done, I will be culpable, and unworthy of the Rank to which you have raiſed me. and of Honeſty in a Miniſter.

It is only you, ſays the Emperor, that can furniſh me with ſuch Literati as I would wiſh to have. You know that when Wine (‡) is to be made, they throw Druggs into it, in order to ferment and give

(†) There are two Commentaries upon this Paſſage, and their Words are remarkable. The firſt is called Ye ki, and explains it thus.

Heaven never ſpeaks, yet it commands our Belief: The ſovereign Spirit is always unconcerned, and yet it is to be dreaded. As being ſupremely true it inſpires us with Belief, and as being without Paſſion, it ſtrikes us with Dread. Heaven, becauſe of its Incomprehenſibility, is called Spirit, and the Spirit, becauſe of its Immutability and eternal Duration, is called Heaven. When we ſay, that it enforces our Belief becauſe it is perfectly true, the meaning is, that it poſſeſſes moſt neceſſary and infallible Reaſon. And when it is ſaid that Heaven makes itſelf to be dreaded, becauſe it is impartial; the Meaning is, that it is Juſtice itſelf and none can inſult it, unpuniſhed. In ſhort, it is here ſaid to know every thing, becauſe it is Eternal, Immutable, and Incomprehenſible.

The ſecond Commentary is called Ye kyang, and is that of the late Emperor Kang hi, who explains it in this Manner.

Heaven is above all, and nothing is more beautiful, nothing more juſt. It is moſt ſpiritual and moſt intelligent, and hears all things, tho' it has no Ears: Not only the public Acts of Government, but whatſoever is tranſacted in the moſt retired and the remote Corners of the World lies open to its Eye. It ſees thro' all, it penetrates all, it examines all. This is the Model which a good King ſhould propoſe: neither his love nor his hatred is influenced by Caprice. In his Rewards he only has regard to right Reaſon. And thus it may, in ſome ſenſe be ſaid of him, that, like Heaven, he hears and ſees every thing.

(‡) The Chineſe Wine or rather Beer, is made of a particular Kind of Rice. When it is almoſt boil'd, they muſt put certain Druggs into it to make it ferment.

give it Strength; your Councils have the like Effect upon me, they raiſe me, they give me a Courage, which I ſhould not have, were it not for you. When a Soup (†) is prepar'd, you know they take care to put Ingredients into it, to hinder it from becoming inſipid. Your Leſſons have the ſame effect upon me, they ſeaſon my Virtue. Labour then with me in teaching me to know myſelf, and be aſſured, that I have nothing in the World more at Heart, than to do whatever you deſire me.

To be willing to be inſtructed, replies Fi ywe, is a very good Symptom, and ſhews that you have a real deſire to do Good; tho' you never can attain to what you ſo earneſtly wiſh for, but by following the Maxims of our ancient Kings. If a Prince can immortaliſe himſelf by any other way, it is a way to which I am yet a Stranger.

In what the Study of Wiſdom conſiſts.

The Study of Wiſdom conſiſts, in a Man's being humble, (‡) as if he were incapable of any thing, but at the ſame time as (A) active, as if he had done nothing, and yet could do every thing. By theſe means, one will ſhun the two great Failings of Indolence and Pride. When a Man is free from theſe, his advancement in the Ways of true Wiſdom is eaſy and quick. Believe me, Sir, if you put this in Practice you will ſoon prove its Effects. When a Man inſtructs the Ignorant, he at the ſame time improves himſelf; and when he is conſtantly employed in both the one and the other, that is, both as Maſter and Scholar, he at the ſame time grows in Wiſdom, almoſt imperceptibly. But that you, Sir, may not be miſlead in this, you muſt always take the ancient Kings for your Model.

The Shi king; or, Third Canonical Book of the firſt Order.

THE Character Shi, ſignifies Verſe, becauſe in effect, all this Book contains only Odes, Songs, and Verſes, compoſed under the reign of the third Race, where we ſee the Manners, the Cuſtoms, and the Maxims of the petty Kings, who were ſubordinate to the Emperor, deſcribed. Some have only three Strophes, or Stanzas, which preſent the ſame Thought, in three Lights very little different, except, that each Stanza ſeems to improve upon the preceding: The others appear to be in a more noble and ſublime Stile. The number of Stanzas is not confin'd, but every Stanza conſiſts commonly of ten Lines.

The Chineſe Interpreters are not very happy in decyphering theſe Verſes; for they have made a Syſtem of them which is contradictory to itſelf, and beſides, does not a great deal of Honour to theſe precious Remains of ſo remote Antiquity: Great Praiſes are there beſtowed upon Virtue, and many wiſe Maxims are found amongſt them; ſo that Confucius gives them great Encomiums, and aſſures us, that their Doctrine is very pure and very holy: From whence ſome Interpreters ſuſpect, that this Work has ſuffered by being interpolated with many bad Pieces; for there are ſome of them extravagant and impious, and looked upon as Apocryphal; however, theſe Verſes are of great Authority in the Empire. Their Stile is very obſcure; this doubtleſs proceeds from the Laconiſm, the Metaphors, and the great Numbers of ancient Proverbs, with which the Work is ſtuffed. But this very Obſcurity procures them the Eſteem and Veneration of their wiſe Men.

Diviſion of this Work.

Theſe Pieces of Poetry may be divided into five different kinds.

The firſt contains the Encomiums of Men, illuſtrious by their Capacities and Virtues; with many Inſtructions which were uſed to be ſung in the Solemnities, Sacrifices, Obſequies, and Ceremonies, inſtituted in honour of Anceſtors.

The ſecond contains the Cuſtoms eſtabliſhed in the Empire, and are, as it were, Romances, compoſed by private Perſons, not ſung, but recited, before the Emperor and his Miniſters. We find there a natural Picture of their Cuſtoms, and the Defects, both of the People and the Princes their Governors, are cenſured.

The third is called Compariſon, becauſe all its Meaning is explained by Similes and Compariſons

The Manner of the fourth riſes to the Sublime, becauſe the Odes commonly begin with certain bold Strokes of the Marvellous, which prepare the Mind of the Reader to be attentive to what follows.

The fifth contains the Verſes that are ſuſpected, and were reckoned by Confucius to be Apocryphal. That I may give the Reader ſome Idea of this Work, I preſent him with ſome Odes which P. Premare has faithfully tranſlated.

(†) The Text ſays Yen mwey, Yen ſignifies Salt, and Mwey a Sort of Fruit which gives it a reliſh.

(‡) This is not the only paſſage wherein Humility is recommended, for this fundamental Virtue is extolled in many Places of theſe ancient Books; and it is ordinary enough to meet with Leſſons of Humility among the Chineſe Philoſophers, but pretty rare among thoſe of Greece and Rome.

(A) The Character of Ceſar is drawn by Lucan almoſt in the ſame Words:

Nil actum putat dum quid ſupereſſet agendum.

Select ODES from the Shi king.

ODE I.

A young King desires Instruction from his Ministers.

I Know that a Man ought always to watch over himself; and that Heaven has an Intelligence which nothing can escape, and whose Decrees are irreversible: Let us not therefore say, "He is so far above and so distant from us, that he never minds what passes below." I know that he considers all, that he pervades all, and that he is ever present with all. But alas! I am yet too young, too ignorant, and too careless of my Duties. However, I apply myself with all my Strength, and I endeavour not to lose time; desiring nothing more ardently than to arrive at Perfection. I hope that you will assist me to carry so heavy a Burden, and that your Councils will help to render me solidly Virtuous, which is all I desire.

ODE II.

(*) In Praise of Ven vang.

HEAVEN made this high Mountain, and Tay vang rendered it a Desart: This Loss intirely proceeds from his Fault; but Ven vang has restored it to its first Lustre. The Path which the former trod was full of Dangers: But the way of Ven vang is straight and easy. Ye, the Race of so wise a King, carefully preserve the Happiness which he hath procur'd for you.

ODE III.

In Praise of the same.

HE who is sole Monarch, and supream Lord, descends so far from his Majesty, as to take care of things here below; always attentive to the real Happiness of the World, he casts his Eyes about the face of the Earth. He sees two Nations who have abandoned his Laws, yet the most High does not abandon them, he tries them, he waits for them; he searches every where for a Man according to his own Heart; and he himself would extend his Empire. With this View he affectionately fixes his Eyes upon the West. It is there he ought to dwell, and to reign with this new King.

He begins then, by rooting up all noxious (†) Herbs, and carefully nourishing the good: He lops off the luxuriant Branches of the Trees, and ranges them in a just order: He plucks the Roses, and he cultivates the Mulberry-Trees. The Lord is about to restore to Men their primitive Virtue: All their Enemies will flee before them: Heaven would give itself an (‡) Equal; never was Will more absolute.

The Lord looks upon this holy Mountain: It is the Habitation of Peace, and here grows none of the Wood of which Weapons are made: His Reign is eternal; therefore no Trees we see here, whose Leaves fall to the Ground. It is the Work of the most High, who has exalted the younger Brother in place of the elder.

Ven vang alone has a Heart, which knows how to love his Brethren; he forms all their Happiness and all their Glory: The Lord fills him with all his good things, and has given him the Universe as a Reward.

The Lord penetrates into the Heart of (‖) Ven vang, and there he finds a secret and an inexplicable Virtue which diffuses its Fragrance all round. It is a wonderful Assemblage of his most precious Gifts; the Intelligence for regulating all, the Wisdom for inlightning all, Science for teaching, Council for guiding, Piety and Sweetness for endearing, Strength and Majesty for awing, and in fine, Grace and Charms for winning, all Hearts; Virtues invariably the same. This is, as it were, an Inheritance which he has received from the most High, and a Happiness which he has communicated to his Posterity.

The Lord has said to Ven vang: When the Heart is not upright its Desires are disorderly, and it is not proper for saving the Universe: You are perfectly uncapable of these failings. Ascend then, first, the Mountain, that you may draw all the World after you. There are Rebels (*) Veng vang, according to Interpreters and Historians was Father to Vu vang, who was the founder of the 3d Race.

(†) All this here must be understood Allegorically, according to the Stile of the antient Poetry. The Shi king, is full of such Passages.

(‡) The Letters Pewey signifies Companion, Equal, it is some times taken for Man and Wife. Some Interpreters have thought that the Spouse, which Heaven appointed for Ven vang, is spoken of here; the Shi king, else where calls her Tyen Pewey, that is to say, the Sister of Heaven.

(‖) The Text says Vang ti, but the best Interpreters agree, it is a wrong Reading, and that it should be Ven vang, because all that is said in this Passage can be applied to none but him.

that diſobey their Sovereign: believing themſelves above Men; they tyrannize over them: Arm yourſelf with my Vengeance, diſplay your Standards, put your Troops in Aray, re-eſtabliſh Peace over all, fix the Happineſs of your Empire, and anſwer what the World expects of you.

Immediately, Ven vang, without quitting his Court, aſcends to the Top of the Mountain. Re-enter into your Caverns ye rebellious Spirits! this is the Mountain of the Lord; ye can have no admittance here. Theſe living Springs are of pure Water, where the Subjects of Ven vang quench their Thirſt; theſe Pleaſures are not for you. Ven vang has choſen this Mountain; he has opened to himſelf theſe pure Fountains: Thither the loyal Subjects ought to come: Thither Kings ſhould repair.

The Lord has ſaid to (*) Ven vang; I love Virtue pure and ſimple ſuch as yours: It makes no great Noiſe, nor any pompous Appearances: It is not forward; it is not haughty; it may be ſaid, that you have Spirit and Underſtanding, that you may conform yourſelf to my Orders: You know your Enemy; make head againſt him with all your Forces, prepare your warlike Machines, make ready your Chariots, march to the Deſtruction of the Tyrant; chace him from the Throne which he uſurps. Ye armed Chariots, haſten not: Ye lofty Walls tremble not: Ven vang is not precipitant in his March: He breathes nothing in his Anger but Peace: He takes Heaven to Witneſs for the Goodneſs of his Heart: He is willing that they ſhould ſubmit without fighting, and is ready to pardon the moſt criminal. Far from incurring any contempt by this Lenity, He never appear'd more amiable; but if they will not ſubmit to ſo many Charms, his Chariots will arrive with a mighty Noiſe: In vain does the Tyrant truſt to the Height and Strength of his Walls: Ven vang attacks, fights, and ſubdues him: He deſtroys his cruel Empire; and this Juſtice is ſo far from rendering the Conqueror odious, that the Univerſe was never more diſpoſed to obey his Laws.

O D E IV.

Councils given to a King.

A Grave and a majeſtic Outſide, is, as it were, the Palace where Virtue reſides. But it is a true Saying: "At preſent, the moſt Ignorant have Knowledge enough to diſcern the Faults of others; and the moſt Clear-ſighted are blind to their own."

He who exacts nothing of any Man which is above his Strength, is fit to teach the Univerſe; and the truly Wiſe does what he pleaſes with the Heart of Man. Form no Deſign where Intereſt has the leaſt ſhare: Iſſue Orders ſo juſt that you need never to change them: And to anſwer theſe two Points, Preſerve even the apperance of Probity and Virtue, that you may ſerve as a Pattern to all your People?

But alas! theſe wiſe Leſſons are of no farther Uſe: All is overturned; and, as it were, buried in a ſhameful Debauch; and becauſe this Debauch pleaſes, Regularity and the Maxims of our ancient Kings are no longer ſtudied, in order to revive their wiſe Laws.

Auſpicious Heaven, you ſay, does no longer protect you: But Heaven only loves thoſe who are on the Side of Virtue: You are in the Middle of the Stream, and ought to dread, leaſt it carry you along. Be inceſſantly upon your Guard in the ſmalleſt Matters, exactly obſerve the Hour of riſing from, and going to, Bed. Take care that your Houſe be always well regulated: You will render your People diligent by your Example; if you keep your Chariots, your Horſes, your Soldiers, and your Arms, in good Condition; you will eſcape War, and keep the Barbarians at a Diſtance.

Perfect your People, and be the firſt to obſerve the Laws which you yourſelf preſcribe: By this means, you will ſave yourſelf a great deal of Uneaſineſs. Above all things, maturely weigh your Orders; and take great care of your outward Appearance: Then all will be peacefull, and all will be well. A Blemiſh may be taken out of a Diamond by ſtrongly poliſhing it: But if your Words have the leaſt Blemiſh, there is no way to efface that.

Never ſpeak therefore but with great Caution; and do not ſay, "It is only a ſingle Word." Remember that no other Perſon has the keeping of your Tongue; and unleſs you keep it yourſelf, you will commit a thouſand Faults. Words full of Wiſdom are like Virtue, which never paſſes unrewarded: By her, you aſſiſt your Friends; and your Subjects, who are your Children, will become Virtuous by following your Maxims from Age to Age.

While you are among wiſe Friends, compoſe yourſelf in ſuch a Manner, as that nothing may be ſeen about your Perſon but what is ſweet and amiable: When you are in your own Family, let nothing that is irregular eſcape you; in ſhort, when you are alone in the moſt retired Corner of your Houſe, indulge your ſelf in nothing that is ſhameful: nor ſay, Nobody ſees me: (‡) For there is an intelligent Spirit that ſees all: He comes when leaſt expected, and it is he who ought to keep us continually watchfull over ourſelves.

(*) The following are the excellent words of a Diſciple of, and a Commentator upon Chu hi.

This admirable Perſon, ſays he, is complaiſant and gentle: humble and pliable: To hear him, one would ſay, that he neither knows nor is capable of any thing. When a Heart is thus diſpoſed, with what Riches may it not be fill'd! For which reaſon the moſt conſpicuous and the higheſt Virtue is founded upon the ſolid and unmoveable Foundation of Humility: The underſtanding of no Man, is greater than his who really thinks his own talents very confin'd.

(‡) Chu hi ſpeaks in the following Terms: A Man muſt be well perſuaded, ſays he, that the Lord of Spirits, and of all Inviſible Beings, is intimately diffuſed thro' all. When he comes, none can perceive that he is preſent; however attentive a Man is, he ought always to fear; what then ought not they to dread, who never have a thought of him! The meaning of all this; is That it is not enough to regulate the Outſide, but we ought likewiſe to watch upon what paſſes within our Breaſt.

Your

Your Virtue then ought not to be common, it ought to riſe to the higheſt Degree of Perfection. Regulate all your Motions ſo well, that you may never leave the ſtraight Path: Do not paſs the Bounds preſcribed you by Virtue, and ſhun whatever can offend her. Propoſe yourſelf to the World, as a Pattern, which it may imitate without Fear. The Proverb ſays, "A Pear is given for a Peach. You will not reap what you have ſowed." They, who tell you the contrary, deceive you; it is as the Saying goes, "Look for Horns in the Head of a Lamb newly brought forth."

A Branch of a Tree, which is eaſy and pliant, takes whatever bent is given it: A wiſe Man poſſeſſes Humility, the ſolid Foundation of all the Virtues. Inform him of the fine Maxims of Antiquity; he immediately complies, and endeavours to put them in Practice. On the contrary, he who is ſtupid, thinks you impoſe upon him, and will believe nothing. Thus every one follows his own Propenſity.

O my Son! you ſay, you are ignorant of good and evil: It is not by forceably dragging you along, that I would conduct you to true Virtue, but, by giving you ſenſible Proofs of all I ſay: It is not by barely hearing my Leſſons that you become wiſe, but, by putting them in Practice with all your Heart. To acknowledge, as you do, your Incapacity, is an excellent Diſpoſition to be ſoon qualified to inſtruct others: For, from the Moment that a Man is no longer full of himſelf, nor puft up with an empty Pride, whatever good he learns in the Morning, he practiſes before the Evening.

Supreme Tyen (*) clearly diſtinguiſhes Good and Evil: He hates the Proud and cheriſhes the Humble: There is not a Period of my Life in which I am not liable to offend Tyen: Then how can we have a moment of Joy in ſo miſerable a Life? It paſſes away as a Dream, and Death comes upon us before we are aware. This it is what gives me Grief. I forget nothing that may ſerve to inſtruct you, yet you hear me with Reluctance. Far from approving my Leſſons, they appear to you, perhaps, very rude. You ſay that you have not yet attained the Period of Life when Wiſdom is acquired; but if at preſent, you neglect to embrace Virtue, how can you arrive at her in a feeble old Age?

O my Son! I dictate to you only the great Maxims of our ancient Kings. If you hear my Councils, you will never have Reaſon to repent. Heaven is in Wrath; dread leaſt it diſcharges itſelf upon you and your Subjects. You have remarkable Examples of its Conduct in paſt Ages. The Lord never deviates from his own Ways. Reſt aſſured, that your not entering immediately into the Paths of Virtue which I have laid open to you, is the means of drawing down upon yourſelf and your Empire the greateſt Miſeries.

ODE V.

Upon the Ruin [or Fall] of Mankind.

I Lift my Eyes to Heaven, which appears as if it were Braſs. Our Miſeries have endured for a long time: The World is loſt: Wickedneſs ſpreads itſelf like a fatal Poiſon: The Snares of Sin are extended on all Sides, and there is no appearance of Remedy.

We once had bliſsful Fields; but Woman has deprived us of them: We once were Lords of all; but Woman has made us Slaves. The thing ſhe hates is Innocence; the thing ſhe loves is Impiety.

The wiſe Huſband rears the Walls; but the Wife, who graſps at all Knowledge, demoliſhes them. O how enlightened is ſhe! She is a Bird whoſe Note is fatal; and the Exceſs of her Tongue is the Ladder, by which all our Miſeries deſcend. Our Ruin does not proceed from Heaven, but from Woman. All, who will not hear the Inſtruction of Wiſdom, are like to that unhappy One. She has ruined Mankind. This was firſt an Error, afterwards, a Crime, which ſhe is ſo far from acknowledging that ſhe cries, What have I done. (†) A wiſe Man ought not to expoſe himſelf to the Dangers of Commerce, or a Woman to meddle with any thing but ſewing and ſpinning.

Why does Heaven afflict you? Why do the heavenly Spirits withdraw their Aſſiſtance from you? Becauſe you have abandoned yourſelf to what you ought to have ſhunned, and left me, whom alone you ought to have loved; you are oppreſs'd with all Kinds of Calamities: There is not the leaſt footſtep of Modeſty and Decency. Man is loſt, and the Univerſe is upon the Point of its ruin.

Heaven has thrown out its Nets; they are ſpread over all: Man is loſt, O how this afflicts me. Heaven ſpreads its Nets, they are not far off: It is done; Man is loſt: This occaſions all my Sadneſs.

This deep Brook has a Source from whence it proceeds: My Grief reſembles it: It is deep, and it comes from afar. Man no longer has what he poſſeſt before his Fall, and has involved his Children in his Miſery. (‡) O Heaven! You only can apply the Remedy: Wipe away the Stains of the Father, and ſave his Poſterity.

(*) Or Heaven.

(†) All Interpreters own that the Text in this Paſſage is almoſt unintellegible ſo that we cannot anſwer for the Tranſlation. Perhaps the Text is corrupted, perhaps it conceals ſome Meaning, which we cannot come at.

(‡) Tho' Heaven (ſays Chu hi) is ſo far above us, that it would ſeem as if this World were unworthy of its Cares, yet its Ways and Deſigns are impenetrable, it can ſtrengthen Weakneſs itſelf, and re-eſtabliſh Order, when all ſeems to be ruin'd. If Tcheu wang would have chang'd, and have become a new Man, Heaven would have ſuſpended its Decree; and the Poſterity of that unhappy Man would not have entirely been loſt.

ODE

The Poet laments the Miſeries of Mankind.

(K) PRODIGIOUS! That Hail ſhould fall ſo much at this Seaſon! Grief wounds my Soul, when I ſee the Diſorders of Sinners. Can they go any further? Behold the miſerable Condition to which I am reduced; my Sorrows increaſe every Moment. Have ſome regard to the Perplexity which I bring on my ſelf. My Sorrows conſume me, and yet I am obliged to conceal them.

I have received Life from my Parents: For what end have I received it, but to be overwhelmed with ſo many Ills? I can neither advance, nor retire. Men imploy their Tongues either in flattering or deſtroying themſelves: And, when I appear afflicted, I am the Object of their Ridicule.

My Heart is full of Bitterneſs, when I ſee ſo much Miſery: The moſt Innocent are the moſt to be bewailed: From whence can they expect relief? Who will ſtop theſe Ravens? Or who are to be their Prey?

Behold, this vaſt Foreſt full of Wood! only proper to be thrown into the Fire. The People overwhelmed with ſo many Misfortunes, look up to Heaven, (†) and ſeem to doubt of Providence. But when the Hour to execute its Decrees is come, no one dares oppoſe it. It is the ſupream Being; it is the ſole Sovereign: When he puniſhes, he is juſt; and none dares accuſe him of being influenced by Hatred.

But the Wicked look upon what is high, as if it were low, and upon what is low, as if it were high. When will their Extravagancies be at an end? They call upon the old wiſe Men, and ſcoffingly ſay to them; Explain to us your Dreams. They are covered with Sin, and they believe themſelves to be blameleſs: Among Ravens, how can we diſtinguiſh the Male from the Female?

When I reflect upon the Maſter of the Univerſe, upon his Majeſty, and his Juſtice; I humble myſelf before him and tremble, leſt, he ſhould reprimand me: Yet all my Words come from the bottom of my Heart, and are conformable to Reaſon. The wicked have the Tongues of Serpents, and revile the Righteous, who are peaceful Behold that vaſt Field: It is full of noxious Graſs which ſprings from its Boſom. Heaven ſeems to play with me, as if I were a Thing of nought; and requires an exact Account, as if I had yet any thing expoſed to the rage of my Enemies. Am I able to deliver myſelf?

My Heart is plunged in Sadneſs; it is ſorely preſſed with Grief. Whence proceed all theſe Diſorders that are now produced? The Flame is always increaſing, and it is impoſſible to extinguiſh it. (‡) Ah Pau tſe'! unhappy Woman! Thou haſt lighted up the Fire which conſumes us.

Think inceſſantly upon your laſt Hour. The Path you tread is dark, it is ſlippery, it is dangerous. You drive a Chariot richly adorned: What are you doing? Alas! You cruſh the Sides of this Chariot, you let all your Riches periſh, and when all is loſt, you cry for Help.

Cruſh not the Sides of the Chariot: Take great Care of its Wheels: Watch over your Attendants: Do not ſuffer ſo precious a Treaſure to periſh: Venture not into dangerous Places. But alas! my Words are in vain, no Regard is paid to them.

The Wicked think they are well concealed: But they are like Fiſh, kept within a Pond; they may dive under the Water; but he, who ſtands upon the Brink, can eaſily diſcern them: My grief to ſee their miſery, is very great.

They paſs their Days in Joy: They are ſerved with exquiſite Wines and delicate Meats: Their Feaſts are endleſs: They aſſemble the Companions of their Debauches: They ſpeak of nothing but Nuptials and Pleaſures. Reflect, that I am left alone, and that I muſt conceal even my Tears.

(*) There are a thouſand Paſſages in antient Poetry that reſemble the Introduction of this Ode; and the beginning of the fourth and the ſeven Stanzas, in which places the Stile is more Sublime and Poetical. All the Shu king was written in this Taſte which continues even to this Day.

(†) Chu ſong ching, one of the Deſcendants of Chu hi, ſpeaks in a very clear Manner, upon this Paſſage.

To render the Good happy, ſays he, and to puniſh the Wicked, is the conſtant Rule, which Heaven obſerves. If in this world we dont ſee the Good rewarded, and the Wicked puniſhed, it is, becauſe the Hour that is to decide their Fate is not yet come. Before this deciſive Hour, a Man can, if we may uſe ſuch an Expreſſion, baffle Heaven. But when the Sentence is paſt, Heaven certainly gets the better of all. A Man who to day is chaſtis'd, to morrow may be rewarded; and he who meets with Rewards to day, may to morrow meet with Puniſhment. When Heaven Chaſtiſes, we ſay it is Angry, but Chaſtiſement proceeds from Juſtice, and Juſtice never can be wrought up to Anger, or Hatred: If it does not puniſh Crimes, as ſoon as they are committed, it is not from a weak Compaſſion to the Criminal; but becauſe the laſt Sentence has not yet paſs'd. And Heaven keeps us in Ignorance of the Moment, when that Sentence is to be executed, that we may always be upon our Guard.

(‡) The Chineſe, who have long regarded theſe Books as ſo many Monuments of what paſs'd at the Commencement of their Monarchy, are of opinion that this unhappy Pau tſe, was the Wife of Yew wang, which ſignifies, the King plung'd in darkneſs. The Words of Chu ſong ching are theſe; It was not, ſays he, Ching tang, who deſtroy'd the Tyrant Kye, it was the Tyrant's unworthy Wife, who was the real Cauſe of his Ruin. It was not Vû wang, who deſtroy'd the cruel Chew: It was his Wife Ta kya. It was not the petty King of Shin, nor the Barbarians of the Weſt, who were the Cauſe of the Deſtruction of the Blind Yew wang: It was Pau tſe who precipitated him into his great Miſery, but alas! Altho' he had a Pau tſe to ruin Him, he had not a Shing tang, nor a Vû wang to ſucceed Him. Theſe few Words contain the Subſtance of all that we know of theſe three Illuſtrious Families.

ODE

The ſmalleſt Worms have their Holes; the vileſt Inſects find their Food; yet at preſent, the People die of Famine and Miſery. O Heaven! Thou who juſtly haſt ſent all theſe Misfortunes upon us, behold, how the Wicked live in Plenty, and take Compaſſion upon the Juſt who are in the utmoſt Neceſſity.

O D E VII.

An Exhortation on the ſame Subject.

THE moſt High ſeems to have changed his Clemency into Fury. The People is reduc'd to the Brink of Miſery. Truth is no longer obſerved in Words. That which never fades is no longer thought of. Even thoſe who are leaſt criminal, becauſe their Views are more confined, are wanting in Sincerity and Uprightneſs: This draws down the wrath of the Lord, and obliges me to warn you.

Heaven appears deaf to our Prayers; we muſt then be ſeized with Fear and Grief. Heaven is in Wrath, we muſt then examine ourſelves, and amend without delay. Let your Words be ſweet to gain the Hearts of the People: But let them be animated with Strength to ſtop the Progreſs of theſe Woes.

Tho' my Employment is different from yours, I am, however, a Man like yourſelves, and I aim at nothing but to ſatisfy your juſteſt Deſires. Hear me then attentively and without contempt, becauſe all I ſpeak is valuable. You know the ancient Proverb, which imports, That the vileſt Herbs ſhould be gathered with care, and the Wood, which ſeems fit only for burning, ſhould be piled up.

Heaven is in Anger: It would be the height of Folly to diſregard its Wrath. I ſpeak to you in all the Sincerity of my Heart, and yet you mock me. You ſay that I am a too timerous old Man; and you remain calm in the midſt of Perils: But in the end, the Evil will admit of no Remedy.

Heaven is enraged, yet your Palace is full of Flatterers. There is no longer any Decency in Manners, and good Men are obliged to be ſilent. The People are inclined to the baſeſt Actions, and we dare not diſcover the cauſe of ſo many Evils. Alas, all is loſt! and wiſe Men are not heard.

Heaven penetrates into the Bottom of Hearts, as Light into a dark Chamber. We muſt endeavour to conform to its Lights; like two Inſtruments of Muſic tuned to the ſame Pitch. We muſt join ourſelves with it; like two Tablets which appear but one. We muſt receive its Gifts the very Moment that its Hand is open to beſtow. Do not ſay that I ſpeak to you in vain: Nothing is eaſier to Heaven than to enlighten us: But our irregular Paſſions block up the entrance of our Souls.

The Sages of the firſt Order are like the Trenches that ſurround us; thoſe of the ſecond Order, are like the Walls that defend us. Your Neighbours are like a Guard before your Door; your Friends like a Prop that ſupports you; and your Relations like a Fortreſs that ſecures you. But, if you would preſerve all theſe Advantages, your Heart muſt entertain Virtue without reprove: for, if you neglect Wiſdom, all theſe forreign Supports will abandon you and leave you defenceleſs. Can one be in more terrible Circumſtances?

Be ſiez'd then with Dread, when you ſee the anger of Heaven ready to burſt over your Head. Do not ſuffer yourſelf to be vanquiſhed by Luxury and Pleaſure: Tremble leaſt Heaven ſhould abandon you, and call you to a ſtrict Account. It is a true ſaying, that Heaven is intelligent: Whether you go out or in, it conſiders all your Steps. Its Sight is compared to the brightneſs of the Morning: Becauſe it obſerves your leaſt Motions.

O D E VIII.

Advice to a Sovereign.

O Mighty and ſupream Lord, thou art the ſovereign Maſter of the World: But how ſevere is your Majeſty, and how rigorous are your Commands? Heaven, it is true, gives Life and Being to all the Inhabitants of the World: But we muſt not depend too much upon its Liberality and Clemency. I know that it always begins as a Father, but I do not know if it will not end as a Judge.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! Ye are cruel, but your Miniſters are Tygers and Wolves. Ye are covetous, but your Miniſters are Blood-ſuckers; yet ye ſuffer ſuch People to be about your Perſons; ye raiſe them to the higheſt Poſts: And becauſe you have conſtrained Heaven to ſend a ſpirit of Giddineſs upon you; you place theſe Wretches at the head of your Subjects.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! As ſoon as ever you deſire to have a wiſe Man near your Perſons, immediately the Wicked vow his Deſtruction, and ſpread a thouſand falſe Surmiſes that they may cover their Hatred with ſpecious Pretexts. Ye hear them, ye love them; and thus harbour within your Palace a Troop of Robbers: For this Reaſon, the Imprecations of the People are boundleſs.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! Ye are with reſpect to your poor People like fierce and hungry Beaſts: And all your ſkill is employ'd in finding out Counſellors more wicked than yourſelves: By not giving the leaſt application to Virtue, you are deſtitute of the moſt ſolid Support: And your Life being but a Dream, all your Counſellors favour the Illuſion.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! The murmurs of your People are to you like the Cries of Graſshoppers; but Anger boils in their Hearts. You are upon the Brink of Ruin, and yet you are not reclaimed. The Plague is in the Boſom of the Empire, and ſpreads even to the moſt diſtant Barbarians.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! It is not the Lord ye ought to accuſe for ſo many Calamities: Impute them all to your ſelves. Ye would not hear the wiſe old Men; you have ſet them at a diſtance from you: But tho' you have theſe venerable Perſons no longer, the Laws ſtill remain with you: Follow them, that you may avert the Scourges that are ready to chaſtiſe you.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! It is a too true Saying, " That fair Tree was not deſtroyed, becauſe its Branches were broken, or its Leaves beaten down, but becauſe its Root was ſpoil'd and corrupted." As you ought to ſee yourſelves in the Kings your Predeceſſors, whom you repreſent, ſo you ſhall, one Day, ſerve as Examples to thoſe who ſucceed you. The older the World grows, there are more illuſtrious Examples for Inſtruction; yet it never grows better.

I am now come to an end of what I had to ſay with reſpect to the firſt three claſſical Books, and have enlarged more upon them than I ſhall upon the two others; becauſe theſe laſt are not near ſo much reſpected, tho' they are look'd upon as very valuable Monuments.

The Chun tſyu, the fourth Canonical Book of the firſt Order.

Opinions about the Author of this Book.

THE Chun tſyû was not admitted into the Rank of the King, till the times of the Dynaſty of the Han. The Book itſelf was written in the Days of Confuçius; and conſequently, much inferior to the other three, which have always, and unanimouſly, been acknowledged the true King: But there have been great Diſputes about the Chun tſyû. One Party, which is the moſt numerous, attribute this Work to Confuçius, but others maintain that this Philoſopher was not its Author. Many are of opinion that it contains the Hiſtory of the Kingdom of Lû, which was the Native Country of Confuçius, and is at preſent the Province of Shan tong. Others maintain that it is an Abridgment of what paſſed in the different Kingdoms, into which China was divided, before they were all united into one Monarchy by Tſin ſhi whang: For which reaſon, Vang ngan ſhe, a learned Man, and able Politician and a Miniſter of State, would degrade the Chun tſyû, by reducing it to the King of the ſecond Claſs. Nevertheleſs, the Chineſe have a particular Fondneſs and an extraordinary Value for this Work.

The Actions of many Princes are there deſcribed; and their Vices and Virtues, together with the reſpective Rewards and Puniſhments attending them, are there exhibited, as in a Mirror. It commences at the 49*th* Year of the Emperor Ping vang, who was the thirteenth of the Race of the Chew, and comprehends all that paſſed during 241 Years under ten Kings. This Piece of Hiſtory begins with In kong, who poſſeſſed the Kingdom of Lû; and ends with Ngay kong the twelfth King.

This Book is entitled the Spring and the Autumn: thereby giving us to underſtand, that an Empire revives and becomes flouriſhing, when governed by a wiſe and virtuous Prince; in the ſame manner as in the Spring, Nature is in ſome meaſure regenerated, and reanimated by the agreeable Verdure, with which the Ground and the Trees begin to be cloathed. On the other hand, under a vitious and a cruel Prince, the Empire languiſhes and appears upon its Decline; in the ſame manner as in Autumn, the Trees diveſt themſelves of their Ornaments, the Leaves and the Flowers fade away, and Nature ſeems to be dying. A Diſciple of Confuçius, whoſe Name was Ko ſhi, has compoſed a learned Commentary upon this Work, intituled Que yu, that is to ſay, The Maxims of Government.

The Ko-ſhi Author of a Commentary upon it.

The Li ki, or the fifth Canonical Book of the firſt Order.

THE fifth Book entitled the Li ki, which is, as who ſhould ſay, a Memorial of the Laws, Duties, and Ceremonies of a civil Life, contains twelve Books which Confuçius had compoſed from the different Works of the Ancients. It is believed that its principal Author was the Brother of the Emperor Vu vang, whoſe Name was Chew kong, a Prince whom Virtue, Prudence, and Capacity equally recommended.

This Book likewiſe comprehends the Works of ſeveral of the Diſciples of Confucius as well as of other Authors more modern and leſs to be depended on. The Cuſtoms and Ceremonies, both ſacred and profane, are there treated of, together with the Uſages of all Kinds which were practiſed tiſed, eſpecially in the Times of the three principal Dynaſties of the Hya, Chang, and Shew. It treats likewiſe of the Duties of Children to their Fathers, and of Wives to their Huſbands; of the Rules of true Friendſhip, of Civilities in Feaſts, of Hoſpitality, Funeral Honours, War, Muſic, and many other Things proper to cement and to keep up Society.

But as 300 Years after this Compilation was made by Confuçius, all the Copies were burnt by that barbarous Order of Tſin ſhi whang; and as no more of this Book could be recovered than a few Leaves, ſaved from the general Conflagration, and what the old Men had been able to retain by Heart; there is no doubt, and it is the Opinion of the Interpreters and Commentators, that it is not only imperfect on account of the unfaithfulneſs of the Memory of old People, and the bad Deſigns of ſome, by whoſe means there have crept in a great deal of foreign and apocriphal Things, but that there are found in it many Uſages which are now a days laid aſide: Beſides it is a Book which the Chineſe themſelves own, ought to be read with a great deal of Caution.

Of the Claſſics, or Canonical Books of the ſecond Order called Tſe ſhu; with the Life of Confucius.

THE five Books juſt now deſcribed, are of the remoteſt Antiquity, and all others compoſed ſince by the wiſeſt Men in China, are no other than Copies of, or Comments upon them. Among the numerous Authors, who have beſtowed their labour upon theſe ancient Monuments, none has been more illuſtrious than Confuçius: For during ſo many Ages, he has been looked upon throughout the Empire, by way of Excellence, as the great Maſter and Ornament of his Nation, as well as a compleat Model for all wiſe Men. Encomiums of Kong fû tſe.

Tho' he never acquired the Title of King, yet by his excellent Maxims and great Examples, he governed a part of China during his Life; and ſince his Death, the Doctrine which he collected in his Books, drawn from the ancient Laws, has been, and ſtill is, look'd upon, as a perfect Rule of Government. As he never had any other View in his Undertakings, Travels, or Diſcourſes, than to revive the Morality of the firſt Ages, to procure the Happineſs of Subjects, by inſtructing their Princes, and thereby to promote the Love of Wiſdom, Juſtice and Virtue throughout the Empire; So his Memory is in the higheſt Veneration, and hath tranſmitted ſuch a Luſtre to Poſterity, that it ſtill ſhines, notwithſtanding the diſtance of Time that has intervened. His Life and Writings the Rule of Government.

There is, properly ſpeaking, no Family in China whoſe Nobility is hereditary, except that of Confuçius, which ſtill ſubſiſts; and is there in the higheſt Eſteem. Many Authors having written the Life of this Philoſopher, I ſhall deliver what is moſt generally ſaid on that Subject. Nobility in China only hereditary in the Family of Kong fû tſe.

The Life of Kong fu tſe, or Confucius.

CONFUCIUS was born in a Town of the Kingdom of Lû, now the Province of Shan tong, in the 21*ſt* Year of the Reign of Ling vang, the 23*d* Emperor of the Race of the Chew, 551 Years before Chriſt, and two before the Death of Thales, one of the ſeven Sages of Greece. He was contemporary with the famous Pythagoras; and ſomewhat earlier than Socrates. (*) But Confuçius has had this advantage above the other three, that his Glory has increaſed with the ſucceſſion of Years, and has arrived at the higheſt pitch that human Wiſdom can pretend to. This exalted Reputation he ſtill Maintains in the midſt of the greateſt Empire in the World, which thinks itſelf indebted to this Philoſopher for its Duration and Splendor. Time of his Birth. His Advantages above ſome Græcian Philoſophers.

Had Thales and Pythagoras, like Confuçius, been contented with giving Precepts of Morality; had neither the firſt dived into Queſtions purely Phyſical, concerning the Origin of the World; nor the ſecond dogmatized on the nature of the Rewards annexed to Virtue, and the Puniſhments appointed for Vice, after this Life; theſe two Sages of Antiquity might have enjoyed a Reputation for Learning, leſs liable to Cenſure.

Confuçius, without being ſolicitous to ſearch into the impenetrable Secrets of Nature, or to refine too much on Points of common Belief, a Rock dangerous to Curioſity, ſolely confined himſelf to ſpeak concerning the Principle of all Beings; to inſpire a Reverence, Fear and Gratitude for him; to inculcate, that nothing, not even the moſt ſecret Thought, eſcapes his Notice; that he never leaves Virtue without Reward, nor Vice without Puniſhment, whatever the preſent Condition of both may be. Theſe are the Maxims ſcattered throughout his Works; upon theſe Principles he governed himſelf, and endeavoured a Reformation of Manners. The Doctrines inculcated in his Works.

Confuçius was but three Years old when he loſt his Father Sho lyang he, who died about the Age of 73. This old Man enjoyed the higheſt Offices of the Kingdom of Song, yet left no other Inheritance to his Son, but the honour of deſcending from Ti yé, the 27*th* Emperor of the 2*d* Race of the Shang: His Mother, whoſe Name was Shing, and who drew her Pedigree from the illuſtrious Family of the Yen, lived 21 Years after the Death of her Huſband. Account of his Parentage.

* The Author might have added, that he was Contemporary with Solon, the Celebrated Philoſopher, and Legiſlator of Athens.

In

His Studies in his Youth,

In his moſt tender Age he was obſerved to have the Wiſdom of a diſcreet Man; Play and childiſh Amuſements were not at all to his liking. A grave, modeſt and ſerious Air gained him the Reſpect of thoſe who knew him, and was a Preſage of what he would one Day become. He had ſcarce attained his 15th Year, when he applied himſelf ſeriouſly to the Study of the ancient Books, and furniſhed his Mind with Maxims the moſt proper to regulate the Heart, and inſpire the People with the Love of Virtue. At the Age of nineteen he married, and had but one Wife, and by her a Son called Pe yu, who died at the Age of fifty; this latter left one Heir, called Tſû tsë, who treading in the Steps of Confuçius his Grand-Father, devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of Wiſdom, and by his Merit obtained the chief Employments in the Empire.

His Marriage.

He propoſes a general Reformation of Manners.

When Confuçius was more advanced in Years, and thought he had made conſiderable Progreſs in the Knowledge of Antiquity, he propoſed to re-eſtabliſh the form of a wiſe Government in the ſeveral little Kingdoms, of which the Empire was compoſed, and to procure by this means the Reformation of Manners. For then, each Province of the Empire was a diſtant Kingdom, had its particular Laws, and was governed by its own Prince.

To ſay the Truth, all the little Kingdoms were dependant on the Emperor; but it often happened that the imperial Authority was too weak to keep them within the bounds of their Duty. Theſe Kings were Sovereigns in their reſpective Dominions; they levied Taxes, impoſed Tribute, conferred Dignities and Employments; declared War, when they thought proper, againſt their Neighbours, and ſometimes became formidable to the Emperor himſelf. As Intereſt, Avarice, Ambition, Diſſimulation, falſe Policy, with the love of Pleaſure and Luxury, prevailed in all theſe little Courts, Confuçius undertook to baniſh theſe Vices, and to introduce the oppoſite Virtues in their Stead, he preached up every where, as well by his own Example, as by his Inſtructions, Modeſty, Diſintereſtedneſs, Sincerity, Equity, and Temperance, together with the contempt of Riches and Pleaſures.

Accepts of Offices into the Magiſtracy with that View.

His Integrity, extenſive Knowledge, and the Splendor of his Virtues, ſoon cauſing him to be known, ſeveral Places in the Magiſtracy were offered him; which he accepted ſolely with a View of propagating his Doctrine, and reforming Mankind. Tho' his Succeſs was not anſwerable to his Pains, yet being leſs influenced with the Honours that were paid him, than the Love of the public Welfare, he preſently threw up all his Employments, how conſiderable ſoever, to go in queſt elſewhere of a People more tractable, as well as more capable of profiting by his Precepts.

Reformation wrought in the Kingdom of Lû.

Of this he gave ſeveral Proofs on various Occaſions, but eſpecially in the 55th Year of his Age, when he was promoted to one of the chief Poſts in the Kingdom of Lû, his native Country. In leſs than three Months the Face of the Kingdom was changed; the Prince who placed his whole Confidence in him, the Grandees of the Kingdom, and the People, were quite different from what they were before. This Change was ſo ſudden and proſperous, that it infuſed Jealouſy in the neighbouring Princes. They judged that, as nothing was more capable of making a Kingdom flouriſh than good Order and the exact Obſervation of the Laws, the King of Lû would infallibly become too powerful, if he continued to follow the Councils of ſo wiſe and knowing a Man.

Of theſe Princes the King of Tſi, being moſt alarmed, held ſeveral Councils with his principal Miniſters; and after frequent Deliberations it was concluded, that under the pretence of an Ambaſſy, a Preſent ſhould be made, to the King of Lû and to the great Lords of his Court, of a great Number of beautiful young Girls, who had been inſtructed from their Infancy in Singing and Dancing, and had all the Charms, requiſite to pleaſe and captivate the Heart.

Defeated by a Stratagem.

This Stratagem ſucceeded: For the King of Lû and all his Grandees, received this Preſent with a great deal of Gratitude and Joy; and not being able to reſiſt the Charms of theſe Strangers, thought of nothing elſe but making Feaſts to divert them. The Prince wholly taken up with his Pleaſures, abandoned the Buſineſs of the State, and became inacceſſible to his moſt zealous Miniſters.

Confuçius endeavoured by Remonſtrances, to bring him back to his Reaſon and Duty; but when he ſaw that the Prince was deaf to all his Councils, he reſolved to diveſt himſelf of an Office which could be of no uſe to the People, under ſo voluptuous a Prince. Whereupon, laying down his Employment, he left the Court; and became an Exile from his native Country, in order to ſeek in other Kingdoms for Minds, more fit to reliſh and follow his Maxims.

He returns to a private Life, and falls into great Indigence.

He paſſed through the Kingdoms of Tſi, Ghey, and Tſû, to no Effect. The Auſterity of his Morals, made his Politics dreaded; nor were the Miniſters of the Princes willing to countenance a ſkilful Rival, who was able quickly to ruin their Credit and Authority. Thus wandring from Province to Province, he came into the Kingdom of Shing, where he was reduced to the greateſt Indigence, without laying aſide his Greatneſs of Soul and uſual Conſtancy.

It was a Sort of Novelty to behold a Philoſopher, after he had gained the public Admiration in the moſt honourable Employments of the State, returning of his own accord to the private Functions of a Sage, entirely devoted to the Inſtruction of the People, and on this Account, undertaking continual and painful Journies. His Zeal extended to Perſons of all Ranks, to the Learned and Ignorant, to Courtiers and Princes; in ſhort, his Leſſons were adapted to all Conditions in general, and proper for each in particular.

Number of his Diſciples.

He had ſo often in his Mouth, the Maxims and Examples of the Heroes of Antiquity, Yau, Shun, Yu, Ching tang, and Ven vang, that thoſe great Men ſeemed to be revived in him. For this Reaſon it is not at all ſurprizing that he had ſuch a great Number of Diſciples, who were inviolably attached to his Perſon: For they reckon 3000, amongſt whom there were 500, who who poſſeſſed, with Honour, the higheſt Truſts in various Kingdoms; and amongſt theſe were 72, ſtill more diſtinguiſhed than the reſt by the Practice of Virtue. His Zeal inſpired him even with a Deſire of croſſing the Sea, in order to propagate his Doctrine in the moſt diſtant Climates.

He divided his Diſciples in four different Claſſes: The firſt was of thoſe who were to cultivate their Minds by Meditation, and to purify their Hearts by the care of acquiring Virtues. The moſt famous of this Claſs were Men tsë kyen, Jen pe myew, Shung kong, and Yen yuen: This laſt was ſnatched away by an untimely Death, at the Age of 31; and as he was greatly beloved by his Maſter, he was a long time the ſubject of his Grief and Tears. The ſecond Claſs conſiſted of thoſe whoſe Buſineſs was to reaſon juſtly, and to compoſe perſuaſive and elegant Diſcourſes: The moſt admired amongſt theſe were Tſay ngo, and Tſŭ kong. The Employment of the third Claſs was to ſtudy the Rules of good Government; to give the Mandarins an Idea of it, and to teach them how to acquit themſelves worthily in the public Offices. The moſt eminent in their reſpect were Ien yen, and Ki lŭ. In ſhort, to write in a conciſe and elegant Stile, the Principles of Morality, was the Buſineſs of the Diſciples of the laſt Claſs; among whom Tſŭ yen, and Tſŭ hya, deſerved very great Commendations. Theſe ten choice Diſciples were the Flower and Chief of Confuçius's School. He divides them into Claſſes.

The whole Doctrine of this Philoſopher, tended to reſtore human Nature to its primitive Luſtre and Beauty, received from Heaven; which had been obſcured by the Darkneſs of Ignorance, and the Contagion of Vice. The means he propoſed to attain it, was to obey, honour and fear the Lord of Heaven; to love our Neighbours as ourſelves; to conquer irregular Inclinations; never to take our Paſſions for the Rule of our Conduct; but to ſubmit to Reaſon, and liſten to it in all Things; ſo as neither to act, ſpeak, or think in any wiſe contrary to it. He aims to reſtore corrupted Nature.

As his Actions never contradicted his Maxims; and as by his Gravity, Modeſty, Mildneſs, and Frugality, his Contempt of Earthly Enjoyments, and a continual watchfulneſs over his Conduct, he was himſelf an Example of the Precepts he taught in his Writings, and Diſcourſes, each of the Kings ſtrove to draw him into his Dominions: The good Effects wrought by him in one Country, being a Motive for another earneſtly to wiſh for his Preſence. Is courted by ſeveral Kings

But a Zeal continually ſucceſsful, and without Oppoſition, would have wanted ſomething of its full Luſtre. Confuçius appeared always equal to himſelf in the greateſt Diſgraces and Troubles; which yet were the more likely to ruffle him, as they were excited by the Jealouſy of ill deſigning Perſons, and in a Place where he had been generally applauded. This Philoſopher, after the Death of the Prince of Chew his Admirer, became of a ſudden, through the Envy of his Courtiers, the common Talk of the ſenſeleſs Populace, and the Subject of their Songs and Satyrs; in the midſt of which unworthy Treatment, he loſt nothing of his uſual Tranquility. His Reſolution and Steadineſs.

But what was moſt to be admired, was the Conſtancy and Steadineſs he diſcovered, when his Life was in iminent Danger, through the Brutality of a great Officer of the Army, named Whan ti; who hated this Philoſopher, tho' he had never given him any Offence. But bad Men have always a natural Antipathy to thoſe, whoſe regular Life is a ſecret Reproach to their diſorderly Conduct. Confuçius beheld the Sword lifted up, ready to give him a mortal Blow; yet tho' the Danger was ſo near, he did not diſcover the leaſt Concern or Emotion: But his Diſciples were terrified and diſperſed. Remarkable Inſtance thereof.

As ſome of thoſe who had moſt Affection for him, preſſed him to make Haſte away, to avoid the Mandarins Fury: If Tyen, replied he, protects us, of which he has juſt given a very ſenſible Proof, what Harm can the Rage of Whan ti do us, notwithſtanding he is Preſident of the Tribunal of the Army? His Notion of Providence.

Confuçius ſeemed on this Occaſion to ſupport the Character of a Sage, more worthily than the Stoic did, when his Maſter gave him the Blow which lamed him. His natural Inſenſibility, founded on a notion, that the Pains of the Body do not affect the Soul which reſides there, has nothing in it equal to the Sentiment of Confuçius, who relies on the Protection that Heaven extends to thoſe who ſerve it. This is not to place Happineſs in a Man's own Virtue, that being an inſupportable Pride, but is founded on a long Habit of referring every thing to Tyen; inſomuch that it occured to his Mind, on the very firſt motion of Surprize and Dread.

The Virtues of this Chineſe Philoſopher, were ſtill more heightened by his charming Modeſty. He was never heard to praiſe himſelf, and could hardly bear the Encomiums others beſtowed on him: To which he anſwered only by reproaching himſelf, for taking ſo little care in watching over his own Actions, and neglecting to practiſe Virtue. When any one admired his Doctrine, and the ſublime Principles of Morality which he taught, far from aſſuming the Honour to himſelf, he ingenuouſly confeſſed that it was not invented by him, but was much more ancient, being derived from thoſe wiſe Legiſlators, Yau and Shun, who lived 1500 Years before him. His Modeſty, and Averſion to Praiſe.

According to a Tradition univerſally received amongſt the Chineſe, he was frequently heard to repeat theſe Words; Si fang yew ſhing jin, importing, that, in the Weſt, the true Saint was to be found. It is not known who the Perſon was concerning whom he ſpoke: But it is certain, that 65 Years after the Birth of Chriſt, Ming ti, the 15*th* Emperor of the Family of the Han, equally affected with the Words of this Philoſopher, and the Image of a Man who appeared to him in a Dream as coming from the Weſt, ſent Tſay tſing and Tſin king, two Grandees of the Empire, into thoſe Parts, with Orders not to return till they had found the holy Perſon, whom Heaven had revealed to him, and had learned the Law which he taught. But the Meſſengers terrified with the Dangers and Fatigues of the Journey, ſtopped ſomewhere in the Tradition the Source of Superſtition and Idolatry.

Indies, for the Place is uncertain, where they found the Image of a Man named Fo, who had infected thoſe Parts with his monſtrous Doctrine, about 500 Years before the Birth of Confuçius; and having informed themſelves in the Superſtitions of this Country, on their return to China, they propagated that Idolatry.

His Death, Confuçius having finiſhed his philoſophical Labours, and in particular the hiſtorical Work of Chun tſyû, died in the Kingdom of Lû, his native Country, aged 73, in the 41ſt Year of the Reign of King vang, the 25*th* Emperor of the Race of the Chew.

and laſt Sayings. A few Days before his laſt Sickneſs, he told his Diſciples, with Tears in his Eyes, that he was pierced with Grief, to ſee the Diſorders which reigned in the Empire; adding, " The " Mountain is fallen, the high Machine is deſtroyed, and the Sages are no more to be ſeen." His Meaning was, that the Edifice of Perfection, which he had endeavoured to raiſe, was almoſt overthrown. He began from that time to languiſh, and the ſeventh Day before his Death, turning himſelf towards his Diſciples; " The Kings, ſaid he, refuſe to follow my Maxims; and ſince " I am no longer uſeful on the Earth, it is neceſſary that I ſhould leave it."

Lamented by the King of Lû. Having ſpoken theſe Words he fell into a Lethargy, which continued ſeven Days, at the end whereof he expired, in the Arms of his Diſciples. When Ngay kong, who then reigned in the Kingdom of Lû, firſt heard of the Death of the Philoſopher, he could not refrain from Tears. Heaven is not ſatisfied with me, cried he, ſince it has taken Confuçius from me. In effect, the Sages are precious Gifts which Heaven beſtows on the Earth, and their Worth is moſt known by the loſs of them.

His Sepulchre. They built his Sepulchre near the City Kyo ſew, on the Side of the River Su, in the ſame Spot where he uſed to aſſemble his diſciples. It has ſince then been encloſed with Walls, and at preſent looks like a ſmall City. He was lamented by the whole Empire, but eſpecially by his Diſciples, who went into Mourning, and bewailed him as if he had been their Father. Theſe Sentiments, full of Veneration which they had for him, encreaſing with time, he is at preſent conſidered as the great Maſter and chief Doctor of the Empire.

His Perſon. He was tall and well proportioned. His Breaſt and Shoulders were broad, his Air grave and majeſtic, his Complection olive, his Eyes large, his Beard long and black, his Noſe a little flat, and his Voice ſtrong and piercing. On the Middle of his Forehead there was a Swelling, or Kind of Wen, which disfigured him a little, and cauſed his Father to call him Kyew, that is, little Hill: A Name he ſometimes gave himſelf out of Modeſty and Humility.

His Works. But it is by his Works that he is chiefly known; whereof four are in greateſt Eſteem, becauſe they contain all that he had collected relating to the ancient Laws, which are looked on as a perfect Rule of Government: Altho' the laſt of them is more properly the Work of his Diſciple Mençius. The firſt of theſe Books is called Ta hyo, which ſignifies the grand Science, or the School of Adults. The ſecond is named the Chong yong, or the immutable Medium, being that juſt Middle which is found between two Extreams, and wherein Virtue conſiſts. The third is called Lun yu, that is, moral and pithy Diſcourſes. And the fourth is intitled Meng tsë, or the Book of Mençius: In which the Author gives an Idea of a perfect Government.

To theſe four Books, are added two others, which are almoſt in equal Reputation. The firſt named Hyau king, that is, of filial Reſpect, contains the Anſwers which Confuçius made to his Diſciple Tſeng, concerning the Reverence due to Parents. The ſecond is called Syau hyo, that is, the Science or School of Children; and is a Collection of Sentences and Examples, taken from ancient and modern Authors. In order to give the Reader a ſlight Notion of the Chineſe Science, I ſhall make a ſhort Extract of each of theſe Books, from the Latin Tranſlation of P. Noël (one of the moſt ancient Miſſionaries of China) printed at Prague in 1711. To which I referr thoſe who would be more thoroughly acquainted with them.

The Ta hyo, or, School of Adults. The firſt Claſſical or Canonical Book of the ſecond Order.

Abſtract of the Ta hyo. CONFUCIUS is the Author of this Work, and his Diſciple Tſeng tsë the Commentator. This is what Beginners ought to ſtudy firſt, becauſe it is as it were the firſt entrance into the Temple of Wiſdom and Virtue. It treats firſt of the Care we ought to take in governing ourſelves, that we may be able afterwards to govern others; and of Perſeverance in the Sovereign good, which according to him, is nothing elſe but the Conformity of our Actions with right Reaſon. The Author calls his Book Ta hyo, or, The grand Science, becauſe it was chiefly deſigned for Princes and great Men, who ought to learn to govern their People well.

The great Science conſiſts in reſtoring our corrupted Nature. All the Science requiſite for the Princes and Grandees of a Kingdom, ſays Confuçius, conſiſts in cultivating and improving the reaſonable Nature they have received from Tyen; and in reſtoring to it that primitive Light and Diſcernment, which has been either weakened or obſcured by various Paſſions, that they may be in a condition afterwards to forward the Perfection of others. To ſucceed then herein it is neceſſary to begin with ourſelves; and for that end it is requiſite to examine well into the nature of Things, and to endeavour to acquire a true Knowledge of Good

Good and Evil; to fix the Will towards the love of this Good, and the hatred of this Evil; to preſerve Integrity of Heart, and regulate his Manners. When a Man has thus renewed himſelf, he will have no Difficulty to renew others: And by this means Concord and Union is quickly ſeen to reign in Families; the Kingdoms are governed according to the Laws; and the whole Empire enjoy perfect Peace and Tanquillity.

The Doctor Tſeng, to give his Maſters Doctrine its full Extent, explains it in ten Chapters. In the firſt he ſhews from the Text of the canonical Books, and the Examples of ſome ancient Emperors, wherein renewing ourſelves conſiſts; and what muſt be done to reſtore reaſonable Nature, to that primitive Light which it received from Heaven. Chap. 1. Wherein renewing conſiſts.

In the ſecond he teaches, in what manner the Minds and Hearts of People are to be renewed. Chap. 2.

In the third he ſhews, what courſe muſt be taken to attain Perfection. He propoſes as a Patern the Application of a ſkilful Workman, who deſires to do his Work in Perfection; and quotes Inſtances of ſeveral Princes, who were continually attentive to the Regulation of their Actions and Conduct. Chap. 3. How to attain Perfection.

In the fourth he demonſtrates, that before all things, a Man ought to Study his own Perfection, and that then it will be eaſy to render others perfect. Chap. 4.

In the fifth he explains, what it is to penetrate the Nature of Things to the bottom, in order to come to a perfect Knowledge of Good and Evil. Chap. 5.

In the ſixth he teaches, that we ought not to deceive ourſelves, but apply with a ſincere Heart to the Study and Practice of Virtue; to fix the Will in the love of Good and the hatred of Evil; and to put ourſelves with regard to both, in the ſame Diſpoſition as we are with regard to Beauty, which we are prone to love, and Uglineſs which we are naturally inclin'd to hate. Chap. 6. That our Endeavours be ſincere.

In the ſeventh he ſhews, that in order to regulate our Manners, we muſt know how to govern the Heart; and above all, to maſter the four principal Paſſions, capable of introducing Trouble and Confuſion, viz. Joy, Sadneſs, Anger and Fear. That in reallity theſe Paſſions are inſeperable from human Nature, but can never hurt the Perſon who knows how to bridle them; and that the Heart is like a poliſhed Mirror, which is not ſullied by the Objects it reflects. Chap. 7. How to govern the Paſſions.

In the eighth he ſhews, that to eſtabliſh Union and Peace in a Family, the Father muſt know how to govern his Affections, that he may not be ſway'd by a blind Love, but in all things, follow the Light of ſound Reaſon: For otherwiſe he will never be able to ſee either the Faults of thoſe he loves, or the good Qualities of thoſe to whom he has taken an Averſion. Chap. 8. Of paternal Affection.

In the ninth he proves, that the wiſe and prudent Manner, by which Families are regulated, is the Baſis of good Government in a Kingdom; that it is the ſame Principle which actuates and gives motion to both of them; that if we reverence and obey our Parents, we will alſo reverence and obey the King; that if in the Orders which are given, his Children and Domeſtics, are treated with Mildneſs, the ſame Lenity will be extended towards his Subjects; that this was the wiſe Council which the Emperor Vû vang gave to the King his Brother, ſaying, Love your People as a tender Mother loves her young Child; that this Love is infuſed by Nature, and requires no Study; that a Maid before her marriage, was never known to ſtudy how to manage in ſuckling her Child; that a wiſe Prince receives the ſame Inclination from Nature; that his Example is the Rule by which his Family is governed, and the government of his Family, the Model for the government of his Dominions. Chap. 9. The Regulation of Families is the Baſis of Government.

In the tenth Book he ſhews, that to govern a State well, a Prince ought to judge of others by himſelf; that he ought to avoid impoſing on his Subjects any Commands, which he would not be pleaſed to find in the Orders of one who had a right to command him; that he ought to gain the Hearts of his Subjects by his Virtue, and inſpire them with the Love of it by his Example; that the Happineſs of a State does not conſiſt in Gold and Silver, but in its abounding with virtuous Men; that a wiſe Prince ought, above all things, to be very careful in chuſing his Miniſters; that he ſhould caſt his Eye upon none but juſt, wiſe, honeſt and diſintereſted Perſons; that the Hearts of his Subjects is an inexhauſtble Treaſure to him; that he will loſe his Riches if he ſeeks to heap them up, and that if he diſtributes them liberally among his People, he will never fail to be Rich; that in ſhort, he will never taſte Happineſs, but in proportion as he renders his People happy, and prefers the public Good to his own private Intereſt. Chap. 10. How Princes ſhould act.

Chong yong, or, The immutable Medium. The ſecond Claſſical, or Canonical Book of the ſecond Order.

THIS Work, of which Confuçius is the Author, was publiſhed by his Grandſon Tſe tsé: And treats of the Medium which ought to be obſerved in all Things. Chong ſignifies Middle or Mean, and by Yong is underſtood that which is conſtant, eternal and immutable. Abſtract of the Chong yong.

He undertakes to prove that every wiſe Man, and eſpecially thoſe who are entruſted with the Government of Nations, ought to follow this Middle, in which Virtue conſiſts. He begins with a Definition of human Nature and its Paſſions: Then he introduces divers Examples of Virtues, The Doctrine of the Medium.

Virtues, and among the reſt, of Piety, Fortitude, Prudence, and filial Reſpect; as ſo many Patterns of the Medium that ought to be obſerved. He ſhews afterwards that this Medium, and the Practice of it, is the right and true Path for a wiſe Man to take, in order to arrive at the higheſt Pitch of Virtue.

The firſt Article. Reaſon the Rule of human Actions.

This Book is divided into 33 Articles. In the firſt he ſays, that the Law of Heaven is engraven even in the Nature of Man; that the Conduct of this Nature, or rather the ſecret Light that directs his Reaſon, is the right Path which he ought to follow in his Actions, and becomes the Rule of a wiſe and virtuous Life; that he muſt never ſtray from this Path, for which Cauſe a wiſe Man ought inceſſantly to watch over the Motions of his Heart and his Paſſions; that theſe Paſſions keep the Middle, and incline neither to the right nor left when they are calm; that if we know how to curb and moderate them when they riſe, they are then agreeable to right Reaſon; and, by this Conformity, Man keeps in that right Way, that Medium, which is the Source and Principle of virtuous Actions.

The 2d, 3d, &c. The Medium of ſeveral Virtues.

In the ſecond Article, and ſo to the twelfth, he deplores the unhappy State of the Generality of Mankind, whereof ſo very few follow this Middle wherein Virtue conſiſts. He enters next into a Detail of certain Virtues, and explains what is the Middle of Prudence, Piety and Fortitude; confirming his Doctrine by Examples of the ancient Emperors, and ſome Diſciples of Confucius.

The 12th & 13th. The Science eaſy as to Practice.

In the twelfth and thirteenth Articles, he makes it appear, that this Science of the Medium is ſublime, difficult and ſubtile in Speculation, but in Practice eaſy and common; that it extends to the moſt ordinary Actions of Life, as the Reſpect a Child owes to its Parent, the Deference due from a younger Brother to an Elder, and the Sincerity uſual between Friends.

The 14th. Effects of keeping the Medium.

In the fourteenth he ſhews, that in keeping the Medium, a wiſe Man confines himſelf to the Duties of his Employment, and does not meddle with other Affairs; that whatever Circumſtances, State or Place he is in, he is always the ſame, always Maſter of himſelf, being equally ſteady amidſt the hurry of Buſineſs, and in the repoſe of a private Life; that as he is never proud nor haughty in great Proſperity, ſo he diſcovers nothing mean or grovelling in a low and abject Condition.

The 15th &c. Examples of Princes.

From the fifteenth Article to the twenty firſt, he brings Examples of Princes, who both poſſeſſed and practiſed the Science of the Medium; amongſt the reſt he cites the Emperor Shun, Ven vang and Vû vang; affirming that Heaven rewarded the Reverence they payed their Parents, by advancing them to the Empire, and loading them with Riches and Honours. Afterwards he gives an Account of the Ceremonies, which theſe Princes inſtituted as well to honour the Lord of Heaven, as to give public Marks of their Mindfulneſs of, and Reſpect for the Memory of their deceaſed Parents.

The 20th. Virtues requiſite for regulating the Manners.

In the twentieth he ſhews, that to govern others well, we muſt know how to govern ourſelves; that the Regulation of Manners conſiſts principally in three Virtues, viz. Prudence, Integrity of Heart, and Fortitude; that Prudence is neceſſary for diſcovering the juſt Medium in queſtion; Integrity of Heart for purſuing it, and Fortitude for perſevering therein. Next he enumerates nine Virtues which an Emperor ought to be poſſeſſed of, in order to govern wiſely. (1.) He muſt regulate his whole Life and Conduct. (2.) He muſt honour wiſe Men in a particular Manner. (3.) He muſt love his Parents tenderly. (4.) He muſt treat the prime Miniſters of the Empire with Diſtinction. (5.) He muſt treat the Mandarins, and thoſe who aſpire to Offices, as he is treated himſelf. (6.) He muſt take Care of his Subjects as his own Children. (7.) He muſt draw into his Dominions ſuch as excell in any uſeful Art or Profeſſion. (8.) He muſt give a kind Reception to Strangers, and the Ambaſſadors of other Princes. (9.) He muſt keep all the Kings of the Empire, and the tributary Princes within the Bounds of their Duty — After this he explains the Advantages which will accrue to a Prince, by the Practice of theſe nine Virtues. If his Life be well regulated, it will ſerve as a Patern to his Subjects, who will form their Manners by his Example. If he honours wiſe Men, their Advice and Inſtructions will be of great ſervice to him, in governing himſelf and others prudently. If he loves his Parents and Relations, they will not look on his Grandeur and Advancement with an evil Eye; but will join in their Endeavours to maintain his Dignity and Power. If he treats the prime Miniſters of the Empire with Honour, they will aſſiſt him both with their Councils and Intereſt in any difficult and perplexing Affair; and he will know what Reſolutions he had beſt to take. If he has the ſame regard for the other Mandarins as himſelf, their Gratitude to ſo good a Prince, will make them more zealous and punctual in the Execution of their Truſts. If he takes care of his Subjects as if they were his Children, they will love him as if he was their Father. If he draws all ſorts of ſkilful Artiſts into his Empire, they will bring with them Riches and Plenty. If he receives Strangers kindly, the four Quarters of the World will reſound with his Fame, and the number of his Subjects will be encreaſed, by the People who will come from all Countries to taſte the Sweets of ſo wiſe a Government. Laſtly, if he keeps the tributary Princes within their Duty, his Authority will be reſpected, and Peace will reign in the Empire.

Thoſe required in Princes:

and their Effects.

The 21ſt &c. Truth the Eſſence of Virtue.

In the twelve following Articles, he makes it appear that theſe Virtues do not deſerve that Name, if they be not real and free from all Diſguiſe; that Truth is the eſſence of all Virtue; that the prudent Man who would follow the Medium in which Virtue conſiſts, ought to apply himſelf to the Study of Truth; that it reſides in the Heart by the Affection, and appears outwardly by the Practice; that when a Man has once acquired it, he extends his Views and Attention to every thing, foreſeeing what is to come, as if it was preſent; that in ſhort, if he

he who has attained to the Perfection of true Virtue, be poſſeſſed of the Sovereign power, he can eſtabliſh no Laws but what are wiſe, and for the good of the People.

Laſtly, in the 33d Article, he proves, that to acquire this Perfection in which the Medium of Virtue conſiſts, it is not neceſſary to perform difficult, painful and extraordinary Things; it ſuffices to apply himſelf particularly to this Virtue, which tho' hidden within us and not viſible to the Eyes of Men, will yet ſhew itſelf outwardly, become known and admired: Juſt as a Fiſh, which hides itſelf at the bottom of clear Water, always appears above. He ſupports this Doctrine by ſome inſtances of the ancient Emperors Ven vang and Vû vang, who are ſpoken of in the canonical Books, intitled I king, Shu king and Shi king.

33. Perfection eaſy to be acquired.

Lun yu, or, The Book of Sentences. The third Claſſical, or Canonical Book of the ſecond Order.

THIS Book is a Collection of Sentences and moral Diſcourſes, and divided into twenty Articles; which conſiſt only of Queſtions, Anſwers and Sayings, either of Confuçius or his Diſciples, on the Virtues, good Works, and the art of governing well: Excepting the ten Articles, wherein the Diſciples of Confuçius give a particular account of the outward Behaviour of their Maſter. We find in this Collection, as fine Maxims and Sentences of Morality, as any aſcribed to the ſeven wiſe Men of Greece, ſo much cry'd up. As it is not poſſible to give the Subſtance of ſo many ſcattered Maxims, I ſhall only offer a brief Account of the principal Matters treated of in each Article.

Abſtract of the Lun yu, or Book of Moral Sentences.

In the firſt he gives the Character of a wiſe Man, and ſhews what are his Virtues and Duties in every condition of Life, whether he be in a private Station, or at the Helm of Affairs. He ſays, among other things, that it is impoſſible a Flatterer ſhould be Virtuous: to which the Diſciple of Confuçius adds, that he examined himſelf every Day, with reſpect to three Things. (1.) If when he undertakes to do any one a Piece of Service, he applies himſelf wholly to it, and without Reſerve; (2.) If in converſing with his Friends, he behaves with Caudour and Fankneſs; (3.) If after he has heard his Maſter's Doctrine, he takes care to benefit by it and put it in Practice. He ſays likewiſe, that he who ſtudies Wiſdom, does not grieve for being little known to Men, but becauſe they are not ſufficiently known to him.

1. The Character of a wiſe Man.

In the ſecond he ſpeaks of the Duties of a Prince, who would govern his Subjects well; and of the Reverence due from Children to their Parents. He informs us by what Signs to diſtinguiſh a wiſe Man; with what Care we ought to avoid the evil Sects &c. Would you know, ſays he, whether a Man be wiſe or not? Examine well his Actions: If they are bad, he is but too well known: If they are good, try to find out the Motive that influenced him. Carry your Curioſity yet farther: Examine what his Inclinations are, and what he takes moſt Delight in; After this it will be in vain for him to counterfeit, ſince you have diſcovered what he really is at the Bottom. He who approves of the evil Sects, ſays he again, ſuch as thoſe of the Ho ſhang and Tau tsë Bonzas, does great Hurt to himſelf, and Injury to the Empire. There is no true Doctrine but that which we have received from the ancient Sages; which teaches us to follow right Reaſon, to preſerve Integrity of Heart, to retain a decent Behaviour, to correct our Faults and reform our Manners.

2. How to know a wiſe Man.

In the third he gives a particular Account of the Ceremonies preſcribed for honouring deceaſed Parents; and rebukes thoſe who neglect or tranſgreſs them. He ſpeaks of the Worſhip due to Spirits; of the imperial Laws, Muſic, and the Method of ſhooting with the Bow (‡).

3. Honour to deceaſed Parents.

In the fourth he ſpeak of the Duties of Children towards their Parents. He ſhews the Difference between an honeſt Man and a Knave, a wiſe Man and a Fool. Theſe following are ſome of his Maxims; we may judge even by Men's Faults, whether they are virtuous or not. A virtuous Man ſcarce ever offends, but thro' exceſs of Affection and Gratitude; a malicious Man commonly ſins thro' exceſs of Hatred and Ingratitude. The wiſe Man has nothing in View, but the Beauty of Virtue; and the Fool thinks of nothing but the Conveniences and Pleaſures of Life. The wiſe Man does not grieve for want of being advanced to great Employments, but becauſe he wants the neceſſary Qualifications for rendering him worthy of them. In beholding the Virtues of wiſe Men we are wiſe if we imitate them: In beholding the Vices of wicked Men, we are virtuous if we ſound ourſelves, and examine if we be not ſubject to the ſame Vices.

4. Duties of Children to Parents.

In the fifth, Confuçius gives his judgment with reſpect to the Qualifications, Diſpoſitions, Virtues and Failings of ſome of his Diſciples. He praiſes for inſtance, one named Tſu ven, who having been advanced thrice to the Office of prime Miniſter, in the Kingdom of Lû (now the Province of Hû quang) diſcovered no ſign of Joy; and having been as often deprived of his Dignity, ſhewed no ſign of Concern. To which he adds: I judge from thence that he is an excellent Miniſter, but dare not affirm he was Virtuous; for to be ſure of that, I ſhould have been able to dive into his Thoughts, and know if he poſſeſſed Integrity of Heart. He teaches afterwards, that we ſhould not judge of a Man's Virtue by ſome outward Actions, which often have only the appearance of Virtue; for that true Virtue dwells in the Heart, and in its natural Rectitude.

5. Character of the Diſciples of Kong fû tſë.

(‡) In this exerciſe, which was to teach them Archery, the Skin of a Beaſt was ſet up for a Mark. For the Emperor it was a Bear's-ſkin; for a King, the Skin of a Stag; for a Mandarin, that of a Tyger's Skin; and for one of the Literati, that of a Boar. The Emperor, in ſhooting, ſtood 120 Paces from the But; the King 80, the Mandarin 70, and the Man of Letters 50. Which different Diſtances, denoted the different Degrees of Power and Authority.

6. Their Characters Continued. In the ſixth Confuçius makes known ſome of his Diſciples, whom he judges fit for Government; and praiſes their extraordinary Zeal to learn and improve. Then he treats of the Manner to be obſerved in giving and receiving [Preſents.] Next he explains the Qualities of true Virtue. My Diſciple Yen whey, ſays he, was reduced to extream Poverty, having nothing to ſubſiſt on but Rice and Water; yet in this State of Indigence he never loſt his uſual Tranquility and Joy: Such a Man I call a true Sage ——— I call him a virtuous Man, who firſt bears with Conſtancy all the Difficulties that occur in acquiring Virtue; and afterwards thinks of taſting the Sweets which are found in the Poſſeſſion of it. ——— A virtuous Man may ſuffer himſelf to be deceived ſo far as to believe Falſhoods, but never ſo far as to do what is evil.

7. Kong fi tſe's humble thoughts of himſelf. In the ſeventh, he relates the mean Opinion Confuçius had of himſelf, and the Encomiums beſtowed on him by his Diſciples. It was not I ſaid the Philoſopher, who invented the Doctrine which I teach you: I take it from the Ancients, from whom I learned it. —— He ſaid another time, that he was continually uneaſy on four Accounts. Firſt, becauſe he had made too little Progreſs in Virtue; Secondly, becauſe he was not eager enough in purſuit of his Studies; Thirdly, becauſe he did not give himſelf up to the Duties which Juſtice preſcribes; Fourthly, becauſe he was not ſufficiently watchful over himſelf, and the Reformation of his Manners. ——— He ſaid alſo, I ſee myſelf in extream Indigence, a little Rice and Water being all I have to live upon; yet therewith I am chearful and content, becauſe I conſider the Dignities and Riches which are acquired by unjuſt Means, as Clouds driven about in the Sky by the Winds. ———How happy am I! ſaid he another time, for if I commit a Fault, it is immediately known to every body. ——— Being informed one Day that they gave him the Name of King, that is, moſt Wiſe: That Encomium does not ſuit me, ſaid he, nor can I ſuffer it. All the good that can be ſaid of me, is that I endeavour to acquire Wiſdom and Virtue; and am not diſcouraged by the trouble there is in teaching them to others. ——— His Diſciples ſayed of him, that he joined three Things together, which ſeemed almoſt incompatible: viz. All the Charms of Politeneſs with a great deal of Gravity; a ſevere Look with abundance of good Nature and Mildneſs; and an extraordinary greatneſs of with a great deal of Modeſty.

8. Encomium of the ancient Emperors. In the eighth, he makes the Encomium of the ancient Emperors Vû vang, Yu, Shun and Yau. He recites ſome Maxims of the Doctor Tſeng, and ſhews what are the Duties of a wiſe Man. Where is there to be found, ſays Confuçius, a greatneſs of Soul equal to that of the Emperors Shun and Yu? They were taken out of a very abject Condition to be raiſed to the Empire; and on the Throne they were ſo free from Ambition and vain Glory, that they poſſeſſed the Empire as if they poſſeſſed it not. —— When ſhall we find a Man of Abilities, who patiently liſtens to the Inſtructions given him by an ignorant Perſon? Where ſhall we find that Man, who being treated with Contempt and Outrage, does not think of Revenge? For my Part, I never knew any one of this Character, except my fellow Diſciple Yen ywen. —— A wiſe Man ſhould for ever be learning as if he knew nothing, and ſhould always be afraid of forgetting what he has learned.

9. Encomiums on Kong fi tſe. In the ninth, we meet with ſeveral Encomiums on Confuçius, his Doctrine and his Modeſty when he ſpoke of himſelf; with divers Precepts for acquiring Wiſdom. We ſhould not only reſpect old Men, ſaid Confuçius, but ſhould even reſpect young People: For how do I know, but this young Man may one Day become more wiſe and virtuous than myſelf? ——— I never yet met with any body ſo fond of Virtue, as I have found others fond of Pleaſure.

10. His Deportment. In the tenth, the Diſciples of Confuçius deſcribe the Air and outward Behaviour of their Maſter; his Manner of Deportment either at home or abroad, with Perſons of all Ages and Conditions; his Way of living, ſpeaking, walking, dreſſing, drinking, eating, ſleeping, &c.

11. His Converſation. In the eleventh, Confuçius converſes with his Diſciples: He praiſes ſome and reproves others. One of them deſiring that he would teach him how to die well: You have not yet learned how to live well, ſayed Confuçius, and yet you will know how to die well.

12. Rules for Government and living well. In the twelfth, Confuçius teaches how to make our Actions conformable to right Reaſon: Then he preſcribes Rules for governing the People well; gathering the Tribute and acquiring Virtue. Somebody aſking him what he ought to do in order to live well: When you appear abroad, ſaid he, be as grave and modeſt, as if you were viſiting ſome great Lord: Treat others in the ſame Manner you would be treated yourſelf: Neither do, nor ſay any thing that may give Provocation or Uneaſineſs. —— He ſaid to another of his Diſciples: Life and Death depend on the Law of Tyen, which we cannot alter: Poverty and Riches come from the free Diſpenſation of Tyen, which cannot be compelled: The wiſe Man reveres this Law and Diſpenſation of Tyen; and therein is the Source of the Peace and Tranquility he enjoys.

13. Qualities of a wiſe Man. In the thirteenth, he points out the Qualifications and Virtues, which conſtitute a wiſe and prudent Man. I believe a Man to be wiſe, ſays he, when I find that he gains the Love of all good Men, and is hated by none but bad Men. —— I think that a Man would be virtuous, when I ſee that he is modeſt in his own Houſe, active in Buſineſs, and candid in his Converſation with others.

14. And of a Miniſter of State. In the fourteenth, he ſpeaks of the Duty of a wiſe Man; the Care which Heaven takes of Kingdoms; the Qualifications belonging to a Miniſter of State, and the Zeal he ought to have for good Government. He who is very ready at making Promiſes, ſays Confuçius, finds it difficult to keep them. ——— The Ancients, ſays he again, ſtudyed Wiſdom for its own ſake, that is, to know the Truth and acquire Virtue: The Moderns apply themſelves to ſtudy Virtue, for ſake of others, that is, to get a Name and acquire Honour and Riches. ——— Does not the Father who loves his Son, take care to correct him when he commits a Fault? In like Manner ſhould not a faithful Miniſter, acquaint his Prince, when he is wanting in any of his Duties?

The fifteenth contains divers Maxims, touching the Virtues of a wiſe Man, and the great Art of reigning. Theſe are ſome of them: When a Man is hated by every body, before you hate him, examine what it is that is hateful in him. When a Man is generally beloved, before you love him, examine what it is that renders him amiable. Not to mend our Faults, is to commit new ones. ——— Be ſevere to yourſelf and gentle to others, and you will never have Enemies. ——— The wiſe Man loves to be by himſelf; the Fool ſeeks Company. 15. Maxims of Government and Wiſdom.

In the ſixteenth, he exclaims againſt a prime Miniſter, who did not diſſwade his Prince from making an unjuſt War, and ſhews the ill Conſequences of bad Government. He ſpeaks afterwards of ſuch Perſons and Things as we ought to love; of what a wiſe Man ought to ſhun, and in what Manner Confuçius inſtructed his Son. The following are ſome of his Maxims. If a Leopard or Tyger breaks out of the royal Park, who is to anſwer for it? If Troubles and Diſſention overturn a State, who is to be blamed for it? —— I have ſeen a great Prince afflict himſelf, not becauſe his Subjects were few in Number, but becauſe they were ambitious: Not on account of the Poverty of his Kingdom, but for the Diſcord that reigned in it. In effect, if Ambition be baniſhed from a State, it will quickly grow rich: If Tranquility and Subordination prevail, it will quickly ſwarm with People. —— Three Sorts of Friends are uſeful: Thoſe which are virtuous; thoſe which are frank and ſincere; and thoſe who are learned. ——— A young Man, when in preſence of a Perſon venerable either for Age or Dignity, may commit three Faults: The firſt, if he ſpeaks without being ſpoken to, he will paſs for a forward Rattle. Secondly, if when he is ſpoken to he makes no Anſwer, he will be taken for a tricking deceitful Man. The third, if he ſpeaks without conſidering well what he ſays, he will be looked on as a Fool. 16. What we ought to love and ſhun. Maxims.

The ſeventeenth contains the Opinion of Confuçius, with reſpect to the Mandarins who deſert their Princes Intereſt; the Virtues requiſite in a Prince; thoſe whom a wiſe Man ought to hate, and the Obligation of mourning three Years for the Death of a Father or Mother. I would have a Prince, ſays Confuçius, to be Grave and Good, a Speaker of Truth, diligent in Affairs, and Liberal. If he has Gravity, he will be reſpected by his Subjects; if he has Goodneſs, he will gain all their Hearts; if he loves Truth, he will obtain their Confidence, and give no occaſion of Jealouſy; if he is diligent, his People will labour to improve themſelves; if he is liberal, they will obey him with pleaſure. —— There are four ſorts of Perſons, ſays Confucius again, who ought to be odious to a wiſe Man. (1.) Thoſe malignant Spirits, who love to publiſh the Faults of others. (2.) Thoſe vile Wretches, who ſpeak ill of their Princes. (3.) Thoſe Men in power, who have no Sentiments of Humanity. (4.) Thoſe bold and raſh Men, who act without the leaſt Reflection. Tſu kung, one of his Diſciples taking up the Diſcourſe. There are three others ſayed he, whom I cannot endure. (1.) Thoſe groſs and ignorant People, who would fain appear Judicious and Knowing. (2.) Thoſe haughty and preſumptuous Mortals, who affect Courage and Valour. (3.) Thoſe ſatyrical carping Spirits, who would be thought Juſt and Sincere. ——— There is one thing which appears to me very difficult, ſays Confuçius again, that is, to govern Women and Servants: If you treat them with Gentleneſs and Familiarity, they loſe all reſpect: If you make uſe of rigour, there will be continual Diſturbances and Complaints. 17. The Virtues requiſite in a Prince.

In the eighteenth he ſpeaks in Praiſe of ſome ancient Princes, or Emperors and their Miniſters: He ſhews how hurtful the love of Women in a Prince is to good Government: He relates the Actions of certain Sages, who led a recluſe and obſcure Life: He ſpeaks afterwards of divers Muſicians, which were formerly employed at Entertainments: Laſtly, he ſets down the Rules of good Government, in reciting the Inſtructions given by a Prince to his Son. 18. Rules of good Government.

In the nineteenth, he ſhews what are the Duties of one who would acquire Wiſdom; and after ſetting forth the Method of teaching his Diſciples, he vindicates his Maſter Confuçius from certain ill-grounded Reflections, and makes his Encomium. The following are ſome of his Maxims. He who is negligent in the Study of Wiſdom, and of a light and wavering Temper, will never, during his Life, encreaſe the Number of Sages, or diminiſh it when he dies. ——When we are going to converſe with a true Sage, we find him in three different Situations: When we perceive him at a Diſtance, his Countenance is grave and ſevere; when we draw near and diſcourſe him, his Air and Behaviour is full of Sweetneſs and Affability; when we hear him ſpeak, we are charmed with his Steadineſs and Integrity. ——— A wiſe Miniſter ought in the firſt place to perſwade the People that he loves them, and has their Intereſt at Heart; when he has gained this Point, he may without fear exact the Tribute of the People, who will not think themſelves agrieved: Next he ſhould convince the Prince thoroughly of his fidelity and attachment to his Perſon, without which all his Counſels will be looked upon as Injuries. ——— Tho' the Emperor Chew was not ſo wicked as he is repreſented; yet as he has left a bad Character behind him, we commonly attribute all ſorts of Crimes to him: For this reaſon, a wiſe Man avoids the very appearance of Vice, for fear he ſhould be charged with many Vices, which in reality he was not guilty of. 19. Kong fu tſe Vindicated. Maxims.

The twentieth contains the Beginnings and Succeſs of the wiſe Government of the Emperors Yau, Shun, Yu, Ching tang and Vû vang; with the Properties of a good Government, and the Defects of a bad one. All that they recommended to their Miniſters and Subjects, was to follow that juſt Medium or Mean, in which Right reaſon and Virtue conſiſts. 20. Wiſe Government of the firſt Emperor.

Abſtract of the Book of Meng-tſe.

MENG is the Name of the Author, and Tſe denotes his Quality, as Doctor: Which implies that this Book was compoſed by the Doctor Meng. He was related to the Kings or Princes of the Kingdom of Lû, now the Province of Shan-tong, and the Diſciple of Tſe tſe the Grand-ſon of Coufuçius. Su ma Author of the Annals of the Empire, who has collected the Precepts and Actions of the great Men, from the Emperor Yau, to the reign of the Dynaſty of the Han, makes great Encomiums upon the Work of Mencius. None of the Diſciples of Confuçius, ſays he, has expreſſed that Philoſopher's Senſe and Energy ſo well; And whoever would be inſtructed in his Doctrine aright, ought to begin his Studies with the Work of Mençius.

Treats of good Government.

His Book is divided into two Parts; the firſt containing ſix Chapters, and the ſecond eight. He treats of good Government, almoſt throughout this Work: And as at that time, the whole Empire was filled with Commotions and civil Wars, above all things, he recommends Uprightneſs of Heart and Equity. For this reaſon, he proves, that the Re-eſtabliſhment of Peace and Tranquility in the Empire, was not to be attain'd by the force of Arms, but by the Examples of Virtue. Theſe Diſcourſes are connected in form of Dialogues or Converſations, which he had either with his Diſciples or with Princes. And the better to illuſtrate what he advances, he frequently makes uſe of Similitudes, and familiar Compariſons agreeable to the ancient Cuſtom.

His deſign in this Work is reduceable to four Heads. Firſt, he much eſteems and praiſes the Manner in which the Empire was governed, under the three firſt imperial Families, namely thoſe of Hya, Shang and Chew. Secondly, he deſpiſes and diſapproves of the Conduct of ſome Sovereigns, who imagined that they were able to re-eſtabliſh Peace, by means of their Arms. Thirdly, he ſhews in what, the Goodneſs and Rectitude of human Nature conſiſts. Fourthly, he refutes the dangerous Errors of ſome Sectaries.

Having premiſed this general Idea, I ſhall now enter into the Detail, and give an Abridgment of each Chapter.

PART I. CHAPTER I.

Dialogue between Meng tſe and Prince of Ghey.

THE firſt Chapter contains a Dialogue, betwixt Mençius and the Prince of the Kingdom of Ghey, who after his Death was called Whey vang. Whey ſignifies beneficent, and Vang Prince; for which reaſon he is called likewiſe Lyang Whey vang, that is to ſay, the beneficient King of Lyang or Ghey, which is now the Province of Ho nan, and its Capital Ta lyang is now called Kay fong.

Princes ſhould have no view but Piety and Equity.

The Prince of Lyang having invited the Philoſophers into his Kingdom, Mençius repaired thither. The firſt Inſtruction he gives the Prince, is to have no other view in Government, but Piety and Equity. A Prince, he tells him, is a Pattern to his Subjects: If he ſeeks only to advance his particular Intereſts, his Miniſters, the Mandarins, the Literati, and even the People, will regard nothing but theirs; and by this means the common Wealth muſt be neglected, and the Kingdom reduced to the Brink of ruin.

In the ſecond Viſit which Mençius made the Prince, he found him walking in his Park, and diverting himſelf with ſeeing the Swans ſwimming in the Pond, and the Deer running through the Forreſt. Can a King, ſaid that Prince, who is only intent upon the Government of his People, ſtoop to theſe Sorts of Amuſements?

May recreate themſelves as well as other People.

Princes, anſwers Mençius, may take reaſonable Diverſions like other Men: We read in the Shi king, that the wiſe Emperor Ven vang having drawn up the Plan of a Tower for aſtronomical Obſervations, a Park, and a Pond, the People ran with ſo much zeal to aſſiſt the Building, and were ſo eager in their Services to promote theſe Works, that they were finiſhed in a very few Days.

That good Prince amuſed himſelf from time to time, with walking in his Avenues, in ſeeing his tame Deer running about, in obſerving his Fiſhes ſwimming, and his Storks flying. Whence proceeded the Zeal of that People, for contributing to the Pleaſures of their Prince? Becauſe he governed them with Piety and Juſtice, and becauſe that wiſe Emperor took great care that his Subjects ſhould be deſtitute of none of the Neceſſaries of Life.

On the contrary, the Emperor Kyé, who uſed to ſay, that he was in the Empire, the ſame that the Sun is in the Firmament, and that he would periſh only with that Luminary, felt no Joy amidſt his Pleaſures, and lived in continual Diſquiet; becauſe his People looked on him as an execrable and deteſtable Object.

Eſſential Duties of a good Government.

He then ſhews the Prince, that Inhabitants are never wanting in a Kingdom well governed: That it is an eſſential Part of good Government, to take Care that the Kingdom may abound with the Neceſſaries of Life; to ſee that the Lands are cultivated, that there be Plenty of Fiſh, and that Trees may be planted and pruned at proper Seaſons; to be attentive in ſettling the the Diviſions of Grounds, and in bringing up domeſtic Animals, and Silk-Worms, to be moderate in afflicting Puniſhments, or impoſing Taxes, and to take care that the Morals of Youth be rightly formed: By theſe Means, a Prince gains the Affection of his People, and when he is Maſter of that, he will find no Difficulty in eſtabliſhing Laws, in giving uſeful Inſtructions, and in erecting Schools.

But a Prince ought chiefly to aſſiſt his People in a Time of Famine. Very blameable and unworthy of a Throne, is that Prince, who, in ſuch a Time, for his own Pleaſure, maintains a Parcel of uſeleſs Beaſts, that devour the Proviſions neceſſary for the Subſiſtence of Mankind, while his Subjects are ſtarving. Will you ſay, adds Mencius, that the Famine, and not you, is the Cauſe, why theſe People die. You may as well tell me, when you have run a Man through with a Sword; It was not I, but the Sword, which killed that Man; Where is the difference to a Perſon, whether he dies by the edge of the Sword, or under the Tyranny of his Prince? We naturally hate thoſe wild Beaſts, which kill and devour one another; but theſe are only Emblems of the Prince, who prefers the Lives of Brutes, to the Lives of his People, whom he ought to look upon as his Children.

Mencius ſeeing that no great advantage was reaped from his Inſtructions, in the Kingdom of Ghey, directed his courſe to the Kingdom of Tſi, at that time governed by Sven vang. This Or Swn. Prince being greedy of Glory won by Valour, ſaid to the Philoſopher, We have five Princes, whoſe heroick Atchievments make a great noiſe in the Empire: Two who have render'd their Names illuſtrious by their Conqueſts, are more particularly talk'd of. Inform me of their glorious Actions, Confuçius and his Diſciples, anſwered Mencius, would have bluſhed to have praiſed theſe five Princes; or to have tranſmitted their warlike Virtues to Poſterity; they, and I who am their Diſciple, apply only to the Study of Virtue, and the Rules of good Government, as we have them in the Writings and Examples of our antient Emperors. Ha! what are theſe Rules? ſaid the Prince. Equity and Piety, anſwered Mençius. If you poſſeſs the two Virtues, you will eſtabliſh Peace and Tranquillity in your State: And you will love your People as your own Children.

But is that a Thing in my Power, replied the Prince. Do you doubt of that? ſaid Mencius. Hû he your firſt Miniſter told me, that one Day as you were walking out of your Palace, you ſaw an Ox, whom they had bound, and were leading out of the Walls to be ſlaughtered; and that being melted with the Sight, you ordered the Ox to be carried back to his Stall. If the Death of a worthleſs Animal, could excite your Compaſſion, can your Heart be inſenſible, when you ſee the Miſeries of your People? But you love the claſhing of Arms, you delight in raiſing Troops, and are pleaſed to ſee your Subjects face Death and Danger.

By no means, ſays the Prince, that is none of my Pleaſures: It is a violent Remedy which I uſe againſt my own Inclination, in order to gain what I want. Ha! replies Mencius, what can you want? Is not your Table furniſhed with exquiſite Meats? Can your Habits be more Magnificent? or is there any thing wanting to ſooth your Senſes? Have you not a vaſt Croud of Domeſtics, that watch your ſlighteſt Motions to ſerve you, and to execute your Orders? What can you wiſh for more?

Theſe are Trifles, anſwered the Prince, my Views are more exalted. To what do you then aſpire? replied Mencius. To extend your Kingdom? To ſubdue the neighbouring Nations? To invade the Empire? That is as idle as if you ſhould mount to the Top of that Tree, expecting there to find Fiſhes.

Nay, replies the Prince, you now carry you Reflections too far. By no means, ſaid Mencius, I have not ſaid enough: For he who climbs to the Top of that Tree to find Fiſhes; it is true, gives himſelf a very needleſs Trouble, but then no Body ſuffers beſides Himſelf: His Undertaking, vain as it is, never harms the Common-wealth, and is never attended with any publick Calamity. But by the Wars which you carry on, you torment your ſelf with a thouſand Troubles and Diſquiets, you drain your Kingdom and plunge it into the moſt frightful Miſery. Believe me, Sir; Direct all your Views only to the Government of your State: Endeavour all you can to render your People happy; take Care they are reaſonably provided with all Neceſſaries: See that the Grounds are cultivated, and that Plenty reigns; Watch over the Reformation of Manners, and the Education of Youth: Where Tyranny obtains, the People will abandon that Land, and crowd to taſte the Sweets of your Government; and in ſhort, they will count it a Happineſs, that their Days ſhould gently glide on, and their Lives terminate under the peaceable Sway of of ſo moderate and ſo virtuous a Prince.

CHAPTER II.

KING Sven vang owned to Mencius, that he was much delighted with Muſic: The Philoſopher, far from condemning this Taſte, told him, That it might be very uſeful to good Government, becauſe of the Relation betwixt the Harmony of Sounds and that of Hearts; and becauſe Harmony, or the well regulated Concert of many Sounds, is a ſenſible Image of the Union, which ought to ſubſiſt betwixt the Head and Members of the Body Politic. But, that this Harmony and good Underſtanding cannot ſubſiſt, if the Prince ſtudies only his own Diverſions; and is ſo far from ſharing them with the People, that he ſuffers them to be plunged into Sadneſs and Miſery. This is the Source of Diſaffection and Murmurings.

The Prince ſhifted the Subject. I have heard, ſaid he, that Ven vang's Park was ſeventy Chineſe Furlongs in Circumference, and yet that the People thought it too little. Mine is but forty, and my Subjects think it too large. How can we account for theſe different Judgments of the People?

I will inform you, anſwered Mencius: Every body was allowed to enter the Park of Ven vang, to carry off what Wood or Pulſe he had a mind; and to hunt the Pheaſants and Hares. The Entry of the Park was ſhut to none, for which reaſon, the People thought it too little. When I came into your Territories, I informed my ſelf of the Uſages in your Kingdom, that I might obſerve them, and likewiſe of the Reſtrictions and Prohibitions, that I might not infringe them. I was told that you had a Park forty Furlongs in Circumference: That all your Subjects were debarred from it; and that if any one was ſo bold as to venture to kill or to wound any of your Deer in it, he was puniſhed as ſeverely as if he had killed or wounded a Man: Are you aſtoniſhed after this, that your People ſhould think your Park too large?

The Prince, who by no means reliſh'd this Advice, aſk'd another Queſtion; Teach me, ſaid he; What I ſhall do to preſerve Peace in my State, and to gain the Friendſhip of the Princes my Neighbours? Two Things, replies the Philoſoper: 1. Be obliging, friendly, and always ready to ſerve thoſe who are weaker; 2. Be reſpectful and ſubmiſſive to thoſe who are ſtronger than your-ſelf. He then exhorts him not to abandon himſelf to the Tranſports of a fiery and impetuous Temper; ſhewing him, That real Strength conſiſts in curbing his Anger and ſubduing his Paſſions, and that true Wiſdom has no Aim but pure Equity.

The Prince, having at another time admitted Mencius into his Pleaſure-houſe, Has ſo delicious a Manſion, ſaid he, nothing inconſiſtent with the Wiſdom that a King ought to profeſs? No, anſwered Mencius, if that King ſhares in the Joy, and ſympathiſes in the Grief of his Subjects: If he taſtes the Pleaſures, and feels the Pains of his People; they, in Return, will partake of his Griefs, and ſhare in his Joys: It is by theſe means, that a Kingdom is rightly governed.

The ancient Emperors, added Mencius, paid every twelfth Year a Viſit to their tributary Kings and Kingdoms: And this Viſit was called Inſpection. Every ſixth Year theſe Kings repaired to the Court of the Emperor, there to to give an Account of their Conduct, and after what Method they govern'd their States.

In the ſame Manner, the Emperors within their Territories, and the Kings in their Kingdoms, made two yearly Progreſſes: The firſt in the Spring, to examine if the Lands had been carefully ſowed and tilled: And if in any Place Seed was wanting, wherewith to ſow them; they furniſh'd it out of the public Granaries. The ſecond Progreſs was in Autumn, at the time when the Crop is gathered in: And if it was not ſufficient to ſubſiſt the People, they opened the public Granaries for their Relief.

Very different from this, is the Conduct of modern Princes. It is true, they viſit their Kingdoms. But in what Manner? They march attended with near three Thouſand Soldiers, who devour the greateſt Part of the Proviſions neceſſary to ſubſiſt the poor People, who are faint and languiſhing with Hunger. Shall we wonder, in the Bitterneſs of Soul and the Oppreſſion under which they groan, if they ſeek ſome Relief from their Murmurings, and the perpetual Invectives with which they tear in Pieces the Reputations of their Princes. Thus, I have laid before you the Conduct of our ancient and modern Princes, and leave it to yourſelf; which of them you will chuſe to imitate.

He afterwards propoſes the Emperor Ven vang as a Pattern. This Prince exacted no other Tax from Huſbandmen than the ninth Part of their Crop: He aſſigned Penſions to the Sons and the Grand-ſons of the deceaſed Mandarins. No Cuſtom-houſes were known in his Dominions. Merchandizes were there exported and imported without being taxed: None were then debarred from fiſhing in Lakes and public Rivers: If a Criminal was to be puniſhed, as he tranſgreſſed in Perſon, ſo he was chaſtiſed in Perſon; nor did his Puniſhment reach, as at preſent, to his Wife and Children. In ſhort, this Prince, tho' he diſtinguiſhed every Moment of his Reign by Goodneſs and Clemency, yet he extended their Effects principally to four Sorts of Perſons: To old Men who had no Wives: To Widows: To old Men who were childleſs; and to young Orphans who were fatherleſs. Theſe four Species of Unhappineſs, appear'd to him moſt worthy of Compaſſion; becauſe being deſtitute of all human Aid, they had no other Recourſe but to the Goodneſs of their Prince; who, tho' he is the Father of all his Subjects, is more particularly ſo of thoſe, who are moſt helpleſs.

What would you ſay, Sir, continued Mencius; if he, who is at the Head of the ſupreme Tribunal of Juſtice, did not watch over the Conduct of his inferior Officers, and was at no Pains to be informed of the Manner in which the Magiſtrates adminiſter Juſtice, if he ſuffer'd the Innocent to be puniſh'd, and the Guilty to eſcape? I would diſplace him, anſwer'd the Prince. But, adds the Philoſopher, if a King neglects the Care of his Kingdom, and if he never minds the Inſtruction of his People, nor compaſſionates their Miſeries; if he protects not the unhappy and the forlorn, what is your Opinion of him? At theſe Words, the Prince bluſh'd, and appeared diſconcerted: He threw his Eyes from the one Side to the other, as if he had been diſtracted, and diſmiſt the Philoſopher without any Anſwer.

Mencius in another Conference, inſtructs the Prince in the right Choice of his Miniſters. He adviſes him not to give too much Credit to the Recommendations of private Men, who might ſurprize him; nor even to the Voice of the People, upon whom it was eaſy to impoſe: But to have a perſonal Knowledge of their Probity, their Diſintereſtedneſs, their Zeal and their Underſtandnig:

derſtanding: He then recommends to his Choice, ſuch as have inceſſantly applied to the Study of Wiſdom from their Childhood, and, by their Labour and Application, have acquired at their riper Age the Qualifications neceſſary for right Government.

CHAPTER III.

THIS Chapter contains a Dialogue betwixt Mencius and his Diſciple Kung ſung chew, upon the Art of Governing. He proves from a View of the Troubles which then harraſſed the Empire, and the Miſeries which afflicted the People in ſeveral Kingdoms; that it was eaſy for a Prince who reigned with Juſtice and Moderation, to gain the Affection of all, and to make himſelf univerſal Monarch. But where, continued he, can we find a Prince with theſe Qualifications? Thoſe happy Days, when Kingdoms were governed by wiſe Princes, are no more, and ſcarce the Memory of them remains.

There is farther required in a Governor a ſtable and an unſhaken Soul, both when he determines in a puzling Caſe, and when he is expoſed to Danger. He then cites many Examples of thoſe great Men whom nothing could ſhake; and who might be deprived of their Lives, but not of their Intrepidity and Courage.

He diſtinguiſhes Reſolution into two Kinds, one, peculiar to narrow Minds, the other, to great Souls. The former is directed by the firſt Torrent of an impetuous Ardour; the laſt by the Dictates of right Reaſon. I remember, ſays Mencius, that our Maſter Confucius formerly gave me two Rules, in which I can eaſily diſcern true Fortitude, and a genuine Greatneſs of Soul. If an Opportunity ſhall offer to fight, ſaid he, and if, after mature Deliberation, I perceive that it would be unjuſt in me to attack mine Enemy, even tho' he is a great deal weaker than me, and unable to make Head againſt me, or to keep the Victory one Moment in Suſpence, yet I would forbear to attack him. You may eaſily perceive from this, that it is not Cowardiſe that damps me. But if after due Reflection, I am convinced that it is juſt in me to make the Onſet, tho' I had Millions to encounter, nothing ſhould be able to ſtop me from plunging undaunted amongſt the thickeſt Battalions.

Mencius next proceeds to the Manner of right Government. There is a great deal of difference, ſaid he, betwixt the Conduct of our ancient Emperors, and our modern Princes: The firſt loved Peace, and the latter, War: The firſt by their Piety and examplary Virtue, commanded not only the Hands, but the Hearts of Men; the latter command the Hands but not the Hearts.

Where is the Prince, whoſe ruling Paſſion is not for Glory? Or who has an Averſion to whatever can ſully his Reputation? Glory is only won by Virtue, and Diſgrace can be occaſioned only by Vice. Whence then can it proceed, that Princes who ſo much dread Infamy among Men, ſhould abandon themſelves to their Paſſions and Vices? In this, they are like Men who cannot bear with Dampneſs, yet want to lodge in a low and moiſt Apartment. If they are ſo jealous of their Reputation, why do they not take the only method both for eſtabliſhing and preſerving it? This Method is to ſubdue their corrupt Inclinations, to eſteem Virtue, to wage no War but with Vices, to honour the Learned, to raiſe the Wiſe and Virtuous to the firſt Dignities, and to take advantage of the public Tranquility for eſtabliſhing wiſe and uſeful Laws; a Prince of this Character renders himſelf always formidable to his Enemies, and attracts the Eſteem and Veneration of his Equals.

But what is the preſent Practice? While the Empire is peaceable, and the People begin to taſte the Sweets of Tranquillity, the Princes ſtudy only to abandon themſelves to Pleaſure, and to effeminate themſelves more and more by Luxury and Idleneſs. Is it to be wondered at, if under a Prince of this Character, a Kingdom appears to totter, if the People murmur, and if they are upon the Point of being attacked by new Enemies?

There is none, continued Mencius, but receives from Nature a certain Tenderneſs of Heart, which gives them a ſenſibility of their Neighbours miſery. A Prince whoſe Paſſions have not ſtifled this natural Propenſity, and who pities the Afflictions of his People, has no more difficulty in governing his Kingdom, than if he could hold it in his Hand.

But how can this ſecret Propenſity of Nature, this Senſibility with which we are born be diſcerned? An Example will inſtruct you. You ſee a Child all of a ſudden ready to fall into a Well; your Heart is immediately touched, and you fly to ſave it. You are not then determined by Reflection, nor influenced by the thoughts of deſerving the Acknowledgments of the Father and the Mother, or of procuring to yourſelf an empty Honour; you act by an Impulſe purely natural. In unforſeen Events, and when there is no Time either for Reflection or Deliberation, it is genuine Nature that acts. It is not ſo at other Junctures, which admit of Deliberation before Action; for there Diſguiſe and Diſſimulation may enter.

What I have ſaid of Compaſſion, adds Mencius, I apply to the other Virtues: To Piety, to Equity, to Humanity, and to Prudence: We have the Seeds and Principles of them all in our Heart, and if we took care to follow the Hints they give us, we ſhould be in a continual Guard againſt the Paſſions that are alone able to deſtroy them, and every Day perfect ourſelves more and more.

One of the Diſciples of Confucius, whoſe Name was Tsë lu, had ſo great a deſire for Perfection, that it gave him an exquiſite Pleaſure when he was told of any Fault. The Emperor Yu immediately beſtowed marks of his Reſpect and Acknowledgment upon the Man who gave gave him good Advice. The great Shun, regarding Virtue not as the property of a particular Perſon, but as a common Good belonging to all Mankind; he made an Advantage of, and ſtudied to acquire, all the Perfections and Virtues which he ſaw in others. This he put in Practice, through all the Degrees of his Life, not only while he was Huſbandman in the Plains of Lye ſhan, a Potter in the City of Ho pin, or a Fiſherman upon the Lake Lâ i tſe, but even when he was Emperor.

When a Man endeavours thus to appropriate to himſelf the Virtues which he remarks in others, he renders Virtue common to all. For in profiting by another's Example, he ſets the ſame Example to others, that they may profit in their Turn.

CHAPTER IV.

MENCIUS continues the Converſation, which he had begun in the preceeding Chapter, with his Diſciple. He treats firſt of three Things which are neceſſary to Succeſs in War; namely, the Choice of Time, the Advantage of Ground, and the Concord and Union of ſuch as either attack or defend a Place. But he judges the laſt Circumſtance more abſolutely, and more eſpecially, neceſſary.

I ſhall ſuppoſe, ſays he, that a City is in the beſt State of Defence, both by the height of its Walls, the deepneſs of its Ditches, the number and bravery of its Garriſon; and in ſhort by the plenty of its Proviſions. With all theſe Advantages, if there is Diſcord among Troops, or if a Miſunderſtanding divides the Officers and the Soldiers, the City will be carried ſoon, and without much Reſiſtance.

One of the Diſciples of Mençius, a little after, puts a Queſtion to him which he thought would puzzle him: I perceive, ſaid he to his Maſter, in the different Kingdoms where you have reſided, you ſometimes accepted, and ſometimes refuſed the Preſents proferred you by their Kings. You have refuſed 2400 Taëls of fine Silver from the King of Tſi, yet made no ſcruple to accept of 1680 from the King of Song, and of 1200 from the King of Sye. I find no uniformity in this Conduct: The ſame Reaſon that made you refuſe the Preſents of the one, ought to have induced you to have refuſed thoſe of the others.

You are miſtaken, anſwered Mençius: I did nothing but what was agreeable to the Lights of Reaſon and Equity. While I was in the Kingdom of Song, and ready to make a long Voyage, it was both polite and equitable in the Prince, to ſupply me with Money for defraying my neceſſary Expences, conſequently, I had a good Reaſon for accepting his Preſent. The Kingdom of Sye, while I was there, reſounded with the noiſe of Arms, and was threatened by an immediate Irruption of the Enemy: Amidſt theſe Tumults I run the riſque of being ſtarved, and it was but reaſonable that the Prince, who had invited me into his Dominions, ſhould provide for my Subſiſtence. But as to what concerns the King of Tſi, as he had no Reaſon to give me a Preſent, ſo I had none to accept of it, which if I had done, it had been a ſhameful Avarice in me, and unworthy of a Man, who had ſpent his Life in the Study of Wiſdom.

Mençius having gone to the City of Ping lo, which was in the Kingdom of Tſi, he found the Country lying waſte through a general Barrenneſs: One half of the numerous Inhabitants periſhed of Hunger, and the other half left the ungrateful Soil to ſeek for Food in more diſtant Kingdoms. Mençius addreſſing himſelf to Kiw ſin, who was Governor of the City; If any of your Soldiers, ſaid he, while upon Duty, ſhould five times ſucceſſively deſert his Rank, would you not puniſh him? I would not wait for his doing it three times, replies the Governor, for I would puniſh him the firſt time. You are in the right, replies Mençius; but you condemn yourſelf for neglecting what is more important in your Charge. During theſe melancholy Years of Barrenneſs; the People periſh of Hunger and Miſery: I ſee many ſtooping under the weight of Years, who fall with meer Weakneſs into the Ditches, and there finiſh their unhappy Lives; I ſee others, and theſe are the greater Number, who being young, and full of Vigour, rove from one End of the Empire to the other, to ſeek whereupon to live. Alas! replies Kiw ſin, ſin, I lament theſe Calamities, and I wiſh I were able to apply a Remedy. But I have no Authority to cauſe the Granaries to be opened, or to exempt the People from their Tributes. If a rich Man, replies Mençius, ſhould commit to you the Care of his Flocks, and would not aſſign them proper Paſturage, what would you do? You are the Paſtor of this great People: And you ought to addreſs yourſelf to the King, to relieve their Miſeries and to ſupply their Neceſſities: If the King will not hear you, can you calmly ſee them die of Hunger, and will not you rather throw up your Government?

Mençius finding that the wiſe Councils which he gave to the King of Tſi and his Miniſters were all loſt, reſolved to retire to his native Country. One of his Diſciples called Yu who attended him in his Voyage, obſerving a certain Cloud of Sadneſs and Melancholy hanging on his Countenance, ſaid to him; I have often heard you ſay, that a wiſe Man is never uneaſy, if Heaven no longer favours his Undertakings; and that he never complains when Men refuſe to conform themſelves to his Maxims; yet you have a melancholy Air which is far from being natural to you, and doubtleſs is a mark of ſome ſecret Diſcontent.

No, replies Mençius, I complain neither of Heaven nor of Men: I am only gay or ſad, according to my different Situation. When I led a private and a ſolitary Life, I was imployed only in the Study of Wiſdom. But at preſent, while I teach my Doctrine to Princes and People, and while I have the public Good in View, I am melancholy.

CHAP. V

CHAPTER V.

THIS Chapter contains a Dialogue betwixt Mençius and Prince Ven kung, Heir of the Principality of Teng. The Philoſopher ſhews him, that every Man is capable of practiſing Virtue, and imitating the Sages; becauſe the Goodneſs of Nature which we receive from Tyen [Heaven,] is the ſame in all Men, and this Goodneſs is no other than a natural Inclination to Juſtice and Piety.

When Paſſions grow up with Years, ſaid he, if Reaſon moderates them, Nature then perfects herſelf, and the Man becomes virtuous. He next propoſes the Emperors Yau and Shun for Patterns. Think not, continues the Philoſopher, that the Virtues of theſe Heroes can't be attained. They were Men like you, and according to the Endeavours you uſe, and the Application which you give, you may become wiſe like them. All I fear is, leſt you ſhould be diſcouraged with the Difficulties you muſt encounter in your Endeavours to ſubdue your Paſſions, to practiſe Virtue, and to learn the right Art of Government. The Shu king informs us, that the Medicine, which does not work the Patient, is ineffectual: In the ſame manner, a Prince reaps no Advantage from the Inſtructions of wiſe Men, if he does not ſtruggle to vanquiſh himſelf. Prince Ven kung's Father dying at this Juncture, he conſulted Mençius in what manner he ſhould pay the laſt Duties to him, the better to ſhew his Affection. You muſt, anſwer'd Mençius, obſerve the Rules preſcribed by the Rites to thoſe who are really reſpectful to their Fathers. The Mourning ſhould continue for three Years; and during that time, they ought to lay down all public Poſts, to be employed only in their juſt Griefs, to cloath themſelves in coarſe Stuffs, and to ſubſiſt only upon the moſt ordinary Rice.

I have learned from Confuçius, added he, that formerly, when the Emperor dyed, his Son who ſucceeded him, cauſed a mean Hutt to be built without the ſecond Gate of the Palace, where he paſſed three Years in mourning for his Father, in proſtrating himſelf both Morning and Evening before his * Coffin, and living on the coarſeſt Rice. During that time, the Prime Miniſter governed the Empire. The Mandarins and the Grandees, after the Example of their Princes, ſtrove who ſhould give the greateſt Marks of their Grief, and the Mourning became general throughout all the Empire.

Prince Ven kung reſolved to follow this Advice: But as the Rites in the Province of Teng preſcribe only five Months of Mourning for a King, he paſt that Time in bewailing his Father. When the Day for carrying the Corps to the Burying-Place was fixt, Curioſity drew from all Parts of the Empire a prodigious multitude of Spectators, who beheld the Prince following the funeral Pomp with a pale emacerated Countenance, ſending up Sighs, which came from the Bottom of his Heart, and melted them into Tears.

Theſe Strangers, returning home after the funeral Solemnity was over, were ſo many Tongues which proclaimed every where the Piety of Ven kung, and revived the Practice of the ancient Ceremonies inſtituted in Honour of the Dead, which till that Time had been much neglected.

Ven kung intending himſelf to govern his Kingdom, deſired Mençius to give him ſome Rules which might direct him to govern wiſely. The firſt Object, ſays the Philoſopher, a King ought to regard, is his People; what principally touches the People, is their Subſiſtence: The means of their Subſiſtence are the Lands, when diligently cultivated, and abundantly producing the Neceſſaries of Life. Agriculture then ought to be looked into, and the greateſt Care taken that the Lands do not lie idle: The People will then have whereupon to live, and being under no Apprehenſions of Want, they will endeavour to reform their Manners, and to acquire Virtue.

On the contrary, if they find themſelves in Want, all their Paſſions will ſoon break looſe; for there is no Crime but what Neceſſity and Indigence will drive them to commit: When their Wants are exceſſive, the Rigour of their Laws, and the Severity of Puniſhments will be Curbs too weak to reſtrain them. For this reaſon, wiſe Princes formerly lived with a great deal of Modeſty and Frugality; the former Virtue inducing them to treat their People with Moderation, and the latter preventing their impoſing too ſevere Taxes: This made an able Mandarin ſay, "That a Prince who aimed at Riches, could never arrive at Virtue; and the Prince "who deſired to be virtuous, could never be rich."

Mençius next exhorts Ven kung to eſtabliſh public Schools, for teaching the Practice of Virtue. He then points out the Manner in which the Partition and Diviſion of Lands ought to be made, ſo that neither the Huſbandman, nor the Officers of the King might wrong one another. In ſhort, ſaid he, if you practiſe exactly all I have told you, I dare not ſay that you will one Day attain to Imperial Dignity; but I can boldly pronounce, that Emperors will form themſelves upon you, and take you for their Pattern.

The Prince profited by the Inſtructions of the Philoſopher; and by the wiſe Diſtribution which he made of the Lands, and his Care to have them well cultivated, he ſoon ſaw Plenty flouriſh in his Dominions. The Reputation he gained, engaged a great many Strangers to ſettle in his Kingdom, and to petition for Lands which they might cultivate.

Among theſe Strangers there were ſome Sectaries, who propagated a very dangerous Opinion, and very contrary to good Government. They pretended, that a wiſe Prince ought to live upon his own Labour, in the ſame manner as the People; that he ought to till the Land, and to eat nothing

Chineſe Levellers in the Time of Mençius.

* The Chineſe frequently preſerve in their Houſes the Coffins of their Fathers for ſeveral Months, nay Years, before they are carryed to the Burying-Place.

nothing but what was the Fruit of the Ground cultivated by his Royal Hands. Mençius refuted theſe Sectaries in the following Manner: Addreſſing himſelf to Shin ſyang, who was become their Diſciple, Why, ſays he, do thoſe of your Sect confine themſelves to labouring the Land? Why don't they make their own Cloaths? Why don't they forge their own Spades, and their other Inſtruments of Agriculture, together with the Kettles wherein they boil their Rice, and in ſhort, every Thing elſe they make uſe of in their way of Life? Would not this be better than to run about to Merchants and Tradeſmen's Shops to buy theſe different Utenſils?

This, replied Shin ſyang, is impoſſible; Agriculture employs a Man entirely. If Huſbandmen ſhall attempt to make all the Inſtruments you have named, they muſt neglect the Care of the Lands, which will then become barren.

Wiſely ſpoken, replied Mençius, Is it then a ſmall Affair to govern a Kingdom? Is not that Employment enough for all the Moments of a Prince? He, doubtleſs, will have a great deal of Leiſure to work with his Subjects in cultivating the Ground.

This Compariſon ſtopped the Mouth of Shin ſyang. Mençius then ſhews him, that it was neceſſary there ſhould be different Employments and Profeſſions in a Kingdom; that one Man could not have Time to look after every thing; that the Emperor Yau divided the Toils of Government with his Miniſters, for the greater Eaſe and Inſtruction of his People; and that this, in a Prince, is called univerſal Piety, and extends indifferently to all his Subjects.

He then oppoſes the ſame Sectaries, who wanted to eſtabliſh an Equality in the Prices of all Goods, ſo that a coarſe Stuff ſhould be ſold as dear as the fineſt.

In ſhort, he concludes this Chapter by refuting the Doctrine of another Sect, which pretended that all Men ought to be loved alike, without making any Difference betwixt Relations and Strangers. He points out the ridiculous Abſurdity of this Opinion, and then ſhews that the Cuſtom eſtabliſhed in all Ages, of beſtowing a more honourable Burial upon Parents than on others, aroſe from the greater Degree of Love with which Nature inſpires Children.

CHAPTER VI.

MENCIUS in this Chapter inſtructs Shin tay his Diſciple, and ſhews him the Manner in which a wiſe Man, who profeſſes to teach the Art of living and of reigning well, ought to behave. Amongſt other things, he tells him, that ſuch a Man ſhould beware not to introduce himſelf in an undecent Manner into the Palaces of Princes, and that he ought to take care to be invited, and even preſt before he goes thither: That as the meaneſt Artiſt would bluſh to deviate from the Rules of his Art, ſo a wiſe Man ought to diſcover in all his Conduct the Uprightneſs of his Heart, the Decency of his Manners, and the Equity of his Actions: That if he ſeeks to raiſe himſelf to Dignities, in order more ſucceſsfully to propagate his Doctrine, he ought to uſe no Methods but thoſe which Juſtice preſcribes: If he remains in a private Condition, he ought to be eaſy, ſince, even then, he deſerves equally to be honoured on account of the Excellence of his Doctrine.

The firſt Miniſter of the Kingdom of Song having made a viſit to Mençius, communicated to him a Deſign he had to aboliſh the diſagreeable Cuſtom that had been introduced, of burthening the People with Impoſts; declaring that he wiſh'd to revive the ancient Laws, which exact only the Tithe of the Crop to be paid in Tribute, and prohibit the taxing any foreign Merchandize imported into the Kingdom: But, adds he, as theſe wiſe Laws have been long diſuſed, and ſeem now to be entirely forgotten, I think they ought not to be re-eſtabliſh'd all at once: In my Opinion, it will be better to gain that End by ſlow and imperceptible Degrees: What is your Opinion? I ſhall anſwer your Queſtion, ſaid Mençius, only by a familiar Compariſon. A certain Perſon had gotten into a Habit of ſtealing ſome Hens every Day from his Neighbours; One of his Friends, who diſcovered him, had the Courage to tell him, that it was a ſhameful Action, and unworthy of a Man either of Honour or Honeſty. I own it, anſwered the Doctor: But as it is a Vice now too deeply rooted in my Nature for me to correct it all of a ſudden, I will take this Courſe: I'll ſteal only one Fowl in a Month, and in time I may come entirely to give over this Habit. What is your Opinion? replies Mençius, Don't you think that this Man, who acknowledged and deteſted his Vice, ſhould immediately have corrected it?

About that Time, two Sects infected the Empire with their wicked Doctrines; Yang was the Author of the one, and Mé of the other. Mençius being a zealous Defender of the ancient Doctrine, was continually refuting their Errors. This, at firſt, made him paſs for a factious ill-natured Man, and one who loved to be diſputing. One of his Diſciples, zealous for his Maſter's Glory, told him that the Strangers, whoſe Opinion he oppoſed, run him down on all ſides, and made him paſs for an eternal Caviller.

I wiſh, replies Mençius, that I could condemn myſelf to Silence all the reſt of my Days: But that is not allowed me; my Duty obliges me to put a Violence upon my Inclination, and to oppoſe this Torrent of dangerous Opinions, with which they would overthrow the Empire. Ever ſince the wiſe Reigns of the Emperors Yau and Shun, under the Shadow of whoſe Authority the People lived eaſy, we have ſeen a continual Viciſſitude of good and bad Government. The Emperors who ſucceeded theſe wiſe Princes, applied only to their Pleaſures, and abuſing their Power, oppreſſed the poor People by their Exactions and Violence: Some of them beat down the Houſes of vaſt Numbers of their Subjects, there to make Ponds, Lakes and Reſervoirs: Others drove the People out of their Villages and Fields, which they turned into Parks, Gardens, and Places of Pleaſure: Whole Diſtricts were ſoon changed into Foreſts, which ſerved as the Retreat of Tygers, wild Boars, and Leopards. Such were the Amuſements of theſe Princes, who reduced their People to the moſt terrible Want. Chew, who ſucceeded them in the Throne, by his Cruelties, compleated their Tyranny. At laſt, the Cries and Groans of the People touched the Heart of Vû vang, who declared War againſt, and dethroned, the Tyrant.

This Prince, when Maſter of the Empire, applied himſelf to reſtore its primitive Luſtre, and to procure the Happineſs of his Subjects: He demoliſhed thoſe Gardens, Parks, Foreſts, and Houſes of Pleaſure, and reſtored to the People the Lands that were their Property. The Face of the Empire was ſoon changed, and after ſo many Miſeries and Calamities the People began to take Breath. But theſe happy Times were of no long Continuance: The Princes who ſucceeded him, inſenſibly loſt a Diſpoſition to Virtue: The Laws were weakened, and the wiſe Maxims that taught the Art of Reigning were no longer inculcated; the Empire ſaw itſelf plunged again into its former Barbarity: So that the Virtues peculiar to a reaſonable Soul, I mean, Love for a Parent, and Reſpect for a Prince, were almoſt quite annihilated.

Then appeared Confuçius, who, touched at this general Blindneſs, endeavoured to prevent the Ruin of the Empire, by reforming the Manners, by reviving the ancient Laws, and by ſetting before the Eyes, both of the Princes and People, thoſe great Actions of the Emperors and Kings, who reigned gloriouſly for about 200 Years. This is the Subject of his Book intitled Spring and Autumn. His Inſtructions and Maxims were attended to, and applauded; nay there was no reſiſting him, ſo that every one endeavour'd to conform himſelf to his Morals. But is there now any Footſtep of the Reformation he wrought? Where are the Emperors whoſe Virtue and Wiſdom rendered them reſpected by the People? In what are Kings now imployed? Do not we ſee them tread upon the Laws of Juſtice, that they may deſtroy and tear one another to Pieces by the moſt cruel Wars? How many ignorant and impious Profeſſors take the Advantage of theſe Diſorders to propagate their pernicious Maxims, and to eſtabliſh their dangerous Sects? Such is that of Yang ſhu, who, without regarding the public Good, teaches that every one ought to mind only Himſelf and his own Intereſt, and is a profeſſed Enemy of all Governors! Such is that of Me tye, who, ignorant of the ſtrict Ties of Blood, and laying it down as a Principle, That all Men ought to be loved alike, deſtroys the filial Affections, and makes no difference betwixt a Father and a Stranger.

Theſe Sectaries have already gained Proſelites among the Literati, who reject the ancient Doctrine as handed down to them by our Sages, that they may follow the pernicious Maxims of theſe blind Profeſſors. What ſhall become of good Order, Peace, and the public Tranquility, if theſe Sectaries are not ſoon checked? We have Inſtances in all Ages of great Men, who have ſupported the Empire when ſhe was upon the very Brink of her Ruin. The celebrated Yu ſtopp'd the Inundation of Waters, and reſtored Plenty. Prince Chew-kong ſubdued and put to flight the Barbarous Nations that poured in from the South and North, and re-eſtabliſhed Tranquillity. Confuçius revived the Vigour of the ancient Laws, and oppoſed the pernicious Deſigns of ſome Rebels. At preſent, when a general Infection gains ground on all Sides, by corrupting the Underſtanding, and deſtroying the good Morals of Mankind, ought not I, after the Example of theſe great Men, to do my beſt to ſtop its Progreſs, and thereby to preſerve the Empire.

Mençius ends this Diſcourſe by laying down the Rules of true Temperance, and by ſhewing how ridiculous thoſe Encomiums are, which are beſtowed upon a Man who affects a vain Appearance of Sobriety.

PART II. CHAPTER I.

FROM a View of the Conduct of ſome Princes, who in the Government of their States follow only their own Caprices, and neglect the ancient Laws, Mençius makes the following Reflections:

A Workman however ſkilful he is, can never ſucceed in what he works, if he does not make uſe of Compaſſes and a Rule. He who precedes in a Concert, will make a wretched Diſcord of the fineſt Muſic, if he does not employ twelve Flutes, ſome ſhort, ſome long, that there may be a Harmony betwixt the Voices and the Inſtruments. It is the ſame with a Prince; his State will be in Diſorder and Confuſion, if he does not regulate his Conduct by the Laws of good Government which the Ancients have left us.

The Ancients invented the different Utenſils; Compaſſes, the Rule, the Manner of Levelling, Weights, Meaſures, and all the other Inſtruments which we at this Day uſe with ſo much Succeſs, in finiſhing Buildings, and the other Works that are uſeful to the public Weal. They likewiſe, by a conſtant Application, endeavoured to tranſmit to their Poſterity the Art of good Government among them, by eſtabliſhing the wiſeſt Laws, from which we have learned thoſe of Equity, Civility and Politeneſs: Theſe have taught us how to divide the Ground, to plant Trees, to breed Animals which are uſeful to the Support of Life, and to eſtabliſh Schools for inſtructing the People in good Morals. A Prince, who is at no Pains to obſerve theſe Laws, can never wiſely govern his Kingdom.

The Miniſtry of a Prince, continued Mençius, who does not reign according to the Rules of Equity, can be compoſed only of grovelling Souls, who will flatter his Inclinations, and take no care to enforce the Obſervation of the Laws. Under him, the Crowd of Mandarins, who commonly follow the Air of a Court, will ſeek only after the Honours and Profits of their Poſts, and neglect their Duties. The People, ſeeing this general Diſregard both of Law and Juſtice, will no longer ger have any Thing to reſtrain them. They will no longer fear to infringe the Laws of the Empire, they will live without any Curb, and give a looſe to all their Paſſions. I aſk, if a Kingdom can long ſubſiſt in ſuch a Condition?

A Prince then muſt be a Lover of Wiſdom and Equity: A Miniſter ought to be faithful to his Prince, and ready to execute his Orders. But how can he be faithful, if he ſtudies only to pleaſe him, and to ſooth his Paſſions; if he does not ſet before his Eyes the heroick Virtues of our ancient Emperors, theſe nobleſt Patterns to every wiſe Prince.

Mençius then ſhews that nothing contributes more to the Deſtruction of a Kingdom, than the unjuſt Exerciſe of the Royal Prerogative.

There is an Art, continued he, in maintaining Authority; which is, by keeping the People within the Bounds of the Fidelity they owe to their Prince. The Means of rendering them faithful are, by gaining their Hearts; and their Hearts are eaſily gain'd, when Authority is directed by the Love of Juſtice, and a hearty Zeal for the public Weal. An Otter, who is conſtantly ſpreading Snares for Fiſh, obliges them to conceal themſelves in the Bottom of the Water; and a Kite, who is always ſoaring in the Air over the little Birds, makes them to tremble, and forces them to retire into the Hollows of the Trees; in the ſame manner, theſe barbarous Princes Kyé and Chew, by ſcattering Fear and Terror among the People, forced them to ſeek an Aſylum under the wiſe Princes Ching tang and Vû vang, whoſe Clemency, Juſtice, and Moderation are univerſally celebrated.

The Effects of Chew's Tyranny over his People are well known. The Prince Pe i on the one Side, and the wiſe Tay kong on the other, eſcaped his Cruelties by privately retiring to the Sea-ſhores. The Fame of Prince Ven vang's great Virtues, his Piety, his Clemency, his Juſtice, the Goodneſs of his tender and compaſſionate Heart, together with the Care he took of the Aged, the Minors, Widows, and Orphans reſounded on all Sides. What are we doing here? ſaid theſe two Sages. Let us repair to that wiſe King, and for ever devote ourſelves to his Service. Accordingly they did ſo; but with what an Impreſſion were the People ſtruck, when they ſaw the Conduct of theſe two Men, ſo illuſtrious by their Birth and Employments, and ſo venerable by their Age and Virtues, and who were looked upon as the Fathers of their Country? Their Examples brought over the whole Empire; Chew was abandoned by his Subjects, and forced to deſcend from his Throne, which he reſigned to Ven vang.

Some Princes, adds Mençius, affect to appear gentle, affable, ſober and moderate. But theſe are only the diſſembled Virtues of an Outſide; they are Virtues which are Strangers to their Hearts, and belyed by their Actions. Are they in reality affable, while they have a Contempt for their Subjects? Are they ſober and temperate, while their Avarice is inſatiable, and their oppreſſive Exactions upon their People are endleſs? True Clemency conſiſts in the right Affections of the Heart, and not in exterior Grimace, an affected Tone, an obliging Smile, or the tinſel Appearance of an unnatural Gentleneſs.

The Eyes of a Man are frequently the Interpreters of his Heart. The candid, upright, generous Soul, is often read by a Brightneſs, which gently beams in the Look. On the contrary, Vice, Falſhood, and Diſſimulation, are diſcovered by a certain Gloom that overcaſts it. In ſhort, the good or bad Affections of the Heart are diſplayed to public View, by a correſponding Series of virtuous or vicious Actions.

A Diſciple of Mençius aſked him, Whence it happened that ſo many wiſe Perſons, who tenderly loved their Children, intruſted their Education into other Hands? That, anſwered our Philoſopher, is the Effect of their Wiſdom. Is it not true, that when a Son does not improve by the Inſtructions of a Father, and if he hears his Precepts with an Air of Diſcontent, the Father won't fail to be diſſatisfied with the intractable Boy? What is then the Conſequence? The natural Temper of the Son is ſower'd; he proceeds even to reproach his Father in the following Terms: "You lay down for me a Plan of Life, which is contrary to your own Practice. Your "Maxims and your Actions appear to me contradictory." The Minds of both will thenceforward be diſunited; the Love of the Father will cool, and the Submiſſion and Tenderneſs of the Son inſenſibly decay: Diſcord will enſue in the Family, than which nothing can be more deſtructive to good Order.

Faults that ſometimes inſinuate into Filial Duties.

Advice to Children to endeavour to reclaim vicious Parents.

He concludes this Chapter with obſerving three Faults, which frequently ſteal into filial Reſpect. The firſt is, When a Son perceives ſome Weakneſſes in his Father, and yet, without loſing any of the Reſpect he owes him, has not recourſe to an ingenious Artifice, which may reclaim him to Virtue, after the Example of Prince Shun, who having a very vicious Father, redoubled every Day his Application and Endearments, ſtill contriving Ways to divert him; that he might inſinuate himſelf ſo far into his Affections, as to win him over to the Love and the Practice of Virtue. The ſecond Fault is, When a Son has poor Parents, yet takes no care to relieve them, or to provide for their Subſiſtence. The third and laſt is, When a Son neglects to marry, and to perpetuate the filial Duties in his Poſterity, by practiſing, ſeveral times every Year, the Ceremonies preſcribed in Honour of deceaſed Parents.

CHAPTER II.

MENCIUS ſhews in this Chapter, that the wiſe Emperors, who have reigned ſucceſſively, have always obſerved the ſame Conduct in Government, and the ſame manner of Living, and that their Favours were not confined to particular Perſons, but more univerſal, and extended in general to all their Subjects. Upon this the Philoſopher related a generous Action of Tſe ſſan, the firſt Miniſter of the Kingdom of Shin, which was univerſally applauded. Being to paſs a River where it was fordable, he perceived a poor Man who was on foot, and durſt not venture to take the Ford. The Miniſter, touched with Compaſſion, took him into his Chariot and carried him to the other Side.

That Mandarin, replied Mençius, undeniably had a beneficent Inclination: Yet I can never allow that he had Abilities for governing a State. Wiſe Princes have always taken care to cauſe Bridges to be built for the public Convenience; and it was never heard of, that during their Reign the Commerce of the People was ever interrupted by the difficulty of paſſing a River.

Mençius then lays down a good many Rules of Prudence. He tells us, that we ought to be very reſerved with reſpect to our Neighbours Failings, leſt we indiſcreetly publiſh them to the World. He tells us, that all Extreams are Vice, and even Virtue itſelf, when carried to exceſs, is no longer Virtue: That every thing about Confuçius was natural, and that in his Diſcourſe and Actions, he always diſcovered a modeſt Character, removed from all Vanity or Oſtentation: That the Loſs would not be great, if Calumny only hurted herſelf: But that the great Misfortune is, the Loſs which the Public ſuſtains from her Malignity, by keeping back from Dignities and Poſts Men of Virtue who were moſt capable to fill them.

Syu, one of his Diſciples, aſked him why Confuçius ſtopt ſo often at the Bank of a Rivulet: It is true, ſaid he, that Philoſopher made every thing tend to the Inſtruction of the People: But I cannot ſee what he could find in the gliding of the Water, and the ſoftneſs of its Murmur, that could be of uſe to the Reformation of Manners.

Then I muſt tell you, anſwered Mençius. By attentively conſidering that Rivulet, which iſſued Night and Day from its Source, and which calmly continued its Courſe to the Sea, without being ſtopped by the Inequality of the Ground, or the Gulfs it met with in its Channel, he found an inexhauſtible Fund of Reflection. Behold, ſaid he, a natural Image of the Man who draws the Rules of his Conduct from Truth, as from a Fountain-head, and whom no Obſtacle can hinder from arriving at Perfection in Virtue.

After this, he paſſes to the Uſe that a Man ought to make of Reaſon, which is the only Thing that diſtinguiſhes Men from Beaſts; and he propoſes ſome of the ancient Emperors, who followed right Reaſon in every thing, as Patterns. Prince Shun, ſaid he, fell into ſo agreeable a Habit of acting according to the Light of Reaſon, that even, tho' he did not reflect, he never deviated from her Paths.

Prince Yû was continually upon his Guard, not to do any thing contrary to the Rules of right Reaſon. His Cup-bearer one Day ſerving him with an excellent Wine at Table, he perceived that he was too much pleaſed with its Flavour; I am afraid, ſaid he, that the Princes my Succeſſors will ſuffer their Hearts to be effeminated by ſo delicious a Liquor; and immediately diſmiſſed his Cup-bearer, and renounced the uſe of Wine.

Prince Ching tang continually watched over himſelf, that he might not fall into either of the two Extreams ſo inconſiſtent with Virtue. In his Choice of Miniſters he regarded nothing but Virtue. He preferred the Clown to the Courtier, and the Stranger to his own Relations, when he found in them a ſuperior Merit.

Ever ſince the Emperor Ping vang tranſported the Imperial Seat to the Weſt, there has been ſeen a perceptible Decay of Vigour in all the Parts of the State: The wiſe Maxims, and the glorious Actions of the ancient Emperors, have inſenſibly fallen into Oblivion. This induced Confuçius to write the Annals of the illuſtrious Princes of his native Country, Lû. He found Materials in the Annals of the Mandarins, who were preferred to write the Hiſtory of their Nation: But he put them in a quite new Light, by the Reflections which he interſperſed, and by the Ornaments of a chaſte, polite Stile: And as this Philoſopher always ſpoke and thought modeſtly of himſelf, he uſed to ſay, that whatever was good in this Book was borrowed from others, and that all his Merit was his having ranged that Series of Facts into better Order, and put them in a better Stile.

Mençius then lays down the Rules of Temperance, Liberality, and Fortitude, as he ſaid they had been taught him by the Diſciples of Confuçius. He principally inculcates, that in the Exerciſe of theſe Virtues a Man ought not to be engaged by the firſt View that offers, but that he ought maturely to reflect, before he determines to execute any Action that comes under the Head of theſe Virtues. He then treats of the Means of attracting the Friendſhip and Eſteem of Men, which is by practiſing of Piety and Humanity; and this, ſays he, conſiſts in having a ſincere, obliging and civil Manner of acting.

If, continues he, in fulfilling the two Duties, I meet Contempt or Invectives from one of a blundering heavy Underſtanding, I will begin by ſounding my own Breaſt, and examining if I have done any thing contrary to theſe Virtues: I then redouble the Teſtimonies of Friendſhip, Politeneſs and Complaiſance, and thereby endeavour to ſoften him; but if I ſee that theſe Advances meet with nothing but rude ſhocking Anſwers; I then ſay to my ſelf; There is the Character of a very intractable Fellow, I ſee not one Sentiment of Humanity in him, nor ſeems there to be any Difference betwixt his Character and that of the wildeſt Beaſts. Let me leave him as he is; I ſhould torment myſelf uſeleſly did I pretend to tame him. By this way of reaſoning it is, that nothing can diſquiet the wiſe Man, and the moſt ſhocking Injuries are not capable to ruffle his Tranquillity.

Before he ends this Chapter he ſhews, 1ſt. That tho' wiſe Men act differently according to the different Situations they are in, yet their Actions are determined by the ſame Underſtanding, the ſame Equity, and the ſame Uprightneſs of Heart. 2. He inveighs againſt ſuch as make uſe of the moſt unworthy Meanneſſes, and the moſt ſervile Flatteries, that they may arrive at Dignities and Poſts; but become intoxicated by Fortune, and inſolent with Power, after their Promotion.

CHAPTER III.

MENCIUS ſhews to what a Degree Prince Shun carried his Love and Reſpect for, and Submiſſion to, his Father and Mother. The Emperor Yau finding himſelf ſtooping beneath a Weight of Years and Infirmities, the ordinary Attendants of old Age, committed to him the Government of the Empire. While he was in the Height of Grandeur, and ſurrounded with Honours, Riches, Plenty, and the Applauſes of a mighty People, he could take no Pleaſure, becauſe he ſaw his Parents abandon themſelves to ſhameful Paſſions: And all his Application was directed to find out the Means of reclaiming them to the Ways of Virtue. This made him often ſend up Sighs to Heaven: And tho' he was fifty Years of Age, and Maſter of the Empire, he perſevered, even to his Death, in the Practice of all the Duties which are preſcribed by filial Piety.

He then ſhews the extraordinary Regard the ſame Emperor had for his Brother Syang, an unnatural Prince, who had ſeveral times attempted the Life of the Emperor his Brother, but he was ſo far from puniſhing him, when it was in his Power, that he loaded him with Honours, Favours and Riches.

When the Emperor Yau was dying, he left his Empire to his Miniſter Shun, preferring him to his own Son, in whom he did not find the Qualifications neceſſary for governing aright. Upon which, one of his Diſciples aſks him, If it be in an Emperor's Power, thus to deprive his Son of his Birthright. No! anſwered the Philoſopher, It is not. Crowns are at the Diſpoſal of Heaven, and Heaven gave the Empire to Prince Shun. The Emperor Yau only propoſed him to Heaven, and Heaven agreed: The People, ſtruck with the Luſtre of his Virtues, voluntarily ſubmitted to the Decree of Heaven, and flocked to recognize their new Emperor. This Concurrence of Suffrages, this unanimous Motion of all the Parts of the Empire, is entirely ſupernatural, and can only be the Effect of a Will that controuls and directs Events. It is certain, adds he, that Events, whoſe Cauſes are unknown, can be attributed only to Heaven, which never diſpoſſeſſes Children of their Father's Throne, except they are unworthy to fill it: As were the Emperors Kyé and Chew, whoſe Tyranny rendered them Objects of Horror.

He then praiſes the Modeſty and Diſintereſtedneſs of a Sage whoſe Name was I in: He was a common Huſbandman, but his Reputation for Wiſdom and Virtue was very great in the Empire. The Emperor Ching tang, who had heard him frequently mention'd with great Encomiums, was willing to profit by the Counſels of ſo underſtanding a Perſon, and engage him to come to his Court. Upon which he ſent Ambaſſadors to him with magnificent Preſents, and invited him to fix his Abode in his Palace. I in appeared to be no ways touched, either with the Magnificence of the Embaſſy, or with the Richneſs of his Preſents, which he refuſed. There is, ſaid he, ſomething in your Offers, and in the Propoſals you make me, that might flatter a Man who has ambitious Views; but as for me, who deſire nothing in this World, can I renounce my dear Solitude, and the Pleaſure of ſinging the Verſes of our ancient Sages, of reading their Books, and of forming myſelf upon their Examples, to engage in the Hurry of a Court, and to expoſe myſelf to thoſe Troubles and Diſquiets, that are inſeparable to the Management of public Affairs?

The Prince was very much ſurprized when he was told of the Huſbandman's Anſwer. Such a Contempt of Honours and Riches made him ſtill more deſirous of having a Man of that Character about his Perſon; ſo he ſent three Times other Ambaſſadors, who renewed his Invitations. The wiſe I in then perceived that a Prince who ſought him ſo earneſtly, muſt have Views that were very juſt, and conducive to the Good of his People. Doubtleſs, ſaid he, Heaven has beſtowed more Underſtanding upon me than upon the generality of Mankind, that I may propagate my Doctrine, that I may aſſiſt the Prince by my Counſels, in cauſing the almoſt extinguiſhed Virtues of our ancient Emperors to be revived by the Juſtice of his Conduct.

This Motive made greater Impreſſion upon him than the Honours and Preſents, which he diſdained; ſo he repaired to the Court of Ching tang; and it was by his Advice, that this Prince declared War againſt the Tyrant Kye, and thereby delivered the People from the cruel Oppreſſions under which they had long groaned.

Mençius then makes the following Reflection: Wiſe Men, ſays he, tread in different Paths: Some inſinuate themſelves into, and others keep at a Diſtance from Courts: Some don't ſcruple to accept of, others refuſe and deſpiſe, Honours and Dignities. But amidſt all this Difference of Conduct, they all propoſe the ſame End, which is to practiſe Virtue, and to lead a blameleſs Life.

He ends this Chapter by undeceiving one of his Diſciples, who believing the popular Reports about ſome Sages, who debaſed themſelves ſo far as to accept of the moſt mean and deſpicable Employments, in order to make themſelves known, and to pave the way to Dignities: He ſhews his Scholar, that theſe are ſo many Fables, invented by ſuch as ſought Examples to juſtify their Abjectneſs and Meanneſs, by which they courted the Protection of the Great.

CHAPTER IV.

HE begins this Chapter with obſerving, that tho' the ancient Sages had no other View in their Conduct but Equity and Politeneſs, yet each of them had a different Manner of Acting, Thinking, and Living. The wiſe Pe i, for inſtance, would not turn his Eyes upon any Object that was in the leaſt indecent; nor hear any unbecoming Word: If a Prince had the leaſt Failure in point of Virtue, he refuſed to ſerve him: If the People were indocile, he left them: When a State was in Peace and Tranquillity he willingly diſcharged the Functions to which he was raiſed; but where there was the leaſt Agitation or Trouble, he immediately threw up his Employment.

The Sage I in was of another Opinion: Where is there a Prince ſo vicious, ſaid he, whom we may not ſerve? Is there any People ſo indocile that they cannot be governed? We ought not to refuſe Poſts in the Magiſtracy, neither when a State is calm, nor when it is toſs'd with Storms. A wiſe Man, adds he, in the Time of Peace, has Leiſure to teach Virtue; and during the Troubles of a State, he endeavours to appeaſe them.

After having ſaid that a Miniſter ought to form himſelf upon the ancient Sages, who have given us Examples of Integrity, Generoſity, Courage, and Prudence; he gives a Detail of the Poſts and Dignities, which were in the Empire and in every Principality, and of the Revenues appropriated to theſe Dignities.

He then teaches his Diſciples the Manner in which they ought to behave to their Friends: Whatever Superiority you may have over them, ſays he, either in point of Age, Birth, Dignities, or Alliances, never treat them in a haughty, imperious Manner, but always, as if they were your Equals. Upon this he cites Examples of great Mandarins, Kings, and Emperors themſelves, who courted the Friendſhip of wiſe Men, and who deſcending from the high Rank to which they were raiſed, treated them with Honour and Diſtinction: As for inſtance, the King of Tſin, who paying a Viſit to the Doctor Hay tang, did not preſume to enter into his Houſe, nor to ſit down to eat, before he obtain'd his Permiſſion. The Emperor Yau, likewiſe, lived ſo familiarly with his Miniſter Shun, that he frequently cauſed him to eat at Table with himſelf

The ſame Diſciple aſked our Philoſopher, what ought to be the View of a wiſe Man that aſpired to Dignities? To aſſiſt, anſwer'd Mençius, in the good Government of a State: If he is poor, and wants only to ſupply his own Neceſſities, he ought to be contented with the leſs important Employments, without aſpiring to more exalted Dignities: He has whereon to live, and that ought to be ſufficient. Upon this Head, he cites the Example of Confuçius, who being in extream Want, did not bluſh to accept of the Poſt of Overſeer of the Royal Park. The meaner and more contemptible my Employment is, ſaid he, it will be the more eaſy for me to diſcharge it. Provided the Flocks of the King be in good Condition, I fulfil all my Duty, and no more can be required of me.

He lays it down as a Principle, that a wiſe Man, who has no Employment at Court, ought not to go thither, even tho' the King himſelf ſhould ſend to deſire him. Upon which a Diſciple objects to him, that if a King ſhould order one of his Subjects to go to War, the Subject would be obliged to obey him: And that for the ſame Reaſon, a wiſe Man, whom his Prince wanted to diſcourſe with, ought to repair to him whenever his Majeſty did him the Honour to call him.

That is a different Caſe, anſwered Mençius, for on what Account, think you, does the King wiſh to ſee and diſcourſe with a wiſe Man? Is it not to profit by his Underſtanding, to conſult him in perplexing Caſes, to hear and follow his Advice? He looks upon the wiſe Man then as the Maſter, and himſelf as the Scholar, and will the Laws of Civility and good Breeding ſuffer the Scholar to ſend for his Maſter? And for the ſame Reaſon, will not the Maſter offend againſt theſe Laws, if he obeys ſuch an Order? A Prince does not diſparage himſelf when he viſits a Maſter of Wiſdom, becauſe he obſerves the Ceremonies preſcribed, which appoint the Scholar to behave in ſuch a Manner to the Maſter. If a Prince, who would profit by the Diſcourſes of a wiſe Man, ſhall fail of obſerving this Law of Politeneſs and Reſpect, he acts, as if he invited him to enter into his Houſe, and yet ſhut the Door againſt him.

But, replies the Diſciple, I have read, that Confuçius being ſent for by the King of Lû, flew immediately to his Court without waiting till the Chariot was got ready. Did that Pattern of wiſe Men commit hereby an indecent Action?

At that time, replies our Philoſopher, Confuçius was the firſt Miniſter of the Kingdom: The King had a right to cauſe his Miniſter to come to him, and it was the Miniſter's Duty to obey him as readily as he could; but a wiſe Man, who is cloathed with no Dignity, is not ſubject to any ſuch Law.

Menius ends this Chapter, by ſaying, that when a Prince falls into any Errors, either with regard to the bad Choice he makes of Mandarins, or the Orders he gives in the Government of his State, his Miniſter ought to tell him of it with all the Addreſs that is ſuitable to his Dignity: But if his firſt Advice is unſucceſsful, he ought to repeat it again and again; and if the Prince obſtinately perſiſts to diſregard it, he ought then to throw up his Employments, and retire from Court.

CHAP. V.

CHAPTER V.

MENCIUS having advanced, that Nature of herſelf was upright, and inclinable to Virtue, his Diſciple Kau tſe propoſes to him ſome Difficulties. I have always been of opinion, ſays he, that Nature is not vicious; but it appears to me, that ſhe is indifferently and equally inclined to Good or Ill. I compare her, adds he, to Water which falls from the Heaven into a large Ditch; if it finds no Paſſage by which it can run off, it ſtagnates and has no Motion; but if it finds ſuch a Paſſage, whether it is to the Eaſt or Weſt, its Courſe is directed by it. In like manner, the Nature of Man appears to me, neither good nor bad, but in a State of Indifference, and is determined to Good or Ill by virtuous or vicious Morals.

I ſhall grant, anſwers Mençius, that the Water has an equal Tendency towards the Eaſt or Weſt; but it does not follow that it has an equal Tendency to mount into the Air, as to ſink to the Ground. Will not its ſpecific Weight preſs it downwards? The Nature of Man has an equal Tendency to Virtue. But as we ſee that Water no longer follows its natural Courſe when obſtructed by a Mound, but flows back to its Source; in like manner, when a Perſon knows not how to controul the Paſſions which ariſe in, and continually agitate, the Heart of Man, they entirely pervert that Tendency which is in his Nature towards Good.

He then refutes the Opinion of his Diſciple, who makes the Nature of Man to conſiſt in Life, and the Faculties of knowing, feeling, and moving. If it were ſo, ſaid he, in what would the Nature of Man differ from that of a Beaſt? He then ſhews that his Nature conſiſts in Reaſon: That Reaſon is the Principle of Piety and Equity; and that theſe two Virtues are as it were two Properties inſeparable from human Nature. He proves this by the Reſpect due to aged Perſons; this is a kind of Equity, not at all conſiſting in their great Age, which has a Right to be reſpected; for this Right is extrinſic of the Perſon who pays Reſpect: But it conſiſts in the Knowledge which he has of this Right, and in the Affection of the Heart, both which are intrinſic to human Nature.

I own, continued he, that it is not eaſy to know the Nature of Man in itſelf; but in order to judge what is good and right, we need only to examine what is its innate Propenſity and Inclination. Every Man naturally has a Compaſſion for the Unhappy, a Modeſty that reſtrains him from ſhameful Actions, Reſpect for his Superiors, with an Underſtanding that can diſtinguiſh Truth from Falſhood, and Honour from Infamy. This Sentiment of Compaſſion is named Piety: The Sentiment of Modeſty is named Equity: The Sentiment of Reſpect goes by the Name of Civility; and in ſhort, the natural Underſtanding is what we call Prudence. Whence proceed theſe four Sentiments in Man? Not from exterior Cauſes. They then are intimately united to his Nature. But the Misfortune is, that moſt Men neglect, and even don't attend to that natural Uprightneſs which they received from Tyen; for which reaſon, they inſenſibly loſe it, and are afterwards plunged into all kind of Vices.

On the contrary, they, who improve it, daily advance in Perfection, till they become celebrated by their Virtue and Wiſdom. You ſow the ſame Grain in the ſame Soil, and at the ſame Seaſon; yet in the time of Harveſt there is a difference in the Crop, tho' the Nature of the Grain be the ſame; but the Reaſon of this is, becauſe the Culture beſtowed by the Huſbandman was unequal. We ſee in every Member of Man the ſame natural Inclination for its Object. The Eyes in every Man, for inſtance, are equally affected with Beauty, the Ears with Harmony, and the Palate with an exquiſite Taſte. Hence we may conclude, that, as there is a perfect Conformity in the Senſations of the Body, it is impoſſible that there ſhould be found any Man whoſe Heart ſhould be the only Part about him that is differently formed.

But whence can this Reſemblance in the Heart of all Men proceed? From right Reaſon, which is the ſame in all. But if we neglect to improve theſe Lights of right Reaſon, if we ceaſe to cultivate that natural Propenſity to Virtue, they will become as a young Plant, which withers and dies when we neglect to water it.

When I lived in the Kingdom of Tſin, I went ſometimes to ſee King Swen vang, and I was not ſurprized at his extream Blindneſs: For he was not at the leaſt Pains in perfecting the natural Uprightneſs of his Heart. You plant a Tree: If, after a warm Day, which makes it bud, there come ten Days of Froſt, it is impoſſible that it ſhould grow, or bear Fruit: My Counſels and Inſtructions were, with reſpect to that Prince, as a warm Day is to a young Tree. But my Foot was ſcarce out of his Palace but he was invironed with a crowd of Flatterers, who made the ſame Impreſſion upon his Mind, as ten Days of Froſt make upon ſuch a Tree: So that when I perceived how uſeleſs my Cares were, and how little the Prince profited by my Inſtructions, I left him to himſelf.

Thus it is, that moſt Men invert the Order of Nature, and blind themſelves, by extinguiſhing the Lights of their Reaſon, and abandoning themſelves to their Pleaſures. Thus too, they neglect their natural Uprightneſs, which nevertheleſs has ſomething in it more precious than Life; ſince a reaſonable Man would prefer Death to the committing an unjuſt and unreaſonable Action.

Is it not ſtrange, adds Mençius, that Man being compoſed of two Parts, namely a Soul and a Body, the firſt being very noble, and the laſt very deſpicable, he ſhould apply all his Cares to the vile, while he neglects the noble, Part of himſelf, which ought to employ him entirely, becauſe it diſtinguiſhes him from Brutes? What would we think of a Gardener who ſhould leave the admirable and uſeful Trees Hya and Kya without Culture, and bend all his Cares to worthleſs, uſeleſs Shrubs?

CHAPTER VI.

MENCIUS in this Chapter eſtabliſhes this Principle; That ſome Uſages are common to, and ought to be obſerved by all Men; but may be diſpenſed with in ſome particular Caſes: And that there are general Laws, but that theſe Laws have likewiſe their Exceptions. It was objected to our Philoſopher; I can't get ſo much as will preſerve my Life, if I obſerve the Laws of Honeſty and Civility, which are eſtabliſhed in the Commerce among Men: May I not violate theſe Laws to ſave myſelf from dying of Hunger?

Doubtleſs you may, anſwered Mencius: The end of our ſeeking Food, is, that we may preſerve Life and prevent Death: And the Point of leaſt Importance, in the Rules of Civility and Politeneſs, is, to do nothing contrary to theſe Rules, when it concerns the procuring to ourſelves neceſſary Subſiſtence. Now, the Neceſſity of preſerving Life, takes place of all the Points of leſs Importance in the Duties of Civility. It is a particular Caſe, and does not at all deſtroy the ordinary Uſage: It is an Exception of a Law, but ſerves to confirm that very Law's Univerſality and Extent.

Kyau, younger Brother of the King of (*) Tſau, one Day viſited Mencius, and ſpoke to him in theſe Terms, I can't comprehend what I every Day hear; that there is no Man but may make himſelf like theſe famous Emperors Yau and Shun, whoſe Wiſdom and Virtue have always appeared to me inimitable: What is your Opinion on this Head.

I think, anſwers Mencius, that it depends upon yourſelf alone, to reſemble theſe Heroes: You may want the Will, but can never be deſtitute of the Power to imitate them: For if you are really willing, you muſt always ſucceed. I ſtand in need of your Leſſons for that effect, replied Kyau, ſo I deſign to fix my Reſidence here for ſome Time, that I may be near your Perſon, and hear the Inſtructions of ſo great a Maſter.

Mencius ſaw there was little Sincerity in this flattering Diſcourſe: The Way of Virtue, ſaid he, is like the high Road; none are Ignorant of it, and no Perſon has any Difficulty in keeping in it, but ſuch as are Slaves to their Paſſions, and pleaſed with their Fetters. As you don't want Underſtanding, you may return Home, and your own Reflections will ſoon guide you to the Practice of Virtue.

Mencius relates the Converſation he had with the Doctor Sung keng. This laſt having ſaid that a War being juſt about to break out betwixt the Kings of (†) Tſin and (‡) Tſu; he was thinking on the Means of pacifying theſe two Powers: That he would firſt repair to the King of Tſu, and endeavour to appeaſe the Storm from that Quarter, and to inſpire him with Sentiments of Peace: That if he could gain nothing upon his Inclinations, he would then direct his Courſe to the King of Tſin: and that he was hopeful to win the Favour of either the one or the other, ſo far as to make them enter into Terms of Agreement.

But, anſwered Mencius, what Argument will you make uſe of to perſwade them, and to bring them over to your Sentiments? I will ſhew them replied the other, that their entering upon a War can be of no uſe, but, on the contrary, may prove very deſtructive to their States.

I am afraid, ſaid Mencius, that you muſt loſe your Pains, if you have no other Argument to uſe but their own Intereſts; and that you will never ſucceed in what you propoſe, which is, the quieting both Kingdoms. Suppoſe that this Motive ſhould induce the Princes to diſmiſs their Troops and to lay down their Arms. What can be inferred from that? Candour will no longer prevail: Generals and Magiſtrates in their Obedience, will have nothing but their private Intereſt in View; and Self will be the Soul of Subordination, which is ſo neceſſary to good Government: Piety, Humanity, and Equity, will then be Virtues unknown; and the leaſt Appearance of Gain will give riſe to Quarrels and Diſputes: Thence, Diviſions, Hatred, Fury, Murders and Aſſaſinations will proceed: Private Intereſt is the Bane of Society: And the Kingdom, into which it ſteals, cannot long ſubſiſt.

Would you maintain Peace in theſe two Kingdoms, you muſt charm their Princes with the Beauty of all the Virtues, but eſpecially of Piety and Juſtice: If they take theſe two Virtues for the Rule of their Conduct, they will ſoon lay aſide all their Inclinations to War. Their Mandarins and People will act by the ſame Rules, and will conſult only Piety and Virtue in the Reſpect and Obedience which they owe, either, to their Prince, or their Parents. Then Sincerity, Candour, Peace, Friendſhip, Truth, Loyalty, and Obedience will flouriſh. Theſe are the Virtues which root up Diviſions, and either eſtabliſh, or maintain Peace in a State.

He then gives an Account, how careful the ancient Emperors were to viſit the different Kingdoms of the Empire, and of the Penalties they impoſed upon the Kings, within whoſe Kingdoms they found, Agriculture neglected, Wiſe Men deſpiſed, old Age left without any Relief in its Miſeries, or impious tyranical Perſons raiſed to Poſts and Dignities.

He then mentions the Ordinances relating to theſe fendatory Princes. If they failed to repair to the Imperial Court at the time appointed, for their giving an Account of their Adminiſtration, they were reduced to a lower Degree of Nobility for the firſt Fault. If they failed a ſecond Time, their Revenues were diminiſhed, and the Bounds of their Juriſdiction contracted. For the third Fault, the Emperor ſent an Army to puniſh the Rebel Prince, and to depoſe him him from his Dignity. He even frequently gave this Commiſſion to the neighbouring Kings who invaded his Kingdom all at once, and executed the Emperor's Orders.

(*) At preſent a Wall City depending upon Yeu chew, in the Province of Shan tong.

(†) At preſent the Province of Shan ſi.

(‡) Now call'd the Province of Hû quang.

He then recounts the wiſe Regulations made upon a like Occaſion, by the Prince Ven kung, who held an Aſſembly of the States, at which were preſent all the Feudatory Princes: Then mounting a kind of a Tribunal, he read the following Ordinance containing twelve principal Articles which they were to obſerve. The firſt made it Capital for Children not to pay all the Reſpect to their Parents, which was their Due. The ſecond prohibited the Subſtitution of a Concubine, in Place of a lawful Wife; and in like Manner, the preferring the Son of a Concubine to that of a lawful Wife, in order to make him Heir of the Kingdom. The third ordained, that Men who were diſtinguiſhed by their Honour and Wiſdom ſhould be honoured, and that handſome Penſions ſhould be aſſigned them for their Subſiſtence. The fourth enjoins, that old Age ſhould be reſpected. The fifth, that Children ſhould be well educated. The ſixth, that Strangers ſhould not be deſpiſed, but treated with Honour. The ſeventh, that thoſe who have rendered any Service to the State, ſhould be rewarded with an hereditary Penſion. The eighth, that many Poſts or Dignities ſhould never be conferred upon one Man. The ninth enjoins, that none ſhould be raiſed to Poſts in the Government but they who have deſerved them, and have given Proofs of their Capacity. The tenth, that if a firſt Miniſter ſhall be found guilty of a Crime worthy of Death, he ſhall not be put to Death, without laying the Affair before the Emperor. The eleventh, that no Dikes or Cauſeways ſhall be made in time of Drought, ſo that the Waters may be kept upon the Ground, and not ſuffered to run into neighbouring Kingdoms, The twelfth, prohibites the Prince from diſpoſing upon his Kingdom either wholly or in Part, without the expreſs Conſent of the Emperor.

How admirable, continued Mencius, is the Conduct of Heaven towards the Wiſe and the Brave. Shun, that illuſtrious Emperor, was taken from the Plough, to be advanced to the Throne. Kau tſong, after a diligent ſearch found Fu ywe among Maſons, and made him quit his Trowel and his Mortar to raiſe him to the firſt Dignity of his Court. Ky au, an Innkeeper was placed at the Head of the Counſels of Ven vang. Ven kong brought another out of Priſon to make him his firſt Miniſter. Pe li hi was only a little Merchant, yet the King of Tſin raiſed him to the firſt Rank in his Court, and profited ſo well by his Councils, that no Prince ever acquired an Authority and Reputation in the Empire equal to his.

Thus, when Heaven deſigns a Man for the higheſt Employments which require an extraordinary Virtue, it never fails to prepare him for his exalted Station by a train of Adverſities, Affronts, Hunger, Poverty, Fatigues, and many other mortifying Accidents. Virtue uſes to recollect herſelf in Misfortune, to reunite all her Forces, and to ſtruggle againſt Adverſity. A wiſe Man does not know the Extent of his Reſolution and Conſtancy, if he is not put to all kinds of Tryals.

We ſee the ſame thing happen in the Government of Kingdoms. A Prince who has not Miniſters ſufficiently wiſe and able to maintain the Vigour of the Laws, and who is not able to reform himſelf when he deviates from the Laws, ſoon falls into Snares ſpread by his Courtiers, and that Swarm of Flatterers that commonly infeſt Courts. He abandons the Care of his State, that he may give himſelf up to vain Amuſements, to Idleneſs, to Eaſe, to Effeminacy, and the moſt criminal Pleaſures. This gives Riſe to Complaints, Murmurings, popular Commotions, Rebellions, and in the End, to the Ruin both of the King and Kingdom. Whence we may conclude, that Pains, Troubles, and Affronts, frequently contribute to a happy Life; and that Proſperity, Softneſs, and Pleaſure, contribute yet more frequently, to an unhappy End.

CHAPTER VII.

MENCIUS obſerves in this Chapter, that in order to ſerve Heaven aright a Man muſt 1ſt. Guard his Heart, and not allow it to have too great an Inclination for Affairs foreign to itſelf, or to diſſipate itſelf in vain, triffling, Matters.

2dly. Follow right Reaſon in all his Conduct; love nothing but what is really amiable to her, and do nothing but what ſhe enjoins. He informs us, that a wiſe Man never troubles himſelf whether his Days are to be many or few; that he knows their Number are fixed by Tyen, and that all his Care is, the due Regulation of his Morals: That Riches and Honours are ſought after at the Expence of great Diſquiets, and that theſe Diſquiets are almoſt always uſeleſs, becauſe the Object of our Deſires and Ambition is commonly without ourſelves: That the Caſe is otherwiſe with reſpect to virtuous Actions, the Principle which produces them being within ourſelves; and that we attain it, as ſoon as we ſet about ſeeking it with a ſincere and an upright Heart.

He next gives ſome Inſtructions to one of his Scholars, who followed the Profeſſion of teaching Wiſdom. You are ambitious, ſaid he, to inſinuate yourſelf into the Palaces of Princes, there to propagate your Doctrine: But if you would behave like a Man truly wiſe, you muſt not ſuffer the good or bad Succeſs of the Pains you are at, to affect the inward Peace of your Mind: Whether Men receive your Inſtructions with Pleaſure, or reject them with Diſdain, your Conduct muſt be always equal and uniform.

Among theſe vaſt Numbers who ſeek to ſettle in the Courts of Princes, I diſtinguiſh four Sorts: Some who obtain their Ends by Intrigues of all kinds, and who have nothing in View but to pleaſe the Prince, and to render themſelves agreeable by an inſinuating Behaviour, and an abject Flattery. Others propoſe only to preſerve Peace in the Kingdom, and to remove every Cauſe of Diviſion. Some we may call the Men ſent from Heaven, becauſe they are ſolely employed in following the Laws of Heaven. If they have Grounds to believe that their Leſſons upon the Rules of Morals and Government, will be of any ſervice to Kings or People, they willingly accept of Poſts and Dignities. If, on the contrary, they have reaſon to believe that their Doctrine will be neglected; they then retire from the Palaces of Princes to a Life of Obſcurity and Retirement. Laſtly, ſome may be looked upon as Heroes. Such as thoſe, whoſe Lives are ſo well regulated, that they engage Princes by their Examples, and in ſome Meaſure force them to imitate their Virtues.

Cauſe

Every thing, adds Mençius, gives Joy to the truly wiſe Man. 1*ſt*. The good Health of his Father and Mother, and the Union of his own Family. 2*dly*. When he lifts up his Eyes to Heaven, if he finds nothing within him that is blameable. And when he humbles them to look on Man, if he finds nothing in his Conduct for which he needs to bluſh. 3*dly*. That he can, by his Diſcourſes and Example, inſpire the People with the Deſire of perfecting themſelves in Virtue. He does not make his Happineſs to conſiſt, as you ſee, in the Poſſeſſion of Honours and Riches. Tho' he were able to eſtabliſh a flouriſhing Kingdom in the very Heart of the Empire, and to ſubject all the People who are within the four Seas, yet he will not place his Happineſs in that. Every thing that is without himſelf, Honours or Diſgrace Riches or Poverty, are incapable to affect him either with Joy or Grief. All his Pleaſure is to cultivate and to bring to Perfection, the Virtues he has received from Nature; namely, Piety, Equity, Humanity, and Prudence. Theſe Virtues, when once they are deeply rooted in the Heart, manifeſt themſelves in the ſerene Look, the modeſt Countenance, the Deportment, and Air of him who poſſeſſes them. Every Part of his Perſon is ſtamp'd by the Virtue of his Heart.

The Memory of Prince Ven vang, continues he, will be for ever revered; and his Piety, Clemency, with his Cares of young Wards, Widows, Orphans, and old Men, is conſtantly celebrated. Is it only meant by this, that he took care to ſend every Day the neceſſary Subſiſtence to each Family? No; that was not enough for him to do.

The Method then which he took to relieve the Poverty of his People, and eſpecially of thoſe, whom either Poverty or old Age diſabled from ſupplying their own Neceſſities, was this. He aſſigned five little Arpents of Ground to every Maſter of a Family, whereon he might build a Houſe, and lay out Gardens. He ordained likewiſe, that Mulberry-Trees ſhould be planted, with whoſe Leaves the Women might nouriſh the Silk-Worms: By theſe means, the old Men had Stuffs wherewith they might cloath themſelves and keep out Cold. He likewiſe ordered every Family to bring up Poultry and Piggs. In ſhort, he gave a certain Number of Arpents of Ground, which the Children, who were ſtrong and robuſt, were to labour. By this ſage Regulation, every good old Wan had wherewith to ſubſiſt both himſelf and his Family. While the Prince thus provided for the Neceſſities of his People, he found them more docile to hear his Precepts, and more inclinable to obſerve them.

How little is true Virtue underſtood, cried he again? The horror for Contempt and Poverty, and the deſire of Honours and Riches, blind moſt Men. Let a Man be almoſt famiſhed, he has a Reliſh for the moſt inſipid Food; it would ſeem that his Pallat could no longer judge of Taſtes. The hunger, and thirſt of Riches produce the ſame Effects upon the Heart. Perſeverance in the Purſuit of Virtue neceſſary.

You have heard the celebrated Liew hya whey, who was a Pattern of Gentleneſs and Affability, ſpoken off. Neither the moſt frightful Poverty with which he was threatned, nor the firſt Rank of the Empire, with which he was flattered, could in the leaſt ſway him to Vice, or divert him from Virtue. The ſtudy of Virtue is a great Work, no Man ought to enter into it, but he who has Conſtancy enough to perſevere in it till it is finiſhed. He who applies to this Study is like a Man who diggs for a Well. After he had diged to the Depth of nine Perches, if he grows weary, and leaves off his Work, he will never diſcover the Spring he ſeeks for, and all he has done muſt go for nothing: It is the ſame in our Purſuit of Virtue; if our Courage fails us in the Middle of our Work, and if we ſhall ſuſpend our Labours, before we have attained to Perfection, we ſhall not only never ſucceed, but all the Pains we have been at, will be vain and fruitleſs.

When that famous Miniſter of the Empire, I in, ſaw the Emperor Tay kya degenerate from the Virtues of his Grand-father Ching tang, he cauſed him to deſcend from his Throne, of which he had rendered himſelf unworthy, and ſhut him up in a remote Palace, wherein the Tomb of his Grand-father ſtood. The Action procured him an uuiverſal Applauſe. The Prince when he viewed the Aſhes of that Heroe from whom he was deſcended, came to himſelf, bewailed the Irregularity of his Life, deteſted his Vices, and applied himſelf ſeriouſly to the Study of Wiſdom. As ſoon as the Miniſter was ſenſible of the Change wrought upon him, he brought him out of the Palace and replaced him upon the Throne. This was new matter of Joy for the People, who equally applauded the Wiſdom of the Miniſter, and the Docility of the young Emperor.

But, ſaid one of his Diſciples, is this an Example to be imitated? If a wiſe Miniſter ſerves a diſorderly Prince, will he be allowed to ſuſpend him from the Exerciſe of Royalty? Without doubt he may, anſwered the Philoſopher, if he has an Authority as ample, and Intentions as pure, as the Miniſter I in. Without theſe Qualifications, he will be looked upon as a Robber and a Rebel, and no Law will be too ſevere for puniſhing him.

I have read, replied the ſame Diſciple, in the Book Shi king, that he who does not work, ought not to eat. In conſequence of this, we ſee no Perſon but has ſome Employment or other other, Princes, Magiſtrates, Huſbandmen, Tradeſmen, Merchants, in ſhort, every body is employed: But what is the wiſe Man, who does not enter into affairs of Government, employed in? His Life ſeems to me to be uſeleſs, and yet he receives the Penſion of his Prince, which ſerves only to maintain his Idleneſs.

Do you reckon, anſwered our Philoſopher, his Inſtructions and Examples for nothing? If a King profits by theſe, all the Kingdom ſoon feels their good Effects; Tranquillity, Opulence, and filial Piety are promoted. Can a Man, who is the means of procuring ſo much Happineſs to a State, be called uſeleſs.

At laſt, the ſame Diſciple, who thought the Morality of Mencius too auſtere, ſpoke to him in the following Terms: The Path of Virtue, as you lay it out, is beautiful, but too ſublime, and acceſſible only to few. Why don't you render it more eaſy to come at? You would then have a great many more Diſciples. There is no Artiſt, replies Mencius, who teaches a Trade, but follows a certain Method and ſome invariable Rules. And would you have a Maſter of Wiſdom, who teaches the Road that guidesto Perfection, have a variable Doctrine, which he can accomodate to the Taſte and Caprice of his Hearers. Such a one, if he were able, would betray his Profeſſion, and ceaſe to be a Maſter of Wiſdom.

CHAPTER VIII.

MENCIUS, diſcourſing with his Diſciple Kung ſun ſhew, about the King of Ghey, whoſe Name was Whey vang, ſaid, that this Prince had no true Piety; that he was compaſſionate to Brutes, and cruel to Men. And would you have a Proof of this? added he. That Prince intoxicated with a Deſire to aggrandiſe his State, and to enrich himſelf with the Spoils of his Neighbours, waged bloody Wars, and his People became the Victims of his Ambition. While he ſaw the Ground drenched in Blood, and covered with the dead Bodies of his Soldiers; the frightful Scene never touched him. Nay more, when he ſaw moſt of his Army cut in Pieces, far from ſaving the Remnant, he rallied them, and led them on to Battle anew, placing his Son, his Relations and his Favourites in the Front. Thus, we may ſee that he preferred his Conqueſts to the Lives of them who were deareſt to him. Can you call that true Piety? Don't tell me that Confucius in his Work, entitled the Spring and Autumn, writes a Hiſtory of the Wars among Princes. That Philoſopher approved of no Wars but thoſe that were juſt, ſuch as that which the Emperor entered into, to puniſh a Rebel Prince. But he condemned and diſapproved of unjuſt Wars, ſuch as thoſe which the Princes carried on againſt one another without the Emperor's Permiſſion.

If any one, adds Mencius, ſhall go to a Prince and ſay to him; I am ſkilled in warlike Matters: I know how to draw up an Army in Battle array: And, by this Diſcourſe, engage the Prince to take up Arms, and to carry War into his Neighbour's Territories: Would he not be look'd upon as a Blood-thirſty Man, and a real Diſturber of the public Tranquillity? The Prince who is truly virtuous, has no Occaſion to uſe Arms for Conqueſt. His Virtue and Moderation are more effectual for ſubduing Kingdoms, than the moſt dazling Victories.

We need no other Example than that of Prince Chin tang: While he was overrunning the Southern Provinces, the People of the Northern complained of his Slowneſs: Have we not long enough, ſaid they, groaned under the tyrannical Oppreſſon of a mercileſs Maſter? Why does our Deliverer delay to come to our Relief? All the People of the Empire ſtretched out their Hands to him, and expected his Preſence, only to ſubmit to his Laws.

Encomium of Shun.

What I call Virtue in a Prince, appeared in that wiſe Heroe, Prince Shun. In the firſt Year of his private Life, tho' he was ſo poor that he could ſcarce get a little Rice and Pot-herbs to live on, yet was contented with his Lot. When he was Emperor, that ſupreme Dignity did not in the leaſt ſwell his Heart. Neither his People, nor all the Delicacies of a Court, with all the Enchantments of a Throne, were able to ſeduce him. He poſſeſſed all theſe as if he had not poſſeſſed them: And it was by that Wiſdom and Integrity of Life, which was always uniform, that he abſolutely gained all Hearts.

But perhaps you will ſay, theſe Times were different from what ours are. The Corruption of Mankind is now almoſt become general; how ſhall we reſiſt its Torrent? Vain Pretexts! Can a ſevere Famine cauſe a rich Man to die of Hunger? For the ſame Reaſon, a corrupted Age can never change the Heart of a Man who is ſolidly virtuous.

Afterwards, treating of the Piety which ought to guide a Prince in the Government of his People, he eſtabliſhes the Order to be obſerved in gathering the Tributes. The Tribute of Silk, ſays he, ought only to be raiſed in the Summer. That of Millet and Rice, in the Autumn, and the public Taxes ought to be exacted only in the Winter. If a Prince ſhall break into this Order, and demand two kinds of Tributes in the ſame Seaſon, he will reduce his Subjects to Miſery and Famine: The People will then diſperſe themſelves, to ſeek for a Livelihood in other Provinces; and the diſpeopled Kingdom will be ruined by the Avarice of its Prince.

There are three things, added he, which ought to be more dear and precious to a Prince, than Gold and Jewels. 1*ſt*. The Kingdom which he has received from his Anceſtors. 2*dly*. The People intruſted to his Care. 3*dly*. The Scienee of rightly governing them. He will acquire the Science of governing others, when he is once learned to govern himſelf, and to watch over the Motions of his Heart, ſo as to render himſelf its Maſter, which he will ſoon be, when he knows how to contract its Deſires.

He

He then proceeds to the Choice which Confuçius made of his Diſciples. That Philoſopher, ſaid he, required that they ſhould have elevated Sentiments, a great Courage, and a Conſtancy in the good Reſolutions they had formed: He abhorred theſe Sophiſts who were only ſkilled in the Arts of Falſhood and Diſſimulation, and who, by a ſimple Outſide and the vain Appearances of Virtue, only ſtudied to attract the Encomiums and Approbation of their Fellow Citizens, without putting themſelves to the Trouble to deſerve them by Actions that were really virtuous.

Laſtly, he ends this Chapter and his Book, by ſhewing that this great Art of governing and living well could not have ſubſiſted long, if there had not been, at certain periods of Time, great Men who took care to tranſmit them to Poſterity. The Emperors Yau and Shun were the firſt Maſters, and the firſt Models of them, together with their Miniſters Yü and Kau yau. The Emperor Ching tang appeared 500 Years after, and with the Aſſiſtance of his Miniſters I in and Ly ſhu, revived theſe great Maxims which were then almoſt forgotten. Ven vang about 500 Years after, again reſtored them to their Vigour; and about the ſame Diſtance of time after him, Confuçius, as it were, raiſed from the Dead the ancient Doctrine, which he put in a new Light by the Wiſdom of his Reflections and Maxims.

Hyau king, or, of Filial Reſpect. The fifth Claſſical Book.

THIS little Book contains only the Anſwers of Confucius to his Diſciple Tſeng, concerning the Duty of Children towards their Parents. He pretends to prove, that this Filial Reſpect is the Foundation of the wiſe Government of the Empire: And for this effect, he enters into a Detail of what is owing to Parents from Sons of every Rank, either of Emperors, or Kings, firſt Miniſters, Literati, or even of thoſe who are in the loweſt Stations of Life. This Book is very ſhort, and conſiſts only of eighteen brief Articles. General Sketch of this Work.

In the firſt Article, he tells his Diſciple, That the ſublime Virtue of the ancient Emperors, who in their Reigns promoted Peace, Harmony, and Subordination throughout all the Empire, was derived from their filial Reſpect, which is the Foundation of all Virtues. Particular Contents of the firſt,

In the ſecond, third, fourth, fifth, and ſixth Articles, he ſhews, That whatever Station a Man is in, and to whatever Dignity he is raiſed, he is obliged to obſerve this filial Reſpect: That Emperors and great Men who give the People an Example of Love and Veneration towards their Parents, find none who dare either deſpiſe or hate them: By theſe means Subordination is preſerved in the Kingdom; and that the neceſſary Effects of this Subordination are Peace and Tranquillity. and the five following Articles.

In the ſeventh, he ſays, That Filial Reſpect is of vaſt Extent, that it is a Virtue that reaches even the Heaven, whoſe regular Motions it imitates: That it comprehends the whole Earth, whoſe Fruitfulneſs it reſembles. That ſhe finds an Object in the moſt common Actions of Men, ſince it is in the moſt common Incidents of Life that ſhe exerts herſelf: That when ſhe is well eſtabliſhed in a Kingdom, no Troubles, no Law-ſuits, no Quarrels are ſeen there; and that when Peace prevails in every Family, all the Subjects of the Prince are gentle, equitable, and Foes to all Diſputes and Injuſtice. Seventh.

In the eighth he ſhews, That when the Emperor gives an Example of Filial Piety, it is alwhys imitated by the wiſe and great Men of the Empire: That the Mandarins form themſelves by the Court, and that the People in like Manner imitate the Mandarins: and that the Conduct of the Emperor thus influencing all the Members of the State, all are ſubmiſſive, the Laws are obſerved, and the Morals regulated.

In the ninth, Tſeng aſks of Confuçius, If any other Virtue is greater than that of filial Reſpect, Confuçius anſwers; That as Heaven produced no work more noble than Man, ſo the moſt excellent of all human Actions was that by which he honoured and reſpected his Parents. That the Father is with reſpect to his Son, what the Creator is to the Creature; and the Son has the ſame Relation to the Father, as the Subject has to the Prince: That he who does not love his Parents ſins againſt Reaſon; and he who does not honour them, againſt Civility. That a King who requires Submiſſion and Obedience in his Subjects, ought to do nothing contrary either to Reaſon or Civility; becauſe his Actions ſerve for the Rule and the Pattern of his Subjects, who will be ſubmiſſive and obedient to him only in proportion as they are ſo to their Parents. Ninth.

In the tenth, he ſums up five Duties of this filial Piety; The Man, ſays he, who honours his Parents ought, Firſt, to honour them within Doors. Secondly, to take a pleaſure to procure any thing that is neceſſary for their Subſiſtence. Thirdly, to let the Grief of his Heart appear in the Air of his Face when they are ſick. Fourthly, to put himſelf in Mourning at their Death, and to obſerve all the Ceremonies preſcribed during the time of Mourning. Fifthly, to diſcharge, with the moſt ſcrupulous Exactneſs, all their funeral Duties. Tenth.

In the eleventh, he mentions five Sorts of Puniſhments for the different Crimes: And he pretends that there is no Crime ſo enormous, as the Diſobedience of a Son towards a Parent. To attack a Prince, adds he, ſhews a Willingneſs to have no Superior: To remove the wiſe Men is to be willing to have no Inſtructors: And to deſpiſe filial Obedience, is to be willing to have no Parents. This is the Height of Iniquity, and the Source of all Diſorders. Eleventh.

In the twelfth he ſhews, that a King by loving his Parents, can fall upon no better Method to teach his People the Love which they owe to him. That a King who reſpects his eldeſt Brother, thereby ſets the beſt Example to his Subjects of the reſpect which they owe to Magiſtrates: Twelfth.

That a King, who exactly obſerves the Ceremonies that are preſcribed, that is to ſay, who behaves towards every Perſon according to the Rules contained in the Book of Rites, can fall upon no better Method to promote the Uſages, and to maintain the Peace and Tranquillity of the Empire.

Thirteenth. In the thirteenth, he ſays, that a Prince has attained to the Perfection of Virtue, when, by his own Example, he has eſtabliſhed throughout all his Empire this filial Reſpect and Love: And he cites the Verſes of the Shi king to the following Purpoſe. " That a Prince ought " not to be called the Father of his People, unleſs he knows how to win their Affections by " regulating their Morals."

Fourteenth. In the fourteenth he ſhews, that there is no way ſo ſhort or ſo ſure, for attaining to a high Reputation, as being exact in all the Duties of filial Piety.

Fifteenth. In the fifteenth, Tſeng puts this Queſtion to Confuçius. I am ſenſible of the Neceſſity and Advantages of filial Reſpect, but does it tie us down to a blind Obedience to all the Orders of a Father? Confucius anſwers; That if a Father or a Prince ſhall command any thing that is contrary to Juſtice or Civility; Or if both the one and the other ſhall fall into any conſiderable Error, the Son is neither bound to obey his Father, nor the Miniſter his Prince: But both the Son and the Miniſter will fail in their principal Duty, if they do not give their reſpectful Advice with regard to the Fault which the Father or the Prince is about to commit. He afterwards tells us, that in former Times, the Emperor had, at his Court, ſeven Miniſters whoſe Office it was to make Remonſtrances to him, and to tell him of his Faults: That a King had five; a firſt Miniſter three: One of the Literati had a Friend, and a Father had a Son, who performed this Duty to one another.

Sixteenth. In the ſixteenth he ſays; That tho' the Emperor is raiſed to the ſupreme Dignity, and all the People are ſubmitted to his Authority, yet, he has, above him, his Parents whom he ought to love and revere: For this Reaſon it is, that he appears twice every Year in the Hall of his Anceſtors in ſo reſpectful a Poſture, that he may make known to all the World how much he honours them.

Seventeenth In the ſeventeenth he ſhews, that the Prince and the Miniſter ought to cultivate a reciprocal good Underſtanding.

Eighteenth. In the eighteenth and laſt Article, he teaches what a good Son is to obſerve when he pays the funeral Duties to his Parents. His Air, his Diſcourſe, his Cloaths, his Food, and in ſhort, all his Perſon ought to expreſs the Grief of his Soul. However, the Laws eſtabliſhed by the Ancients, put ſome Bounds to this. They require that a Son ought not to be more than three Days without eating: And not to continue his Mourning above three Years: That a Coffin ſhould be made and adorned according to the Uſages: That the dead Body ſhould be ſhut up in it and ſerved with Victuals after it is in the Coffin: That the Son muſt there weep and groan, and afterwards build a decent Burying-Place which is to be incloſed with Walls: That the Coffin ſhould be depoſited there with the uſual Ceremonies: That a Building ſhould be reared in which his Deſcendants are to aſſemble every Year in the Spring and the Autumn, there to renew the Memory of the deceaſed, and to pay him the ſame Duties as they paid him when alive.

Syau hyo, or, The School of Infants. The ſixth Claſſical Book.

Of the Author and Contents of this Book. THIS Book was compoſed by the Doctor Chu hi, who lived under the Reign of the Family of the Song, about the Year of our Lord, 1150. It is a Compilation of Maxims and Examples, both ancient and modern. As this Work contains nothing but the Citations of the different Maxims and Examples, no other order is obſerved in it, than that of a Diviſion into Chapters and Paragraphs. It treats, more particularly, of public Schools; of the Honours due to Parents, Kings, Magiſtrates, and aged Perſons; of the Duties of Man and Wife; of the Manner of regulating the Heart; the Geſtures of the Body; Food and Raiment. The Deſign of the Author in it, is to inſtruct Youth, and to form them to Morals.

This Work is divided into two Parts; The firſt is called Intrinſic or Eſſential; the other Extrinſic or Accidental: As moſt of its Maxims are contained in the Books of which I have already treated, I ſhall only mention ſome additional ones which the Author has thrown into it, and I ſhall follow the ſame order of Chapters and Paragraphs.

PART I.

CHAPTER I. Of the Education of Youth.

Of the Education of Boys. HE cites the Book of Rites, which preſcribes the following Rules with reſpect to Education. A Mother, in the Choice of a Wet-Nurſe for her Child, ought only to pitch upon a modeſt, meek, virtuous, affable, reſpectful, exact, prudent Woman, and one who is diſcreet in her Diſcourſe.

At ſix Years of Age. Aſſoon as a Child can raiſe his Hand to his Mouth, he ought to be weaned, and taught to uſe his right Hand. When he is ſix Years of Age, he ought to be taught the moſt common common Numbers, and the Names of the principal Places in the World. At the Age of ſeven, he ought to be ſeperated from his Siſters; and not ſuffered either to ſit or to eat with them. At the Age of eight, he ſhould be formed to the Rules of Civility and Politeneſs, which he is afterwards to obſerve, either when he enters, or goes out of, the Houſe, or when he is in Company with aged Perſons. At the Age of nine, he is to be taught the Calender. At ten, to be ſent to the publick School, and he is to have no Cloaths lined with Cotton, becauſe they are too warm for one of his Age. His Maſter is then to make him acquainted with Books, and to teach him Writing and Arithmetic. At thirteen, he is to ſtudy Muſic, that he may know how to ſing the Verſes, that the wiſe Maxims contained in them may be the better imprinted in his Memory. At fifteen Years of Age, he is to learn to manage a Bow, and to ride. At twenty, he is to receive his firſt Cap with the uſual Ceremonies; he may then wear Cloths of Silk and of Furrs, and then he is to give himſelf up entirely to ſtudy till he is (*) thirty: At which Age he may be married, and after that, he is to apply to the Management of his Houſe, and to continue to perfect himſelf in Letters. At forty, he may be raiſed to Poſts and Dignities, but he cannot be made firſt Miniſter till the fiftieth Year of his Age; and at ſeventy, he muſt reſign his Employment.

Seven. Eight. Nine. Ten. Thirteen. Fifteen. Twenty. Thirty. Forty. Fifty. Seventy.

As to what concerns the Girls; after they are ten Years of Age, they are not to be allowed to go out of the Houſe. They muſt be taught to have an affable Air; to ſpin, to divide the Silk, either into Skeins or into Clues; to ſew, to make Tiſſues either of Silk or of Worſted; in ſhort, they muſt be kept to all the other Employments that are proper for their Sex; and at twenty, they may be married.

The firſt Preſident of the ſupreme Tribunal of Rites, ought to eſtabliſh in every Diſtrict, Officers, who are to take care that three Things ſhall be principally inculcated upon the People. 1ſt. The ſix Virtues, namely, Prudence, Piety, Wiſdom, Equity, Fidelity, and Concord. 2dly. The ſix commendable Actions, which are, Obedience to Parents, Love to Brethren, Concord among Relations, Affection for our Neighbours, Sincerity amongſt Friends, and Pity towards the Poor and the Unhappy. 3dly. The ſix Kinds of Knowledge in which a Man ought to be inſtructed, conſiſting in underſtanding the Rites, Muſic, Archery, riding on Horſeback, Writing, and Arithmetic.

The Doctrine of the Maſter, ſays another Book, is the Rule of the Scholar. When I ſee a young Man who is attentive to this, and endeavours to put it in Practice; who hears the Leſſons of his Maſter in the Morning, and repeats them in the Evening; who forms himſelf upon the Conduct of the Sages, and ſtrives to imitate them; who never expreſſes any ſign of Haughtineſs, and whoſe outward Appearance is perfectly compoſed; who watches over his Looks, and never caſts his Eyes upon any Object that is ever ſo little indecent: Who among thoſe of his own Age, keeps Company only with ſuch of them as are wiſe and virtuous; who never ſpeaks but to the purpoſe, and always in a reſpectful Manner; I immediately conclude that he has made great progreſs in Wiſdom and Virtue.

CHAPTER II. Of the five Duties.

PARAGRAPH I. Of the Duties of Father and Son.

THE Author cites the Book of Rites, which gives the moſt exact Account of all that a Son ought to do, to expreſs his Submiſſion and Love with regard to his Father and Mother. He ought to riſe early in the Morning, to waſh his Hands and Face, to dreſs himſelf genteelly, that when he appears before his Father he may have a decent Appearance; to enter into his Chamber with great Modeſty; to enquire about his Health, to preſent him with Water for waſhing his Hands, and a Napkin for drying them; in ſhort, to do him all the little pieces of Service that may beſt expreſs his Care and Affection.

When an elder Son has riſen by his Merit to ſome conſiderable Dignity, and pays a Viſit to the Head of his Family, whoſe Circumſtances perhaps are but mean, he is not to enter the Houſe with the Pomp and Magnificence that is ſuitable to his Station; but to leave his Horſes and Equipage at the outer Gate, and to put on a very modeſt Air, that the Family may not have the leaſt Grounds, from his Behaviour, to think he is come to inſult them, by an Oſtentation of Honours and Riches.

Tſeng, a Diſciple of Confucius, ſpeaks thus; " If your Father and Mother love you, rejoyce; " and be mindful of them: If they hate you, fear, and take Care not to exaſperate them: If " they commit a Fault, inform them of it, but don't contradict them."

We read in the Book of Rites: If your Father or your Mother commit any Fault, inform them of it in the moſt gentle and reſpectful Terms. If they reject your Advice, don't forbear to reſpect them as much as ever. Endeavour to find ſome favourable Moment for admoniſhing them anew; for it is better that you ſhould be importunate, than that they ſhould become the Talk of the Town. But if this Advice ſhall exaſperate them ſo far as to ſtrike you, you are not to take it ill, but to pay them the ſame Reſpect and Obedience as before.

A Son, let his Neceſſities be what they will, ought never to ſell the Veſſels he made uſe of at his Father's Burial; and tho' he were ſtarving for Cold, he ought not to uſe the Habits he wore at that Ceremony, nor to cut the Trees planted upon the Hillock where his Father's Burying-place is.

PARAG.

(*) This Cuſtom is changed at preſent. They are married when it is convenient. much younger; ſometimes in the fifteenth Year of their Age.

PARAGRAPH II. Of the Duties of a King and a Miniſter.

A King ought to lay his Commands upon a Miniſter with Gentleneſs and Goodneſs; and a Miniſter ought to execute them with Readineſs and Fidelity.

The Manner of Confucius's entring the Imperial Palace.

The Diſciples of Confucius relate; That when their Maſter entered the Palace he ſtoop'd to the Ground; nor would he ever halt at the Threſhold of the Gate: That when he paſſed by the King's Throne, the Reſpect and Veneration with which he was ſtruck, was read in his Air and Look: That he walked ſo faſt, he ſcarce ſeem'd to lift his Feet: And that when he went to an Audience of the Prince, aſſoon as he entered the inner Apartment, he modeſtly gathered up his Robe, bow'd profoundly, and held in his Breath, ſo that one would have ſaid, he had loſt the Faculty of Reſpiration. That when he left the Prince's Preſence, he walked very faſt, that ſo he might be the ſooner out of his Preſence: That he afterwards reſumed his grave Air, and walked modeſtly to take his Place among the Grandees.

If a Prince makes a Preſent of a Horſe to his Miniſter, this laſt ought immediately to mount him: If of a Habit, he ought to put it on that inſtant, and then repair to the Palace to return thanks for the Honour his Majeſty had done him.

A firſt Miniſter betrays his Maſter if he connives at his Vices, and is ſo weak as not to tell him of the Hurt he does to his Character. He who aſpires to the firſt Poſts of a Court, and aims only at his own private Intereſt, is of no Uſe to the Prince. He is in a continual Agitation till ſuch time as he has attained theſe Poſts; and after he ſucceeds, he fears every Moment to loſe them. There is no Villany of which a Man of that Character is not capable, in order to maintain himſelf in his Station.

As a modeſt Woman never marries two Huſbands, ſo a faithful Miniſter ought to take care not to ſerve two Kings.

PARAGRAPH III. Of the Duties of Man and Wife.

Of the Choice of a Wife.

THE Book of Rites ſays; "That a Man ought not to ſeek a Wife in a Family of his own Name. He muſt act with Sincerity in the Preſents he then gives, and take care that the reciprocal Promiſes that paſs, are conceived in honourable Terms; that the future Spouſe may be informed both of the Sincerity with which ſhe ought to obey her Huſband, and of that Modeſty which ſhould be the Soul of all her Conduct. When ſhe is tied to a Huſband, the Union ſhould laſt as long as her Life; and ſhe ought never to marry another. The Bridegroom is to go to her Father's Houſe to receive the Bride, and to bring her from that to his own: He is to preſent her with a tame Bird, either to expreſs his Affection for her, or, to inſtruct her by that Emblem, with what Docility ſhe muſt ſuffer herſelf to be ruled.

There ought to be two Apartments in the Houſe; an outward one for the Huſband, and an inner one for the Wife. Theſe Apartments muſt be ſeparated by a Wall or a good Partition of Boards; and the Doors carefully guarded: The Huſband muſt never go into the Wife's Apartment; and the Wife ought never to leave her own without a good Reaſon. A Wife is not her own Miſtreſs; nor has ſhe any thing at her own Diſpoſal; and her Orders and Authority extend no farther than the Walls of her own Apartment.

Women that ought not to married.

There are five Sorts of Girls whom a Man ought never to think of marrying. Firſt, When ſhe is of a Houſe that has been negligent of the filial Duties. 2. When her Family is irregular, and the Morals of thoſe who compoſe it are ſuſpected. 3. When ſome Blemiſh or Brand of Infamy is annext to it. 4. When there is in it any hereditary or infectious Diſeaſe. 5. When ſhe is an elder Daughter who has loſt her Father.

Cauſes of divorcing a Wife.

A Man may repudiate his Wife in ſeven Caſes: 1. If ſhe has failed in her Obedience to her natural Parents. 2. If ſhe is barren. 3. If ſhe is unfaithful to his Bed. 4. If ſhe is jealous. 5. If ſhe is infected with any contagious Diſeaſe. 6 If ſhe can't command her prattling, and ſtuns him by continual Clack. 7. If ſhe is apt to ſteal, and capable, by that, to ruin him. There are, nevertheleſs, Caſes in which a Man cannot obtain a Divorce. As for inſtance; if, when the Marriage was contracted, ſhe had Parents, and during the time of her Marriage, by loſing them, has no Reſource left: Or, if in Conjunction with her Spouſe, ſhe has wore Mourning three Years for his Father or Mother.

PARAGRAPH IV. Of the Duties of young Perſons towards aged Perſons.

Precepts of Civility.

THE Book of Rites ordains as follows: When you go to viſit a Relation of your Fathers, neither enter nor leave his Houſe, but with his Permiſſion; and never ſpeak but when you anſwer his Queſtions.

When you are in company with a Man twenty Years older than yourſelf, reſpect him as if he were your Father, and if he is ten Years older than you, as your elder Brother.

When a Scholar walks the Street with his Maſter, he muſt not leave him to ſpeak to any other Perſon whom he meets. Nor muſt he walk up with him, but keep a little behind. If his Maſter ſhall lean his Hand upon his Shoulder to whiſper ſomewhat in his Ear, the Scholar muſt put his Hand before his Mouth, leſt he be uneaſy to him by his Breath.

If

If you ſit by your Maſter, and if he puts any Queſtion to you, never interrupt him with your Anſwer; and take care not to ſpeak till he has done. If he examines you about the Progreſs you have made in your Studies, you are immediately to riſe and to ſtand, during all the time you anſwer him.

When you are at your Maſter's, or an aged Perſon's Table, and if he preſents you with a Glaſs of Wine, you are to ſtand while you drink it, and to refuſe nothing that is offered you: But if you are ordered to ſit, obey. When you ſit by a Perſon of Note, if you perceive that he is in any Uneaſineſs; for inſtance, if he is reſtleſs on his Seat, if he makes a Stir with his Feet, or if he examines the Shadow of the Sun to know what it is a-Clock; you are immediately to take your Leave of him, and to aſk his Permiſſion to retire. Whenever he puts any Queſtion to you, always anſwer him ſtanding.

If you diſcourſe with any Perſon who is your Superior, either by his Dignity, or his Alliances, never aſk of him how old he is: If you meet him in the Street, don't aſk him where he is a going. If you ſit by him, be modeſt, and don't look to either the one Side or the other; uſe no unbecoming Geſtures, nor make any Motion with your Fan.

The Diſciples of Confucius report, that when their Maſter aſſiſted at any great Entertainment; he never left the Table till all thoſe, who were older than himſelf, were gone.

PARAGRAPH V. Of the Duties of Friends.

A Man, who is ſerious in his purſuit of Wiſdom, never chuſes any for Friends, but thoſe, whoſe Diſcourſes and Examples can improve him in Virtue, and Literature. Of the Choice of Friends.

The Duty of two Friends conſiſts, in reciprocally giving one another good Advice, and in animating one another to the Practice of Virtue.

There are three Sorts of Friends with whom an Engagement and Intimacy cannot fail to be pernicious. The vicious, the diſſembling, and the indiſcreet Blabs. Perſons whoſe Friendſhip ought to be avoided.

When you receive a Perſon at your Houſe, don't fail to preſs him at every Door to walk in. But when you come to the Door of the innermoſt Hall, aſk his Permiſſion to enter firſt, that you may put the Chairs in order; then, return to him, and conduct him reſpectfully to his Seat, which muſt be always on your Left. The Gueſt is not to ſpeak firſt; for the Laws of Politeneſs require, that the Maſter of the Houſe ſhould open the Converſation. Manner of receiving a Perſon who viſits another.

CHAPTER V. Of the Vigilance required over One's ſelf.

PARAGRAPH I. Rules for the Government of the Heart.

AS ſoon as Reaſon aſſumes the Maſtery over our Paſſions, every thing goes well; but when the Paſſions get the better of Reaſon, all is wrong. Precepts of Morality.

A Prince who would be happy, and wants to make his People ſo too, ought to obſerve the following Particulars: To take Care that the high Station to which he is raiſed, does not inſpire him with haughty arrogant Airs: To oppoſe every irregular Paſſion: Never to be intoxicated by any Opinion, with which he had ſuffer'd himſelf to be prepoſſeſſed: To indulge himſelf only in lawful Pleaſures: He muſt ſtudy to be popular and ſerious, for this will procure him the Affections of his People: If he loves any one, he muſt not be blind to his Faults: If he hates any one, he muſt not ſhut his Eyes to his good Qualifications: If he heaps up Riches, let it only be to diffuſe them: In ſhort, he muſt never decide with any Diffidence; and in giving his Advice, he muſt not aſſume a poſitive Tone.

When you come out of your own Houſe, let your Air be modeſt, and ſuch as you muſt have when you pay a Viſit to a great Lord. When you deliver your Orders to any Body, have as much Gravity about you, as if you aſſiſted at ſome great Solemnity. Judge of others by yourſelf, and never do that to another, which you would not have done to yourſelf.

Even when you are alone, you muſt retain your Modeſty: When you are about any Buſineſs, apply your whole Attention to it: In the ordinary Commerce of civil Life, you are to expreſs a great deal of Candour. Theſe are Virtues which you ought never to neglect, even tho' you were baniſhed to the moſt barbarous Nations. A Man may be ſaid to deſerve the Reputation of being wiſe, when he does not love to fill his Belly with Victuals: When he does not ſeek his own Eaſe: And when, he manages his Buſineſs with Dexterity, and his Words with Diſcretion, and ſeeks to keep Company with none but wiſe and virtuous Perſons.

PARAGRAPH II.

THE Book of Rites ſpeaks thus: That which diſtinguiſhes the wiſe Man from all others, is Civility and Juſtice. Theſe two Virtues have their Principle in the perfect Regulation of all the Motions of the Body; the Gentleneſs and Serenity of the Look, and good Breeding in Diſcourſe. Precepts of Civility.

When one ſpeaks to you, don't advance your Ear that you may the better hear him: Nor anſwer him by bawling, as if you were crying upon one: Don't look a-ſquint upon any body, nor ſuffer your Eyes to wander, ſo as to let him perceive you are thinking of ſomething elſe. When you walk, let it not be with a ſtrutting Pace, or with a fierce Look: When you are ſtanding, don't raiſe your Foot in the Air: And when you ſit, never let your Legs be croſſed: When you work, let it never be with your Arms naked: When you are warm, never open your Habit that you may cool yourſelf: And in what Company ſoever you are, let your Head be always covered: When you are a-Bed, keep yourſelf in a decent Poſture: When you diſcourſe with any one, take great care not to put on a diſdainful or a rallying Air. Never ſpeak with Precipitation, nor let the Faults of others be the Subject of your Diſcourſe: Advance nothing upon ſlight Conjectures, and never be ſtubborn in your Opinion.

The Diſciples of Confuçius ſay, that when their Maſter was at Home, he ſpoke very little: So that to ſee him, one would have thought he could not ſpeak: But on the contrary, when he was at Court, he was admired for his Eloquence. That no Body knew ſo well as he did, how to adapt himſelf to the Genius and Quality of thoſe he diſcourſed with. That, when he talked with the inferior Mandarins he ſtruck them with Reſpect, by a certain Dignity of Expreſſion which run through all his Diſcourſe: That he inſinuated himſelf agreeably into the Spirits of his ſuprerior Mandarins, by a gentle unaffected Eloquence. In ſhort, that he never ſpoke but to the Purpoſe, and when it was neceſſary: That while he was at his Meals, or when he was going to Bed, he always obſerved a profound Silence.

PARAGRAPH III. Rules about Dreſs.

Ceremonies when the firſt Cap is given to young Men.

THE Book I li, ſpeaking of the Ceremonies practiſed when the Cap is firſt given to young Men, has theſe Words. The Maſter of the Ceremonies, in putting the Cap on his Head muſt ſpeak thus. Remember that you now take the Habit of the Adults, and that you are now out of the State of Childhood: You muſt therefore no longer have any of its Sentiments or Inclinations: Aſſume grave and ſerious Airs: Apply yourſelf in good earneſt to the Study of Wiſdom and Virtue, and thereby merit a long and a happy Life.

According to what is preſcribed in the Book of Rites; a Son is not allowed, while his Father and Mother are alive, to be dreſſed in (†) White. In like Manner, it is forbidden to the Head of a Family, whoſe Parents are dead, to wear Habits of different Colours, even when the triennial Mourning is expired.

Children muſt not have ſilken Cloaths, or Cloaths lin'd with Furrs.

He, ſays Confuçius, who labours to reform his Manners, yet bluſhes to be plainly dreſt, and to feed on the coarſeſt Food, ſhews, that he has made but little Progreſs in the Path of Virtue.

PARAGRAPH IV. Rules to be obſerved at Table.

WHEN you entertain any one, or when you ſit at any one's Table, be very obſervant of all the Punctilios of good breeding: Take Care that you do not eat too greedily, or take too long Draughts in drinking; or make a noiſe with your Mouth; don't gnaw the Bones, or throw them to the Dogs; don't ſipple up the Soup that is left, or ſhew any deſire for any particular Meat or Wine, or pick your Teeth, or blow upon the Rice when it is too hot, or make up new Sauces for the Meats that is preſented you. Take very ſmall Mouthfuls: Chew your Victuals well between your Teeth: Let your Mouth never be too full.

Tho' the Table of Confuçius was far from being delicate; and tho' he never was very curious about exquiſite Meats, he always deſired to have the Rice, that was ſerved up to him, very well boiled, and he ſcarce ever eat any Fiſh, or any Victuals but what were minced. If the Rice was fermented, either with Heat or Moiſture, or if the Victuals began to be in the leaſt ſpoiled, he immediately perceived it, and never would touch them. Beſides, he was very moderate in the uſe of Wine.

The ancient Emperors have had it in View, to prevent the exceſſive drinking of this Liquor; when they ordered the Gueſts at an Entertainment, to make ſo many Bows to one another at every Glaſs they drank.

Theſe merry Companions, ſays Mencius, are in the utmoſt Contempt, becauſe, they have no other Care but to ſatisfy their ſenſual Appetites, and to regale the moſt worthleſs Half of their Being, thereby doing an infinite Prejudice to their nobler Part, which deſerves all their Care.

CHAPTER IV. Examples drawn from Antiquity with reſpect to theſe Maxims.

PARAGRAPH I. Examples of good Education among the Ancients.

THE Mother of Mencius liv'd in a Houſe adjoining to a Field, where there ſtood a great Number of Burying-places: The young Mençius took a Pleaſure in conſidering the Ceremonies which were practiſed there; and in his childiſh Amuſements he diverted himſelf by imitating them: His Mother, who obſerved him, judged that was not a proper Place for her Son's Education: So ſhe immediately changed her Dwelling, and lived near a public Market. The (†) White is the Colour of Mourning in China.

The little Mençius, upon ſeeing the Merchants, the Shops, and all the different Motions of that vaſt Crowd of People which reſorted thither, made it his ordinary Diverſion to imitate the ſame Motions, and the different Poſtures he had remarked in them. This is ſtill the wrong Place for my Son to receive a proper Education in, ſaid his Mother: So ſhe immediately left that Dwelling, and took a Houſe near a public School. The young Mençius examining what paſſed there, ſaw a great Number of young Gentlemen who practiſed Civility and Politeneſs; who made mutual Preſents, yielding the Place to, and treating, one another, with Honour; going thro' the Ceremonies preſcribed, when one receives a Viſit; and then, the greateſt Diverſion the little Mencius had was in imitating them. Now, ſaid his Morher, I have at laſt hit upon the Means of having my Son rightly educated.

Mencius, when a Child, ſeeing a Neighbour kill a Pig, aſked his Mother, Why he killed that Animal. For you; anſwered ſhe laughing; he deſigns to treat you with it: But afterwards, reflecting, that her Son began to have the Uſe of his Reaſon; and fearing leſt, that, if he ſhould be ſenſible, that ſhe had a mind to deceive him, he might get into a habit of lying, and of tricking others, ſhe bought ſome Pounds of the Pig, and had it dreſſed for his Dinner.

PARAGRAPH II. Examples of the Antients upon the five Duties.

THE Prince of Ki, who has the Title of Tſu, that is to ſay, of Marquis or Baron, ſeeing that his Nephew, the Emperor Chew, abandoned himſelf entirely to Luxury, Effeminacy, and the moſt infamous Debauches, gave him a ſerious Advice with reſpect to his Conduct: But the Emperor was ſo far from following it, that he ſhut him up in Priſon. While he was a Priſoner, he was adviſed to make his Eſcape, and the Means of making it were offered him. That I will not do, anſwered he, for where ever I go, my Preſence will remind the People of the Vices and Cruelty of my Nephew. The Courſe he followed was, to counterfeit Madneſs, and to do Idiot Actions: He was afterwards treated only as a vile Slave, and thereby had Liberty to retire from public Notice. Moral Maxims.

The Prince Pi kang, who was likewiſe Uncle to the Emperor, ſeeing that the wiſe Councils of Prince Ki had no effect: What would become of the People, ſaid he, if the Emperor continues in his Diſorders? I cannot be ſilent: Tho' I ſhould loſe my Life, I muſt repreſent to him the Wrong he does to his own Reputation, and the Danger into which he puts the Empire: So he addreſt himſelf to the Emperor, who heard him with an Air of Indignation mixt with Fury. It is pretended, ſays he, that the Hearts of wiſe Men are different from thoſe of other Men: I want to be certain of this. So he inſtantly commanded his Uncle to be cut aſunder in the Middle, and ordered his Heart to be thoroughly examined if it was formed different from that of other Men.

This cruel Execution coming to the Ears of the Prince of Wey, the Emperor's Brother; When a Son, ſaid he, admoniſhes his Father three Times without Succeſs, he does not ſtop there, but endeavours to melt his Heart with Cries, Tears and Groans. When a Miniſter has three times given a wholeſome Advice to his Prince, without any Effect, he is thought to have fulfilled all his Duties, and is at Liberty to retire. This is the Courſe which I will follow. In effect, he baniſhed himſelf from his Country, carrying along with him the Veſſels which ſerved at the funeral Duties; that there might be, at leaſt, one of the Royal Family remaining, to pay the funeral Rites to their Anceſtors twice a Year. Confuçius boaſted much of theſe three Princes, and ſpoke of them as true Heroes who had ſignalized their Zeal for their Country.

The young Princeſs Kung kyang, had been promiſed in Marriage to Prince Kong pi: But this laſt died before he eſpouſed her. The Princeſs reſolved to preſerve the Fidelity ſhe had promiſed, and never to take another Huſband, to which, tho' her Parents much preſt her, ſhe never would conſent: She compoſed an Ode, where ſhe made a Vow to prefer Death to Marriage.

Two Princes of two neighbouring Kingdoms, had ſome Diſputes about a Piece of Ground; of which each pretended to be lawful Lord. They both agreed to choſe Ven vang for the Arbiter. He is a virtuous and a juſt Prince, ſaid they, and will ſoon decide this Difference: Accordingly, they both ſet out for his Kingdom, into which they had ſcarce enter'd, when they ſaw certain Labourers, who yielded to one another a Piece of Ground which was diſputable; and Travellours who gave one another the Middle of the Way out of Complaiſance. When they entered into Cities, they there ſaw young Men who relieved the Old of their Burthens, by taking them on their own Shoulders. But when they came to the Capital, and ſaw the civil and reſpectful Manners of the Inhabitants, with the reciprocal Teſtimonies of Honour and Complaiſance that paſſed among them; How inſenſible are we? ſaid they. We don't deſerve to tread upon the Territories of ſo wiſe a Prince; and immediately they yielded up the Ground in Queſtion to one another. But as each refuſed to accept of it, that Piece of Land remains ſtill independant of, and exempted from, all Rights of Lordſhip.

I ſhall ſay nothing upon the third Paragraph, which relates to the Regulation of Manners; Nor of the fourth Paragraph, which is upon Civility and Modeſty; becauſe the Examples they contain are taken from the preceding Books, of which I have already given an Account.

PART II.

CHAPTER I. Maxims of Modern Authors.

PARAGRAPH I. Containing Maxims upon the Education of Youth.

Advice of an Emperor to his Son.

THE Emperor Shaw lye, of the Family of the Han, being on his Death Bed, gave this Advice to his Son and Succeſſor. If you have an Opportunity of doing a good or a bad Action, don't ſay, It is but a ſmall Matter; for we ought not even to neglect the ſmalleſt Affairs: There is no Circumſtance of good, however ſlight, but what we ought to practiſe; nor of evil, however ſmall, but what we ought to ſhun.

The Inſtruction which the firſt Miniſter Lyew pye gave to his Children, was as follows: If a Man does not take care of his Reputation, ſaid he, he diſhonours his Anceſtors, and precipitates himſelf into five Sorts of Vices; againſt which, one cannot be too much upon his Guard. I will recount them to you, in order to inſpire you with the Horror which they deſerve.

The firſt is, the Vice of thoſe who are employed only in Pleaſure and Merry-making: Who have nothing in View, but their own Conveniency and Intereſt: Who ſtudy to ſtifle, in their Hearts, every Sentiment of Compaſſion which Nature inſpires for the Unhappy.

The ſecond Vice is, that of ſuch as have no Taſte for the Doctrine of the ancient Sages: Who never bluſh with Shame and Confuſion, when they compare their own Conduct with the great Examples, which, the Heroes of paſt Ages have left us.

The third is, of ſuch as diſdain their Inferiors: Who love only Flatterers: Who are only pleaſed with Buffoonries, and trifling Diſcourſes: Who look upon the Virtues of others with a jealous Eye, and pry into their Failings, only to publiſh them: Who make all their Merit to conſiſt in Pride and Vanity.

The fourth is, of thoſe who love only Plays and Entertainments, and neglect their moſt important Duties.

The fifth is, of ſuch as endeavour to raiſe themſelves to Poſts and Dignities; and in order to attain them, have Recourſe to the moſt abject Meanneſs, and make themſelves the Slaves of every Man who has Intereſt enough to ſerve them.

Don't forget, my dear Child, added he, that the moſt illuſtrious Families have been ſlowly eſtabliſhed by the filial Piety, by the Fidelity, by the Temperance, and Application of their Heads: And that they have been deſtroy'd with a ſurprizing Rapidity, by the Luxury, the Pride, the Ignorance, the Whims, and the Prodigality of the Children, who have degenerated from the Virtue of their Anceſtors.

Fan ſhe, the firſt Miniſter and Confident of an Emperor, had a Nephew who was continually ſoliciting him to employ his Intereſt for raiſing him. As he was young and unexperienced; Fan ſhe ſent him the following Inſtruction:

Inſtructions of an Uncle to a Nephew.

My dear Nephew, If you would deſerve my Protection, begin to practiſe the Councils which I give you.

1. Diſtinguiſh yourſelf by filial Piety, and your great Modeſty: Be ſubmiſſive to your Parents, and to thoſe who have any Degree of Authority over you: And in all your Conduct, never betray the leaſt Symptom of Haughtineſs or Pride.

2. Imprint it well upon your Thoughts, that an extraordinary Application and a vaſt Compaſs of Knowledge is required, to fill great Poſts. So, loſe no Time, and ſtore your Mind with the Maxims which the antient Sages have left us.

3. Entertain a mean Opinion of yourſelf, but do Juſtice to the Merit of others, and take a Pleaſure to beſtow that Share of Honour, on every one, which is his Due.

4. Take Care not to ſuffer your Mind to be diverted from your ſerious Occupations, or to be diſtracted by Amuſements unbecoming a wiſe Man.

5. Be upon your Guard againſt the love of Wine, for it is the Poiſon of Virtue. The Man of the fineſt natural Parts, who abandons himſelf to ſo mean a Paſſion, ſoon becomes fierce and intractable.

6. Be diſcreet in your Words; all your great Talkers make themſelves contemptible, and often involve themſelves in troubleſome Affairs.

7. Nothing is more comfortable, than for a Man to make himſelf Friends; but, be not too anxious about preſerving them: And do not be amongſt the Number of thoſe People, whom the leaſt Word that is dropt, if it happens to diſpleaſe them, puts it into a Rage and Anger.

8. We ſee few that don't liſten to flattering Diſcourſes, and who, having taſted Praiſe that has been artfully gilded, don't conceive a high Idea of themſelves: Never fall into this Fault; and inſtead of ſuffering yourſelf to be bubbled by the pleaſing Inchantments of Flatterers, look upon them as Seducers, who want to betray you.

9. It is peculiar to the ignorant Vulgar to admire theſe vain Men, who make a Show of a pompous Equipage, and a long Train of Domeſtics, of magnificent Habits, and of all the Luxury invented to gain that Preeminence, which is ſeldom ſupported by Merit: But wiſe Men look upon ſuch with an Eye of Pity, eſteeming nothing but Virtue.

10. You ſee me at the Height of Proſperity and Grandeur; bewail me, my Nephew, and envy not my Fortune. I look upon myſelf as a Man whoſe Legs totter upon the very Brink of of a Precipice, and who walks upon brittle Ice. Believe me, it is not high Poſts which make a Man happy; it is no eaſy matter for him to preſerve them and his Virtue at the ſame time. Follow then a Council, which is the Fruit of my long Experience; ſhut yourſelf up in your Houſe, and there live retired; ſtudy Wiſdom, fear to ſhew yourſelf too frequently abroad, and deſerve Honours, by avoiding them. The Man who walks too faſt, is prone either to ſtumble or to fall. Providence is the Diſpenſer of Wealth and Grandeur; and her Time muſt be waited for.

PARAGRAPH II. Maxims upon the five Duties.

THE Author enters into a Detail of the Duties of Domeſtics: Of the Ceremonies appointed, when the firſt Cap is put on the Head of young Perſons: Of the funeral Honours which ought to be paid to deceaſed Parents: Of the triennial Mourning: Of the Care with which we ought to ſhun the Ceremonies introduced by the Sectaries: Of the Duties of Magiſtrates: Of the Precautions that ought to be obſerved in Marriages: Of the Love that ought to be among Brethren, and of the Rules of Friendſhip. As moſt of theſe Reflections are to be found in the foregoing Books, I ſhall only mention ſome, of which, I have not yet treated. Maxims of Civility.

Formerly, it would have been a Scandal and a puniſhable Fault to have eat Meat, or drunk Wine, during the time of Mourning for deceaſed Parents: How are the Times changed? At preſent, we ſee even Mandarins, at a Juncture like that, which is conſecrated to Grief and Melancholy, viſit and regale one another: They even have no ſcruple to make up Marriages. Among the Vulgar, the Relations, the Friends, and the Neighbours, are invited to an Entertainment which laſts the whole Day, where they frequently get themſelves fuddled. O Morals! What are ye become?

The Rites of the Empire ordain every one to abſtain from Meat and Wine, during the time of Mourning, except ſick Perſons, and thoſe that are fifty Years of Age; theſe are permitted to take Soops and to eat ſalt Meat: But they are abſolutely prohibited from feeding upon delicate Meats; or to aſſiſt at Entertainments. There are ſtill ſtronger Reaſons, for debarring them from all Pleaſures and Diverſions. But this I don't ſpeak of, for there are Laws eſtabliſhed in the Empire to curb ſuch as are guilty of this Exceſs.

The Superſtitious, who believe the Impoſitions of the Sect of Fo, think that they have diſcharged the eſſential Duty with Regard to their deceaſed Parents, when they load the Idol with Preſents, and offer Meat to their Miniſters. If you believe ſuch Impoſtors, theſe Offerings efface the Sins of the Diſeas'd, and facilitate their Entry into Heaven. Hear the Inſtruction which the celebrated Yen gave to his Children. Our Family, ſaid he to them, has always refuted the Artifices of this Sect by learned Writings: Take Care, my Children, never to be caught by theſe vain and monſtrous Inventions.

When you deſign to marry your Son or your Daughter, ſeek only in your future Son, or Daughter, in Law, the good natural Temper, the Virtue, and the wiſe Education they have received from their Parents: Prefer theſe Advantages to all Honours and Riches. A wiſe and virtuous Huſband, tho' poor and in a mean Station, may one Day make a Figure by his Riches and Dignities. On the other Hand, it is very probable that a vicious Huſband, however rich or dignified he is, will fall into Contempt and Poverty. Qualifications requiſite in Marriage.

The Grandeur or Ruin of Families frequently proceed from the Wives. If your Wife has brought you a large Fortune, ſhe will not fail to deſpiſe you; and her Pride will ſoon create Trouble in your Family. I ſhall grant, that this rich Match has raiſed and enriched you; but if you have the leaſt Spark of a Soul, will you not bluſh to be beholden to a Woman for theſe Honours and Riches?

The Doctor Han uſed to ſay; When you marry your Daughter, let it be into a Family more Illuſtrious than your own: For then, ſhe will behave with the Obedience and Reſpect which becomes her; and the Family will be bleſt with Peace. For the ſame Reaſon, marry your Son into a Family more obſcure than your own: For then, you can be ſure that he will be eaſy in his Houſe, and that his Wife will never tranſgreſs the Bounds of Reſpect which ſhe owes him. Sentiments of the Doctor Han upon Marriage.

The Doctor Shing was in the right, when he ſaid, that to make Friendſhip more durable, it was neceſſary that Friends ſhould reſpect one another, and inform one another of their Failings. If you chuſe none for Friends, but ſuch as will flatter you, and divert you with their witty Sayings, their Pleaſantry, and their Jeſts, you will ſoon ſee an end of a Friendſhip ſo trifling. And of Shing upon Friendſhip.

PARAGRAPH III. Maxims of modern Authors, upon the Care with which a Man ought to watch over himſelf.

AN antient Proverb ſays, that he who aims at being virtuous, is like a Man who climbs up a ſteep Mountain; and that he who abandons himſelf to Vice, is like a Man who deſcends a very rough Precipice.

The Doctor Fû chung ſwen, gave this Inſtruction to his Children and Brethren. Are we to cenſure our Neighbours? The greateſt Dunces, among us, are clear ſighted. Are we to critiſize our own Conduct? The moſt clear ſighted become Dunces: Employ your Subtility in critiſizing your Neighbour, upon yourſelf, and apply the Indulgence with which you treat yourſelf, to him Inſtructions of the Doctor Fû chung ſwen to his Children.

The Heart of Man is like an excellent Soil. The Seeds with which it is ſowed are the Virtues, Gentleneſs, Juſtice, Fidelity, Clemency, &c. The Books of the Sages, and the Examples of illuſtrious Men, are the Inſtruments by which the Soil is cultivated. The perplexity of worldly Affairs, and our Paſſions, are the noxious Herbs, the Thorns which grow in the Soil, and the Worms that gnaw and eat up the Seed: Care, Vigilance, Attention to our Duty, and examining our own Conduct, are the Pains beſtowed upon watering and weeding this Ground. In ſhort, when a Man is ſo happy as to arrive at Perfection; that is the time of the Harveſt and enjoying the Crop.

Sentiments of the Doctor Hi veng ting upon true Wiſdom.

The Doctor Hû veng ting explains himſelf in this Manner: A Man who aſpires to Wiſdom, ought to neglect the Delights of the Age, and not to ſuffer himſelf to be dazzled by the Tinſel Glitter of Honours and Riches. Princes, who are intoxicated with their Grandeur, diſtinguiſh themſelves only by their Vanity and Pride. They have large Halls ſumptuouſly adorn'd; Tables ſerved with all the Delicacy and Magnificence imaginable; a great number of Lords and Domeſtics who ſurround them and court them; Sure, if I were in their Place, I would take Care not to imitate them. He who would be truely wiſe, ought to deteſt Luxury; and without debaſing his Mind by employing it upon theſe Trifles, to aſpire to more ſublime Attainments: He ought frequently to remember the Examples of the celebrated Chew ko kung ming, who flouriſhed about the end of the Government of the Family of the Han. He lived peaceably in the Town of Nan yang, without Deſires and without Ambition; being employed only in cultivating his Lands, and acquiring Wiſdom. Liew pi, General of the imperial Troops, by his Intreaties, having engaged him to follow the Profeſſion of Arms, he acquired ſo great an Authority in the Army, that having made a Partition of the Fields and the Provinces, he divided all the Empire into three Parts. When he was at this high Pitch of Credit and Authority, what Riches might he not have heaped up? However, Attend to the Diſcourſe he had with the Heir of the Empire. I have, ſaid he, upon my Family Eſtate, 800 Mulberry-Trees for nouriſhing Silk-Worms: I have 1500 Arpents of Land, which are carefully cultivated; ſo that my Children and Grand-children may have a plentiful Subſiſtence. This being ſufficient for them, I will take Care not to heap up Riches; I have no other View but to procure the Happineſs of the Empire, and to prove to your Majeſty the Truth and Sincerity of my Words, I promiſe, that at my Death, there ſhall be found neither Rice in my Granaries, nor Money in my Coffers. And in Effect, the Thing happened as he had promiſed.

CHAPTER II. Examples extracted from modern Authors.

PARAGRAPH I. Examples of Education.

A Society for perfecting the Morals.

ONE of the Literati, whoſe Name was Lyu, born in the City of Lyen tang, formed with his Fellow-Citizens a Kind of a Society, for endeavouring in Concert with one another, to attain to Perfection. They agreed inviolably to obſerve the following Laws. 1. All the Members of this Society were frequently to aſſemble, in order to engage, and to animate one another in the Practice of Virtue. 2. They were bound to inform each other of their Faults. 3. They were to unite at the Feaſts and Aſſemblies, and to paſs them together. 4. They were to aſſiſt one another in their Neceſſities, and mutually to relieve one another in Troubles and Afflictions. 5. If any one of their Society performed an Action worthy of an Encomium, it was entered in a Regiſter, that the Memory of it might be preſerved. 6. If any of them fell into a conſiderable Fault, it was written immediately in the ſame Regiſter. 7. Every Member of the Society who was three times admoniſhed of his Faults, and relapſed into them, was for ever excluded from the Society, and his Name ſtruck out of the Regiſter.

Complaint of the Mandarin Hû ywen againſt vain Eloquence.

The Mandarin Hû ywen, frequently complained that young People, who applied to the Sciences, and aſpired to the Magiſtracy, followed only a vain Eloquence, without being at Pains to fathom the Doctrine of the ancient Sages, or to form themſelves upon their Examples. For which Reaſon, he explained to his Diſciples, only what was moſt important in the ancient Books, with reſpect to the Regulation of Manners, and the Virtues required in good Government: In his Diſcourſes, he ſought only to unfold the Senſe of the ancient Books; and deſpiſing the Flowers of Eloquence, he advanced nothing but what was ſupported by ſolid Reaſonings. His Reputation ſoon ſpread on all Sides: And in a very little Time, upwards of a thouſand Scholars, made a vaſt Progreſs under ſo able a Maſter.

While he was Literary Mandarin in the City Hû chew, he erected two Schools. In the one, none were admitted but thoſe who had a very eminent Genius, and had, for a long Time before, applyed to the Study of the Doctrine of the Ancients, and to comprehend all that was moſt Sublime in them. They who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their Prudence, were admitted into the other, where they were taught Arithmetic, the Exerciſes of their Arms, the Rules of Government, &c. This great Number of Diſciples, diſperſed themſelves all over the Empire. And as they were diſtinguiſhed from the Vulgar by their Wiſdom, their Modeſty, and Integrity, it was enough to ſee them, for one to know that they were Diſciples of the Mandarin Hû ywen.

PARAGRAPH II. Examples upon the five Duties.

THE young Sye pau minding nothing, but to render himſelf expert, and to acquire Virtue: His Father, who had married a ſecond Time, took ſuch an Averſion to him, that he drove him from his Houſe. The young Man, who could not endure to part with his Father, wept Night and Day, and ſtill hung about the Houſe. The Father proceeded to Threatnings, and from Threatnings to Blows: The Son was then obliged to retire: But built a little Hut near his Father's Houſe; where he went every Morning to rub and cleanſe the Halls, as he had done before. This put the Father into a ſtill greater Paſſion; he cauſed the Hut to be demoliſhed, and baniſhed his Son abſolutely from his Preſence. Sye pau never gave over for all this: He ſought out a Lodging in the Neighbourhood, and went every Morning and Evening to preſent himſelf before his Father to offer him his Service. A year paſt thus, and yet the ſevere Manner in which he was treated, could not diminiſh his Tenderneſs and Piety. At laſt, his Father began to make Reflections upon the Injuſtice of his Hatred; and after having compared the Harſhneſs of his own Conduct, with the tender Love which his Son bore him, he yielded to the Sentiments of Nature, and recalled his Son about his own Perſon. Sometime after, Sye pau loſt his Parents: After having performed a Mourning of three Years, his younger Brothers propoſed to divide the Effects, to which he conſented: But what was his Conduct afterward? Behold, ſaid he, a Number of Domeſtics in a decrepid Age, and incapable to ſerve any longer: I have known them for a long Time, and they are formed according to my Humour: As for you, ye will have ſome Trouble in managing them: So, they may live with me. Behold ſome Houſes half ruined, and Lands that are barren: I have helped to cultivate them from my tendereſt Youth, and I will reſerve them for my ſelf. There is nothing now to divide but the Moveables: I will take theſe half broken Veſſels, and that old Furniture which is falling into Pieces; I have always made uſe of them, and they ſhall be my Portion. Thus, tho' he was the elder Brother of the Family, he took for his Share all the Refuſe of his Father's Houſhold: And his Brothers, having ſoon ſquandered all their Fortunes, he divided with them what remained of his.

Continuation of the Maxims of Civility.

When yu, who made himſelf ſo famous throughout the Empire, relates, that it was to the wiſe Councels of his Mother, he owed all the Luſtre of his Family. One Day, ſays he, ſhe took me apart and ſpoke to me thus: "Having gone to viſit a prime Miniſter, who was one of my Relations; after all the Compliments were paſt, You have a Son, ſaid he to me, if ever he comes to any Dignity, and if you hear that he is poor, and ſcarce has whereupon to live; you may thence draw a good Omen for all the future Part of his Life. If, on the contrary, it is told you, that he is vaſtly rich; that his Stable is filled with the fineſt Horſes, and that his Cloaths are fine: Look upon this Luxury and theſe Riches, as a certain Preſage of his approaching Ruin. I have always, continued ſhe, remembered this Reflection, in which there is ſo much good Senſe. From whence can it proceed that Perſons, who are raiſed to dignities, can every Year ſend ſuch large Sums and rich Preſents to their Relations? If it proceeds from their Frugality, and from abridging their Expences, I ſhall be far from blaming them: But if it is the Fruit of their Extortions, what Difference is there betwixt theſe Mandarins and common Robbers? And if they have Dexterity enough to ſcreen them from the ſeverity of the Laws, how can they endure themſelves, and not bluſh with Confuſion?"

When the Dynaſty of the Han reigned; a young Girl, whoſe Name was Shin, at ſixteen Years of Age married a Man, who, ſoon after his Marriage, was obliged to go to the War. When he was juſt departing, I know not, ſaid he to his Wife, if ever I ſhall return from this Expedition: I leave a very aged Mother, and I have no Brethren who can take Care of her: Can I rely upon you, that if I die, you will charge yourſelf with this Duty? The young Lady agreed to this with all her Heart, and her Huſband went to the Campaign without any Uneaſineſs. A little time after, News came of his Death, and the young Widow performed her Promiſe, by taking a particular Care of her Mother in Law: She ſpun, and wrought at Stuffs every Day, that ſhe might earn whereupon to ſubſiſt her. When her three Years of Mourning were expired, her Relations deſigned to give her another Huſband: But ſhe abſolutely rejected that Propoſal; and informing them of the Promiſe ſhe had made to her Huſband, ſhe told them that ſhe would rather embrace Death than a ſecond Marriage. So reſolute an Anſwer ſtopped the Mouths of her Relations: And being thus become Miſtreſs of her own Fortune, ſhe lived eight and twenty Years with her Mother in Law, and gave her all the Aſſiſtance ſhe could have expected from the beſt of Sons: The Mother in Law dying when ſhe was upwards of eighty Years of Age, the Daughter ſold all her Houſes, Lands, and Poſſeſſions, that ſhe might give her a magnificent Funeral, and purchaſe for her an honourable Burying-Place. This generous Action, had ſuch an Impreſſion upon the Governor of the Cities of Whay ngan and Yang chew, that he gave an Account of it to the Emperor in a Memorial which he preſented upon that Head: And his Majeſty to reward the Piety of the generous Lady, cauſed 4240 Ounces of Silver to be given her, and exempted her from all Taxes during the reſt of her Life.

Generous Behaviour of a Daughter to her Mother in Law.

Under the Reign of the Dynaſty of the Tang, the Siſter of the firſt Miniſter of the Empire, whoſe Name was Ky cye, was dangerouſly ſick: While her Brother was warming a Drink for her, his Beard took Fire: His Siſter, touch'd with this Accident, Ha! Brother, ſaid ſhe, have we not a great Number of Servants? why will you put yourſelf to that Trouble? I know that, anſwer'd he, but both you and I are old, and perhaps I ſhall never have Occaſion again to perform to you theſe little Pieces of Service.

Example of fraternal Affection.

Pau

Pau hyau ſo being Governor of the City King ſau, which is now called Syen ngan, a Man of the loweſt Rank, came to him. I formerly had, ſaid he to the Governor, a Friend who ſent me a hundred Ounces of Silver: He is now dead, and I want to pay back that Sum to his Son, but he abſolutely refuſes to receive it: I beg you would cauſe him to repair hither, and order him to take what is his Due: In the mean time, the Debtor depoſited the Money in the Hands of the Governor. The ſuppoſed Creditor appeared by the Orders of the Governor, and proteſted that his Father never had ſent a hundred Ounces of Silver to any one. The Mandarin, not being able to clear up the Truth, inclined ſometimes to give the Money to the one, ſometimes to the other, but neither of them would receive it; both refuſing it, as not being their Right. Upon which, the Doctor Liew yang cried out, Who will now ſay, that there are no longer any Men of Probity? Or who will now pretend that it is impoſſible to imitate the Emperors Yau and Shun? If any one advances ſuch a Paradox, I will go no farther than this Inſtance to confute him.

Sû quang, who had been Preceptor to the apparent Heir of the Crown, preſented a Petition to the Emperor Swen ti, in which, having laid before him, that he was in a very advanced Age, he begg'd Leave to retire to his Houſe: The Emperor granted his Requeſt, and preſented him with a large Sum of Money: The Prince his Pupil, made him a conſiderable Preſent likewiſe; and the good old Man returning to his Country, ordered, that his Table ſhould be always well ſerved, that he might entertain his Neighbours and ancient Friends, aſking from Time to Time of his Steward, how much Money he had yet left; and ordering him to purchaſe every Thing that was beſt in its Kind.

This Expence alarmed his Children, who went to their Father's Friends, that they might engage them to make Repreſentations to him upon that Head. We hoped, ſaid they to the Friends, that when our Father had arrived at Honours and Riches, he would have endeavoured to eſtabliſh his Family upon a ſolid Foundation, and to have left us a large Eſtate. Yet you ſee what expence he is at in Entertainments and Feaſts; Would he not employ his Money much better in purchaſing Lands and Houſes? The Friends promiſed to talk with the old Man; and having found a favourable Opportunity, let fall ſome Inſinuations to him, with regard to the Reaſons of his Children's Complaint.

I am ſurprized at my Children, anſwered he: I believe they think that I am a Dollard, or that I have forgot what I owe to my Poſterity. Let them know, that I will leave them in Lands and Houſes, what will be more than ſufficient for their Mantainance, if they know how to manage it? But do not let them flatter themſelves, that by increaſing their Fortune, I will contribute to feed their Indolence. I have always heard it ſaid, that to beſtow Riches on a wiſe Man, is the means of enervating and weakening his Virtue: and that to beſtow them upon a Fool, is the way to encreaſe his Vices. In one Word, the Money which I expend, was beſtowed upon me by the Emperor, for the Comfort and Recreation of my old Age; Is it not therefore juſt, that I ſhould uſe it according to his Intention; and that I ſhould divert myſelf with my Relations and Friends, that I may the more gayly ſpend the ſhort Remainder of my Life?

Remarkable love of Chaſtity in two young Women.

Tang few had two Daughters, the one nineteen, and the other ſixteen Years of Age; both of them poſſeſſed of great Beauty, but of greater Virtue; tho' neither of them had any other, than a common Country Education. A Troop of Robbers, who at that time infeſted the Empire, broke all of a ſudden into the Village where the two Girls lived: Upon which, they concealed themſelves in the Cavities of the Mountains, that they might eſcape their Inſults and Cruelties. They were ſoon diſcovered by the Robbers, who were dragging them along as Victims appointed to ſatisfy their brutal Paſſions. Having walked with them for ſome time, they came to the Brink of a Precipice. It is much better, ſaid the elder Siſter to the younger, to loſe our Life than our Honour; and immediately jumping down the Precipice ſhe expired upon the Spot. The younger Siſter, almoſt at the ſame inſtant, followed her, but did not die by the Fall; having only both her Legs broken. The Robbers frightned by this Sight, held on their Way, without enquiring any farther. The Governor of the next City informed the Emperor of what had happened, and his Majeſty, to eterniſe the Memory of ſo noble an Action, beſtowed a magnificent Encomium upon the Virtue of the two young Women, and exempted their Family, and the Village in which they lived, from all Taxes, for ever.

Leau yung loſt his Parents when he was a Child: But he had three Brothers, with whom he was very intimate; they all lived together in the ſame Houſe, and their Fortune was common to them all. It happened, that all the four Brothers married; and their Wives ſoon broke the Harmony: They could not bear with one another, and they were every Moment diſputing and quarrelling; at laſt, they demanded a Diviſion of the Fortune, and a Separation of the Families.

An Inſtance of Affection in Brethren.

Leau yung was ſenſibly afflicted at this Demand: And the better to prove how much his Heart was touched: He aſſembled his Brethren, and their Wives in his Apartment: He then ſhut the Door, and taking a Staff, he ſtruck himſelf ſeverely upon the Head: Ah! Unhappy Leau yung, cried he, what does it now avail thee to have watched continually over your Actions, to have applyed thy ſelf to the ſtudy of Virtue, and to have meditated inceſſantly upon the Doctrine of the ancient Sages? You flattered yourſelf, that you might one Day by your Example, reform the Manners of the Empire, and yet you are not able to eſtabliſh Peace in your own Family.

The

This Sight made a lively Impreſſion upon his Brethren and their Wives: They threw themſelves at his Feet, and diſſolving into Tears, promiſed to reform their Conduct. In effect, there was no more Noiſe heard: A good Underſtanding was re-eſtabliſhed in the Family, and a cordial Union amongſt them all ſucceeded.

PARAGRAPH III. Examples of the Care with which we ought to watch over Ourſelves

THE Mandarin Ti-â-lun was one Day aſked, If, ſince he had firſt endeavoured to attain to Virtue, he had ever ſucceeded ſo far, as to diveſt himſelf of Affections for particular Perſons? I perceive, anſwered he, that I have not, and my Reaſons for thinking ſo are as follow: Sometime ago, a Perſon offered me a Horſe that was ſo ſwift and ſo ſprightly, that he would travel a thouſand Furlongs in a Day: Tho' I refuſed this Preſent from one, who perhaps had ſome ſelfiſh Views in offering it, yet, when ever any body was propoſed for filling up a vacant Poſt, that Perſon's Name came always in my Mind. Likewiſe, when my Son has any ſlight Indiſpoſition, tho' I know that his Life is no way endangered, yet I cannot help paſſing whole Nights without Sleep, in an unaccountable Uneaſineſs; which inſtructs me, that my Heart is not yet free of all Affections that are not perfectly regular.

Inſtance of Patience in a Mandarin,

The Mandarin Lyeu quon was ſo much Maſter of himſelf, that the moſt extraordinary, and the moſt unforſeen Events, never affected the Peace and Tranquillity of his Soul. His Wife, one Time, undertook to put him in a Paſſion, and gave her Maid Orders for that effect, which was punctually executed as follows. One Day, when he was preparing to go to Court, and had dreſs'd himſelf in his moſt magnificent Habits, the ſame Maid threw down a Kettle which entirely ſpoilt his Mandarin's Robes, and hindered him from appearing before the King that Day. The Mandarin, without altering his Countenance, was ſatisfied with ſaying to the Girl, in his ordinary calm Manner, Have you ſcalded your Hand, Child? and then he retired to his Apartment.

The Mandarin Yang ſhin, made ſuch Encomiums upon one of the Literati, whoſe Name was Vang myé, that the Emperor intruſted him with the Government of the City of Shang. One Day, as Yang ſhin was paſſing by that City, the ſame Governor immediately came to pay him his Compliments; and offered him at the ſame Time a hundred and ſixty Ounces of Silver. Yang ſhin giving him a ſevere Look, When I formerly knew you, ſaid he, I took you for a wiſe Man, and, accordingly I recommended you to the Emperor: How happens it that you don't know me? Let me perſuade you, anſwers the Governor, to accept of this ſmall Mark of my Acknowledgment: It is now dark, and no body can know any thing of the Matter. How! replies the Mandarin, no body know any thing of the Matter! Does not Tyen know it? Do not heavenly Intelligences know it? Do not I know it? Do not you yourſelf know it? How then can you ſay that no body knows any thing of the Matter? Theſe Words covered the Governor with Shame, and he retired in Confuſion.

Particulars of the Hiſtory of Chung in.

Chung in, was three Times General of the Troops of the Empire. In this high Station, he never valued himſelf upon having fine Horſes, and being bedaubed with Perfumes. All his leiſure Moments, were employed in Reading: He laid no Streſs on the vain Preſages that are ſometimes ſpread abroad, and was very cautious how he informed the Emperor of them. He deteſted all Sectaries, eſpecially thoſe of Fo and Tau. When his Soldiers fell into any Fault, he was rigid: When he was relieving the Poor and the Orphans, liberal. His Granaries were always full of Rice, in order to ſupply the Wants of the People in a time of Famine: He carefully kept up public Inns; and was magnificent in his Entertainments. In ſhort, when he underſtood that there were, in the Place where he was at the Time, any Girls of an honourable Family, but poor, and without Relations, he took it upon himſelf to provide for them: He then found out Huſbands for them of an equal Quality with themſelves, and furniſhed them handſomly with Marriage Cloaths.

In the Viſits which the Doctor Lyew paid to his Friends, he ſometimes ſpent more than an Hour in diſcourſing with them, without in the leaſt bowing his Body, and all this while keeping his Breaſt and Shoulders immoveable, nor was he ſeen to move either his Hands or his Feet: And ſuch was his Modeſty, that he appeared to be a ſpeaking Statue.

Li ven tſing (A) caus'd a Houſe to be built for himſelf near the Gate of the imperial Palace: One of his Friends told him, that the Veſtible was not large enough, and that a Man on Horſeback could ſcarcely turn himſelf in it: This Houſe, anſwered he with a ſmile, will one Day belong to my Children, and the Veſtible is large enough for the Ceremonies that will be performed at my Funeral.

THE admirable Polity, and fine Order obſerved in the Chineſe Empire, are owing to the Maxims contained in thoſe ancient and valuable Books, of which I have given the Reader a Summary.

If it is demanded, whether this State, in ſo long a Tract of Time, under ſo many different Monarchs, and amidſt ſuch a Variety of Revolutions, is not impaired in its Vigour, and degenerated from the Wiſdom and Strictneſs of theſe Inſtitutions? The beſt Anſwer to this will be gathered from the Chineſe themſelves, by peruſing the Hiſtory of their different Dynaſties, in the Collection made by the Orders, and under the Inſpection of the late Emperor Kang hi, of which I give a faithful Tranſlation done by P. Hervieu, an ancient Miſſionary in that Empire.

This Collection contains, 1. The Edicts, Ordinances, Declarations, and Inſtructions, of ſeveral Emperors, ſent to Kings, or Tributary Princes; either upon the Subject of good or bad Government, or the Care they ought to take in their Choice of Miniſters; or to recommend to the People the filial Duties, and an Application to Agriculture; and to Magiſtrates, Diſintereſtedneſs, and the Love of the People; or to ſtop the Progreſs of Luxury, and other Abuſes in their Government. 2. The Diſcourſes of the moſt able Miniſters, ſometimes upon the public Calamities, and the means of relieving the People; ſometimes upon the Arts and Difficulties of Governing, upon the Management of War, the Advancement of Learning, and the Qualifications of a Miniſter: Or elſe, againſt the Corruptions introduced into the ancient Doctrine by different Sects, and eſpecially that of the Idol Fo, upon the Falſeneſs of Auguries, and againſt thoſe who propagate them, &c. At the End of almoſt every one of theſe, you meet with ſhort Reflections made by the late Emperor Kang hi, and written with the red Pencil, that is, with his own Hand.

I ſhall add to theſe, Extracts from a Collection drawn up under the Dynaſty of the Ming, which immediately preceded the preſent one; treating of the Duties of Sovereigns, Miniſters of State, and Generals of Armies, and the Choice to be made of them; of Politics, of Hereditary Princes, of Remonſtrances made to the Emperors by their Miniſters; of good Government; of the Daughters of Emperors; of ſuch as abuſe their Princes Favour; with Diſcourſes by the moſt able Miniſters, upon different Heads relating to the State.

I ſhall ſubjoin another Extract from a Chineſe Book, intitled, The illuſtrious Women, by which it may be ſeen, that under all the different Reigns, the Ladies of this Empire have formed their own Conduct, and regulated that of their Families, upon theſe very Maxims.

This kind of Tradition inconteſtably proves, that the fundamental Principles of the Chineſe Conſtitution have been always obſerved; and hence we may conclude, that it is by no means ſurprizing, if ſo large an Empire has ſubſiſted ſo long, and ſtill continues in its full Luſtre.

Edicts, Declarations, Ordinances, and Inſtructions of the Emperors, &c.

Some Time after Tſin ſhi whang, King of Tſin, was made Emperor, there was a Deſign to remove all who were not Natives of Tſin from their Employments. Li tſe, who was a Native of the Kingdom of Tſû, and who had been very inſtrumental in promoting Tſin ſhi whang to the Imperial Throne, made the following Remonſtrance to the Emperor in favour of Strangers.

GREAT Prince! As there is a Report that an Order is entered the ſupreme Tribunals, by which all Strangers are removed from their Poſts: Permit me to make a moſt humble Remonſtrance upon this Head. One of your Anceſtors followed a different Conduct. Zealous to ſearch for Merit where ever it was; he had no regard to the Diſtinctions of Climate. That Part of the Weſt, called (*) Yong, furniſhed him with (†) Yeu yu; he had Pe li hi from

(*) The Name of a Country.

(†) A Man's Name.

from Wan in the East, and finding the means of drawing to his Court, Tsû shû, Pi hû and Kong sun chi, all Foreigners, he gave them Employments; and their Services were of such use to him, that having subdued twenty petty States, he finished his glorious Reign by the Conquest of Si yong.

Hyau kong, during his Reign, saw a prodigious Change in the Kingdom of Tsin. The Manners of his People were reformed, his Kingdom grew more populous, Himself more powerful, and his Subjects more happy and contented. The Princes his Neighbours loved and respected him; and the Troops of Tsû and Whey, who durst attack him, were defeated, while he enlarged the Bounds of his Kingdom above a hundred Leagues. To whom did this Prince owe his Successes? Was it not to the Councils of Shang yang his first Minister? And was not this Minister a Stranger?

Whey vang with equal success, made use of the Abilities of Chang i, a Stranger too, to annex to his Crown those Conquests which you well know, and of which your Majesty at this Day reaps the Advantages.

Could Chau vang, if unaided by the Councils of Tan hi, have destroyed Yang hew, expelled Hû yang, confirmed his Family in Possession of the Throne, rooted up Faction, and reduced the Princes his Neighbours to depend upon him for the common Supports of Life? In short, could he have raised Tsin to the Reputation of an Empire, in all Respects excepting the Name? It was the Councils of Strangers, that influenced all the Actions of these four Princes of your August House.

Permit me now to ask your Majesty, What Harm has your State ever suffered from the Strangers you have employed? On the contrary, Is it not certain, that had the Princes I mention excluded Strangers from their Councils, as your Majesty is now advised to do; their State would never have been so powerful; nor had the Name of Tsin been so celebrated. Besides, when I consider the several Things in Use about your Majesty's Person, I see Mount Quen furnish you with precious Stones, Swi and Ho with Jewels, and Lung with Diamonds. The Arms you wear, the Horse you ride, even your Ensigns and your Drums, are either composed of foreign Materials, or embellished with foreign Ornaments. Why then do you make use of them?

If not to be a Native of Tsin, is sufficient to shut a Man out of all Employments, however great his Merit and Fidelity may be, to act consistent with this Maxim, you ought to throw out of your Palace, your Diamonds, your Moveables of Ivory, and your other Jewels. You would then banish from your Court, the Beauties of Chin and Wey. If it is an established Rule, that nothing foreign ought to find a Place in the Court; why do they present you every Day with those Ornaments of Pearls and the like, which adorn the Heads of your Queens? Why don't the Gentlemen, who are so violent Enemies to whatever is foreign, begin their Reformation, by banishing from your Court its greatest Ornaments, and oblige your Majesty to send back to Chau, even the Queen your Consort. In short, the Chinese Music consists only in two or three Instruments, one of Earthen-Ware, and one of Bone, which, both together, make but a very sorry Harmony; and would it be reasonable to desire your Majesty, to prefer their doleful Sounds to the sprightly Music of Chin and Wey? No, sure! Since then, Sir, in Affairs of Pleasure, you are presented with, and freely use the best of every Kind, let it come from what Country it will; must you be debarred of that Liberty in your Choice of Men? Must you reject without Enquiry, and without Distinction, every Man who was not born in this Country? Such a Conduct would shew that you prefer your Diversions to the Happiness of your Subjects.

It is not by these Means, that Tsin sees her self Mistress of so many other Countries: The large Rivers and Seas receive, without Distinction, all the Brooks that fall into them. Hence it is, that their Deepness is unfathomable: A Prince who is seriously resolved to accomplish himself in good Qualities and Virtues, ought to act thus. Such formerly were our (*) five Ti, and our three Vang. They regarded only a Man's Wisdom and Virtue, without enquiring into his Country. And it was by this, and the Assistance of (†) Quey shin, that they at last had no Enemy to struggle with. At present, to dismiss by a Decree, so considerable a Number of your Officers distinguished by their Merits, of which your Neighbours will make their Advantage, and to exclude for ever from all Employments, every one, who is not a Native of (‡) Tsin, is, as the Proverb says, to furnish Arms to a Robber, is to give Advantages to your Enemies, in Prejudice of your own Subjects; to weaken yourself at Home, and to raise up Enemies against your self abroad; to imagine, that the Sentence which is entered, is either necessary or useful, is, in my Opinion, to impose upon your own Understanding.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] In former Times, whoever had Wisdom and Abilities was esteemed. Princes courted these Sort of Men with Presents and Employments, if they would accept of them, into their Service; so far were they from rejecting or banishing them, only because they were Foreigners. To make the best use of good Qualities wherever they are found, is a wise Maxim. Li tsë, Author of this Piece, was at the Bottom a bad Man: But there is no Reason for that, to despise the Good he advises.

On Occasion of an Eclipse in the Days of the Han, the Emperor Ven ti ordered the following Declaration to be Published.

I Have heard it said, that (||) Tyen always gives to the People he creates, Princes to nourish and govern them. If these Princes are worthless Men, and bad Governors, Tyen, to bring them to their Duty, either punishes or threatens them with Calamities.

(*) Ti, Emperor, Lord, Master, Sovereign. Vang King. These three Vang, as they are commonly stil'd, have been in the Number of their Emperors. As for the five Ti, it is not agreed who the Persons are, to whom this expression relates.

(†) The Quey shin. Nothing in the Text marks a Plurality.

(‡) Eng is said to have advised Tsin shi whang, to cause the Books of China to be Burned.

(||) Heaven, or the Lord of Heaven.

In

In this 11*th* Moon, (*) there has been an Eclipſe of the Sun; what a Warning is this for me? On the one Hand, I reflect that upon my weak Perſon is devolved the Care of ſupporting my Family; of keeping the People, the Officers, the Princes, and the Kings that are under me in their Duty; and in ſhort, of making my Empire happy. On the other Hand, when I conſider, that, tho' charged with ſuch a Burthen, I have but two or three Perſons, at moſt, who help me to ſupport it; I am ſenſible of my own Inſufficiency: Above, the Stars loſe their Light; below, my Subjects are preſſed with Want; in all theſe I read my own Defect of Virtue.

Aſſoon as this Declaration is publiſhed, let it be the Buſineſs of my People with the utmoſt Attention, to examine into my Conduct, and inform me of my Faults; and let this laſt Employment be entruſted with Perſons of Underſtanding, of Integrity, and Reſolution, ſought out for that Purpoſe, and who ſhall be preſented to me. For my Part, I recommend to all in Offices under me, to apply themſelves, more than ever, to a conſciencious Diſcharge of their Duty, eſpecially by retrenching all unneceſſary Expences to the People. I will ſet them an Example, by recalling from my Frontiers all my Forces, except ſuch as are abſolutely neceſſary for their Defence.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] In the (†) Shi king we read, All inviſible as he is, he ſtill is at Hand, ſo that there is no time in which it is permitted us to relax in our Duty to Shang ti; but when an Eclipſe of the Sun happens, which is as it were a Warning from (‡) Tyen, we ought then to redouble our Diligence and Cares to appeaſe him.

One of the Gloſſes ſpeaks thus;] This is the firſt time that any of our Emperors, on occaſion of public Calamities, or extraordinary Phenomena have deſired to be told of their Faults. But ſince the Days of Ven ti, there are many other Inſtances.

Another Declaration of the ſame Emperor Ven ti repealing a Law againſt Criticiſing the Form of Government.

IN the Days of our ancient Emperors, there was expoſed on the one Side of the Court a Sheet, upon which any one might write, and propoſe any Amendments for the good of the State; and on the other Side of the ſame Court, there was a Board fixed, upon which might be marked what ever was conceived to be blameable in the Adminiſtration.

This was in order to facilitate Remonſtrances, and procure good Advice to the Prince. At preſent, I find among our Laws, one which makes it criminal to ſpeak ill of the Government: This Law is the Means not only of depriving us of the Advantages we might receive from the Correſpondence of wiſe Men, who are at a Diſtance from us; but even of ſtopping the Mouths of the Officers about our own Court. How ſhall a Prince ever after this, be made ſenſible of his Faults. This Law is ſubject to another Inconveniency; which is this: Under pretence that the People have already made public and ſolemn Proteſtations of their Fidelity, Submiſſion, and Reſpect, to the Prince, if any one amongſt them ſeems in the leaſt to depart from theſe Proteſtations, they are liable to be proſecuted as Rebels: It puts it in the Power of Magiſtrates arbitrarily, to conſtrue the moſt indifferent Diſcourſes into Sedition againſt the Government. Thus, ſimple ignorant People may be accuſed of Treaſon without any Thoughts of committing it, and convicted of a Capital Crime. No! I can never ſuffer the Continuance of ſuch a Law, ſo let it be abrogated.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Tſin ſhi whang made a great many Laws, ſuch as this; Kau tſu, Founder of the Dynaſty of the Han, had abrogated a great Number of the ſame. The Law ſpoken of here, was only abrogated under (*) Ven ti, which was too late.

Another Declaration of the ſame Emperor Ven ti, importing an Order to deliberate upon the Repeal of another Law, by which, the Relations of a Criminal were involved in his Puniſhment.

LAWS being the Rules of Government, ought, if poſſible, to be faultleſs. Their Ends are, not only to puniſh Vice, but to protect Innocence. Yet I find among our Laws one ſtill in force, by which, when a Man is criminal, his Father, his Mother, his Wife, and Children, are involved in his Puniſhment, and the leaſt Puniſhment they have to dread, is Slavery. This Law is by no means to my Liking. It is a common and a true Saying, that Laws when perfectly juſt, are the ſureſt Means of keeping the People in their Duty. When Puniſhment falls only upon the guilty Head, all the World approves of the Judge. The firſt Duty of a Magiſtrate is to guide the People, like a good Shepherd, and to prevent their going aſtray. If our Magiſtrates have not ſucceeded in this, and have ſtill Laws to judge by, not entirely conſiſtent with the ſtricteſt Equity, theſe Laws, tho' originally deſigned for the Good of the People, turn to their Prejudice, and favour of Cruelty. Such ſeems to me the Law I have mentioned; of which I cannot ſee the good Tendency. Let it be maturely delibcrated, whether it is not neceſſary to repeal it.

The Emperors Kang hi's Remark.] Theſe wiſe Princes, the ancient Emperors, often deſcended from the Majeſty of their Throne, to bewail and to weep over the Guilty. How unreaſonable was was it to include, in the Puniſhment of a Malefactor, his Father, his Mother, his Wife, and Children. Ven ti wanted to have this Law aboliſhed; whence we may conclude that he was a good Prince.

Another Declaration of the ſame Emperor, importing, a Remiſſion of the half of his Revenue in Grain, for the Encouragement of Agriculture.

THEY who have the Government of People in their Hands, ought to inſpire them with all poſſible Concern for what ever is neceſſary to the Good of the State: Such, without Doubt, is Agriculture.

For this Reaſon, I have been inculcating this important Point, theſe ten Years. Yet I cannot obſerve that they have enough laboured the new Grounds, or that there is greater Abundance of Grain. On the contrary, with Grief, I ſee Famine painted upon the Faces of the poorer People. Surely, either the ſubordinate Officers and Magiſtrates have not had a juſt Regard to my Ordinances on this Head, or, they are improper to fill the Rank they poſſeſs. Alas! If the Magiſtrates, who are immediate Witneſſes of the People's Miſery, are regardleſs of it, what effectual Remedy can I apply for their Relief? This muſt be thought of. In the mean Time, I remit Half of my Revenue in Grain for the current Year.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Nothing is more juſt in itſelf than this Declaration; and it is admirably well expreſſed: Even to this Day, it is affecting, and what muſt it have been when it was firſt publiſhed?

There are in the ſame Book, a great many other Declarations of the Emperor Ven ti, of the ſame Nature with this laſt, which proves him (ſays Kang hi) to have been a Prince of vaſt OEconomy.

Another Declaration of the Emperor Ven ti, importing, an Order to deliberate upon changing Mutilations into other Puniſhments.

I HAVE heard it ſaid, that in the Times of (*) Shun, the Execution of an Effigies, was ſufficient to keep the People within their Duty. Happy Government! At this Time, for Crimes not Capital, we have three Sorts of (†) Mutilations very real and very ſevere. And yet there are every Day terrible Crimes committed. To what is this owing? Is it to my being deſtitute of the Virtues and Qualifications required to inſtruct my People aright? Yes, ſure it is! The Faults my Subjects commit, and the Neceſſity there is of puniſhing them accordingly, are to me the greateſt Subjects of Confuſion. The Shi king, animating a Prince to the right Government of his Subjects, ſays, that he ought to be to them as a Father and a Mother; yet, if any of my Subjects commits a Fault, even thro' Ignorance, he is immediately puniſhed; and the Puniſhment is ſuch, as diſables him ever to repair it by a better Conduct. This pierces my Heart. What a Torture muſt it be to the poor Sufferers, when they commit a Fault, if they are ſo mulitated as to be, for ever after, incurable? But how ſevere does ſuch a Law ſhew the Prince to be? Is this being a Father and a Mother to his People? Then let the Abrogation of this Law, come immediately under Deliberation: I ordain, that theſe Mutilations be changed into other Puniſhments; And it is likewiſe my Pleaſure, that thoſe who have been chaſtiſed more or leſs, according to the Nature of their Faults, be, after a certain Time, readmitted to the ſame Privileges with the reſt of my Subjects.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] It may be ſaid, that the abrogating theſe Laws, will give greater Encouragement to Offenders, to act unpuniſh'd; and by this means increaſe their Numbers; but at the ſame Time, it ſhould be conſidered that thoſe Mutilations, and the Diſgraces that attend them, deprive the Sufferers of almoſt all the Means of repairing their paſt Conduct. (§) To change theſe Puniſhments for others, ſuch as whipping with Rods, will ſave a great many poor Wretches.

Another Declaration of the ſame Emperor Ven ti, on account of the Prayers and Supplications offer'd in his behalf by many Officers who were negligent of their Duty.

I AM now arrived at the 14*th* Year of my Reign; the longer it continues, the more I am ſenſible of, and confounded at, my own Want of Abilities; tho' I have not hitherto failed to diſcharge, every Year, the preſcribed Ceremonies both to Shang ti and my Anceſtors, I am ſenſible, that in theſe Ceremonies, none of our antient and wiſe Kings had any Eye to their private Intereſt, or petitioned for what is term'd Happineſs. So far were they from this, that they ſet all Conſiderations either of Blood or Intereſt aſide, in order to raiſe an able worthy Man, tho' no ways related to them; and preferred the wiſe Advice of another to their own natural Inclinations. Nothing is more beautiful and wiſe, than ſo diſintereſted a Conduct in great Princes!

At preſent, I underſtand, that many Officers outdo one another, in their Prayers for good Fortune; the good Fortune of what? not of my People, but of my Perſon: This is what I cannot reliſh. If I approved that Officers, indolent in their Duty, and unattentive to the Well-fare of my People, ſhould be entirely employed in the perſonal good Fortune of a Prince, who has ſo little Virtue as I have, it would be a conſiderable Addition to my Failings. I therefore ordain, that my Officers, inſtead of theſe pompous Petitions for me, ſhould give all poſſible Application to a conſcientious Diſcharge of their Duties.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] It is the Virtue of an Offering, not the Contents, that renders it agreeable. When, in good Earneſt, we ſeek for Virtue, the Gifts of (*) Tyen come of Courſe. How ridiculous was it for the Officers of the Empire to imagine, that, by only repeating ſome Forms of Prayer, they could procure Happineſs to their Prince? Ven ti was certainly in the right to condemn ſuch an Abuſe.

Tſing te yew, one of the famous Literati under the Dynaſty of the Song, remarks of this Declaration: That if there were any Defects in the State, Ven ti attributes them all to himſelf; and with regard to Happineſs, he diſdained all that was not in common with his Subjects. In this, he was a true Imitator, and a worthy Succeſſor, of our ancient Princes.

Another Declaration of the ſame Emperor Ven ti, importing, that Men of approved Virtue and Merit might be ſought for, and preſented to him.

THE great Yû was at extraordinary Pains, to procure virtuous and able Perſons to aſſiſt him in governing wiſely. The Orders he publiſhed for this Effect, were not only publiſhed within the Bounds of the Empire, but were known a great Way beyond them; and we may ſay, they were unknown only to Countries, inacceſſible to Ships, to Chariots, and to Men. Every one, both far and near, eſteemed it both a Pleaſure and a Duty to communicate to him their Knowledge; by theſe Means, this great Prince was never ſeen to take one wrong Step, and became the Founder of a long and a flouriſhing Dynaſty.

Kau ti, in later Times, has taken the ſame Precautions in founding our Dynaſty. After he had delivered the Empire from its Calamities, his firſt Care was, as much as he could, to furniſh himſelf with Men of Merit. All ſuch he put in Poſts, and recommended nothing ſo ſtrongly to them, as to help him to govern aright. Aided by the powerful Protection of Tyen, and the Fortune of his Family, and peaceably poſſeſſing his large Kingdom, he extended the Effects of his Goodneſs even to neighbouring People. (†) From him, you know it, the Empire devolves on me. You know likewiſe (for I have often told you ſo myſelf,) that I have neither Virtue nor Qualifications ſufficient for the Weight of Government.

This engages me to publiſh the preſent Declaration; to enjoyn all who are in Poſts in my Empire, from the Prince, to the ſimple Magiſtrate, to enquire carefully after Perſons of Merit for my Service. Such, for inſtance, as know the World perfectly well; others who have a thorow Underſtanding of all Affairs relating to the State; but above all, ſuch as have Reſolution and Honeſty enough, to inform me freely of what they think amiſs in my Conduct. I require a good Number of all theſe to ſupply my Defects. In the mean Time, ſuch of you as are in the Rank of (§) Ta fû, muſt aid me in this, as far as you can. All that is eſſential to be examined, are the following Points. 1. My daily and my perſonal Faults. 2. The Defects of the preſent Adminiſtration. 3. The Injuſtice of Magiſtrates. 4. The Neceſſities of the People. Explain yourſelf upon theſe Heads, in a Memorial drawn up on purpoſe. I will read it, and, in ſo doing, perceive whether your Zeal for my Service extends ſo far as it ought; and I will not think it real, if, from the Beginning to the End of that Memorial, you do not ſpeak with Freedom, and without ſparing even my Perſon. Take Care, Ta fû; it is no Trifle ye are about, but an Affair of the greateſt Conſequence; and endeavour worthily to acquit your ſelves of what I give you in Charge.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This is the firſt Declaration an Emperor ever publiſhed, in order to procure able Counſellors. The Shortneſs and Aptneſs of the Stile in this Piece, are in the ancient Taſte.

Another Declaration of the ſame Emperor Ven ti, upon the Peace concluded with Tan yu a Tartar Prince, towards the North of China.

FOR many Years paſt, my Subjects have ſuffered a good deal, and my Neighbours and Allies, yet more. The Irruptions of the Hyong nû have been frequent. I am ſenſible they have coſt many Lives on both Sides, and have Reaſon to believe that much of the Miſchief has been concealed from my Knowledge. I cannot ſee my People ſuffer ſo long without being ſenſibly affected, and the more ſo, becauſe I have always looked upon myſelf as the Author of it; for, if I had more Wiſdom and Virtue, theſe Misfortues would have been prevented. In this continual Diſtreſs, I have been Day and Night, meditating on the means to procure a laſting Peace, both at Home and abroad. To this alone, tend the frequent Motions of my Ambaſſadors. I have omitted nothing to make (‖) Tan yu ſenſible of my real Intentions, which are equally calculated for the good of his Subjects and mine. Tan yu at laſt comprehends them, and acknowledging their Juſtice, deſires to contribute to the common Good of both. We therefore have agreed, mutually to forget what is paſt, and to live in Friendſhip for the Good of the World. In this Year I can ſay, I have acquitted myſelf of the firſt Duty a Prince owes, which is to eſtabliſh Peace in his Family.

Declaration

Declaration of King ti, Succeſſor of Ven ti, enjoining Compaſſion in judicial Proceedings againſt Criminals.

LAWS and Puniſhments are neceſſary, in order to prevent or ſtop Miſchiefs; but at the ſame Time, it ought to be remembred, that they who are once put to Death, can never be brought again to Life. Now it often happens, that corrupt Judges ſacrifice an innocent Perſon, to, either, their own, or another Man's Paſſion; and thus, barter away the Lives of Men. It even happens, that ſome, tho' diſintereſted in Appearances, yet ſeek at the Bottom, to acquire a Character, at the Expences of another, by giving the ſpecious Names of Vigilance and Juſtice to the vileſt Subterfuges, and the moſt unwarrantable Severities; thus, deſtroying many of their fellow Subjects, and even ſome Officers of Diſtinction. This occaſions to me great Uneaſineſs, Grief, and Compaſſion: But, on the other Hand, as Puniſhments are neceſſary, and Laws muſt ordain them, what I think myſelf obliged to ordain, that theſe Abuſes may be as much prevented as poſſible, is this. When, in the ſtrict Senſe of the Law, a Man is capitally convicted, if there are any Circumſtances by which the Public favours the Criminal, let this be regarded, and a Mitigation of the Sentence take Place.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Edict is well expreſſed; the Emperor King ti was a clear ſighted, and an intelligent Prince, which appears ſtill more by his Tenderneſs and Clemency.

Another Declaration of the Emperor King ti, recommending to the People Agriculture, and to Magiſtrates Vigilance and Uprightneſs.

TO what end ſerve ſo many Sculptures, and ſuch a Profuſion of empty Ornaments? They are not only unneceſſary, but miſchievous, by taking up a great Number of Hands, who might be employed in Agriculture. Why too, ſo many Embroideries and Bawbles, which now amuſe our Women, formerly more uſefully employed in the Manufactures of wearable Stuffs and Cloths? By the Men's purſuing other Arts than Agriculture, the Lands are become deſart, and by the Women's leaving for Trifles, our profitable Manufactures, whole Families are deſtitute of Cloathing. It ſeldom happens, but that People, who want Food and Rayment, run into all manner of Evil. I, every Year, cultivate the Earth with my own Hands, and the Empreſs my Conſort, rears Silk-Worms. It is with the Labours of our own Hands, that we furniſh out Part of the Ceremonies paid to our Anceſtors. We think it our Duty to act thus, that thereby, we may give a good Example, and animate our Subjects to Agriculture, and procure Plenty in the Empire. With the ſame View, I refuſe Preſents, I ſuppreſs unneceſſary Offices, and retrench every thing elſe as much as poſſible, that the Taxes may be proportionably diminiſhed. There is Nothing, Nothing! I have ſo much at Heart, as the Improvement of Agriculture. If it once flouriſhed, Plenty would follow of Courſe, and Reſerves might be laid up againſt the Times of Scarcity. Then ſhould we no longer dread thoſe Days, when Famine prompted the Strong to ſpoil the Weak, and Troops of Robbers deprived poor Families of the Neceſſaries of Life. If Agriculture flouriſhed, we ſhould no more behold the Young cut off by miſery, and violent Deaths, in the Bloom of Life; and every one would have enough to make his Life glide gently on to the Brink of old Age. Inſtead of this, we now feel a Year of pinching Want; what occaſions this Calamity? Do I ſuffer myſelf to be impoſed upon by Hypocriſy and Fraud in in the Diſtribution of Offices? Are the Magiſtrates remiſs in adminiſtrating Juſtice? Have the Officers of the Tribunals, under Pretext of collecting my Revenue, oppreſt my Subjects? In fine, are there any, who trampling upon the moſt eſſential Laws, and whoſe Buſineſs it is to ſuppreſs Robbers, yet ſecretly ſhare in their Rapines? We ſtrictly charge all the principal Officers of our Provinces, that they will, more than ever, watch over the Conduct of their inferior Officers, and inform our Miniſters of the Culpable. And for this Effect, we ordain, That this our preſent Declaration be publiſhed throughout all our Dominions, that every one may be inſtructed in our Intentions.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Declaration comes directly to the Point, and there is not a Word in it but what has this Tendency. What this Prince remarks of inferior Officers, ſhews, he was acquainted with the moſt private Hardſhips of his People.

Declarations of the Emperor Ven ti, recommending to his Subjects, that they would give him Advice in his Adminiſtration, that they would inſtruct him in certain Points, and ſpeak to him with Freedom.

BEING raiſed as I am, by a ſingular (*) good Fortune to the Throne of my Anceſtors, that I may tranſmit it to my Poſterity; and charged with the Government of a great Empire, that I may encreaſe its Splendor, I am no leſs full of Gratitude for the Honours done me, than ſenſible of the Weight of Power. Day and Night ſince my Acceſſion, have I inceſſantly applied myſelf, yet, I have Grounds to fear that many Things have eſcaped my Vigilance; and that I have committed many Faults. For which Reaſon, I have recommended to all the (†) Chu lyew, and to all others in the Empire, to find out Perſons capable to inſtruct and aſſiſt me in the great Art of Governing.

(*) This alludes to his being preferred to the Succeſſion by his Father, before his elder Brother.

(†) Tributary Princes.

You

You then (‡) Ta fû (a Rank which I ſee you with Pleaſure worthily poſſeſs) you I ſay, who are at the Head of thoſe hitherto preſented to me, read this with Attention. The Point upon which I demand your Advice is this. I hear that under our 5 Ti and our 3 Vang, the Empire enjoyed a charming Tranquillity; and yet, that in Order to preſerve it, they made Uſe only of ſome very ſimple Regulations, and a few pieces of Muſic. Since the Death of theſe Princes, the Form of their Bells, their Drums, and other Inſtruments, have been tranſmitted to us. But their Government has met with a different Fate: It has fallen by little and little to Ruin. Under (*) Kye, Chew, and others like them, there did not remain almoſt a Veſtige of it.

What ſurprizes me moſt is, that in the Space of 500 Years betwixt the time of Ven vang, to the laſt Reigns of the Dynaſty of Chew, there have been ſeveral good Princes and worthy Miniſters, who have oppoſed the Corruption of the Age, and full of Eſteem for the ancient Government, have endeavoured to re-eſtabliſh it, but in vain. Things went from bad to worſe. Is this to be attributed to the fault of Men alone? Ought we not rather to ſay, that Things happened thus by the ſupream Decree of (†) Tyen? From whence proceeded the Proſperity, of our three firſt Dynaſties? And what was the firſt Cauſe of their Decay and Ruin?

I have heard many, both of the naturally Wiſe and Virtuous, of thoſe who are born dull, and thoſe who are viciouſly enclined, make a Diſtinction of long Life and untimely Death. Both the one and the other, ſay they, is to be attributed to Nature and Fate. This I have a Thouſand Times heard, but am far from being ſatisfied on that Head. While I expect ſome Satisfaction from you in this Point, I ſhall inform you of what I have chiefly at Heart: I require, that every one voluntarily, and without Conſtraint, ſhould do his Duty, and that the Vicious may be reſtrained and reclaimed, by the moſt gentle Laws, and the mildeſt Puniſhments. In ſhort, that my Subjects being united may live in Contentment, and that the Government may be faultleſs. I want to have again the ſeaſonable Returns of Dews and Rains, that render the Fields fertile, and the Trees abounding in Fruits. That no terrible Phenomena may be ſeen in the Stars, and that the Seaſons may again be regular. In fine, I want, aided with the powerful Aſſiſtances of Tyen, and the conſtant Protection of Quey ſhin, to make my Empire every Day more flouriſhing, my People more happy, my Neighbours, and, if poſſible, all the World, to ſhare in that Happineſs.

You ſee Ta fû, what I wiſh for. From you I expect great Aſſiſtance in theſe Points: From you who are ſo thoroughly acquainted with the moſt remote Antiquity, with the Government of our wiſeſt Princes, and with the Springs upon which the good or bad Fortune of Empires depend. But what I chiefly recommend to you is, that you proceed regularly, and not upon too many Articles at once, diſcuſſing firſt one Subject, then another; thus advancing by Degrees, till you are perfectly well informed, of all that is moſt eſſential and of greateſt Uſe in every Point. Whatever Faults you diſcover in the Officers of my Empire, whether they lie in the want of Virtue, Diſintereſtedneſs, Zeal, or Application, let me be informed of them, without omitting any Thing. As for what relates to my own Perſon, ſpeak it out boldly; for that End uſe no Artifice, or Diſguiſe, and dread no troubleſome Conſequences. Apply yourſelves inceſſantly to draw up a Memorial on theſe Heads; which, when done, I ſhall read.

In Purſuance of the above Declaration, Chwen ti hong ſhu drew up a Memorial for the Emperor, (an Extract of which I ſhall give below) with which, Ven ti was ſo well pleaſed, that in order to procure another, made the following Declaration.

IT is ſaid of (‡) Shun, that when walking peaceably about, with his Arms folded, he was giving the Enjoyment of perfect Peace to the Empire. It is ſaid, on the contrary, of (‖) Ven vang, that in order to keep every Thing in Order, he put himſelf to prodigious Pains; the Care of his People employed him ſo much, that many Times, the Sun was ſet, before he had broken his Faſt. Whence did this proceed? Why did the one Prince toil ſo much, and the other ſo little? Was it on Account of their different Maxims? I know not, if I am miſtaken, but I think I have diſcovered the Reaſon of ſo remarkable a Difference. In the Times of Shun, all the native Simplicity of the firſt Ages ſtill prevailed. In the Time of Veng vang, Pomp and Luxury had got Footing. In Effect, we find by our ancient Books, that about the Beginning of the Dynaſty of the Chew, were introduced large Chariots, richly adorned and painted, glittering Arms which were ſometimes adorned with precious Stones. Then were introduced Conſorts of Muſic, and magnificent Balls; but no ſuch Things were known in the Reign of Shun: The Maxims of his Days, were, that if any one had a fine Stone without any Blemiſh, to engrave a Figure upon it, was not to embelliſh, but to ſpoil it: Under the Chew, a contrary Maxim prevailed, which was, that Virtue muſt be aided, and ſupported with a little Embelliſhment.

In Times more diſtant from one another, the Difference was ſtill as great; ſevere Laws were then inſtituted to keep Men in their Duty, and Mutilations were frequent. Theſe Laws were aboliſh'd under the Chew; and under Kang vang Criminals were ſo few, that the Priſons remained empty, during the Space of forty Years. Puniſhments came again in Uſe under the Tſin; then a horrible Maſſacre enſued, but it never diminiſhed the Number of Offences. An infinite Number then periſhed. One cannot reflect on it without Horror and Compaſſion: But alas!

(‡) A Degree of Honour, to which he had elevated Chwen ti hong ſhu, the moſt eſteem'd of the wiſe Men that were preſented to him.

(*) Names of very bad Princes. (†) Heaven.

(‡) A famous Prince.

(‖) Another famous Prince among the firſt of the Dynaſty of the Chew.

Alas! It is by calling it continually to Mind, and by comparing what paſſed under the Emperors my Predeceſſors, that I endeavour to improve, ſo as to ſupport the Dignity of my Crown, and to procure the Happineſs of my People.

I aim chiefly at promoting Agriculture, and filling Offices only with worthy Men. To ſet my Subjects a good Example, (§) I labour the Ground with my own Hands. I honour thoſe who diſtinguiſh themſelves in this Labour, and frequently ſend Emiſſaries into the Country to find them out. I inform myſelf with great Care of the Poor, the Orphans, and the Helpleſs; In ſhort, I am inceſſantly contriving to render my Reign glorious, by making my People virtuous and content. Notwithſtanding of all this, I cannot ſay, that I have been ſucceſsful. The Seaſons are irregular, the Air is tainted, Diſeaſes abound, Numbers of People die, and my Subjects ſuffer a great deal. I know not to what I ſhould attribute all theſe Misfortunes, unleſs to this, that in ſpite of all my good Intentions, ſome Corruption reigns among thoſe I have put in Offices. It is in order to examine this ſo intricate and neceſſary Point, that I have brought to my Court many knowing Men, whom I have ſearched for in all Parts.

To you then, my Lords, to all and every one of you, this Declaration is addreſſed. We ſtrictly charge you, carefully to examine into the Defects of the Government. In thoſe Points that differ perhaps from wiſe Antiquity, examine, if the Difference is grounded on Reaſon, or Negligence. Lay open to us your Thoughts: Diſcloſe the Ways and Means you think proper to procure Redreſs of the growing Evils, and do it in an exact Memorial; in the drawing up of which, we expreſsly charge you to take Care of two Things. 1. That you ſhall not confine yourſelves to talk to me in fine Language; but reſtrict yourſelf to what is practicable. 2. That neither Reſpect nor Fear ſhall hinder you from ſpeaking with Freedom; for ſuch is our Will.

In the Book, from which theſe Pieces were taken, are ſeveral other Declarations of the Emperor Vû ti upon the ſame Subject, with the two foregoing. Kang hi ſays of one of them, This Piece alone, ſhews that a polite fine Diction obtained in the Time of Vu ti. I ſhall not be poſitive that theſe are the Emperor's Words. One thing is certain, that an Author, named Ching te liew, is cited immediately after, who ſays: "That the Declarations of Vû ti are too laboured. "They have, continues he, Taſte and Stile, but are at the ſame Time vague and empty: I love "thoſe of (‖) Vû ti much better; the Language is more ſimple, but not leſs beautiful; and at the "Bottom, they come more directly to the Point in whatever is real and ſolid." I find in the ſame Book, other Declarations and Ordinances of the ſame Emperor Vû ti, either containing, Acquittances of what were his Dues, or Orders to ſupply the Old and the Poor out of his Treaſury. Upon which, the Emperor Kang hi ſays; Vû ti in all theſe imitated his Father King ti, and his Grand-father Ven ti, but not in their OEconomy. He exhauſted his Treaſures by a thouſand Expences; and towards the end of his Reign found himſelf in very bad Circumſtances.

Chau ti, youngeſt Son to Vu-ti, ſucceeded him: In this Book I only find two Pieces of his, whereof the firſt is very ſhort. The occaſion of its being written is as follows. Han fu and four others, were preſented to him as Perſons of diſtinguiſhed Merit, exemplary Virtue, and great Capacity; but at the ſame time, he was given to underſtand that they wanted to live retired, and not to concern themſelves with Affairs; from which they hoped his Majeſty would excuſe them. Upon this Chau ti publiſhed the following Order.

I HAVE an equal Love and Eſteem for Han fû and his Friends. Qualified as they are for great Employments, I am willing to ſpare them the Fatigues. I therefore conſent that, being free of all Cares, they be only employed in advancing, by their Diſcourſes and Examples, every one in his own Country, the Practice of all the Virtues, eſpecially filial Piety. As a Teſtimony of my Eſteem for them, I ordain my Officers, who are upon the Spot at the beginning of every Year, to make a Preſent to each of them, at my Expences. (*) If any Misfortunes happen to them, I order a (†) Coverlet to be furniſhed to them, and ſuitable Habits at my Coſt likewiſe; and that the funeral Honours paid them, be ſuch as are due to a Perſon of the ſecond Rank.

Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] For a Prince thus to deprive himſelf of a good Miniſter, is, in Effect, to gain him. Their Diſcourſes and their Examples form a great many able and virtuous Men.

Tang wang, King of Yen, tho' of the Blood Royal, entered into a Party againſt the Emperor Chau ti, who thereupon ſent him the following Letter ſealed with his own Seal.

KAU TI, from whom we have both of us the Honour to deſcend, when he came to the Crown, gave to all the Princes of his Blood Appanages, in order to ſtrengthen his Family. Since his Days, the (‡) Lyû having endeavoured to undermine us; all the Lye û remained firmly united againſt them as common Enemies. They had P rince Kyang and others on their Side. The Lyû were extirpated, and our Family, in the Perſon of Ven ti, kept Poſſeſſion of the Throne.

(§) An ancient Cuſtom.

(*) The meaning is, If they ſhall die, but the Chineſe ſhun that Expreſſion.

(†) Becauſe in China the Coffin is dreſt up almoſt like a Bed, and the dead Body, when put into it, is habited very well.

(‡) A Family, that by means of an Empreſs Conſort aſpired to the Crown.

The Families of Fan, the Ki, the Tſau, the Quan, to which Kau ti was ſo much indebted for their Fidelity and Services, after being conſiderably encreaſed, found themſelves in a ſhort time as it were, blended with others of all Ranks and Conditions. Numbers of them contentedly laboured the Ground, and ſuffered a great deal without repining; and a few, from Regard to the Figure they once made, were raiſed, but none above the Rank of Hew. This you know, and, at the ſame Time, are not ignorant, that our Family met with a different Treatment. Without once appearing in the Field, or doing the leaſt Service, they were admitted into, as it were, a Partnerſhip of the Empire: They had a Territory aſſigned them, they were honoured with the Title of Vang, or King, and were furniſhed with conſiderable Sums. Such was the Conduct of Kau ti to thoſe of his own Blood; and theſe Favours have been perpetuated ſo ever ſince his Time, that the Succeſſion has continued from Father to Son; and where the elder Son was dead, it devolved upon the younger; ſo that it is to your Blood that you owe all you are. And it is againſt that very Blood, which now ennobles you, that inſtead of the Affection you owe to me as the Chief of your Family, you are caballing againſt me, with People who don't in the leaſt value you. You are forming, or at leaſt ſupporting, a rebellious Party. If it is granted to the dead to be conſcious of what paſſes here below, with what Face dare you appear at the Myau of your Anceſtors, when you perform the uſual Honours to their Memories?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Grave, the Solid, and the Tender are ſo intermixed in this Letter, that they ſupport and illuſtrate one another. Beſides, the Style is well connected, and has a great deal of the Pathetic.

A Gloſs.] Tan, when he received this Letter, opened it, read it, and ſtrangled himſelf upon the Spot.

Declaration of the Emperor Suen ti, importing an Order, that Perſons might be preſented to him, who were diſtinguiſhed for filial Piety.

CONSCIOUS as I am, of my own Inabilities and Inſufficiency, I endeavour to ſupply my other Defects by a conſtant Attention to the Neceſſities of my Government, in which I employ myſelf Day and Night. The juſt Fear I have of diſgracing my Anceſtors, makes me call in to my Aſſiſtance, Perſons diſtinguiſhed for their Character and Merit. Notwithſtanding of all this, and other Methods I take, I have yet failed of Succeſs in the Reformation of Manners. Reflecting to Day on what Tradition informs us of; That filial Piety is the Baſis of all other Virtues; I ordain, that from every Government, one diſtinguiſhed for this Virtue be preſented me: I want to honour and promote all ſuch according to their Capacities.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Han ſucceeding immediately to the Tſin, that is to ſay, to Times of Trouble and Corruption, nothing was more needful than the Suppreſſion of Immorality and the promoting of Virtue; thus we ſee that ſince Ven ti's Days, Vou ti and others have made this their main Study.

Another Edict of the Emperor Suen ti, importing an Exemption from all Attendance on publick Services, to thoſe who had loſt their Father or Mother.

ONE good Method to retain Subjects in a quiet Submiſſion is, to inſpire them with a Love of the filial Duties. But it happens now adays, that without Regard to ſuch as have loſt their Father or Mother, they are employed as other People in public Services; ſo that a diſconſolate Son cannot peaceably pay his laſt Duties to his Parents. If he has the leaſt Spark of Piety, this Violence muſt pierce his Heart. I am touched with Compaſſion at ſuch a Caſe, and ordain, that henceforth, he who loſes his Father or Mother, his Grand-father or Grand-mother, ſuch a one ſhall be exempted from Attendance on public Services, to the intent that he may provide a decent Funeral for them, and freely acquit himſelf of all the Duties of a good Son.

The ſame Emperor (Suen ti) publiſhed a Declaration, by which he for the future diſpenſed with a Son's accuſing a Parent, or a Wife her Huſband, but made it Capital for a Father or a Huſband, to conceal certain Crimes of his Son or of his Wife. Upon which the Emperor Kang hi remarks, that this Diſtinction is founded upon good Reaſons.

Yu, younger Brother of Yuen ti (both Sons of Suen ti, tho' by a different Mother) was, when young, made Vang, or King of Tong ping. When he grew up, he committed ſome Extravagancies which diſobliged his Mother, who on her Part exaſperated him worſe. Yuen ti gave his Brother ſome Advice, and then wrote to his Mother in the following Terms.

I The Emperor, charge all my Eunuchs upon Duty, that they forward this Letter to the Queen, Mother of the Vang, or King, of Tong ping.

Some Things, Madam, have come to my Ears, which makes me beg Leave to ſuggeſt to you, that the Happineſs of Families united within themſelves by the ſtricteſt Tyes of Blood, conſiſts in Unanimity; and their Deſtruction is occaſioned by nothing ſo much, as Diſcord. It is ſaid, that the King of Tong ping, under the Pretext of the high Rank he holds, grows in Inſolence in proportion as he advances in Years. That he neglects his Studies, and abuſes his Officers; and, even ſeems, a little to forget the Reſpect he owes to you. Theſe are Faults, but after all, they are Faults that many wiſe Princes have not been entirely free from at his Age. An ancient Maxim ſays, that it becomes Parents to conceal the Failings of their Children. Reflect a little, Madam, upon this Maxim; and on the Relation, in which you and your Son ſtand to one another. Tho' you live and breathe ſeperated from each other, yet the ſame Blood and the ſame Spirits are diffuſed thro' both your Bodies. Can any Tyes be more ſtrict, and ſhould any Trifle have power to break them? In former Times, Chew kong in adviſing Pe kyu, recommended to him, among other Things, never to break with a Friend, but for very weighty Reaſons. If bare Friendſhip requires a mutual Forgiveneſs of many Injuries, judge by this, Madam, I intreat you, of your preſent Caſe. Beſides, I have ſent a Meſſenger to the (*) Vang your Son, and I have given him ſome Advice about his Conduct. He does not excuſe, but acknowledges, his Faults, and repents of them. You, Madam, on your Part, take care by a Behaviour full of Indulgence, Tenderneſs, and if there is occaſion for it, of Patience, again to cultivate Harmony with him.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Advice is very well conceived, and ought to have had its Effects. The Hiſtorian Pau kû ſays of Yuen ti, that all the Orders which he gave in Writing, were full of a Sweetneſs and Openneſs entirely in the ancient Manner. He is certainly in the right, and this Piece proves very well what he advances.

Declaration of the Emperor Ching ti, Succeſſor to Yuen ti, recommending to the (†) Hew and other great Men, to take Care to avoid all unneceſſary Expences; and that none be allowed to wear Cloths, or have Equipages, &c. above his Rank.

OUR ancient Princes, in eſtabliſhing the Titles of Honour with ſo much Wiſdom, had an Eye principally to diſtinguiſh the Ranks in the State; but at the ſame Time took Care, that the Chief ſhould be filled with Perſons of the greateſt Virtue. To do the greater Honour to them, theſe Diſtinctions in Chariots and Habits were regulated, that were ſo ſcrupulouſly obſerved by Antiquity. According to the Maxims of theſe great Men, Riches gave none a Right to diſpenſe with the Obſervance of the Laws. This Uſage was a continual Leſſon inculcated thro' the whole Empire, and taught that Virtue was preferable to Riches. People then ſaw many as noble Examples of this, as they ſaw Perſons in a Station ſuperior to their own.

How vaſtly is the Scene now changed? We now behold only Luxury and ridiculous Expences: This Evil encreaſes every Day. The Kong, the King, the Hew, and thoſe who either as my Friends, Relations, or Officers, approach neareſt to my Perſon, inſtead of entering with me into Sentiments of Zeal and Compaſſion upon theſe Extravagancies, authoriſe them by their own Examples. Inſtead of continually watching over their own Conduct as they ought to do, and by duely obſerving the (‡) Rites, ſetting a juſt Pattern for the People, they are employed in nothing, but their own Vanity and Pleaſures. They build large Houſes, lay out vaſt Gardens and Ponds, and harbour about their Perſons a Pack of idle Slaves. They refine every Day upon their Dreſſes, and ſtrive who ſhall have the greateſt number of Bells, Drums, and ſinging Women. To conclude, in their Chariots, their Dreſſes, their Marriages, their Funerals, and every other Article, their Expences are extravagant. Thoſe of the Magiſtrates and People who are rich, follow their Examples; and theſe Exceſſes paſs into a Cuſtom.

While theſe Diſorders laſt, how can Modeſty, Temperance, and wiſe OEconomy flouriſh in the Empire? How, if theſe Virtues are wanting, ſhall we eſcape ſuffering bad times? Is it poſſible that every one ſhall always be above Neceſſity? O! How good Reaſon had the (§) Shi king to ſay? "Ye, whoſe Rank and Employments raiſe you above the Level of the common People, watch carefully over your own Conduct: Your Inferiors, who always have you in their View, will be ſure to follow your good or bad Examples."

By theſe Preſents, we enjoin our Miniſters and Magiſtrates to labour for a Reformation of theſe Abuſes. Black and Green, are the only Colours which all the Commonality ſhould be allowed to wear; and let them not be permitted to uſe any other. We recommend to all the Hew, and others who have Acceſs to our Perſon, that they examine this Point, and that they be the firſt to bring about, by their own Example, ſo neceſſary a Reformation.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Declaration, exactly anſwers the End of eſtabliſhing theſe Diſtinctions: Thoſe who are above others, by poſſeſſing their Ranks agreeably to the Law, ſet to all the Nation a Pattern, of what is called, genteel Frugality: Which, without doubt, is a great Step to the Reformation of a State: For by it, Luxury, that fruitful Source of Calamities, falls to the Ground. And as thoſe who have great Employments, Dignities, and Eſtates, are the moſt apt to forget themſelves on this Head, Ching ti went directly to the Point, by addreſſing himſelf to them.

Declaration

Declaration of the Emperor Ngay ti, for reforming Muſic.

AT preſent, three great Abuſes prevail among us; Profuſeneſs in Entertainments, and Apparel; an Itch after Numbers of vain Ornaments, and a Paſſion for the tender effeminating Muſic of (||) Chin and Wey. Prodigality ruins Families in the third Generation: and by it the whole Empire becomes poorer. The Itch for vain Ornaments, occaſions Multitudes of People to attend only very uſeleſs Arts, and to neglect Agriculture; and effeminating tender Muſic inſpires Licentiouſneſs. To pretend, while theſe ſubſiſt, to introduce Plenty and Innocence into a State, is to ſeek a pure limpid Stream from a muddy Fountain. Confucius had a great deal of Reaſon to ſay, that the Muſic of Chin ſhould be avoided, becauſe it inſpired a Looſneſs of Manners.

By theſe Preſents, we diſcharge our Band of Muſic, and all the Officers attending on it. As for the ordinary Muſic in the Ceremonies of Tyau, and the muſical warlike Inſtruments, we do not pretend to alter them; theſe are approv'd of in our (*) King, but no Officers are appointed for theſe Purpoſes. We will that it be enquired into, to which of the other Officers it will be proper to commit the Management of theſe Matters.

The Emperor Kang hi, who pigned himſelf upon being a lover of Muſic, makes the following Remark upon this Declaration.] Muſic has the Virtue to calm the Heart, and for that the wiſe Man loves it. Beſides, in diverting himſelf with it, he may exerciſe himſelf in governing well, by an eaſy and juſt Application of the Government in Muſic. But with Regard to wanton Muſic, that admits of no Compariſon. Ngay was in the right, to retrench ſuch a number of needleſs Expences.

A Gloſs.] The Emperor ſaved, by this Reformation, the Penſions and Entertainment of above 440 Perſons.

Diſcourſe of Kya ſhan, upon good or bad Government. Addreſs'd to the Emperor Ven ti, formerly called Hyau wen.

SIR, I have heard it ſaid, that a good Miniſter is he, who having the Honour to ſerve a Prince, employs in his Service all his Abilities; and above all things, teſtifies his Zeal by ſincere Remonſtrances, without diſguiſing any thing, tho' it ſhould coſt him his Head. Poſſeſt of ſuch Diſpoſitions, I now proceed to diſcourſe to you upon Government. I ſhall not go far out of my Road to ſeek for an Example, to illuſtrate the Difference betwixt the Good and the Bad. The Hiſtory of the Tſin who immediately preceeded the Han, will furniſh me with ſuch an Inſtance, and I beg your Majeſty to run it over with me, and to give ſome Attention.

In the firſt Ages, Literati of ſmall Fortunes, and poorly habited, were frequently ſeen to advance themſelves to the higheſt Honours, by their Virtue and Wiſdom, and to immortaliſe their Names by their important Services to the State. It was not thus in the Days of the Tſin. Shi whang, a Prince of that Family, by becoming Maſter of the Empire, thereby became Maſter of its ordinary Revenues; but not ſatisfied with theſe, he loaded the People with new Taxes and Vaſſalages, till his Severity reduced them to ſuch a State of Miſery, that knowing they had nothing worſe to fear, the Mountains were infeſted with Robbers, and the Roads filled with Criminals, whom the Officers of Juſtice were always dragging to Priſons, and to Puniſhments. At laſt, he alienated the Affections of his People ſo much, that they eagerly watched the leaſt Breath of Sedition; and waited only for the Signal, for they were ready to follow any one who ſhould give it, to ſhake off their heavy Yoak.

Chin ſhin gave that Signal: This, great Sir, you know, and you likewiſe know the Conſequences. Beſides, if Shi whang ruined the People by Taxes, he likewiſe ruined himſelf by his Expences. In a Journey he made from Kyen yeng to Yong, he changed his Palaces 300 times, and found every one of them furniſhed, without carrying any of his Moveables from the one to the other; nay, not ſo much as the Drums or Bells (†). Many of the Palaces he dwelt in were ſo prodigiouſly large, that they appeared rather Mountains than Houſes. They were ſometimes built to the Height of ſeveral ſcores of (‡) Iin. From North to South they extended a 1000 Paces, and from Eaſt to Weſt, half a League. The Number and Richneſs of his Equipages were anſwerable to the Magnificence of his Buildings. Where did all this Profuſion end? Why! in his Deſcendants, being deprived even of a thatch'd Houſe.

Shi whang cauſed large Roads to be laid out for his Couriers, even to the breadth of fifty Paces, lined with earthen Walls, and planted with Pine-Trees and other Evergreens, which formed one of the moſt agreeable Sights in the World. Where did all this end? His Children of the ſecond Generation, had not a Buſh into which they could creep for Safety.

Shi whang chooſe for his Burying-Place the Mountain Li; ſome hundred thouſands of Men were employed upon it for ten Years: They dug a prodigious Ditch of (§) a vaſt Depth; within, there was heaped up precious Stones, and Metals of all Sorts; and the Ornaments on the Outſide, conſiſted of the moſt beautiful Varniſhes, in the moſt vivid Colours, with even the fineſt Pearls

(||) Theſe are the Names of a Country, formerly two petty Kingdoms.

(*) Old Books that regulate theſe Affairs.

(†) Tſeng te ſiew ſays, that under the Han Dynaſty, Ky ſhan was the firſt who gave Advice to the Emperor in Writing; he was encouraged to this by the good Diſpoſitions of Hyan w who created him a Hew.

(†) Tang king chwan ſays upon this Paſſage, Kya ſhan had Energy, but his Stile was not correct. This may be owing to his living near troubleſome Times.

(‡) A Meaſure of eighty Feet.

(§) The Chineſe ſays, that it penetrated even to three Sources, an Exaggeration aluding to ſome Fable like that of the ancient Poets about Hell. In other Places they mention nine Sources.

Pearls and other Jewels. Round one of the upper Stories ran large Galleries, and behind all, there was raiſed a Mount for Pleaſure, planted with the moſt agreeable Woods. This was a great Expence for the Burying-place of one Man? I ſay of one Man; for his Deſcendants were obliged to beg a few Feet of Earth for that Purpoſe, and could not procure a ſmall Roof of Reeds to cover it.

At laſt, Shi whang, like a wild Beaſt, having cruelly torn in Pieces all the Chu hew, ſwallowed down, if we may ſo ſpeak, the whole Empire, and trampled upon all the Laws of Humanity and Juſtice. But the Vengeance of (*) Tyen ſoon overtook both him and his Family. Theſe are the Matters I have preſumed to ſuggeſt to you, and I beg you would attend to them, and make a good Uſe of them.

It is true, the Subject who is zealous and faithful, is little regarded by his Prince when he ſpeaks without Diſguiſe; and it has often happen'd that he has ruined himſelf, without having it in his Power to ſerve his Prince. But at the ſame Time it is as true, that it is, almoſt always, very difficult for a Sovereign to govern well without ſuch a Monitor, and as the moſt underſtanding Princes have always had a true Zeal for hearing ſincere Advice, the moſt loyal Subjects have not fear'd to expoſe even their Lives, that they might give, to the Prince they ſerved, this Teſtimony of their Duty.

But it is with Princes in this Reſpect as with Soils. The beſt Grain when ſown upon a ſtony Ground, far from multiplying, does not ſo much as grow. On the other Hand, a rich well watered Soil, encreaſes even the worſt Seed committed to it. For Inſtance, under (†) Kyé and Chew, the Advices of Quan long, Kit ſe and Pi kan three great Men of conſummate Wiſdom, had no other Effect upon them but to haſten them to their Ruin. Under Ven vang it was otherwiſe, he not only had Men of Senſe about his Perſon, who cheerfully and ſucceſsfully communicated their Lights to him; but there was not the leaſt Scullion about his Palace, who durſt not ſpeak his Mind freely; and if his Advice was good, it was even followed: The Conſequences were anſwerable, (‡) Kyé and (§) Chew periſhed with their Families, while that of Ven vang flouriſhed.

A good Prince then ought to do the ſame by thoſe who are capable to aſſiſt him, that a good Soil does by the Seeds committed to it; it nouriſhes them, and multiplies them as much as poſſible. Such is the force of Lightning, that there is nothing but what it penetrates: Should a Weight of 1000 (‖) Kyun fall from a Height, it would infallibly cruſh whatever was beneath it. And yet theſe Compariſons are weak to ſhew what the Authority of a Sovereign is, with Regard to a Subject. Even, when he opens a Way to Remonſtrances, when he deſires they ſhall be made, when he takes them in good Part, and amends by them; yet ſtill there remains ſome Dread in the Subject, who ſeldom goes ſo far in this Point as he can. What would be the Conſequences, if a Prince, ſelf-opiniated, cruel, headſtrong, and blinded by his Paſſions, ſhould fall with all the Weight of his Authority upon thoſe who adviſed him? Tho' they had all the Wiſdom of Yau, and all the Firmneſs of Mong pwen, they could not fail of being cruſhed. But then, a Prince of this Character would be ſoon left to himſelf, and then he would commit ſtill greater Faults, yet no Body would dare to adviſe him; till, by an infallible Conſequence, the State would be in very great Danger.

In the firſt Ages, our wiſe Princes were ſeldom without a Man attending them, whoſe Duty and Office it was, to remark their Faults, and to keep an exact Liſt of them. They had beſides, two Officers, one of which was employed to read in Proſe to the Prince, whatever Acts of Government were tranſacting in the whole Empire; and the other, in collecting all the Verſes and Songs which were in Vogue. Not only Miniſters of State and Perſons in Offices, freely gave neceſſary and important Advices in all Affairs as they occurred, but even People in high Ways and in Streets, without any Dread, diſcourſed of what they diſliked in the State. Thus the Prince was perfectly well inſtructed both in his Duties and in his Defects. Can any Thing be more conducive than this, to the Ends of good Government? Not that our Anceſtors were ignorant of the Difference between Subjects and Sovereigns, or of what was owing to the Rank they held: But they were not leſs exact in reſpecting old Age, in furniſhing themſelves with good Miniſters, in raiſing Men of Merit, and, as far as they could, in procuring ſincere Advice. In the Deference they ſhewed to (⊥) old Men, which went ſo far as even to ſerve them with their own Hands, their View was to promote filial Piety in Families. They, as it were, aſſociated in the Government, able Men; becauſe they well knew how apt a Perſon is to be intoxicated with Power, and blinded with Paſſion, when elevated above the Level of Mankind. In ſhort, they opened a large Field for Remonſtrances, becauſe there was nothing they ſo much dreaded, as by being ignorant of their Faults, not to have in their Power to correct them.

(‡) He of the Dynaſty.
(§) Note that the Name of the Dynaſty, Chew, whatever Reſemblance is otherwiſe, is when written and pronounced in the European Manner very different, both in the Chineſe Writing and Pronunciation, from the Name of that bad Prince.
(‖) Kyun was thirty Pounds.
(⊥) There was a Ceremony eſtabliſhed for this.

Did Shi whang want great Qualifications? By no Means. After having ſubdued the Empire, and deſtroyed the ſix Kingdoms into which it was divided, he divided it anew, into Kyun (*) and Hyen (†), which he governed by very worthy Officers. On the Side were he had moſt to fear, he fortified himſelf with a long and a vaſt Wall. He himſelf entered in as minute a Detail of the Affairs of his Empire, as any Man can do into thoſe of a private Family. Notwithſtanding of all this, his Troops were defeated by (‡) Chin, and the Empire paſſed to the Lyew; becauſe Shi whang, who was full of himſelf, liſtned to nothing but his Avarice and his Pride.

Under the Dynaſty Chew, the Emperors erected 1800 petty States, every one of which had its Prince, and every Prince his Rights. Yet the Land was ſubject only to the Tax of a ſimple Tithe, and the Perſons of the People only to three Days Average in a Year. The Subjects eaſy and contented, by their Songs celebrated the Mildneſs of the Government, and the Virtue of their Princes, who on their Parts, were furniſhed with a decent Plenty. Shi whang Maſter of theſe 1800 States, ſquandered his Revenue and ruined the People, and ſtill not having enough for ſatisfying his Ambition and maintaining his Vanity, he redoubled his Cruelties and Exactions. There was not a Family, nay, not a ſingle Man in the Empire, who did not inwardly look upon him as their moſt cruel Enemy, and ſecretly load him with a thouſand Curſes.

At laſt, Shi whang, tho' in the moſt imminent Danger of loſing all, was the only one who was eaſy; having met with ſome precious Stones in a Voyage, he was ſo full of ſelf-conceit, that he cauſed his Exploits to be engraven upon them, and without any Scruple, raiſed himſelf far above Yau and Shun. The Poſterity of our moſt fortunate Princes, has never been able to maintain themſelves upon the Throne, beyond the twentieth or thirtieth Generation. Shi whang promiſed to himſelf, a Succeſſion of 10000 Generations in his Family. He laughed at the ancient Cuſtom, of having Titles of Diſtinction determined after Death; he was reſolved to fix (||) thoſe of himſelf and his Deſcendants before-hand. He called himſelf Shi whang ti, as being the firſt Emperor of his Family. He ordered that his Succeſſor ſhould have the Appellation of Eul ſhi whang ti, to denote his being the ſecond of the Family, and ſo on for 10000 Generations, or rather, for Eternity. In the mean time Shi whang died. There ſucceeded an univerſal Inſurrection of the Empire againſt his Son, who was as worthleſs as himſelf, and in a ſhort time, loſt at once his Empire and Life. In him ended the Dynaſty of Tſin.

But let us enquire once more, why Shi whang ti did not perceive the melancholy dangerous Situation, to which he had reduced his Affairs? It was becauſe no Perſon about him durſt talk to him; becauſe, intoxicated with Pride, he rigorouſly puniſhed the leaſt Murmur; becauſe any one who pretended to give him a ſincere Advice, was ſure to forfeit his Head: and becauſe he gave to his Miniſters neither Authority nor Credit. He proved by his Misfortune, the Truth of what is advanced by our Shi king: "Will a Prince hear? Then he is ſpoken to. Do's he hate "Advice? He receives none; but there is nothing more dangerous for him than ſuch a Silence." Ven vang underſtood the Truth of this Maxim, and acted in a different Manner. So the ſame Shi king ſays to his Praiſe: "Appear Men of Merit, and boldly diſcloſe yourſelves; you are in "Safety under ſuch a Prince, whoſe greateſt delight is to ſee your Numbers encreaſe."

And indeed, to reap all the Advantage that can be expected from the Councils of Men of Merit, you muſt both love and honour them. Such was the Conduct of our ancient and wiſe Princes towards their Miniſters. They not only rendered them powerful and rich, by beſtowing upon them large Penſions; but they diſtinguiſhed them yet more, by ſingular Marks of their Favour and Regard. Was a Miniſter ſick? the Prince viſited him, without minding how often he did ſo. Did a Miniſter die? The Prince went into ſecond Mourning, and in Perſon performed the (§) Tyau, ſeeing him dreſt according to Cuſtom, and put into his Coffin. Till theſe Ceremonies were over, the Prince abſtained from Meat and Wine; denying himſelf Muſic, till after the Funeral; and he was ſo very ſtrict in this, that he did not even uſe it in the Ceremonies performed in Honour of his Anceſtors, if they interfered with thoſe of his Miniſter's Burial.

If our ancient Princes ſo much diſtinguſhed a Miniſter when dead, they likewiſe entertained a vaſt Regard for him when living. Did they pay him a Viſit? it was always according to the Rites, in their Habits of Ceremonies, and with Decency and Gravity. The Miniſter on his Part, exerted himſelf in every Inſtance, in the exact Performance of his Duties, and dreaded Death leſs than the not anſwering the Favours of his Prince. Thus, every thing proſpered, and many after Ages felt the happy Influences of that Reign. At preſent, your Majeſty ſeated on the Throne of your Anceſtors, calling to mind their Actions and their Virtues, ſhows the greateſt Diſpoſitions to imitate them; and by a Reign ſtill happier than theirs, to give a new Glory to your Family, and a new Luſtre to the Crown which you hold of them. It is no doubt, with this View that you ſeek out and honour Men of Merit and Virtue. Your whole Empire applauds your Conduct, and it is every where ſaid, that the ancient Government revives. There is not a Man of Letters in the Empire, who does not aſpire to render himſelf capable to contribute to this. At preſent, you have at your Court a good Number of ſuch Men, of whom you can have great Aſſiſtance in ſo glorious an Undertaking.

(*) Theſe are what are now called Fu, or Cities of the firſt Order, which have ſeveral others depending on them.

But

But for my own Share, I can not diſſemble: When I ſee thoſe whom you have moſt diſtinguiſhed enter into all your Pleaſures, to which you are but too much addicted; I am apprehenſive that you (*) reap but too few Advantages, from ſo many Men of Capacity and Merit. Do you on your Part never turn a little indolent? I am afraid you do. But if you do this, tho' in the ſmalleſt Degree, the (‖) Chu hew will follow your Example, and the Miniſters and Magiſtrates will do the ſame. Then, what will become of all your good Deſigns? How have you laboured, ſince your Acceſſion to the Throne, for the Happineſs of your People? You have abridged your ſelf in your Table, your Muſic, your Equipages, and your Troops. You have more than once remitted your own Revenues, and the annual Tributes. You have converted into arable Grounds, all your Parks and Gardens. There has been ſeen diſpenſed from your Magazines, 100000 Pieces of Stuff for the Relief of the Poor. You have regulated the Exemptions of Children, in Favour of aged Parents. You preſerve the Dignities of Nan, Tze, and the like; every one may advance to them by Degrees; their Appointments are conſiderable, and well paid; and all this, without reckoning the extraordinary Gratifications you beſtow upon your Officers of the firſt Rank, and their Families. In ſhort, your Favours extend even to Criminals: You have ſoftened their Miſeries, allowed them the Comfort of ſeeing their Relations, and in their Favours mitigated the Rigours of the Laws; by theſe Steps, you have not only gained the Hearts of your Subjects, but have procured benign Rains, that have been followed by a plentiful Crop. Fewer Robberies are now ſeen, leſs Miſery is felt; and (†) Tyen, to ſecond your good Intentions, has diminiſhed the Number of Criminals, in Proportion as you have ſoftened the Severity of Puniſhments.

I underſtand, that in the Provinces, when the Magiſtrates cauſe your Declarations to be publiſhed, there is not an old Man ſo decrepid with Age, if he can ſupport himſelf upon a Staff, who does not crowd to hear them, and in hearing, ſays to himſelf: " Why can't I live a little " time longer, that I may ſee the Perfection of that happy Change, which the Virtues of ſuch " a Prince muſt produce?" Things being upon this Footing, your Reputation ſo well eſtabliſhed thro' the whole Empire, and your Court furniſhed with ſo many Men of the moſt diſtinguiſhed Merit; inſtead of profiting by them, happily to finiſh what you have ſo ſucceſsfully begun, and ſupporting the Hopes conceived of your Reign, in what does your Majeſty employ ſo many great Men? In meer Amuſements. No! Sir, this is what I cannot reflect upon without extreme Anguiſh of Heart, which my Zeal will not allow me to conceal: Alas! How truly is it ſaid by our Shi king; " To begin well, is common, but to end well, is rare."

However, don't imagine, that I propoſe any thing to you that is difficult. All I beg is, that you would apply yourſelf leſs to hunting, that you would revive at certain Times the Ceremonies of (§) Ming tang, and cauſe (‡) the Tay hyo to be reeſtabliſhed and promoted. You will hence ſoon ſee with Pleaſure, excellent Effects; but as for the Literati of Merit, with whom you have ſo well furniſhed your Court, and whom you have put into the greateſt Employments, Amuſements are not for them; ſo far from engaging them in Diverſions, you ſhould not ſuffer them to follow you in yours. To treat them as you do, is againſt the wiſeſt Maxims, and the moſt conſtant Practice of ſage Antiquity. More ſerious Affairs ought then to take up all their Time. They ought inceſſantly to be improving in Knowledge, and confirming themſelves in Diſintereſtedneſs, Uprightneſs, and other Virtues. Without this, they will ſoften by Degrees, till at laſt, their Character will be quite effaced. What a Shame, and what a Loſs is it, that Men of ſo many good Qualities, ſhould not only be uſeleſs to you, but even have their Morals corrupted at your Court! This gives me a mortal Uneaſineſs. Divert yourſelf in the Morning, but let it be with ſome Officers of a lower Rank; and then return to the others, and treat with them about the Affairs of your Empire. Thus, without renouncing reaſonable Diverſions, you may maintain in full Vigour the two eſſential Points of Government, the Councils and the Rites.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Compoſition of this Diſcourſe is far from being correct, but it is ſolid at the Bottom. This and other Pieces of that Age, retain a little of the Diſorders that ſo long prevailed in the Empire before the Han; but, one can perceive by them, that thoſe Men, who ſaw the State extricated out of their Inconveniencies, did their beſt to hinder it from relapſing into them. The weſtern Han owed a good deal to the two Kya and Tong chong ſhu; they properly were the good Leaven of their Dynaſty.

(*) Ching te ſyew ſays: All this Diſcourſe of Kya ſhan tends to reclaim Ven ti, who was too much addicted to hunting, and took his Counſellours and Miniſters of State along with him to that Diverſion. It would ſeem at firſt, that it was neither neceſſary or prudent to cite the Hiſtory of the Tſin, but at its Bottom it was not amiſs; for tho' Ven ti was a good Prince, he began to be a little careleſs of his Conduct; Inſtead of holding frequent Councels with his Miniſters, he was for ever engaging them in hunting Matches; one Paſſion brings on another: It is eaſy to imitate what is ill, and Ven ti might have ruined himſelf like Tſin, which was what Kya ſhin feared, and wanted to prevent. In this he was to be praiſed, but in my Opinion he ends ill; for one of our moſt eſſential Maxims is, always to be perfecting ourſelves in Virtue, to be ſtopping up every Avenue of Vice; but Kya ſhan when he ends his Diſcourſe, opens a Road of Remiſſneſs for his Prince. He is inconſiſtent with himſelf in this Point, and does not follow the Doctrine of the I ewn or Literati.

Theſe are the Words of the Tſing te ſyew; and this Doctor is in the Right, for the true I ewn, which ſome Europeans are pleaſed to call Sect of the Literati, is really the Doctrine common to the whole Empire, and what is contained in the Book, which have been conſtantly acknowledged as King. Now according to theſe Books, every body, but the Prince more eſpecially, ought inceſſantly to watch over his Actions and Thoughts, that he may not give the leaſt entrance to Vice. In this Caſe, and with the Aſſiſtance of Tyen, theſe Books tells us, that both Prince and People are happy.

Diſcourſe or Memorial preſented to the Emperor Ven ti, by Kya i.

GREAT Emperor, When I attentively conſider the preſent State of your Empire, I ſee a Thing capable to make me give great Cries: Two other Things fill my Eyes with Tears; and ſix others, make me utter heavy Sighs; without counting a Thouſand other leſs conſiderable Faults, which, tho' they are contrary to Reaſon, and hurtful to good Government, yet it would be impoſſible for me to enumerate. In all the Writings preſented to your Majeſty, every one has the following Words: The Empire has nothing more to fear, Peace is eſtabliſhed, and every Thing is in Order: As for me, I am far from being of this Opinion: When People talk to you at that Rate, it is either from Flattery, or for Want of Underſtanding. For, let us ſuppoſe a Pile of Wood and a Man ſleeping on its Top, while it is ſet on Fire below: Has this Man, tho' the Flame has not reached him, nothing to fear? And is not this a natural Image of the State of your Affairs; Every Thing that is important is neglected, and all the Cares of Government are applied to Matters of little Conſequence. There is in the Adminiſtration, a Conduct that is very irregular, ill ſupported, and without any conſtant Rule; how then can it be ſaid that every thing is in Order? This is what I cannot agree to, tho' I wiſh more than any Man, that it were ſo.

I have ſeriouſly conſidered the Means of reſtoring this good Order in the Empire, and thereby of aſſuring its Tranquility. And for that Reaſon, I preſume in this Diſcourſe to lay them before your Majeſty, begging that you would read it with ſome Attention, and extract from it what you find to be good.

I propoſe nothing to you that can too much fatigue either your Body or Mind. I do not even require that you ſhould deprive yourſelf of Muſic, with which you are ſo much charmed. But what is moſt important, and no ways inconſiſtent with that, is, to keep all the tributary Princes in their Duty, to prevent the raiſing and the marching of your Troops, to cultivate Peace with the (§) Hyong nû, to make yourſelf obeyed by all your Subjects, to extend your Care to thoſe who are moſt diſtant from your Court, to endeavour, above all things, to render them good, and to diminiſh, as much as you can, Lawſuits and Villanies.

Theſe are the eſſential and capital Points; if you ſucceed in them, which I believe is very eaſy for you to do, you will render your Empire happy, and deſerve eternal Praiſes. Poſterity, when they ſhall admire the Exploits of the Father, will be charmed with the Virtue of the Son; you will be always looked upon as the Joint Founder of the Dynaſty, and that Myau which you have before-hand built, and to which you have given the Inſcription of (‖) Kû ching, ſhall afterwards obtain with Juſtice, the glorious Title of (┼) Tay tſong; lateſt Poſterity will always join you with your Father in the Honours paid to him, and the Empire will celeberate that filial Piety, by which you ſupport ſo well the Honour of your Family. In the mean Time, your Goodneſs will be praiſed, with which you ſo well provide for the Wants of your Subjects: But above all, your Wiſdom will be admired, that has given a Form to the Government, by which, every ſucceeding Prince, however weak, and however young, may reign peaceably.

This is what I propoſe. If your Majeſty thinks that I aſpire to too high a Perfection in Government; I am perſwaded, that from the Underſtanding and Qualifications you poſſeſs, and with a little Aſſiſtance from able Men, you may with Eaſe, attain to all I propoſe. As I frankly lay my Sentiments before you, it is the utmoſt of my Wiſhes that you may agree to them, and put them in Practice; for I have advanced nothing, but what is founded upon a ſerious Examination of the Hiſtory of paſt Ages; and upon attentively comparing them to all I could extract from the preſent Times; upon this I have been meditating Day and Night: Thus I may be bold to ſay, that were Shun and Yu to riſe again and give you Advice, it would infallibly be the ſame which I now ſuggeſt.

Ven ti, ſays a Gloſs, cauſed his Myau to be built in his own Life time; and placed the Inſcription Kû ching upon it, thereby denoting that he apply'd to perfect what his Father had eſtabliſhed.
(┼) Tay ſignifies very great. Tſong ſignifies the Head of a Family: But the two Words joined here together are a Title of Honour, given more than once to Princes who are looked upon as Joint Founders of a Dynaſty: As Tay tſû is given as the Title, of many Founders of Dynaſties. Tſû tſong when joined, ſignifies Anceſtors in general.

In the Infancy of a Dynaſty, if a Prince would eſtabliſh it firmly, it is natural for him to be diſtruſtful, and then, he ſometimes takes falſe Alarms, and may be deceived in his Suſpicions. Hence it happens, that ſometimes the Innocent ſuffer; but there is no avoiding this: And in ſuch Circumſtances, in the Beginning of the Dynaſty, the ſafety of the Sovereign, and the good of the State, is inconſiſtent with the Impunity of ſubordinate Powers, when overgrown. Take Care that your younger Brother does not poſſeſs too powerful a State. He may be tempted, if he has not already formed the Deſign, to make himſelf Emperor of the Eaſt, and to rival you. On the Weſt your deceaſed elder Brother's Son, certainly has Deſigns upon Yong yang; and ſome even pretend, that they are upon the Point of Execution. As for the Vang of U, you know what his Forces are, and that he is the moſt powerful of all the Chu hew; this Vang, I ſay, acts in all Reſpects within his own State, by his own Authority, and in contempt of your Laws. This too, I am certainly informed of. You may judge by this, what a Prince who behaves thus, and has yet only taſted of your Indulgence, will not attempt.

Such is your preſent Situation, a Situation little different from that of thoſe Emperors, whoſe melancholy Hiſtory is wrote in the (*) Chun tſyw. 'Tis true, that there are no actual Commotions; but why? Moſt of the Vang are yet young, and under the Tuition of Governors and Miniſters, who manage their Affairs. And theſe Governors and Miniſters are Men of your own appointing; or at leaſt, ſincerely devoted to your Family. But in a few Years, when theſe Vang are grown up, they will have more Spirit, and be leſs tractable. Then their ancient Officers will each pretend Infirmities, or ſome other Reaſon for retiring from Court. Then ſhall theſe Princes, being as it were emancipated, either give a Looſe to their Inclinations, or follow the Advice of thoſe who have intereſted Views. When this Change happens, and the Time is not far off, if your Brother or Nephew ſhould ſtart their Claims, and break openly from their Allegiance, what Remedy muſt be applied? For my own Share, I ſee none; and I believe that (†) Yau and Shun themſelves would be puzzled to find out one. A Man who wants to dry himſelf, does not wait for Night, but makes the beſt of the Noon-Day Sun that he can. Why have you that Knife in your Hand if you make no Uſe of it? Two Proverbs are attributed to (‡) Whang ti; their Application is very plain. Profit Prince, Profit, by the Power and Time you have. You will then find every thing eaſy; but, if you delay, all will be difficult. The ſmalleſt Inconvenience that can attend ſuch a Delay, is, that you will be reduced to the irkſome Neceſſity of ſhedding the Blood that comes from the ſame Source with your own. But who can anſwer for other Conſequences? And then will not the Times of Tſin revive? Rouſe your ſelf, Sir, ſtrike a maſterly Blow, you have Authority, you are Emperor, the Juncture is favourable, but at the ſame time preſſing; Supported by (§) Tyen, fear only what is really formidable; Give your Empire Peace and Quiet, by preventing the Danger and diſſipating the Storm that threatens it.

That you may the better comprehend the Importance of this Advice, let us call to Mind ſome Points of Hiſtory, and make ſome Suppoſitions. No Doubt, you remember what Hiſtory tells us of one of the Vang of Tſi, called When. He grew ſo powerful, that nothing leſs would ſerve him, but that the other Chu hew ſhould come in a Body and pay him Homage. They reſpected him a good deal more than they did the Emperor. Had you been then Emperor, if you had allowed him quietly to arrive at that degree of Power, what would you then have done? Durſt you have attempted to reduce him? I own I know little; but I know, and dare boldly pronounce, that if you had, your Attempt had been fruitleſs.

But we need not go ſo far back for Inſtances: In later Times, Shang reigned in Tſu, Kin pu in Whey nan, Pung ywe in Leang, Hun ſin in Han, Chang ngau in Chau, having for his Miniſters, Quan kan, Lu quan reigned in Yen, and Chin hi, tho' no Vang, poſſeſſed Tay. Now ſuppoſing that theſe ſix or ſeven Princes were ſtill alive; and that each of them was ſo well eſtabliſhed at Home, that his State was in a flouriſhing Condition; and that they had nothing to fear from one another; ſuppoſe all this, would not you who are Emperor be a good deal alarm'd? Sure you would.

After the Deaths of Shi whang and his Son Eul ſhi, the Empire being in Diſtreſs and without a Maſter, your Father Kau ti taking Arms, all thoſe I have named did the ſame. Every one had his own Views and his own Party. But none among them at firſt had any particular Attachment to your Father; yet, by Degrees, they all came over to his Side. It was a great Piece of good Fortune for him, that they were all of them Princes very moderate in their Ambition. But the great Motive of their Reſolution was, that they found a Superiority of Merit in Kau ti above Envy, ſo that they were not aſhamed to yield to him. Thus your Father was indebted for his Crown to his own Bravery and Merit. He was no ſooner Maſter of the Empire than he ſhar'd his Conqueſts with theſe Princes, giving to each 20 or 30, and to ſome, 100 (||) Hyen. Notwithſtanding all his Merit and Liberalities, within ten Years, there were frequent Rebellions in ſeveral Quarters, and he ſcarce reign'd a Year in Peace. Yet all theſe Princes were ſenſible of his Abilities and Courage, by Experience, and they perſonally held their Dominions of him. If theſe ſix or ſeven Princes reigning over as many different States, ſome larger, others leſs, but every one of them conſiderable, had enjoyed them quietly, would you, had you been then Emperor, have liv'd undisturbed? Could you have kept their Turbulence within the Bounds of Duty and Submission? I dare again affirm, you could not, had they belonged as much to you, as, for the most Part, they did to the then Emperor.

But I must repeat it again; If you do not speedily take some Course to prevent it, Affairs will come to this Issue. All the Vang, who are now your Subjects in Name, will in Effect be no longer so. Each of them proud of his Power which is really too great, will be a petty Emperor within himself, and dispose of every Thing independantly of you, and arrogate to himself the Right to dispose of this or that Dignity as he pleases; of forgiving Crimes, and of pardoning Malefactors tho' worthy of Death; and perhaps some of these Vang more bold, or powerful than the rest, will go so far as to use a Chariot covered with Yellow, to the great contempt of the Laws of the Empire, and your Sovereign Authority. Should any one forget himself, to this Degree, what must be done? Will you send him your Orders and Reprimands? He will despise them. Will you summon him to appear at your Court? He won't come? Or granting he comes; will you dare to punish him according to the Rigour of the Law? But thus to punish near Relations, would infallibly set all the rest against you, and produce a Rebellion from most of them. I own, indeed, that there are some (*) Fong kya, but, besides that they are rare, to what End will their Boldness serve? No sooner shall they dare to open their Mouth, but some mercenary Cut throat will, by planting a Dagger in their Hearts, render them for ever dumb: Unless then, you immediately pursue other Measures, Things will come to this Pass, that you neither can stop the Rebellion of your Relations, nor protect from their Resentment, those who shall have the Courage to declare for you against them.

No sooner was your Dynasty of Han establish'd on the Throne, than the (†) Lyu, abusing their too great Power acquired by an Alliance, endeavour'd to destroy it. But I have pointed out the Spring of these former Commotions, which was the Power of the Lyu, and have you not the same Reason to be afraid, lest the very same Thing should be attempted against you, which formerly the Lyu have against all your Family, and that the Empire should fall into almost the same Troubles as formerly? In such a Case, who could answer for the Event? Notwithstanding your vast Capacity, you would be then in no small Perplexity. But how much more fatal would it be, should it not happen till the Reign of some of your Children endowed with fewer Abilities than you? The Butcher (‡) Tan in one Morning dissected twelve Oxen, without his Knife being in the least hacked, how came this? Because he only used it to cut the Flesh, and artfully to seperate the Joints. When he came to the Bones, or any Part that was too hard, he immediately used the Ax: What the Knife was to this Butcher; Clemency, Liberality, and the like Virtues are to the Sovereign: The Laws and his Power are the Ax; and at present, the Chu hew seem to be so many Bones and hard Cartilages: At least two of them doubtless are so. Certain Experience shews that most Troubles in the State begin by the too great Power of tributary Princes.

This is plain from History, particularly from one of the Passages I have pointed out. The Revolt began by Why yu, when he was the Vang of Tsû a powerful State. He was followed by Han sin. Why? Because the latter was supported by the Hû. The Abilities of Quan kau, Minister of (§) Chau, had rendered that State rich and powerful, so that he was the third who rebelled. Ching hi, who rebelled immediately after, had no large Dominions, but excellent Troops. The others rebelled sooner or later, as they were more or less strong. Li, Vang of Chang sha was the only one who never swerv'd from the Respect and Obedience he owed to his Sovereign. But his Dominions contained no more than 25000 Families. It is justly said of him, that tho' he did less than any of the others for the reigning Family, yet it was more obliged to him than any other, because he had never done any Thing against it. And indeed, tho' he might have been emboldned to throw off his Obedience to his Prince, by his being at such a Distance from the imperial Court, yet he continued always faithful and obedient. But was his Fidelity owing purely to his Virtue, or to his having better natural Dispositions than the others? May not one safely conclude, that it was in some Measure owing to his own Weakness; but let us come to Facts.

There were formerly given to Fan, Ki, Quan and Kyang, some dozens of Towns, as it were in Pledge, with the Title of Vang. These petty Principalities were afterwards aboliſh'd, and it is right not to re-establish them. The Descendants of Han sin and Yw obtained the Title and Rank of Chu hew, which they still possess. There is no great Inconvenience in allowing them to keep this Distinction, if it is not made a Precedent for others; for if you would keep all the Vang in Obedience, and destroy the Intrigues of the great Men of the Orders inferior to Vang, nothing is more expedient, than to reduce the first Order to the same footing with the Vang of Chang cha; and to treat the second as formerly Fan, Ki, Kyan and Quan, were served. At the same Time would you establish your own Authority, and assure a lasting Peace to the Empire, weaken the Power of every one of these Princes, by making several petty Principalities out of every one of their Territories. The Smalness of their Power will deprive them of the Temptation to rebel. Thus, it will be easy, by treating them gently, to keep them attached to you, and make them as ready to comply with your Will, so far as the Laws of the Empire oblige, as the Fingers are to obey obey the Motions of the Hand. Put things in this Situation, and I will anſwer for it, that every one will cry out; "What a maſterly Stroke of Wiſdom is here! The Peace of the Empire is now aſſured for a long time." Begin then by breaking the three Kingdoms of Tſi, Chau, and Tſin, into the ſeveral Principalities, which the Extent of their Dominions comprehends, rendering each almoſt equal to that of Chang ſha; ordain that the three Vang, who at preſent poſſeſs theſe three Kingdoms, leave each to his eldeſt or youngeſt Son, according to the order of his Birth, one of theſe Principalities, till every one of them has its own Prince: Do the ſame with Leang yen, and the other Kingdoms. If it ſhall happen, that the Sons or Grand-ſons of the reigning Vang are not ſo numerous, as that each of theſe Principalities, ſo divided, can have its own Prince, then order it ſo, that the Principalities that remain, may go to the other immediate Deſcendants of the Family.

As to certain Principalities lock'd up within ſome of theſe Kingdoms, and poſſeſt by Families who have the Title of Chu hew; you muſt diſtinctly mark out their Extent, and make them ſeperate States as the others, with the Rights of Succeſſion, and render it impoſſible that they ſhould ever be annexed to your Empire, but for the Crime of Treaſon. By this, you will endear a great Number to your Perſon, ſince you will ſhew that you ſeek no private Advantage; and by this, the whole Empire, will both applaud your Wiſdom and praiſe your Generoſity. Every Branch of the Eſtates that are divided, will do their utmoſt to preſerve themſelves in the Rank of Vang. Their Weakneſs and their Intereſt will naturally induce them to continue in their Obedience; and this will ſpare you the Unpopularity of inflicting any rigorous Puniſhments. No more tragical Events will be ſeen, and your Clemency and Goodneſs will be no leſs praiſed than your Wiſdom and Diſintereſtedneſs. The Laws will then be in Vigour, and your Commands meet with Obedience. No Prince, tho' poſſeſt of a Li ki or a Quan kau for a Miniſter, will dare to undertake any thing. The factitious Deſigns of Chay ki and Kay chong (*) will be cruſhed. When the Princes and great Men are ſubjected, their Inferiors eaſily fall in with what is right; and the whole Empire, charmed as I have ſaid, by your Wiſdom, Diſintereſtedneſs, and Clemency, will enter yet more unto its Duty by ſo equitable a Firmneſs. In effect, when things are upon this Footing, not the leaſt Convulſion in the Empire, can follow even upon the Reign of a minor Prince, tho' an Infant and poſthumous.

In ſhort, you will thereby aſſure the Glory and Tranquility of your Kingdom, and make your Name adored by future Ages. All theſe Advantages may be produced by a ſingle Stroke, of which I am perſwaded you ſee the Expediency, and I dare anſwer for the Conſequences. Then what withholds your Arm? Perhaps you think the Evil is yet Light. But allow me to aſk you, Sir, if a Man can be in good Health when his (†) Leg is ſwelled as large as his Body, and his Finger (‡) as big as his Arm. Sure you will own, he cannot; and that you look upon ſuch a Swelling as dangerous. Believe me, Sir, it is a certain Truth, that even a Wound in the little Finger, when neglected and ill managed, too often baffles the ableſt Phyſicians, becomes incurable, and kills the Patient. Such a Swelling is ſtill more to be dreaded, when accompanied with acute Pains in the (§) Feet. This is certainly the Evil that is capable to make one ſend up great Cries.

But what is more monſtrous is, that tho' the Emperor, whoever he is, is without Doubt the Head of the Empire, becauſe he is above the Reſt of the Nation; and the Barbarians on our Borders are the inferior Extremities, and in this Reſpect, the Feet of the Empire: Yet at preſent, the Hyong nû commit a thouſand Inſults upon us, and in order to prevent more, the reigning Family furniſhes them every Year with large Sums, either in Money or other Commodities. To exact this kind of Tribute, is the Part of Maſters, to pay it, of Subjects. Thus the Feet is above, and the Head below: Unnatural Reverſe! While this is ſuffered, can it be ſaid that there are in the Empire Officers truly zealous? And yet this is her ſhameful Situation, without one Effort to relieve her. She is likewiſe afflicted with violent Pains in one of her Sides; that which I ſpeak of is the N. W. Notwithſtanding the great Expences in keeping on Foot ſuch a vaſt Number of Troops; and notwithſtanding the large Pay of their Officers, the People are in continual Alarms. Theſe who have ever ſo little Strength, are inceſſantly upon the Watch, and Day and Night employed in making Signals by Fires or other Methods. The Troops on the other Hand, are obliged to ſleep with their Armour on their Backs, and their Helmets on their Heads: Theſe are the real Calamities that afflict your Empire. A Phyſician offers you an infallible Remedy for them, and he is not heard. Is not this capable enough to draw Tears from the Eyes? As you poſſeſs the glorious Title of Emperor, is it not ſhameful to render yourſelf in Effect, Tributary? If you continue to put up with the greateſt of all Ignominies, and to ſuffer the preſent Wounds to feſter, in what muſt ſuch a Conduct end? Among all who have the Honour to adviſe your Majeſty, there is not one who does not agree with me, in the Reality of the Evils I have touch'd upon. But when there is any talk of remedying them, they ſee not, they ſay, in what Manner it can be done: For my Share I am of a different Opinion. The whole Nation of Hyong nû has not ſo many Inhabitants as one of the great Hyen of your Empire. And what ſhame muſt it reflect on thoſe at the Helm of Government, that they have not, with the Forces of ſo vaſt a State, been able to reſiſt the Inſolence of one ſo ſmall. The Inconveniences we ſuffer from the Hyong nû are are ſo eaſily prevented, that let the Forces of one Prince your Tributary act but ever ſo little according to my Directions, theſe Barbarians ſhall ſoon be reduced. Make but a Trial, and you ſhall ſoon be abſolute Maſter of the fate of (*) Tan yu, and pronounce the Doom of the Traytor (‡) Ywe, who is at the Head of his Counſels. Allow me, Sir, to tell you that the Inſolence of the Hyong nú is owing to your Manner of treating them. Inſtead of hunting down theſe troubleſome Savages, you are chaſing Wild Boars; and inſtead of purſuing theſe revolted Scoundrels, you are following Hares; Thus, for a vain Amuſement, you neglect the moſt dangerous Evil. It is not thus, that the Quiet and Repoſe of a People is attained. It muſt be owing to yourſelf, if you are ſincere in the Matter, that your Authority is formidable, and your Virtues dear to the moſt diſtant People, even beyond the Limits of your Empire; while, at preſent, you are not ſure of being obeyed even within thirty or forty Leagues of Empire. This is the ſecond Thing I mentioned, which muſt draw Tears from the Man who is zealous in your Service. (§) Luxury is now arrived at ſuch a Height, that mean People embroider the Cloaths, and even the Shoes, of the Boys and Girls whom they are obliged to ſell. One can ſee none expoſed in the Slave-market, but ſuch as are glittering with a Profuſion of Ornaments. At preſent, People of ordinary Rank, dreſs their Wives and Slaves in theſe very Things, which formerly adorn'd our Empreſs, and which ſhe carried only to the Temple. Theſe Axes and other Figures in Embroidery, formerly ſolely reſerved for the imperial Habits of Ceremony, ſerve now to adorn the Parlour or the Dining-room of a Merchant who has ſcraped together a little Money: Who, in ſeeing theſe Diſorders, would not ſay that the Forces of the Empire are drained? No, they are not in Effect, but they are very near being ſo.

When I ſee Perſons of no Quality furniſh their Houſes in this Manner, while your Majeſty's Habit is only of the coarſeſt Stuffs, and the moſt ordinary Colours: When I ſee the Shoes of a vile Concubine more richly embroidered than the Collar of our Empreſs; this Diſorder chiefly ſets me a crying: But I likewiſe ſee, that it is of ſuch a Nature, that it muſt be ſoon followed by Miſery. In effect, the employing ſo many Men in making Cloaths for one Perſon, is the Cauſe why many can get no Cloaths at all. There are ten who eat the Product, for one who tends the Culture, of the Earth; How then is it poſſible but many ſhould want Food? Beſides, to pretend to maintain Order among a People preſſed by Hunger and Nakedneſs, is to pretend to an Impoſſibility. Behold, what drains and ruins the Empire: Behold, what produces the Robberies and Rebellions that are ready to break out.

Nevertheleſs you are frequently told: Every Thing goes well, let us leave them as they are: And they who talk to you in this Manner, are your clear-headed Gentlemen. Yet there cannot be a greater Medly of Cuſtoms imagined: All Ranks are confounded, and there is no longer any Diſtinction betwixt the Grandees and the People. Even the Reſpect due to your ſacred Majeſty is encroatch'd upon, yet they never ceaſe to cry out; Do not let us ſtir, every thing goes well. Is there any thing more capable to make a Man ſend up deep Sighs? (||) Tong yang, without troubling himſelf about Virtue, was wholly employed in ſuggeſting to his Prince the Means of gaining and amaſſing Money. Thus in the two Years that he was in Office, there was a terrible Corruption of Morals. The Son of a poor Man then only thought upon the means of leaving his Father, that he might become the Son in Law of one who was in better Circumſtances. While a Father and Mother was digging the Ground or handling the Rake, the Son, pampered with the Fruits of their Toils, was acting the Man of Importance, and putting on Airs of Haughtineſs even with regard to them. The young Wife, when giving ſuck to her Child, uſed then inſolently to diſpute with her Huſband: The Step-mother and the Step-daughter were Spies upon one another, and every Moment looked upon one another with the moſt malignant Eyes. Nothing then remained to Men, but Indulgence for their Children, and a Paſſion for Riches: When this is all the Diſtinction, how ſmall is the Difference between Man and Brute?

Notwithſtanding of this, Shi whang, purſuing his Project, and taking Advantage of favourable Junctures, invaded ſix Kingdoms, and made himſelf Emperor; he had then nothing more to do, but to take ſuch Meaſures as might eſtabliſh his Family upon the Throne. The true Meaſures for this were Temperance, Modeſty, Gentleneſs, Uprightneſs, Honour, and the Maintenance of the eſtabliſhed Laws. Theſe were all unknown to Shi whang: He blindly followed the Road which Shang yang had pointed out; and only ſtudied to be rapacious, that he might be profuſe. His Subjects followed his Example; every one made his Paſſion, and the Extent of his own Power, the Rules of his Conduct. Wit and Parts were then only uſed to make Dupes of the ſimple and weak; Bravery and Courage to take advantage of the weak and fearful; and a ſuperiority of Strength was looked upon as a Right to commit an Inſult. In ſhort, the Diſorder was at laſt too great to be longer born.

At this Juncture (†) a Man of a ſuperior Merit appeared; every thing yielded to his Courage, and all ſubmitted to his Virtue: And as before that our Fore-fathers ſaid; The Dynaſty of Tſin, ſo they after that ſaid; The Dynaſty of Han. But tho' the Days of the Tſin are over, yet almoſt all their Vices ſtill remain. Luxury prevails: The Rites are more and more diſregarded, and with them (§) Here begins a Detail of the Things that are capable to make one ſend up great Sighs. According to our Author, there ought to be ſix. But Tſing king ſays that three of them are only touched upon in this Diſcourſe, as we have it in the authentick Hiſtory. They are found, ſays he, more at large in Collections made ſince, but theſe deſerve little Credit. The Gaps therefore are left unſupplyed, and remain as in the Body of the Hiſtory.

them Modeſty and Virtue vaniſh. This Change from bad to worſe increaſes ſenſibly every Month, but more ſo every Year. The Crimes of murdering a Father or a Brother, however ſhocking, are not without their Examples in our Age. As to Theſts and Robberies, they are become ſo barefac'd, that the innermoſt Rooms of the Palace, in your Father's and Brother's Time, were forced open, and rifled of their Furniture. In ſhort, Licentiouſneſs has come to ſuch a Height, that in the Capital of your Empire your (*) Officers are robbed, and have their Throats cut in the Face of the Sun.

While theſe Outrages are committing on the one Hand, one ſees, on the other, a wealthy Villain under the Appearance of Honeſty, furniſhing to the public Stores ſome hundred thouſand Meaſures of Grain, or vaſt ſums of Money, and thereby procuring the higheſt Employments of State. A Diſorder greater than all I have mentioned: Yet it is a very common one, tho' they take care to conceal it from you. While they are buſied in aggravating ſome particular Abuſes, the Age is corrupted, the greateſt Vices obtain, and an unbounded Licentiouſneſs is rooting itſelf in your Empire; and all this is beheld without Concern or Uneaſineſs. One would be apt to conclude by the Inſenſibility of your great Men, with regard to theſe Diſorders, that they either think all things are going right, or that it is none of their Buſineſs to reform them if they are wrong. But upon whom then muſt we rely? Upon the ordinary Magiſtrates and their Underlings? Alas! Theſe are ſo taken up with their Writings and their Regiſters, that they carry their Views no farther. And granting that they had Underſtanding and Virtue enough to ſee, and be touched with, theſe Evils; to reform ſo many Abuſes, to remedy ſo many Diſorders, and to inſpire your Subjects anew with the Love of their Duty and Virtue, is an Undertaking far beyond their Capacity.

Our Dependance then is, That your Majeſty would take a perſonal Concern in reforming all this Degeneracy. But I don't ſee that you are in the leaſt touched with, or alarmed at it. This gives me greater Uneaſineſs ſtill. For, to maintain the ſovereign Authority, to mark out the proper Diſtinctions of different Ranks, and to regulate Families, are the Duties that (†) Tyen has devolved upon Emperors, and in which he does not immediately concern himſelf. In theſe ſort of Matters we may ſafely ſay, that not to advance is to retire, and not to put Things on a good footing, is abſolutely to let them fall to the Ground. (‡) Quan tſe ſays, that the exact Obſervation of the Rites, Juſtice, Uprightneſs, and Modeſty, are the four Pillars of Government, and that if they fall, the Empire is ſoon ruined.

Perhaps it will be objected, that Quan tſe is a poor Author: I ſhall ſuppoſe he is. But it is at the ſame time the more ſhameful for others to be more ignorant than he. The Paſſage I cite is a certain Truth. Tſin ſuffered theſe four Pillars to fall, and immediately after he fell himſelf. Within thirteen Years after, his fine Court became a deſart Hillock. Can we now pretend, that theſe four Pillars are in a firm State? No, that would be to flatter ourſelves too groſsly. We ſee thoſe who are hatching the moſt pernicious Projects, already hugging and applauding themſelves. Whiſpers and Surmiſes are buzzing about on all Hands. And why are not Things immediately regulated as they ought to be? Why is not the neceſſary Diſtinction of Power betwixt Sovereign and ſubordinate Authority adjuſted, the Diſtinctions in Ranks ſettled, and the Order in Families regulated? Were this done, all thoſe who form deſtructive Schemes, would loſe the Hopes of ſucceeding. Suſpicion and Jealouſy would ceaſe, and you would thereby give Poſterity an eaſy Plan for their Conduct in Life: In ſhort, by this, the Peace and Happineſs of all your Empire would be ſecured for a long Time. To neglect Affairs of this Conſequence, is the ſame Thing as if one ſhould ſet adrift a Bark in a large and rapid River, without either Oars or Tackling. It muſt go down with the Stream, and the leaſt Breath of Wind that moves the Billows makes it a Wreck. Are we not in the ſame Condition? And is not this a ſufficient Reaſon to make any one ſend up deep Sighs?

The three firſt Dynaſties ſubſiſted for many Generations; that of Tſin, which ſucceeded to them, but for two ſhort ones. Surely, if we regard his Qualities and Nature, there is nothing differs ſo much, as Man does from Man. Whence proceeded it, that the three Families Hya, Shang, Chew, had ſo many long and glorious Reigns, and the Dynaſty of Tſin, which was always in Trouble, ended almoſt as ſoon as begun? One, and perhaps the chief Cauſe was this. Of old, if our Emperor had an hereditary Prince, they inveſted him as ſuch with Solemnity. A Man of Diſtinction was nam'd, who conducted him to the (§) Kyau in Noon-day, that he might be preſented to Tyen. All the great Officers of the Court followed them thither in their Habits of Ceremony, and reſpectfully preſented themſelves before the young Prince, to acknowledge him Heir of the Crown.

Tho' he was thus declared Succeſſor to the Throne, if he paſſed by the Palace of his Father, he immediately alighted from his Horſe, or out of his Chariot. Did he meet with a Palace of any of his Anceſtors in his Journey? he inſtantly quickned his Pace. By all theſe Ceremonies, he was taught what Obedience and Duty he owed to his Parents; and thus they loſt no Time in inſtructing him aright from his Infancy. (||) Ching vang could ſcarce walk, when he was put under the Tuition of Chau kong in quality of Tay pau, of Chew kong, in quality of Tay ſſi,

(*) A Gloſs ſays, Ven ti was a good Prince. Poſterity has much commended him: Kya i himſelf knew well that Things did not go ſo ill: But he wanted they ſhould be better than they were, ſo he exaggerated them, that he might thereby the more affect and influence his Prince.

of Tay kong in quality of Tay tſe. Every one of theſe three Lords had one under him, who never left the Prince. The firſt had the Charge of his Perſon, the ſecond was his Governor, and the third his Preceptor. The Men then choſen to form a young Prince, were recommended by their Virtues, and were equally capable to give their Pupil proper Inſtructions. The Leſſons they gave him were indeed frequent; but their principal Care was, that he ſhould ſpeak to none but thoſe of unblemiſhed Morals, and ſee nothing but what was decent and regular. In ſhort, all the Officers of his Train were eminent for Virtue, Gravity and Knowledge, but at the ſame Time they were ingenious at improving every Opportunity for inſtructing him aright. A Man born and educated in the Country of either Tſi or Tſû, will infallibly have its Accent; and can a Prince, educated in the Manner I have deſcribed, fail of taking a virtuous Bent? Confucius rightly obſerves that Education is, as it were, a ſecond Nature; and we naturally do that to which we are habituated.

When the hereditary Prince was become marriageable, he was made to paſs ſucceſſively thro' ſix Sorts of Apartments, which were ſo many Schools. In the firſt, which was to the Eaſt, he was inſtructed in the Rites, one by one; and above all, in the Duties he owed to his Relations, either by Blood or Alliance. He was there taught to prefer the neareſt of Kin, to thoſe more remote, when all other Circumſtances were equal; to treat every one with Goodneſs, and to keep them united, every one in his proper Sphere. He then paſſed to the School of the South, where he was taught to make the proper Diſtinctions of Ages, and to inſpire the younger with Reſpect for the elder; to eſtabliſh Principles of Honour and Honeſty among all, and thus, to root out the Seeds of Diſſenſions and Law-Suits. Then he went to the School of the Weſt; where he was inſtructed in the Choice a Sovereign ought to make of the Officers, whom he puts in Poſts: And the conſtant Maxims inculcated here, were to prefer Wiſdom to all other Qualifications, to pay more particular Honour to ſuch as had diſtinguiſh'd themſelves by their Virtue; and to put none into great Poſts, but Men of great Abilities and uncommon Merit, Men capable both to ſee and to promote whatever was for the Good of the Empire. From the School of the Weſt, he paſſed to that of the North, where he learned the Diſtinctions of Stations, and the Regard a Sovereign ought to have, for ſuch as are, by their great Employments and eminent Dignities, raiſed above the Level of Mankind, in order to preſerve thereby the neceſſary Subordination of Ranks in a State, and to oblige every one to keep his own. Having paſſed through theſe four Schools, the Prince arrived at a fifth which was of a higher Order. There, under the moſt able Maſters he had Inſtructions of greater Depth and Extent. After every Leſſon, he retired with his Tay fû [or Governor] who cauſed him to give him an Account of it. If he had miſtaken Things, the Tay fû put him right, and ſometimes even chaſtiſed him. But his chief Care was, to inculcate in his Mind, and give him a clear Notion of, the moſt important Points. Thus, his Head and his Heart were improved at once; he became both able and virtuous, and he was qualified for Empire.

Did he begin to form himſelf? In place of the Officers I have named, he had others of leſs Authority, but no leſs Vigilance, who examined all his Actions. He had an Hiſtorian who was placed near him, on Purpoſe to take Notes of his Actions for the Day; another Perſon obſerved him during Meals, and told him immediately when ever any Indecency eſcaped him. In ſhort, he had a Flag ſet up in public, whereon any one might fix what he judged proper to be propoſed; on the other Side there was a blank Table, where he might write what he had a mind to propoſe ſhould be corrected. But if any one had an urgent Remonſtrance to make, he had no more ado but to beat a Drum, and he was inſtantly heard. All this was advantageous to the Public, without being diſagreable to the Prince; who, as he was educated from his Infancy in the Schools of Wiſdom and Virtue, had nothing in him to reprehend, that could occaſion to him either Grief or Shame. As he was, without Ceremony, inſtructed in the moſt wholeſome and the moſt ſafe Maxims, he naturally took every thing in good Part.

Beſides, the Ceremonies inſtituted on particular Seaſons and Days; and which were never diſpenſed with by the Emperors under the three famous Dynaſties, were of great Uſe both to the Prince and his Subjects. Some of them both taught and inſpired Reſpect to the Sovereign, others, Obedience and Piety to Parents, and others, the Rules of Gravity and Decency. The moſt minute Obſervance had its allegorical Meaning; for Inſtance, it was uſual for the Prince not to ſee an Animal dead which he had been accuſtomed to ſee when living, nor to taſte of any Creature whoſe Groans he had heard when under the Knife of the Butcher; for this Reaſon, he never went near the Kitchens. The End of all this was, to encourage in the Prince and all about him, Sentiments of Goodneſs, Humanity and Compaſſion. If it is aſked, why every one of our three famous Dynaſties continued ſo long? I anſwer, from obſerving all theſe Meaſures, but more eſpecially the right Education of the Heir to the Throne.

The Reverſe happen'd under the Tſin, Politeneſs and Modeſty were Virtues ſcarce known. The Man moſt reſpected, was he who yeilded to no-body, who was moſt liberal of his injurious Language, and moſt groſly affronted the firſt who came in his Way. Thus, neither the Rites nor Virtue, but the fear of Puniſhment was the Prop of Government: So that Chau kau, Governor to (*) Hû hay, entertained him with nothing but this Maxim. To Day, Heads were cut off, to Morrow, whole Families were maſſacred. What was the Event? Hû hay, to Day, mounted the Throne, and to Morrow, killed one of his Subjects with his own Hand. The moſt reſpectful and juſt Complaints paſſed for ſeditious Murmurs, the moſt important Advices were treated as trifling, trifling, and the Prince ſaw the Head of a Man ſtruck off with the ſame Indifference as that of a Poppy. Muſt all this be attributed only to the Nature of the Prince? By no Means, the greateſt Part of it was owing to his bad Education. Of two common Proverbs, one ſays, "If you have no Experience in an Affair yourſelf, follow thoſe that have ſucceeded in it:" The other: "When the firſt Cart overturns, he who drives the ſecond is upon his Guard."

(*) This was the Name of the Son, whom Shi whang appointed for his Succeſſor; being the ſame who was afterwards called Eul ſhi.

Our three famous Dynaſties flouriſhed long; we know by what Means, we have nothing to do but to imitate theſe Means. The Dynaſty of the Tſin was ſoon cut off; we know the crooked Paths they kept, and the Traces of their Steps are mark'd out to us, ſo let us ſhun them. To march in the Steps of the Tſin, is to periſh like them. I have ſaid, and ſay it again, that upon the Education of the hereditary Prince, depends the Fate of his Empire. But upon what does the Succeſs of this Education depend? Upon two eſſential Points; Firſt, that he be early inſtructed. Secondly, that it be by Men equal to the Office. When a Prince is inſtructed in Time, before he receives any Prejudices, good Impreſſions have all their Force upon his Heart. There remains nothing more then but to put Men about him, who can conduct themſelves wiſely and dexterouſly. On the other Hand, if this is delay'd, and if his Heart has got a wrong Byaſs, you may place worthy Men about him; who may follow him, attend him, and ſee his Faults, but rarely can they ſucceed ſo far as to correct them. The People of U and Yuë are born with the ſame Inclinations, and in their Infancy reſemble one another even in their Accents; but when they grow up, the Antipathy betwixt them is ſo great, that they can't endure one another. Whence proceeds this but from Education and Cuſtom? I then had Reaſon to ſay, that in order to educate a Prince aright, he muſt be early put into good Hands; when this is done, the Succeſs in a manner is certain, and conſequently, the Empire is happy. For, as the Shu king ſays, the Happineſs of all the People depends upon one Man. This is what ought to be thought of, and is what moſt immediately preſſes. (*)

The moſt clear-ſighted Mortals ſee what is paſt, much more diſtinctly than what is to come. But what is the end of our Rites? They are to prevent Diſorders, as Chaſtiſements are to puniſh them. Hence, every one muſt be ſenſible of the Importance, the Neceſſity, and the Effects of Puniſhments. To encourage the Practice of Virtue by Rewards, and to deter from the Purſuit of Vice by Puniſhments, are the two great Springs of Government. Our ancient Sages have made Uſe of them with a matchleſs Firmneſs, Conſtancy and Equity. I am far from rejecting either; but if I here tye myſelf down to the Rites, it is, becauſe they tend to root out the Seeds of Vice before they ſpring up. They inſtruct the People by almoſt inſenſible Degrees, removing Vice, and directing us to Virtue ſo gently, that we ourſelves ſcarce perceive the Motions. This made Confuçius ſay; "It is a happy Talent to be able, to determine a Law-Suit aright; there are Men who can do this, and actually do it, but it would be much better, were there no Law-Suits at all." Let us ſearch for the Means.

They who would aid a Prince in governing well, cannot, in my Opinion, do better, than to diſtinguiſh betwixt his real and principal Intereſts, and thoſe which either are not neceſſarily ſo, or ſo only in Appearance: and may be neglected without hurting him. Upon this, more than any Thing elſe, depends a Prince's good or bad Succeſs. What he chiefly ought to underſtand is, that great Alterations either for the better or the worſe, are not made all in one Day, eſpecially in great Empires; that they proceed by little and little from remote Cauſes, and that tho their Seeds are ſown ſeperately, yet their Effects appear all at once. If the ordinary Government depends only upon the Rigour of Laws, and the Severity of the Princes, theſe Numbers of harſh Laws and cruel Puniſhments, will be anſwered by the People with a load of Curſes and Rebellions. If on the other Hand, the Prince regard the Rites and good Example, there will reſult from the People a ſincere Union among themſelves, and hearty Affections for his Perſon. Shi whang wiſhed as much as Ching tang or Vû vang, to do Honour to the Hall of his Anceſtors, by tranſmitting his Crown to lateſt Poſterity. Yet Tang and Vû founded, each of them, a Dynaſty that laſted for 6 or 700 Years, while that of Shi whang endured but for thirteen. The Cauſe of ſo vaſt a Difference was as follows.

The Empire may be compared to a Veſſel beautiful and precious, but brittle. If it is always placed upon a compact, ſure Place, it will continue whole for a long Time; without this Precaution it will be ſoon broken. Goodneſs, Juſtice, the Rites, and Muſic, compoſed a firm and compact Baſis, upon which Tang and Vû eſtabliſhed their Empire. Thus, their Dynaſties continued for many Ages, and their Memories is, and ever will be, dear to us and our Poſterity. As for Shi whang, he eſtabliſhed his Authority ſolely upon Terror and Puniſhments, neither Virtue or Beneficence having the leaſt ſhare therein: Hence ſoon followed the Murmurs and Imprecations of his Subjects who hated him, as being their greateſt Enemy; and he in Perſon had well nigh fallen a Sacrifice to ſo general a Hatred. His Son could not eſcape this Fate, and at once loſt his Life and Empire. This Event is ſo late, that it may paſs as one in our Days; ſo that I can produce no more intereſting Proof to confirm what I have advanced.

A Sovereign may be compared to a Hall, the Officers of his Kingdom to the Steps of the Stairs that lead to it, and the People to the Ground, upon which theſe Steps ſtand. If the Hall is ſo raiſed above the Ground, that there are betwixt them, for Inſtance, nine handſome Steps in good Repair, the Look of it is grand; it has a good Effect, and we mount to it with Reſpect.

If,

(*) Perhaps Kya i, to finiſh one of the Subjects of his groaning, took occaſion here to mention ſome Circumſtances relating to this Prince, whoſe Education was neglected, which the Hiſtorian has curtailed. However that may be, he enters on another Subject.

If, on the other Hand, it is almoſt on a Level with the Ground it ſtands on, and has a few pitiful Steps to lead to it; we naturally deſpiſe it, and enter the Hall without any Ceremony. The Application of this is eaſy, and our ancient Emperors underſtood it well. For which Reaſon they eſtabliſhed that beautiful Variety of different Orders. Neareſt their Perſons they had the Kong, the King, and the Ta fû: (*) Thro' different Parts of the Empire were diſperſed the Kong, the Hew, the Pê, the Tſe, the Nan, without counting the Officers of the different Cities, and a great Number of Subalterns.

The Sovereign, raiſed above all theſe Orders, appeared ſo grand and venerable, that all the Officers who approached him, being under the Shelter of his Majeſty, were ſecure from all Inſults. The Vulgar have a Proverb: Tho' I killed the Rat, I had a Regard for the Veſſel. This Expreſſion, tho' homely, may be applied here. 'Tis the Reſpect due to the Perſon of the Prince, that makes even the Horſe he rides on, nay, the Straw his Horſe eats, reſpected. Our antient Rituals prohibited any one from looking into the Mouth of this Horſe; and there was a Puniſhment determined, for any one that trod upon the Straw he was to uſe. And to this Day, whoever is ſitting, when the Table or the Baton of the Prince paſſes by, inſtantly riſes; they who are on foot compoſe themſelves reſpectfully: If any one either in a Chariot or on Horſe-back, meet the Chariot of the Prince, tho' empty, he immediately alights to the Ground. Can it then be wondered at, that our ancient Laws ſubjected, to the corporal Puniſhments they preſcribed, only ſuch as were of an Order inferior to the Ta fû? Doubtleſs our wiſe Legiſlators thought it in ſome Meaſure inconſiſtent with the Reſpect they owed the Prince, to ſubject to theſe Laws any one who by his Rank approached his Perſon; and always believed that as the Prince raiſed none to diſtinguiſhed Ranks, but Men of true Merit, it would have been abſurd to have employed any ſuch Means to keep them in their Duty.

And indeed we don't find in Antiquity, that a wiſe Prince puniſhed any one with Death. Matters are a good deal changed in that Reſpect; they whom our ancient Emperors called by way of Diſtinction, when they ſpoke to them, (†) Pê fû, Pê kyew, are liable to be capitally puniſhed; even they, whom to this Day, our Emperors, when they meet them, honour with a Civility, are not exempted. The Kong, the Hew, and the Vang themſelves, are ſubject to the moſt infamous Puniſhments, as well as the meaneſt People. Their Viſages are branded, their Noſes ſlit, their Hair cut off, they are whipt, expoſed in open Roads, and are ſometimes cut in Pieces. Nay, I muſt ſay more, it is no rare Thing to ſee Officers of the higheſt Rank ſuffer the moſt ignonimous of all Puniſhments, by having their Heads cut off. To puſh things to ſuch Extremities, to pay ſo little Regard to the higheſt Diſtinctions, beſides that they are the means to make the Poſſeſſors of them take vile Inclinations, is going againſt the Proverb, and paying no Reſpect to the Veſſel.

Another Proverb ſays, That let the Shoes be never ſo well made, they won't make a Pillow, and however neat the Cap may be, it won't mend the Shoes. Formerly, was an Officer broke for Corruption? His Fault was mitigated to the World, and it was only ſaid, that he had not duly attended the Rites. Was he broke for Debauchery? The Harſhneſs of that Expreſſion was ſoftned, and it was ſaid, (‡) that the Curtains about him were too thin. If he was broke for Weakneſs or Incapacity to diſcharge his Duty, it was ſaid, that his ſubaltern Officers obeyed him ill. When an Officer then was declar'd culpable, if the Fault was not of a high Nature, he immediately reſign'd his Employment, and Matters went no farther. If his Crime was capital, as ſoon as the Prince had pronounced it to be ſuch, the Officer turned towards the (§) North, made the ordinary Obeiſances, firſt condemned, and then actually put, himſelf to Death. So much did Antiquity reſpect Greatneſs even when Guilty. But muſt they then eſcape? By no means; let them be caſheered, let them be puniſh'd, nay, put to Death, if they deſerve it. But to ſeize them, to baſtonade them, to bind them with Ropes, to deliver them up like the meaneſt private Perſons to the vileſt Officer of Juſtice; can be Spectacles profitable neither to the Small nor Great.

It is pernicious to the People, from whoſe minds it eraſes that excellent Maxim; Reſpect thoſe who are over you, and who by their Rank are venerable. It is pernicious to the Great, in whom it damps thoſe heroic Sentiments which their high Stations inſpire. It is pernicious to the Prince, as naturally tending to weaken the Zeal of thoſe upon whom principally depend both his Glory and Safety. For this Reaſon, the Rites have always recommended to a Prince, that he ſhould treat his Miniſters and other great Officers with Civility. Otherwiſe, the People will forget the Duty they owe to their Superiors; the Effects of which Neglect may be in Time felt by the Prince himſelf. The great Men will forget themſelves, and ſeeing themſelves outwardly degraded, will degrade themſelves, if we may ſo uſe the Expreſſion, inwardly too. No more will they entertain any Sentiments of Honour; but acquit themſelves ſuperficially of their Duty, and catch at every Occaſion of plundering, ſelling, enriching themſelves with, and neglecting the public Good. If their Prince is diſtreſs'd upon any occaſion, they will take but little Concern, nay, perhaps aid the oppoſite Party underhand, and rejoice at his Difficulties; when they ſee the State and the Prince both in Danger, their firſt and only Care is to provide for their own Safety.

(*) Perhaps the Hiſtorian has here likewiſe cut off ſome Circumſtances; at leaſt what follows, has no Connexion with what goes before; Kya i in the Thread of this Diſcourſe, ſpeaks of the Regard a Prince ought to have for his Miniſters, and other great Officers.

(†) My grand Uncle, as European Princes ſay, my Couſin, to Perſons of a certain Rank.

(‡) Contrary to the Chineſe Cuſtom, it being ſcandalous there for Men and Women to be ſeen together in Common.

(§) The Emperor ſat with his Back to the North, and his Face to the South.

Yu yang was a great Officer under Chong hin. When Chi pê had defeated and killed Chong hin, he offered an Employment to Yu yang, who accepted of it. Chau a little after overcame and put to Death Chi pê, upon which Yu yang appeared inconſolable, and did all he could to place the Son of Chi pê upon his Fathers Throne: Hiſtory ſays, he made five different Attempts for that purpoſe, but all without Succeſs. One aſked of Yu yang his Motives for a Conduct ſo different from his former, with Regard to the two Princes he had ſerved. Chong hin, anſwered he, uſed me almoſt like the moſt vulgar of his Subjects, tho' I was under him a great Officer; ſo I took but a vulgar Concern in his Fate. Chi pê treated me according to the Rank I held in his Kingdom, and my Grief for him is proportioned to his Reſpect for me.

And indeed, if an Officer, for whom a Prince ſhews a due Regard, is not zealous in that Prince's Service, he muſt be a Brute. When Affairs are on a right footing betwixt a Prince and an Officer, the latter forgets even the Intereſts of his own Family to ſerve thoſe of the State. If an occaſion happens that he may be a great Gainer, or muſt be a conſiderable Loſer, he neglects all Advantages, and hazards every thing rather than to deſert his Duty: In ſhort, he ſacrifices himſelf without Reſerve to the Service of his Prince. But theſe Dangers are rare, when the Prince treats his great Men with the Regard preſcribed by the Rites; for then there are no Differences among the Princes of the Blood, who after they have lived in Friendſhip, have the Satisfaction to die in Peace, and to be buried with their Fathers. There are no rebellious Wars among the tributary Princes, each lives and dies in Quiet at Home. Good Miniſters ſeek for no Pretences to retire from Buſineſs, which, to their laſt Breath, it is their Pleaſure and Duty to diſcharge. The Officers of War do the ſame, and willingly die on a Breach, or in the Frontiers of the Empire. This is meant by the Expreſſion; A wiſe and an accompliſhed Prince is ſafe in Ramparts of Gold. A Compariſon that ſhews the Relation betwixt him and his Grandees. Such were the happy Effects of their Union, betwixt our ancient Princes and their great Officers; but alas! Since their Days, this Maxim is much neglected, this good Cuſtom is aboliſhed. Is not this deplorable?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Kya i, like an able Miniſter, ſaw the means of preventing the leaſt Troubles, reforming Abuſes, and regulating Manners. No Time, no Station of Life eſcaped him. His Underſtanding like a flaming Torch lighted him thro' all. What an Unhappineſs was it for a Quan and a Kyang to baniſh ſo great a Man, and to loſe the Benefit of his vaſt Capacity?

Another Diſcourſe of Kya i, to induce the Emperor Ven ti, to lay up Stores of Corn and Money.

(*) QUAN tſe ſpeaking of the People, ſaid, that they might be inſtructed and formed to good Morals, when there was wherewithal to feed them. But no Antiquity, even the moſt remote can produce an Inſtance, nor is there any to this Day, of a People continuing long faithful in their Duty, when they wanted the Neceſſaries of Life. It was an old ſaying, that a Man who did not labour the Ground was in danger to want Bread. A Woman who neglects to work at Stuffs, may be ſoon without Cloaths. The Neceſſaries of Life are not all to be had at all Times. If they are not frugally managed, they muſt run ſhort. Such were the Maxims of Antiquity; Maxims which they practiſed, and whereof the exact Obſervance formed the Baſis of their Government. Thus they never wanted Neceſſaries.

At preſent, Agriculture is neglected. Vaſt Numbers of People live upon the Fruits of the Earth, which very few cultivate. This is equal to a Famine. On the other Hand, Debauchery and Luxury increaſe; this is the ſame as if Troops of Robbers plundered the Empire. When Robbery and Famine prevail at once in a State, for what can one anſwer? Forty Years ago, the Dynaſty of the Han began. They did not lay up the leaſt Reſerve, either publick or private. This awakens Compaſſion when one conſiders it. If Rain was ever wanting to fall juſt at the Time it was expected, the People were inſtantly alarmed. Was there a ſcarce Year? One bartered away his Degrees, another diſpoſed of his Children. This is no unuſual Thing. When a State is upon the Brink of Ruin, can the Father or the Maſter of it be without Dread? That Years of Famine may come, is to be expected. Yu and Tang have themſelves paſſed thro' theſe ſhocking Proofs. Let us ſuppoſe, that by Misfortune, 2 or 300 Leagues of a Country proves barren. How ſhall this be remedied? At the ſame Time, ſuppoſe our Frontiers are invaded, and we are obliged to ſend large Armies to their Defence, how are our Troops to be maintained? There is War and Famine at once, and the Empire impoveriſhed without having any Reſource.

It commonly happens in theſe Caſes, that the daring and the ſtrong take advantage of the Opportunity to aſſemble, to plunder, and to rob where ever they can. While the weaker are for ſome Time ſupported by the Price they get for their Children, and then they periſh miſerably. Theſe are not vain Terrors; you know they are not. You are but half Maſter of the Extremities of your Empire, which want but an Opportunity to revolt. If ſo a cruel Piece of News were brought you all of a ſudden, how would you behave? Would it be then time to deliberate? Believe me, there is nothing of ſo great Conſequence, as to lay up in Time good Magazines of Proviſions: This will, as it were, ſecure your Empire. When the Treaſury is full, and Proviſions abound, every thing is calm; and the State is equally able to make a Defence, or to puſh a Conqueſt.

(*) A Gloſs ſays, that the erecting of the Granaries which the Emperor had in every City in China, was owing to this Diſcourſe.

The firſt Step to this is, effectually to labour for the Re-eſtabliſhment of Agriculture. Do all you can, that your Subjects may each live upon the Fruits of his own Culture. There are every where infinite Numbers of idle and vagabond People: And how many others improperly apply themſelves to Employments uſeleſs in Society? Diſpatch all ſuch to cultivate the Lands which lie barren to the South. This is the beſt and the moſt profitable Employment. Nay, if it be neceſſary, don't ſpare even Force. Thus, you will have in all Parts, wherewithal to lay up Reſerves of Proviſions; and by procuring Plenty, you can aſſure the Repoſe of all your Empire, whereas, now it is in a dangerous and a melancholy Situation. This is what afflicts me. My preſuming to give you this Advice, proceeds only from my Zeal for the Glory and Welfare of your State.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Fundamentals of Government conſiſt in inſtructing and feeding the People. When we behold with what Vehemence and Zeal, Kya i, in thoſe Days, ſought to promote the publick Good, we can't help ſaying; This is a Man whom we may juſtly call a proper Counſellor for a Prince.

A Gloſs.] In Conſequence of this Diſcourſe, Ven ti publiſhed Declarations to animate the People to Agriculture; and revived the ancient Rite of cultivating the Earth with his own Hands, to give them an Example.

Chang, ſirnamed Li vang, was the laſt of the Children of Kau ti, Founder of the Dynaſty of the Han. When his elder Brother Ven ti became Emperor, he made him King of Whay nan. The new King afterwards committed many Faults, and Ven ti, who was naturally mild, took no notice of them, till wearied out by his repeating them, he ordered a Tſyang kyun (*), who was at the ſame time a Hew, to write the following Reprimand to the Vang of Whay nan. Tho' the Tſyang kyun wrote with his own Hand, it was in Terms, which ſhewed that it was by the Emperor's Orders.

GREAT King. I have heard often of your Reſolution, your Juſtice, your Continence, Honour, and other good Qualifications; that is to ſay, that (†) Tyen treating you as one of its Favourites, has crowned you with its Gifts, and given you Qualifications to form you for a (‡) Shing; this is what you ought carefully to attend to: But it would ſeem by your Conduct that you do not, ſince you are ungrateful for the Gifts of Tyen. Our preſent Emperor no ſooner mounted the Throne, but he made you the Vang of Whay nan from a Hew. You thought yourſelf ſo little deſerving of that Honour, that it was with Difficulty you accepted it. However, he inveſted you with the Kingdom, which on his Part was a ſingular Favour. Since that Time, you have never appeared at his Court; you only once made a Step to aſk Permiſſion for that purpoſe, but far from demanding it in the regulated Forms, and with the Reſpect due to a Sovereign; you did not even exactly obſerve the Regard due from a younger to an elder Brother.

Beſides, you have of our own Authority, and as it were to ſhew its Extent, put to Death a Perſon of the Rank of Chu hew. Our Emperor is unwilling to enquire into it, but this is an extraordinary Indulgence. The Emperor by our Laws, has the ſole Right of filling up the great Employments in every Kingdom; yet you, rejecting a Miniſter regularly nominated by him, preſumptuouſly demanded that you might be admitted to appoint another. Our Emperor was willing to diſpenſe with the Law, and to indulge you in this. Could there be greater Condeſcendance. You next attempted, as it were, to degrade the Chu hew in your Territories. You inſiſted upon their keeping Guard in Linnen Habits at Ching ting the Burying-place of your (||) Mother. This the Emperor would not permit, but it was as it were degrading yourſelf, when you was thus deprived of the Homage of the Hew; ſo that in this, he ſhewed a Regard to your Dignity. This is a freſh Obligation you lie under to him.

Reaſon would teach, that you ought to exert yourſelf in anſwering the Goodneſs of the Emperor, by an exact Obſervance of all your Duties: On the contrary, by the Licentiouſneſs both of your Words and Actions, you give him freſh Matter of Offence, and ruin your own Character throughout the Empire. This indeed is judging very ill. All that your Family or your ſelf now poſſeſs, comes originally from your Father Kau ti. He many Times endured the Inclemencies of Air, expoſing himſelf to the Dangers of Battles and Sieges, where he was covered with glorious Wounds. Why did he ſuffer this? It was to eſtabliſh his Family. Inſtead of applying yourſelf ſeriouſly to imitate ſo worthy a Father, inſtead of performing the Tſi and other Ceremonies, which may revive in your Mind the Ideas of his Virtues and Exploits; you are forming an extravagant Project of degrading the Hew, who are dependant on you, to the Rank of the common People. To degenerate thus into Pride and Avarice, is not to perform the Part of a worthy Son. Not to be able to maintain things upon the ſame Footing on which you received them from your Father, is to betray a want of Capacity and Wiſdom. To make a Point of guarding the Sepulchre of your Mother, and to neglect that of your Father, is to ſhew a Reſpect for the one and not for the other, and thus to overthrow all good Order. In your repeated Violations of the Emperor your Maſters Orders, where is your Submiſſion and Obedience? In your Neglect of Duty to your elder Brother, where is your Obſervance of the Rites? In your inflicting on your your greateſt Officers infamous Puniſhments, where is your Clemency? In ſhewing the greateſt Contempt for the Vang and the Hew, that you may honour and raiſe a worthleſs young Debauchee, whoſe only Merit is his Sword, where is your Underſtanding? In ſhort, in neglecting all Study, in ſlighting all Council, in running blindly into every Suggeſtion of your Paſſion, and Caprice, where is your Conduct? Great Prince, beware! The Way you tempt is dangerous, and may lead you to your Ruin, nay, if I may ſo ſay, you degrade your ſelf from the Dignity of Vang.

Inſtead of ſtaying at your own Court, there with Majeſty to receive the Honours due to your Dignity, you flutter about, and piqueing yourſelf upon equalling Mong pwen, you affect to act the Bully; how indecent is that? I repeat it once more, all your Steps are ſo dangerous, that if you take not Care in Time, I dare pronounce, that (*) Kau ti will receive no more Offerings from your Hands. Formerly Chew kong put to Death Quan ſhû, and impriſoned Tſay ſhû, in order to ſecure the Dynaſty of the Chew. When kong Prince of Tſi, put to Death his own Brother for Rebellion. Tſin ſhi whang put to Death two of his Brothers, and ſent his Mother a great way off, in order to ſecure the Peace of the Empire. Kin vang, whom your Father Kau ti had made Vang of Tay, defended that State very ill againſt the Hyong nû; and Kau ti deprived him of his Charge. The Vang of Tſi pê took it in his Head to raiſe Troops: Our Emperor did himſelf Juſtice. Such were the former Proceedings at the Court of Tſi and Chew. We have likewiſe taken a View of what has been tranſacted in our Days, by the Tſin and the Han. And will you pretend to diſpute with the Emperor, regardleſs of theſe Examples, both ancient and modern? Ridiculous!

If you do not amend, your Quality of being the Emperor's Brother, cannot exempt you from being judged by the Laws. If Things come to that Paſs, you are infallibly ruin'd, and your Officers great and ſmall, eſpecially your Miniſters, muſt be involv'd in your Fate. To loſe in this Manner, at leaſt, your Rank and your State, to become the Object of Compaſſion to thoſe of the meaneſt Stations, to ſee your Officers puniſhed, and draw the Scoffs of a whole Empire upon your own Perſon, in ſhort, to be a Stain to the Memory of your god-like Father, is what muſt be very diſagreeable to your Spirit. Set then about a Change. Write a reſpectful Letter to your Brother, and acknowledge your Fault in theſe Terms: " (†) I had the Unhappineſs to loſe my " Father in my Infancy, the Troubles of the Lyu then ſucceeded, and laſted for ſome Time. " Since your Acceſſion to the Throne, that happy Change and your Favours puffed me too much " up: Blinded by Pride, I have committed many conſiderable Faults, which, when I reflect at " preſent upon, fill me at once with the moſt ſenſible Grief, and the beſt grounded Fear. 'Tis " with theſe Sentiments, that humbly proſtrate upon the Earth, without daring to raiſe myſelf. " I wait for the Chaſtiſement I deſerve."

If you behave thus, the Emperor, as he is your Emperor, will allow himſelf to be mollified; and as he is your Brother, will be highly pleaſed at your return to your Duty. Each of you will poſſeſs your high Ranks with a mutual Contentment. This is what I wiſh, and ſure tis of the greateſt Importance to you, that ſeriouſly weighing my Advice, you inſtantly follow the Courſe I ſuggeſt; for if you heſitate long, the Arrow will be diſcharged, and it will be in vain to endeavour to ſtop it..

A Gloſs.] Li vang was diſcontented at this Letter, and held on his former Way; ſoon after, he was judged in Form, and baniſhed.

The Advice that Kya i propoſed under the Emperor Ven ti, to diminiſh the Power of the tributary Princes by dividing their Eſtates, was renew'd by Shau tſo, under King ti, the ſucceeding Emperor. The Matter was brought into the Council, whereupon the U and Tſu revolted. King ti retracted, and ſacrificed Chau tſo, as if he had given the Advice. There is nothing in the Diſcourſe of Chau tſo on this Occaſion, but what we have already ſeen in that of Kya i; ſo I but juſt mention it, and proceed to other Diſcourſes of that Miniſter.

A Diſcourſe upon War, addreſſed to the Emperor King ti.

I HAVE heard, that ſince the Acceſſion of the preſent Dynaſty to the Throne, the (‡) Hû lû have made many Incurſions into our Frontiers, and always carried off a Booty, either more or leſs conſiderable. In the time of (§) Kau hew, in one Irruption they forced ſeveral Cities, ravaged a large Extent of Country, carried off a great Quantity of Cattle, and either killed or made Slaves of many of the Emperor's Subjects. They returned ſome time after by the ſame Quarter; we oppoſed them with ſome Troops, but we were defeated; and a good many of our Officers killed upon the Spot. It is a common ſaying, that " Victory inſpires even Cowards with Courage. And a " defeated Army can ſcarce ſupport itſelf. Since the Days of Kau hew, theſe Barbarians entered thrice by Long ſi, and came always off with Advantage. At preſent it is otherways; Our Troops that lie on that Side of the Empire, ſuſtained by the Protection of (‖) the She tſi, and directed by your wiſe Orders, have revived the Courage of the neighbouring People, and we are in a Condition

(*) He here inſinuates to Li vang, that he may come to loſe his Life. What follows proves this to be the Senſe.

(†) The Chineſe Expreſſion is equivalent to this: They ſay literally, your Subject had the Unhappineſs; and above, for I have heard their Expreſſion is, your Subject has heard. The Chineſe, not excepting the Vang, make uſe of this Term when they ſpeak to the Emperor.

(‡) The ſame, who by way of Contempt, are called Hyong nû. Hyong ſignifying Wicked, Cruel; Nû a Slave.

(§) The Queen Dowager of Kau ti.

(‖) This appears to be a tutelar Spirit; but the Chineſe are ſo little agreed upon the preciſe Signification of theſe two Letters, that I choſe not to tranſlate them.

dition not only to reſiſt, but to conquer them. There have paſſed already ſeveral Actions, in which we defeated the Barbarians, tho' they had the Advantage in Numbers.

SIR, The Difference of this Succeſs is not owing to the People of Long ſi, who of themſelves are not more nor leſs brave than they were, but to the Generals and Officers. A Book entitled The Art of War ſays, "That there are no People, however brave, who can be called in-"vincible, but there are Generals, of whom it may be ſaid, that they never were beaten." Nothing is then of greater Importance, either for the Reputation of your Arms, or the Safety of your Frontiers, than the Choice of your General.

Succeſs in War to what owing.

Beſides this Choice, there are three other Things of the utmoſt Importance to the Succeſs of Battle, and to which a good General ought to attend. Firſt, the Ground, which he ought to know perfectly well, in order to be able to make all Advantages of its Situation. Secondly, that his Men become Warlike, by a continual Exerciſe of their Arms. Thirdly, that the Arms, of which there are different Sorts, be all excellent. As to the Ground, if the Country is incumbered with Rocks, Woods or Rivers, or tho' level, if covered with Buſhes, and rank Graſs, he ought to employ his Infantry; ſince a Soldier on Foot is then better worth two others, either on Horſeback or in a Chariot. On the contrary, if he meets with a plain level Field, or a Tract of high lying Ground, without either Woods or Rocks, he ought to employ his Cavalry, for then a Horſeman or a Charioteer is worth ten foot Soldiers. If the Riſings of the Ground are frequent, the Valleys narrow, and ſeperated with a great many Rivers, the beſt Arms are Bows, ſhorter Arms are then of ſmall Uſe; nay, of ſo little, that one good Archer is then worth a hundred Soldiers otherwiſe armed. Where they meet with Thickets and Woods, they muſt have recourſe to their Hatchets, for then one good Hatchet-man is worth more than two Pike-men. In Defiles and Windings, the Sword and Dagger are of uſe: A Man thus armed is then worth ten Archers.

Of the Choice of Ground.

Men.

As to the Men themſelves, the ſubaltern Officers ought to be choſen, and the Soldiers well diſciplined. Otherwiſe they will know nothing of Encampments or Marches, it will be eaſy to diſperſe, and impoſſible to rally them; they will let ſlip every Advantage, and neither have Caution to prevent forſeen, nor Dexterity to extricate themſelves from unforſeen Dangers. They will not know when to obey the Signal, either of the (†) Drum or the Kettle-Drum; and a hundred ſuch raw undiſciplined Men are not worth two.

and Arms.

As to their Armour, if offenſive, it muſt be ſound, handſome, and ſharp. If defenſive, it muſt be ſtrong and thick. You may as well expoſe a Man naked to the Waiſt, as allow him to carry a bad Cuiraſs: A Bow that wants force, is not ſo good as a Dagger. An Arrow that does not fly ſtreight, is as bad as none. And if it does fly, what is the uſe of it if it has not Force to pierce? A Man had as good be without Steel, as to have it blunt and bad. If a General does not watch over this, and if his Soldiers are but ill armed, five Men are not ſo good as one. The Book I have cited goes on. "To lead on an Army ill provided with Arms, is to carry Men to be butchered. "A Prince who puts a General at the Head of wretched Troops that are to fight, in Effect, deli-"vers them up to the Enemy. And the General, who neglects thoſe Points we have touched "upon, is a Traytor to his Prince: In ſhort, a Prince who makes an ill Choice of a General, aban-"dons his Dominions to his Enemy. Their Maxims are very juſt, and ought to be weighed."

Maxims of different States.

'Tis farther ſaid, and juſtly too, that as there is a Difference betwixt great and little, between ſtrong and weak, between what is difficult and dangerous, and what is eaſy and favourable, a Man muſt underſtand and attend to all theſe Circumſtances, before he can determine aright how he is to act. Different States ought to have, and generally have, different Manners. The Maxims of a ſmall Kingdom are to yeild to a greater, that it may procure Peace. The common Maxim of little States is, whenever Occaſion ſerves, to unite againſt a greater Power. The Maxim of our Empire is, always to oppoſe Barbarians againſt Barbarians.

Advantages of the Hû lû over the Chineſe.

The Hû lû, with whom we have now to do, have three Advantages which we want. Their Country is full of Mountains and Ditches, to which their Horſes are accuſtomed, and in which neither our Horſes nor Chariots can enter, far leſs, act. Theſe People are accuſtomed to make irregular Incurſions from their Youth, and while they are galloping over Mountains and Plains, know how to ſhoot very exactly from their Bows. As neither our Horſes or Chariots can come at them, how can our poor foot Soldiers make Head againſt them? Beſides the Hû lû fear neither Wind nor Rain, Hunger nor Thirſt. They are much fitter for Fatigue, and more hardened to Labour than our People. But when we engage them in a plain open Field, we have great Advantages. The Evolutions of our Cavalry and Chariots put them in Diſorder. Our large Bows do Execution at a great Diſtance; their's make no Impreſſion upon us. When we come even to handy Blows, our Men armed with good Cuiraſſes, keeping ſtill their Ranks, with either their Swords or their Pikes in their Hands, and ſuſtained by our Archers, ſoon rout the Barbarians. When our Men ſkirmiſh or fight ever ſo little at a Diſtance, the defenſive Arms of theſe Barbarians being made of nothing but Skins or Wood, are ſoon broke to Pieces. If both Sides diſmount and engage Hand to Hand, fighting only with ſhort Arms, theſe Hû lû reſiſt us ſtill leſs. As they are accuſtomed only to fight on Horſeback, they have not Reſolution enough to maintain a Diſpute on Foot.

and of the Chineſe over them.

By this Reckoning, we have ſeven Advantages over theſe Barbarians, for three that they have over us. If we add to this, that we can eaſily bring ten Men into the Field for their one; the Victory appears ſtill more certain. However we may always ſay with great Truth, that Arms are fatal Inſtruments, (†) A Gloſs ſays, That the Signal for Battle was given by Drums; and for a Retreat, by Kettle-Drums.

Inſtruments, and War is a dangerous Trade. The greateſt and the ſtrongeſt may there, in an inſtant, be levelled with the meaneſt and the weakeſt; and it ſometimes happens, that by too determined a Reſolution to conquer, a Defeat becomes total and irretrievable. Then Repentance is too late. To tread warily, and to leave nothing to Fortune, is always a good Maxim. There are ſome of theſe Strangers that voluntarily ſubmit to our Laws; of theſe may be form'd a Body of ſeveral Thouſands. They are a Race as hardy and as laborious as the Hû lû: They have all their Manners and all their Qualities; and in my Opinion, may be of great Uſe. We ought to provide them well in Arms both offenſive and defenſive, and put at their Head one of our beſt Officers; who is beforehand a little acquainted with their Manners, and who knows how to gain them: We ought to recommend to this General, to employ thoſe Troops, only in Defiles and Paſſes, and to make Uſe of others in open Fields. This in my Opinion is the Way to hazard nothing. Tradition informs us, that an underſtanding Prince makes his Advantage of every thing, even of a Fool's Words. What am I, but a Man without Wiſdom, and without Merit? However I don't deſpair, but that your Majeſty's Wiſdom will find ſomething in this Diſcourſe that may be of Uſe.

Another Diſcourſe of the ſame Shan tſo, to the ſame Emperor, upon the Manner of ſecuring the Frontiers of the Empire.

I FIND that under the Dynaſty of the Tſin, Shi whang from the North, attacked Hû mê (†) and Yang ywê in the South: He took Arms, not to guard his Frontiers and ſecure his Subjects, but to gratify an unbounded Pride and an unſatiable Avarice: Thus before he ſaw his ambitious Deſigns take effect, he threw the whole Empire into Diſorder. It is a true Saying, That to make War upon an Enemy with whoſe Strength or Weakneſs we are unacquainted, is to hazard all. Shi whang found this true by Experience. The Country of the Hû mê is very cold, the Bark of the Trees there are about three Inches thick. The Men ſubſiſt themſelves upon the Fleſh of Creatures half raw, and drink nothing but Milk; the Skins of the Beaſts are hairy and thick, and the Skins of the Men are as hard in Proportion, and as well formed to endure exceſſive Colds. Yang ywê on the contrary, is a Country where is almoſt no Winter, and where the Heats are long and violent, but don't much affect the Inhabitants who are accuſtomed to them. The Troops of Shi whang could not bear the Rigour of theſe Climates. They who carried them their Proviſions periſhed upon the Road; and no body went to ſuch a Country, but with as much Unwillingneſs, as if they had been going to receive a Puniſhment.

In effect, they who were condemned to this Service were, 1ſt, Officers who had been faulty; 2*d*, Thoſe who had married in order to be free from the Authority of their Fathers; and laſtly, They who had been branded with Infamy, whoſe Father and Mother had been People who act by Violence, and, contrary to their own Inclinations, are by no means to be depended upon. The Method of Rewards is much better; where there is a Proſpect either of Preferment or Spoil, the Soldiers and common People will ruſh upon the Fire, and expoſe themſelves to the greateſt Dangers. But in theſe Expeditions of Shi whang, both Soldiers and Subjects had a thouſand Dangers to encounter, and no Reward to expect. Thus every one foreſaw the impending Misfortunes of the Dynaſty of the Tſin. No ſooner had Ching ſhin given the Signal and taken the Field, after poſſeſſing himſelf of Ta tſe, but the People flocked to him from all Sides, as the Waters of a River follow their natural Courſe. Thus ended the Expeditions, to which Ambition, Pride and Avarice prompted Shi whang.

It is not ſurprizing that the Hû attempt frequent Incurſions into our Frontiers. The Reaſon is this; They are a People not indebted to the Culture of their Grounds, either for Food or Rayment. Fleſh and Milk furniſh them with the former, and the Skins of Beaſts with the latter. They have neither Towns nor cultivated Fields, nor ſettled Habitations, but wander up and down like Savages. Do they find in a Spot Paſturage and Water for their Herbs? There they ſtop. Are they in want of Graſs? They decamp and ſeek it where it is to be found. In ſhort, to come and to go coſts them nothing. It is their ordinary Employment. Let us then ſuppoſe, that this Nation when hunting, ſhould make an Irruption into our Frontiers in ſeveral Places: The Princes of Yen, of Tay, of Shang kyun and Long ſi, who are upon the Boundaries of theſe Lands, have ſo few Subjects to oppoſe them, that if your Majeſty does not ſend Troops thither, the People in theſe Quarters muſt be expoſed; and if not ſupported, Fear may induce them to ſubmit to the Enemy. To ſend Troops, is attended with another Inconveniency: A few will not anſwer the Deſign; and a large Army takes a conſiderable time to be drawn together. Nay, when it comes into the Field, the Hû are retired too far to attack them. Conſtantly to keep up a large Body of Troops there, is a vaſt Expence. To diſband them, is inviting the Hû to renew their Incurſions. Theſe are the Inconveniences that have long ſubſiſted, and attend the Empire upon that Quarter.

In order to obviate them, nothing ſeems to be more expedient, than to eſtabliſh new Colonies all along our Frontiers, to encourage Families to ſettle there, by giving them the Property of Lands. For this effect, Fortreſſes ought to be built, ſurrounded with good Walls, and furniſhed with (*) Stones and other Arms. Every one ought to have a reaſonable Extent of Land, and to be placed as near the Paſſes upon the Frontiers, as Conveniency will allow of: And each Diſtrict,

(†) The Names of Countries.

(*) The Chineſe ſays Pau, which ſignifies a Machine for throwing Stones: But how it was made, or how it threw the Stones no body knows. Ever ſince they have had Cannons in China, they likewiſe call them Pau; but there is this Difference betwixt the two Chineſe Characters, that the firſt is Ta ſhe, and the ſecond Ho pau. Now She ſignifies a Stone, Ho Fire. Pau ſignifies Wrapped up, to wrap up, &c.

trict, where at leaſt a thouſand Families ought to be ſettled, ſhould be diſtinctly marked out by Rivers and other Boundaries. For this Effect, Houſes muſt be firſt built, and Proviſions made for whatever is neceſſary for Agriculture; then let ſuch as are convicted of certain Crimes, and ſuch as have by ſome Act of Grace eſcaped their deſerved Puniſhments, be ſent thither. As there will not be ſufficient to People the Country, certain Criminals may have Power to ranſom themſelves, by ſending certain Numbers of Slaves both Men and Women, who ſhall go thither. Honour may likewiſe be decreed, for ſuch as ſhall contribute voluntarily a certain Number. In ſhort, if all this is not ſufficient for the Purpoſe, certain Honours and Rewards muſt be propoſed to ſuch as will willingly go; and Magiſtrates muſt be ordered, to furniſh ſuch as are unmarried with the Means of maintaining Wives, without which, it will be difficult to fix them there.

Not only every Family muſt be furniſhed with what is neceſſary for Agriculture, but Laws muſt be eſtabliſhed that are advantageous for the Society in general. For Example; if the Enemy ſhall make any Inroads upon our Lands, and any of them be taken Priſoners, the Magiſtrates ſhall be obliged immediately to pay a reaſonable and a fixed Price for the Property of half the Slaves thus taken, which Property ſhall devolve to thoſe who have taken them. Thus theſe People, partly from a Proſpect of Advantage, partly from their own mutual Defence, as Allies and Relations, will become hardened, and ready to fall upon the Hû, if they ſhall rebel. As they will be accuſtomed to the Climate from their Youth, and acquainted with whatever relates to theſe Barbarians, they will the leſs fear them, and be more able either to reſtrain or conquer them, than any Troops ſent thither for that Purpoſe. Thus you will ſhun the Inconveniences that attended Shi whang, and muſt attend every Prince that ſends out his Armies upon ſuch an Expedition. You will ſecure your Frontiers by procuring them real Advantages, which will encreaſe in progreſs of Time; and theſe Eſtabliſhments when made, will leave a grateful Remembrance of your Virtues and Glories to future Ages.

The Emperor having agreed to this Advice, Shau tſo drew up the following Memorial, which he preſented to his Majeſty.

GREAT Prince. I hear with Joy, that your Majeſty is determined to ſecure your Frontiers by eſtabliſhing Colonies, which for the future will ſave a vaſt deal of Expence and Trouble. You cannot give your People a more ſolid Proof of your Goodneſs, than by thus cutting off all Occaſions of future Inconveniencies. There is no more now to be done, but that your Officers ſecond your Majeſty's good Intentions; and like wiſe and diſtinguiſhed Men, manage the Inclinations, and win ſo upon the Affections of the People who are firſt tranſplanted, that they ſhall have no occaſion to regret the leaving their native Country. In this Caſe, I dare aſſure you, that there will be no want of Coloniſts; and that in a ſhort time, all the poorer Sort of People will encourage one another, and aſſemble themſelves to go thither.

Beſides theſe Colonies will anſwer two Purpoſes: The one is the Cultivation of deſart Countries; the other, the Security of the Frontiers. With Reſpect to the firſt Point, what is to be obſerved according to the Method of the Ancients, is as follows: Before any City is built, or any Diſtrict regulated, Care muſt be taken to pitch upon a healthy Place where the Waters are good, and where the Soil, by the Beauty of its Trees and the Quantity of its good Vegetables, is promiſing and inviting. When ſuch a Spot is fixed upon, then the City may be built, and its Dependances on all Quarters marked out: The good and arable Lands muſt be divided, and each one's Poſſeſſion bounded by hedges of Communication. Every Houſe ought at leaſt, to have one Parlour, and two convenient Chambers in good repair, ſecured with ſufficient Doors, and tolerably well furniſhed; ſo that theſe new Inhabitants finding there whatever is neceſſary, may the more eaſily forget their ancient Dwellings, and more cheerfully improve their new Settlements. Each of theſe Cities ought to be provided with Phyſicians and (*) U's; the one to take care of the Sick; the other of Burials and funeral Ceremonies. Marriages muſt be promoted, and the Cuſtoms of mutual Rejoicings and Condolences, attended with mutual Aſſiſtances, encouraged; Burying-Places muſt be aſſigned them; in ſhort, nothing muſt be wanting that is requiſite to their fixed and laſting Settlement.

With Reſpect to the ſecond Point, which is the Security of the Frontiers; what I have farther learned of the Ancients to be neceſſary on this Head, is as follows. That all the Families of the Diſtrict be divided into fives. That every five Families be under one Head. And that every fifty Families be incorporated in a Li, which is to be under a Chief of greater Diſtinction than the former. That four Li thus formed may make a Lyew, which ſhall be under an Officer. In ſhort, that ten Lyew may compoſe an I, which is to have a Commandant, who ſhall be ſuperior to all the other Officers. That the Officers be Men who are well acquainted with the Country, and the moſt proper to make themſelves popular. That every ſubaltern Officer ſhall have regulated Times, when thoſe under him are to perform their Exerciſes, to which all the younger People muſt duly repair. That every Officer ſhall be at the Head of his reſpective Troops when they march againſt an Enemy. That the People of one Diſtrict ſhall not be allowed to ſettle in another, but that being accuſtomed one with another, they may live in Harmony together. Thus, if an Alarm ſhould ſpread at Night, they will the better know one another's Voices in order to their mutual Aſſiſtance. In the Day-time, during the Heat of Combat, they will more eaſily diſtinguiſh each other; and tho' at a Diſtance, will more readily expoſe themſelves even to Death for for their common Safety. That to all theſe Regulations, Rewards be appointed for the Brave, and Puniſhments for the Cowardly: Thus in a ſhort Time, we may hope to ſee Soldiers, who will never turn their Backs upon an Enemy.

(*) It is plain, that this Expreſſion has not the Signification of a Sorceror or Magician, which it has elſewhere.

Under the Empire of the ſaid King ti, the King of U reſolved to attack the King of Lyang. As he had no lawful Reaſon for ſo unjuſt a Proceeding, Mey ching endeavoured all he could to diſſwade him, and for that end drew up the following Diſcourſe.

SIR; It is a common and a true Saying, that if a Prince is accompliſhed, every thing ſucceeds well with him. If he is inconſiſtent with himſelf in any Point, a ſingle Slip will make him miſcarry; and that Miſcarriage often brings him to the Brink of Ruin. Shun, notwithſtanding he was afterwards Emperor, did not poſſeſs a (*) Foot of Ground. Yu, whoſe Juriſdiction did not extend over ten Families, ſaw himſelf Maſter of the whole Empire, and of, I don't know how many other Princes. Ching tang and Vû vang were born Princes, yet neither of them was poſſeſſed of ten Leagues of Ground. Each of theſe in his Life-time became Emperor, and Founder of an illuſtrious Dynaſty. What was the Secret of their Succeſs? In a few Words it was this; Being careful to do nothing that could make them bluſh before Tyen (†), or that could hurt them in the Affections of the People, they always followed the Dictates of that right Reaſon they had received from Tyen, and looked upon themſelves as the common Fathers of their Country. Their Subjects on their Part, anſwer'd this Conduct with ſuitable Sentiments of Affection. There were none in Poſts during their Time, who were afraid of ruining themſelves, for making a plain and frank Declaration of whatever they thought conducive to the Public Well-fare. Thus, theſe great Princes met with Succeſs in their Life-time, and with Fame and Veneration after their Deaths.

I wiſh I were able to diſcover the Bottom of my Heart, and to ſhew the Zeal from which I ſpeak. I know of how ſmall Importance I am, and how much Reaſon I have to fear you will ſlight my Council. However, I beg you will give ſome Attention, or rather awaken the Sentiments engraved upon your own Heart on this Occaſion. Suppoſe there were a Rock equally high and rugged, at whoſe Foot there lay an unfathomable Abyſs. Suppoſe that a Man loaded with a vaſt Weight, were placed upon the Extremity of this Rock in ſuch a Manner, that half hanging, half ſtanding, both he and his Load were prevented from falling entirely, only by a (‡) ſmall weak Thread. What Man in ſuch a Situation, ſeeing on the one Hand that his Fall was hindered by next to nothing, and on the other, that if he did fall he muſt infallibly periſh; who I ſay, would not tremble? And yet, allow me to ſay it, this is very near the Condition you are actually in: But it is only in your own Power to eſcape the Danger. The Enterpriſe into which you are engaged, is infinitely (§) difficult and dangerous. Give it up, and in the Twinkling of an Eye, you may be aſſured of a (‖) permanent Proſperity. To be able to paſs the reſt of your Days in Peace, in Joy, and the Poſſeſſion of a powerful State, and yet to engage your Forces in an Enterprize equally painful and fruitleſs, allow me to ſay, is what I cannot comprehend the Meaning of.

Some People there are whom their own Shadows frighten, and to ſhun the Sight of it, are always fooliſhly turning and returning. But would they peaceably remain in a Shade, the Phantom would diſappear, and they would be eaſy. The beſt Method for a Man who is afraid to be over-heard, is to hold his Peace. The Man who is afraid his Project ſhould be known, had beſt abandon it. Is boiling Water upon a large Fire? To blow upon that Water with one's Mouth, to allay the Boiling would be fruitleſs; the only Way would be to take away the Fuel; any other Method would be (⸸) ridiculous. The Happineſs of Prince and People both, depends upon certain Foundations, which ought to be well eſtabliſhed. Their Unhappineſs likewiſe has it Seeds, but the wiſe Man cruſhes its Growth. To ſucceed in this, the moſt minute Beginnings muſt be watched. For that which appears but an inconſiderble Matter at firſt, in a ſhort time, becomes important and weighty. The Water which diſtils from the Mountain Tay, in a long Courſe makes itſelf a Paſſage thro' the Stone, which one would think had been wrought by a Chiſſel. A Cord frequently drawn up and down thro' a Plank in the ſame Place, becomes at laſt two Pieces, tho' it is longer a doing than if it had been cut by Steel. In ſhort, that Tree, which, tho' now ten Foot in Circumference, was raiſed from a very ſmall Seedling, when tender and young, was every way flexible, and might have been eaſily plucked up. But how vaſtly different is it now from what it then was? (‡) Evil is of the ſame Nature. Think upon this, my Prince, I conjure you, think upon it ſeriouſly. Do not begin to abandon, nor change the wholeſome Maxims of your Anceſtors; Such a Conduct never goes unpuniſhed.

We have already ſeen the Declaration which the Emperor Vu ti made, by which he demanded of the wiſe Men preſented to him, eſpecially of Tong chong ſhu, proper Advice about Government and other Points. The Anſwers of Chong ſhu were ſo long, that I ſhall only give ſome Paſſages.

Extracts of the Anſwers of Chong ſhu, to the Emperor Vu ti.

YOUR Majeſty, in your Declaration, was graciouſly pleaſed to command, that ſome Information may be given you about what is called the order of (*) Tyen, (Heaven) and about the (†) Nature and Affections of Man. This is a Taſk to which I own myſelf very unequal. All I can do, in Conſequence of your Commands, is to inform your Majeſty, that, after a ſerious Examination of paſt Events, particularly of thoſe in which we are inſtructed by the (‡) Chun tſyû; nothing ſeems to me more capable to inſpire Princes with a filial and reſpectful Awe, than the Method in which Tyen uſes to deal with Men. When ever a Dynaſty begins to deviate from the right Ways of Wiſdom and Virtue, Tyen commonly ſends them ſome Chaſtiſement in order to reclaim them. If the reigning Prince pays no Regard to ſuch a Warning, it employs Prodigies and extraordinary Appearances to inſpire him with a juſt Dread. If all theſe are ineffectual, and the Prince perſiſts; his utter Ruin is near.

By this Conduct of Tyen, it is plain that his Heart is full of Tenderneſs to Princes, and that he means only to reclaim them by Correction. In effect, his Deſign is to aid and ſupport them; and he never abandons them, till their Diſorders proceed to the laſt Extremities. The moſt eſſential Point then for a Prince, is, that he uſe his utmoſt Efforts, Firſt, to receive Inſtruction and Lights in whatever relates to his own Duties. Secondly, to make ſo good Uſe of them, that he may daily advance in Merit and Virtue. Thus, and no otherways may a right Change be wrought, and happy Conſequences expected. "Do not relax in your Endeavours Day nor Night," ſays the Shi king; "Uſe your utmoſt Efforts," ſays the Shu king: Would not all this ſeem to ſay, that there is a Neceſſity to put a Violence upon one's Self in theſe Caſes?

The Dynaſty Chew was wretchedly torn in Pieces, under the Reign of Yew vang and Li vang. But when there aroſe a Prince, who inceſſantly called to Mind the Virtues of his Anceſtors, and animated himſelf by their Example, to ſupport the Glory of that Empire he had received from their Hands, who applied himſelf as well to remedy the Abuſes, as to ſupply the Defects of Government; (§) Shang tyen aſſiſted him, and furniſhed him with able Miniſters. Hence he always ſucceeded. Under him the good Government of the firſt Chew revived. He was a Subject of the Poets in his own Time, and after his Death, his Memory was celebrated; as it continues to be to this Day, by Elogies.

Such is the ordinary Effect of a ſincere Attachment for Virtue, and of that continual Application recommended by the Shu king. What this Emperor obtained by theſe Means, another might have obtained in the ſame Manner: For tho' Honour commonly attends Virtue; yet, properly ſpeaking, it is not Virtue that raiſes the Man, ſays Confuçius, on the contrary, it is the Man, that can give a value to the Virtue. The Peace or Diſquiet of States, their Ruin or their Glory depends upon Princes. When any one of them loſes his Empire, this Event is not to be attributed to the Order of Tyen, who deprives them of their Power to maintain themſelves on the Throne, but to their own Imprudence and Diſorders: I know, that it is very truly ſaid, that the Foundation of a Monarchy is a thing beyond the Forces of one Man to compaſs, that it is a Boon from Tyen, perhaps the greateſt he makes to Mankind, and that the Conſent of the Univerſality of the People to own one Man as their common Parent, and the happy Omens that attend ſuch a Conſent, are, as it were, the great Seal of Heaven in his Favour. But beſides that, even this, in ſome Sort, is only the Conſequence of Virtue, which, as Confuçius ſays, does not long remain by itſelf; beſides this, I ſay, we never ſpeak thus, but where we treat of the Foundation of a Dynaſty.

After having ſet the good Princes Yau and Shun, their Government, their Virtues, in Contraſt with the bad Princes Kyé and Chew, and the unhappy Conſequences of their Vices, Tong chong ſhu concludes in theſe Words:

"So true it is, that the Manners of People depend on thoſe who are over them, as the Clay upon the Wheel depends upon the Potter who forms it, and as the Metal in the Crucible depends upon the Founder, who throws it into what Mold he pleaſes."

He then ſhews how the Corruption of Manners, tho' before very great, grew ſtill more exceſſive under Shi whang. And then he goes on,

"The beſt Carver in the World, ſays Confuçius, cannot work upon a Piece of rotten Wood; and it would be loſing ones Pains to prop an earthen Wall already old, and which threatens to fall every Moment. In ſuch a Situation did the Han, who ſucceeded the Tſin, find the Empire. For this Reaſon, in Spite of the greateſt Qualities and good Intentions of our Emperors, ſince the Beginning ing of the Dynasty, they have not obtained all the good Effects which were to be wish'd for. It would seem that the greater Care they took to deserve Success, the less they met with. They made Laws, but all the Effect of them was to augment the Number of Criminals. They gave Orders, which only served for new Occasions of Frauds: This is as if one should try to stop the bubbling of boiling Water, by throwing other boiling Water upon it. Allow me, that in order to explain my Thoughts, how so great an Evil may be remedied, to use the Comparison of a Kin (*). Sometimes the Keys are so disordered, that it is in vain to endeavour to tune them, by touching them here or there. The shortest way is to change the Strings, and new mount the Instrument. If a Kin is not new mounted when it has Occasion, the most able Musician in the World, will not be able to give it its right Melody.

'Tis thus of Government. Why has not the Success till this time never answered the good Intentions and Cares of the Han? Because they working always upon the Ground-Work of the Government of the Tsin, had no other Aim but to avoid their Excesses. The Government of the Ancients must be recurred to; above all, you must begin with a hearty Endeavour for the Conversion of the People, and for making them in love with Virtue. For Want of beginning here, all the Means they employed during the seventy Years they reigned, were unsuccessful. Try this, Great Sir, and endeavour to procure to your People, the Instruction of which they stand in need. By your Regulations, and by your Example, inspire them with an Esteem for Virtue. Lay a greater Stress upon this, than upon Proclamations, Sentences and Punishments. You will see the Reformation of Abuses, and the Prosperity of your Government, advance in Proportion with the Pains you take. Success and Plenty will follow those Calamities that are now too frequent.

The Shi king says; "Procure the real good of your People, let not the least Individual escape your Care: Tyen (Heaven) will crown you with Blessings." It thus speaks to those who govern, and informs them, that it is thus, they can draw down the Rewards of Heaven. But what must the Princes do more? They must honour and practise the five (†) Virtues. It is by making them flourish, that a Prince deserves the Assistance of Tyen, the Protection of the Quey shin; and that he puts himself in a Condition, to make the happy Effects of his Government, felt to the utmost Bounds of his Empire.

SECOND DISCOURSE.

IN the second Discourse, which is only a Consequence of the former; he suggests to Vû ti, to re-establish the (‡) great College, or the great School, in order to furnish the Empire with good Masters, capable to instruct and to form his Subjects to Virtue. He bemoans the small Number which were then in the Empire. He not only suggests that the great College should be re-established in order to encrease their Number, but that none should be put into Places of Trust, except Men of Merit, and no Regard ought to be had to the Sons of great Officers, who had nothing to recommend them but their Riches, or at most, the Services of their Fathers. He blames the advancing such to Employments, as had nothing to plead but the Merit of a Parent, and desires that they should advance only by Degrees.

'Twas not thus, continues he, in former Ages; Then, every different Genius had a suitable Employment allotted; a Capacity that were but midling, was always employed in midling Affairs. Was there a Person whose Merit was extraordinary, they made no Scruple to advance him all of a sudden to the most exalted Station. Thus, a Man by having the Means of exerting his Genius, he was of great Use to the Public. At present, it is otherways. A Man of the most distinguished Merit, remains a long time in the lowest Obscurity: And a Person whose Talents are but ordinary, jumps at once into Employments far above his Comprehension.

THIRD DISCOURSE.

IN this third Discourse, Tong chong shu, after excusing himself for having so ill digested the Matters he had treated of in the foregoing Discourse, returns to the main Point, which regards the Instruction and Reformation of the People. He Expresses himself thus:

Anciently, says he, besides that all the Officers in the Empire made it their principal Study: There were other Officers established on purpose to watch over it. In this consisted the Basis of their Government: And nothing was so much at Heart, as to inculcate on the People both by Instruction and Example, a sincere Love for Virtue. By these Means sometimes it happened, that there was not one Criminal found throughout the whole Empire. But of late, this excellent Method has been disused. The People thus neglected, have abandoned Justice, and blindly follow their Lusts, without the Dread of any Laws to restrain them. There are now such a vast Number of Criminals, that every Year they may be counted by (§) Wan. If one attend ever so little to this vast Difference, one cannot help concluding, that the ancient Method must be absolutely followed: And this the (‖) Chun tsyû makes us fully sensible of, when it censures every thing that deviates from wise Antiquity. All that is required of, and commanded to Men by Tyen, is comprized under this Word Ming (+). To fulfill all that this Expression signifies, is the Height of human Perfection. The Powers or the Faculties which every one brings into the World with him at his Birth, are all comprehended under the Term (*) Sing: But, our Nature, in order to bring it to the Perfection of which it is capable, muſt be aided by Inſtruction. All the Paſſions natural to Man are comprehended under the Word (†) Tſing. But theſe Paſſions muſt have Rules to hinder them from running into Exceſs. The eſſential Duties of a good Prince, and his firſt Cares are, reſpectfully to enter into the Views of Tyen his Superior, and conform himſelf to its Orders: To procure to his People the Inſtruction which is neceſſary to give their Nature the Perfection of which it is capable. In ſhort, to make Laws, to eſtabliſh the Diſtinction of Ranks and other Regulations, which may beſt anſwer the End of preventing or ſtopping the Unruline ſs of Paſſions. Is there a Prince who omits none of theſe Duties? His Throne is firm, and his Government eſtabliſhed upon a ſolid Foundation.

Man has received from Tyen his Ming, but it is different from other Beings, even Animals. From this (‡) Ming, ſpring in a Family, the Duties of Father to Son, of Son to Father, &c. In a State, thoſe betwixt Prince and Subject, and the Difference and Reſpect due to old Age. Thence proceed the Union, Friendſhip, Politeneſs, and the other ſubordinate Links of Society. Theſe are the Characteriſticks of Superiority that Tyen has given to Man, above all other created Beings upon Earth. Tyen has produced the five Grains, and the ſix Kinds of domeſtic Animals for his Nouriſhment. Silk and Wool, &c. for his Cloathing. It has given him the Faculty of taming for his Uſe, Oxen and Horſes; even Leopards and Tygers may by him be ſhut up into Cages, and brought under Subjection. In Effect, it is owing to a celeſtial Intelligence, that he is raiſed above other Beings. He who underſtands, as he ought, his own Dignity, and the celeſtial Nature he has received, will not debaſe himſelf to the Rank of inferior Creatures, but maintain his own, and diſtinguiſh himſelf from them by the Knowledge he poſſeſſes, and the Regard he pays to Charity, Juſtice, Temperance, the Obſervance of the Rites, and the other Virtues. The Eſteem he entertains for theſe leads him to practiſe them; at laſt, they become ſo agreeably habitual, that his doing of Good and following Reaſon becomes not only a Duty, but a Pleaſure. To him who has attained to this Perfection, is properly given the Name of Wiſe: And it is in that Senſe, that Confucius ſays, no Man ought to be called Wiſe, who forgets his Ming, or miſunderſtands his Nature.

Ching ſe ſyew, an Author who lived towards the End of the Dynaſty of the Song, ſpeaking of the Diſcourſe from which theſe Paſſages are tranſcribed, ſays: Of all the Literati, who wrote under the weſtern Han, Chong ſhu appears to me, to be the only one who has altered nothing in the Doctrines of Confucius and Mencius. Thus he often reminds his Prince of the Maxims and Examples of the ancient Emperors Yau and Shun.

Nyen ngan, in a Diſcourſe addreſſed to the ſame Emperor, touches upon two Points. Firſt, the Luxury that reigned. Secondly, the War which was carrying on.

AT preſent, nothing is to be ſeen all over the Empire, but Luxury and expenſive Follies upon curious and magnificent Equipages, Habits and Houſes. Never was all Refinements upon ſenſual Pleaſures, carried to ſuch an Extravagance. There is no jumble of Colours but what is worn. Every Day produces new Concerts, and Delicacies for the Palate cannot be any farther improved. One would ſay, that there was an univerſal Endeavour in the Empire to give a Looſe to all the Paſſions. The People have got ſuch a Taſte, that there is nothing glaring and affected but what they covet. To allow of theſe fooliſh Extravagancies, is to teach the People to love them, and to follow their own vicious Byaſs. Whatever is fine, ornamented, coſtly, or curious, naturally ſtrikes the Senſes, and eaſily ſeduces. Repaſts ſerve no longer the End of Nouriſhment, but of Gluttony and Debauchery. Muſic, whoſe original Deſign was to calm the Emotions of the Heart, ſerves now to kindle up the moſt ſhameful Paſſions. A ſincere Attachment to the Rites, is now degenerated into Oſtentation, Grimace, and ſuperſtitious Vanities. Diſſimulation and Chicane, have turned Wiſdom out of Doors. I would willingly know if Tricking, Oſtentation, Gallantry, and Intemperance, are good Leſſons for a People? Are theſe the Means of keeping them in their Duty? Surely not; and one needs not be aſtoniſhed that they make a new Progreſs in Crimes every Day of their Lives. What I wiſh for is, that your Zeal for your People and the Good of your State, may ſet you upon remedying theſe Diſorders as ſoon as poſſible.

After he has ſharply expoſed the bad Conſequences of Shi whang's ambitious Expeditions, he makes the Application and goes on.

I hear of nothing at preſent, but military Expeditions. Here Fortreſſes are built, and there the Barbarians are attacked: Such a People has ſubmitted, and we are going to attack ſuch another. The Hyong nû are terrified, and we have burnt (§) their Long tſing. Theſe Deſigns are applauded by all your Council: For my ſhare, I can eaſily ſee how certain of your Miniſters and Officers may find their Account in all theſe: But is this for the Good of your Empire? I maintain it is not. When you can enjoy a profound Peace, needleſly to involve yourſelf in foreign Wars, to make uſeleſs Conqueſts, and to drain your own State, is not to act as the Father of your People (*) Nature.

(‡) Ming, the ſame as above; but here the Author applies Ming and Sing to the ſame thing. Viz. to right Reaſon, according to the Book Chong yong, which begins with theſe Words. Tyen Ming chin wey ſing. Tyen ming, and Sing, have the ſame Signification. It is Ming, ſay the Commentators, ſo far, as it comes from Tyen: and it is Sing ſo far, as it conſtitutes Man.

People. From an unbounded Ambition, or merely to gratify yourſelf, to irritate the Hyong nû, who are willing to be at Peace with you, is to very ill to provide for the future Repoſe of your Frontiers. Theſe Expeditions, tho' attended with the deſired Succeſs, may really be looked upon as Misfortunes, which will draw with them a long Train of Unhappineſs. The Reſentment of theſe Barbarians will continue. What will your Subjects who are their Neighbours ſuffer hereafter? and how many Alarms muſt your other Subjects feel? Believe me, theſe are not the Means to prolong the Dynaſty of the Han.

We ſee on all Hands, the forging of Cuiraſſes, the ſcowring of Swords, the ſharpening of Arrows, and the bending of Bows. Nothing is met on the Roads, but Armies marching, and Waggons loaded with Proviſions; but we meet them with Grief. Whatever may be told you to the contrary, theſe are the Sentiments of all, except a very few of your Subjects. And it appears to me, to be ſo much the better founded, in that the moſt terrible Revolutions have been produced by Wars. Is a Prince ſeen in any Difficulty? then bad Deſigns begin to be hatched. Such a one poſſeſſes in the Heart of your Empire ten Cities, and almoſt a hundred Leagues of Land: Your Houſe is then no longer in Safety: Take Care: Shi whang was entirely taken up with his ambitious Projects. A Man of no Conſequence at the Head of Troops, armed with almoſt nothing but Sticks, gave the Signal, which haſtened his Ruin. Now a-days, there are ſome who want neither Credit nor Power, and are much more to be dreaded. Think upon it, Prince; the greateſt Revolutions often depend on inconſiderable Circumſtances.

Frequent Remonſtrances were made to the Emperor Vu ti, becauſe Luxury prevailed in his Reign, and Agriculture was neglected. This Prince, one Day addreſſing himſelf to Tong fang ſo, ſaid to him; I want to reform my People; ſuggeſt to me the Means, and lay before me the Meaſures you think moſt proper. Tong fang ſo anſwered him in Writing, in the following Terms.

SIR, I might propoſe Yau, Shun, Yu, Tang, &c. as Patterns for your Imitation, but their happy Reigns have been long over. Why ſhould we go ſo far back? I will confine myſelf to Times not ſo remote, and to domeſtic Examples. I propoſe to you thoſe of Ven ti, whoſe Reign was ſo lately, that ſome of our old Men have had the Happineſs to ſee it. But Ven ti, when raiſed to the high Dignity of (*) Tyen tſe, and in Poſſeſſion of the vaſt Empire of which you are now Maſter, wore none but rough-ſpun Cloaths without any Ornaments. His Drawers were made of an ill dreſt Skin. An ordinary Belt ſerved him for keeping his Sword. His Arms had nothing in them that were curious; his Seat was a very indifferent Matt; and his Appartments had no Furniture that was either coſtly or glaring. The Ornaments and Riches of his Equipage, conſiſted in Bags full of uſeful Writings, with which he had been preſented; the Embelliſhments of his Perſon were Wiſdom and Virtue, and the Rules of his Conduct, Charity and Juſtice. All the Empire endeavoured to imitate theſe aimable Examples with which they were charmed.

Now a-days, we ſee Things quite different. Your Majeſty is pent up within the vaſt Circumference of a Palace, which of itſelf is a large City; you undertake a prodigious Number of new Buildings, and give each of them fine Names. On the left is the Palace of Fong whang: On the right that of Shing ming: So that in general, it is a Palace of a thouſand, or rather ten thouſand Gates. In your inner Apartments, your Wives are loaded with Diamonds and other precious Ornaments. Your Horſes are richly harneſſed, and even the Collars of your Dogs are coſtly. In ſhort, you cauſe Wood and Clay to be cloathed in Embroidery: Witneſs theſe theatrical Chariots whoſe Evolutions you love ſo well; every thing there is dazling, rich and curious: On this Side you cauſe to be founded and erected Bells of a hundred thouſand Pound Weight: On the other Side you are making Drums, whoſe Noiſe equals that of Thunder. In ſhort, there is nothing to be ſeen but the Commedies and Dancings of the Daughters of Ching. I frankly own to you, Sir, that to behave thus, to carry Luxury to ſuch an Exceſs, and yet to endeavour at the ſame time, to inculcate upon your Subjects Frugality, Modeſty, Temperance and Application to Agriculture, is to aim at an Impoſſibility.

If then, your Majeſty conſults me in good earneſt; if you really deſign to follow my Advice, or at leaſt want to know my Opinion, I would adviſe your Majeſty to bring together all that Trumpery of vain Ornaments; to pile them up in a Square, and then ſet them on Fire, that all the Empire may be witneſs of your Reformation. If you begin thus, you may become a ſecond Yau, or another Shun. Our I king ſays; "There are certain Points ſo eſſential, that when they are perfectly obſerved, the reſt follow a-courſe."

Ching te ſyew ſays of this Piece: So was a little teſty, he had his own Way of repreſenting Things: But he was otherways, an upright, ſincere, and an able Man: Vû ti employed him a long time.

(*) That is Emperor: I have before explained the Literal Meaning of this Expreſſion.

Under

Under the ſame Emperor Vu ti, Kong ſun hong his Miniſter of State propoſed that the People ſhould be prohibited the Uſe of the Bow: Vu ti ordered that a Deliberation ſhould be made on this Head. U kyew preſented a Writing to the Emperor, in which he gave his Opinion againſt it. The Extract of his Diſcourſe is as follows.

1. SHI WHANG, during his Reign, made ſuch a Prohibition. His true Motive for making it was to prevent the Revolts, of which he had ſome Reaſon to be afraid; it is true, he made a Handle of another Pretext: Some Quarrels happened, in which, ſome on both Sides were killed. He then gave out that it was in Order to prevent theſe Diſorders, that he publiſhed this Prohibition, which was obſerved with Rigour, but did not at all prevent theſe Commotions. All the Difference was, that they then fought Hand to Hand with Spades, or ſuch like Inſtruments of Handy-craft or Agriculture. Shi whang was likewiſe unſucceſsful in preventing that which was his true Motive for making this Prohibition. Notwithſtanding of this Order, he was beaten by the Forces of a very inconſiderable Perſon, who were rather armed with Staves then Weapons; and ſoon after he himſelf loſt his Empire. 2. There are at preſent, ſay ſome, a great many Robbers, and this Prohibition will diminiſh their Numbers, or at leaſt render them leſs hurtful: But it will be ſo far from anſwering this End, it will even deſtroy it. The Wicked will break this as well as other Laws, and the Virtuous alone will obſerve it. They will thereby be out of a Condition to give good Advice to the Bad, who will ſoon become more inſolent. 3. The intended Prohibition is againſt the Cuſtom of our ancient Emperors, who were ſo far from depriving their Subjects of the Uſe of the Bow and Arrow, that they recommended to them the Uſe of both, and appointed proper Times for that Exerciſe. We read in the Book of Rites: "When a Son is born into a Family, a Bow and Arrow are hung before the Gate."

Under the Emperor Swen ti, new Eſtabliſhments were made, and the Lands upon the Frontiers towards the Hyong nu, were cultivated. Upon theſe laſt diſputing the Grounds, there was a Battle. Several Chineſe were made Priſoners, and ſoon ſet at liberty. Some were for laying hold upon that Opportunity, and for engaging Swen ti to make War. Whey ſyang, one of his Miniſters, oppoſed this, and, in order to diſſwade the Emperor from it, made the following Diſcourſe.

WHEN there are Commotions, or Rebellions in a State, and if they can be quelled only by the Force of Arms; in ſuch a Caſe, War is juſtifiable. When an Enemy unjuſtly invades a Kingdom, makes a great Ravage, and will hearken to no juſt Terms; to take Arms then for the Defence of our Country, is entering into a neceſſary War. When the Difference is about Trifles, when Pride and Jealouſy has a greater ſhare in the Reſentment than Intereſt, it is a War of Anger and Frenzy. When the Deſire of being enriched with its Spoils, is the Motive of invading an Enemy's Country, it is then a War of Avarice. Laſtly, if it is only to acquire Glory, to ſhew a Superiority, or to humble a Rival; it is a War of Vanity and Ambition. In the two firſt Caſes, a People ſeldom ſucceeds, but in the two laſt, never. This is what is commonly ſaid, and this common Opinion of Men is founded upon the ordinary Conduct of Tyen. But it is viſible that the Hyong nû have no Intention to attack us: They have made no Irruption upon our Territories: They have indeed diſputed a Piece of Ground, upon which our People intended to make a Settlement. The Diſpute grew warm: Some Priſoners were made: But they were afterwards very handſomly ſet at Liberty: So that it is not worth while to take any farther Notice of it.

Nevertheleſs, I underſtand that your great Officers of War preſs you to put them at the Head of Troops, in order to march into the Country of the Hyong nû. If your Majeſty conſent to this, what Name will you give this War? In my Opinion it will neither be juſt nor neceſſary. Beſides, your People, eſpecially thoſe on that Quarter, are already ſo miſerable, that the Father and the Son are reduced to make Uſe of the ſame wretched Habit: I know not how many People live upon Roots, and wild Herbs. What will be the Conſequence, if you march thither a numerous Body of Men? Even tho' they may be victorious, their Victory will be more deſtructive than it can be uſeful. It is ſaid, (*) that Wars are followed by bad and barren Years. It is likewiſe ſaid, that this proceeds from the Inclemency of their Seaſons, introduced by the Groans and Sighs of People ruined by the Conſequences of Wars. But if Famine ſucceeds to War, let us ſuppoſe, that it is by a uſeleſs foreign Conqueſt being made; will not that occaſion a vaſt deal of Diſorder at Home? For my ſhare, I believe this is ſo much the more to be dreaded as the Governors of your Provinces, and even the Men who are in the moſt exalted Stations about your own Perſon, are very ill choſen: Becauſe Corruption and Diſorder thereby encreaſe every Day: Becauſe it is no rare thing for a Son to kill his Father, a younger, his elder Brother, and a Wife, her Huſband. This very Year, two hundred and twenty two Crimes of this kind have happened.

Tho' there were no other Diſorders or Troubles to be feared, can this Evil of itſelf be looked upon as Slight? And yet your Officers, without giving themſelves any Trouble, preſs you to bring into the Field an Army, on a very trifling Occaſion, againſt theſe foreign Barbarians. This is is not the Thing that preſſes moſt. Confuçius underſtanding that one of the Ki, when ready to die, diſcovered great Fear, leaſt his Family ſhould ſuffer by the Spite of a certain Chwen yu. Why does he not rather dread, ſays the Philoſopher, the Diſorders which he leaves in it? I would willingly ſay as much to them, who adviſe you into a War at preſent. I am far from being of this Opinion: I conjure you at leaſt, before you come to any Reſolution, to deliberate maturely with the Hew of Ping chang, and Ping ngen, and Lo chang, and others of their Character. If they incline for War, let it, in Gods Name, be carried on.

On Occaſion of an Eclipſe of the Sun and an Earthquake, the Emperor Ywen ti publiſhed a Declaration, ordering the Defects of the Government to be expoſed; and Quang hong, who was then Po ſe, preſented the following Diſcourſe to the Emperor.

SIRE! Behold what are the preſent Manners of your Empire. Riches are in great requeſt; Virtue, almoſt in none. Uprightneſs, Modeſty, Temperance, are rare, eſpecially at Court. The moſt natural, and the moſt common Laws are overthrown. Alliance carries it from Blood. Your neareſt Relations are nothing in Compariſon to certain remote Allies: The greateſt Number of your Miniſters and Officers, ſtudy only the Grimace of Complaiſance, and how to enrich themſelves by your Indulgence. Such is the State of Things. And ſuch is the Source of thoſe Calamities that afflict your Empire. This is what you muſt endeavour to remedy; otherways, your (*) Amneſties are uſeleſs.

The Court is commonly the Pattern of the People's Manners. When your great Men, not only live in a mutual good Underſtanding, but even yield to one another on certain Occaſions, Diſputes and Quarrels will very ſoon become rare among their Inferiors. Robberies and Outrages will ſoon ceaſe, by the great Men becoming charitable and liberal. In ſhort, let Juſtice, Temperance, Modeſty, and Humanity obtain at Court; Unanimity will ſoon reign among the People. They will excite one another to follow ſo fair Examples. By theſe Means our wiſeſt Princes, without uſing almoſt any Severity, have made Virtue flouriſh. But if Vice reigns at Court, it diffuſes itſelf thro' the reſt of the Empire ſo eaſily, that if there is among the People the leaſt (†) Coldneſs or Miſunderſtanding, it immediately improves into Diſputes and Quarrels. Haughtineſs among the Great, is always productive of Inſolence among the Small: If great Officers are ſeen to affect an independant Authority, to abuſe the Favour, and make a Traffic unknown to him, of the Authority, of their Prince: In a ſhort Time, nothing will be heard of among the People, but Robberies, Rapines, and Factions. But at preſent &c. (‡)

If then Vice reigns throughout the whole Empire, in Spite of both Amneſties and Chaſtiſements: It is not Tyen that occaſions it, but the wrong Meaſures that are taken to prevent them. I have found out ſeveral Paſſages of Antiquity to this Purpoſe. A Prince of Ching made great Account of ſuch as were ſtrong and hardy. In a ſhort Time, he had a good Number of Subjects, who could each of them ſubdue a Tyger. Mû kong Prince of Tſin, above all Things eſteemed thoſe who were capable of an inviolable Affection to his Perſon. And there were ſoon ſeveral found, who puſhed their Attachments to him ſo far, as to kill themſelves when he died. A Princeſs of Tſin loved the U; the People immediately gave into a thouſand Superſtitions. A Hew of Tſin was a great Oeconomiſt: All his People were the ſame. Tay vang was Humanity and Goodneſs itſelf: Thus, there was no ſuch Thing as Revenge heard of amongſt his Subjects: But each eaſily forgave his Neighbour. To judge by theſe Inſtances, will it not fairly follow, that ſuch as the Prince and the Court are, ſuch commonly are his Subjects?

Your Majeſty, whom the Admonitions of Heaven have inſpired with a reſpectful Dread, and whoſe Compaſſion for your Subjects is redoubled, has done well to begin, by reforming your ſelf: You have put a Stop to the uſeleſs and ſumptuous Works begun at Kan ſwen. You have abandoned the Expeditions, you deſigned againſt Chu yay. How much Joy has your Declaration upon theſe two Points cauſed thro' the whole Empire? Perſevere in theſe fair Paths. Enquire into whatever calls for a Reformation in your Court. When your Family is once well regulated, extend your Cares farther. In what regards Muſic and Poetry, confine yourſelf to the Taſte of Ya and (||) Song; let it be grave, ſerious, and inſtructive. Shun thoſe of Ching and Wey. Open a large Door for Remonſtrances: Seek out for Men of Merit: Above all, honour thoſe who are diſintereſted, upright, and ſincere. And baniſh from your Court all Flatterers. Apply your ſelf to the reading of our King, examine the Practice of the happieſt Ages. In this Manner, ſtudy whatever is humane and natural in Government, and what produces Union and Peace. In ſhort, endeavour by ſetting them the fair Example of your Virtues, to reform the Ideas and correct the Vices of your Subjects. And at leaſt, let all your Empire ſee, that Wiſdom and Virtue alone, can recommend a Man at your Court.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Diſcourſe may be called a good one, both for its Senſe and Expreſſion. There is not one Word but has its Meaning.

(*) On occaſion of ſome Singular Event, the Emperors pardon certain Criminals. This Cuſtom ſtill holds, and is called Ta he, or the great Pardon.

(†) The Chineſe Expreſſion is: Change of Colour.

(‡) He repeats here more at length, what he had ſaid in the Beginning about the Manners of the Court, and then proceeds.

(||) Names of Chapters in the Shi king.

There is in the ſame Book another Diſcourſe of the ſame Author to the foremen-tioned Emperour Ywen ti. This Prince had two Faults to correct, the firſt was, He was Irreſolute and beſtowed all his Favours on the Relations of the Queen, who abuſed her Truſt. For which reaſon Quang heng in the preſent Diſcourſe, touches on two Points, that are eſſential to all Perſons, but more eſpecially ſo to a Prince. The firſt, is to know his weak Side, and to correct it; the ſecond, to regulate his Family.

BEFORE he directly enters upon the Subject, he exhorts Ywen ti to ſtrengthen himſelf in the laudable Paſſion he had of worthily ſuſtaining the Glory of his Anceſtors, of advancing more and more the proſperous State of the Empire he held from them, and of ſecuring it to his Deſcendants. 'Twas thus, ſays he, that Ching vang did; he had always in his Mind the Virtues and Example of Ven vang his Grand-father, and of Vû vang his Father. His own Reign was full of Happineſs and Glory: But when Encomiums were made upon it, he attributed all his Honour to his Anceſtors, ſaying, that all he did was but following their Views, and imperfectly imitating their Examples Thus, he always deſerved the Favour of Shang tyen, and the Aſſiſtance of Quey ſhin.

After this Exordium, Quang heng explains what he means by a Man's underſtanding his own (*) Nature and correcting it, and in what Manner he ought to be underſtood. Every one, ſays he, ought carefully to examine what he poſſeſſes in too large or too ſcanty a Degree; then to cut of from one Part, in order to add to the other. For Inſtance, Perſons who have naturally a great deal of Wit, or who have acquired a great Compaſs of Knowledge, are liable to be diſtracted amidſt a great variety of Views. They ought to guard againſt this. Thoſe on the contrary, whoſe Experience is ſmall, and whoſe Capacity is but moderate, ought to dread, leaſt a good many things, even of Importance, may eſcape them. Theſe Defects they muſt ſupply as well as they can. Men brave and vigorous ought to be afraid, and guard againſt their being violent. Perſons who are gentle, good, and compaſſionate, ought to guard againſt Weakneſs, Irreſolution, &c.

As to the ſecond Head, he ſays nothing but what I have (†) mentioned before. He only endeavours to make his Prince ſenſible of what Conſequence it is to him, to regulate his Favours in the beſt manner, and not to give much way to particular Inclinations againſt his real Intereſt, and to the Prejudice of his own Blood.

There is in the ſame Book a third Diſcourſe of Quang heng's addreſſed to Ching ti, the Son and Succeſſor of Ywen ti.

THIS Prince had newly mounted the Throne. Quang heng in a very ſhort Exordium, praiſes the filial Piety he had ſhewn. After which, he exhorts him to increaſe the good Foundation he already had by his (‡) Application. For this End he principally recommended two Things.

The firſt is, carefully to fortify himſelf againſt a Paſſion for Women. Upon this he ſpeaks of Marriage, as neceſſary to accompliſh the Will of Tyen, and of the Preference which ought to be given to the Virtue of one Woman, beſides the other Qualities ſhe may poſſeſs. He cites the Encomiums beſtowed by the Shi king, upon the Wife of Ven vang, who was of no ſmall Aſſiſtance to him to make Virtue flouriſh. He puts him in Mind by way of Contraſt, of the fatal Conſequences, which the Paſſion of ſome Princes for ſome particular Coucubines was attended with. He invites him to read Hiſtory, to be the more fully convinced that the Ruin of Dynaſties had moſt frequently taken its Riſe from this.

The ſecond Thing which Quang heng recommends to the young Emperor Ching ti, is, the frequent reading of the King, upon which he makes an Encomium. It is, ſays he, a Summary, or an Abridgment of the Words and Actions of the ancient Sages. One cannot enter too deeply into its Meaning: There all the Duties are marked out, both with Regard to Tyen and Man: In ſhort, every thing that a Prince ought to do in order to render his Subjects happy. He ends by exhorting him to acquit himſelf worthily of the (||) great Ceremony which he was ſoon to perform: And to give, by that firſt publick Action, an Idea of what was to be expected from him, in the following Part of his Reign.

I was willing to inſert here the Extract of three Diſcourſes of Quang Heng, the two firſt addreſs'd to the Emperor Ywen ti, and the third to Ching ti his Succeſſor: but I thought I ought not for that reaſon to omit a Piece of another Author under Ywen ti, his Name was Kong yu, on occaſion of a bad Year, addreſs'd this Emperor, exhorting him to imitate the Temperance, Frugality, and Modeſty of the Ancients.

AMONGST the Ancients, every thing was determined by certain Rules: In the Palace of our Emperors, the Number of Women never exceeded nine, and that of the Horſes, eight. The Walls were handſome and in good repair, but without Ornaments. The Wood was clean (*) Quan heng uſes the Expreſſion Sing or Nature. But Ching te ſeou ſays upon this Paſſage; that by this Expreſſion, is underſtood the Nature or Temper thatdepends upon Organs and Matter. He does not ſpeak here of that Nature Sing, or natural Reaſon, which is alſo named the Order or Law of Tyen.

(†) It was, ſays a Gloſs, the Character of Ywen ti.

(‡) The Chineſe ſays literally, tho' you have natural Capacity, Sin, I wiſh that you would add a Heart, Shing. Sin Shing.

(||) It was that, of which Confucius ſays; The End is to honour the ſupreme Lord, or the ſupreme Emperor Shang ti.

clean and ſmooth, but without Sculpture. The ſame Simplicity was obſervable in their Chariots and all their Moveables. The Circumference of their Park was but for a few Leagues, and the Entrance of it free to all Degrees of People. Their Revenue was the Tythe of the Grounds, which was all that ever was paid them. Every Family furniſhed three Days Work of a Man in a Year, and that was all the Average they had. The perſonal Eſtate of the Emperor was a hundred Leagues of Ground: From the reſt he drew the Tythe. Every Family was at its own Eaſe: And theſe fortunate Times are highly celebrated by fine Odes.

In Times more modern, our Anceſtors Kau tſû, Hyau wen, and Hyau king, fell into a pretty cloſe Imitation of Antiquity. Their Women never exceeded Ten, and the Horſes in their Stables a Hundred. The Emperor Hyau wen, approached the moſt near to the ancient Simplicity. His Habits were of a coarſe plain Stuff, and his Breeches of ill dreſt Leather. Never did Gold, Silver, or Carvings appear upon his Moveables. Things are much changed ſince. Not only every Emperor has exceeded his Predeceſſor in Expences, but Luxury has crept into all the Orders of the Empire. The Queſtion now is, who ſhall be moſt richly cloathed, moſt finely accoutred, or who ſhall have the handſomeſt Sword, or the fineſt Sabre. In ſhort, every one without any Ceremony, uſes what before was only proper for the Sovereign to wear. Thus ſhould the Emperor appear to give an Audience, or march out for any Ceremony, were it not for ſome other Circumſtances, he could ſcarce be diſtinguiſhed. This indeed is a great Diſorder, and the worſt of it is, that it is not perceived.

Formerly Chau kong, Prince of Lû, when the Rights of the Emperor were laid before him, that he might be inſpir'd with the Reſpect due to his Sovereign, "How do I act contrary to them," ſays he? He himſelf alone, was blind to his own Conduct. Now a-Days, how many imitate him? The Ta ſû encroaches upon the Chu hew: The Chu hew acts like a petty Emperor, and the Emperor himſelf, a good deal exceeds what Reaſon preſcribes. The Evil is great, and may already paſs as inveterate. But if there is a Remedy, it is you, O Prince, alone that muſt apply it. If there is a Poſſibility to recall former Times? your Example muſt do it. I ſay, if they can be recalled, for according to my ſmall Meaſure of Underſtanding, it appears impoſſible to put things upon the ancient footing. But we ought to come as near them as we can.

As for what regards your Palace as it is at preſent, it is a determin'd Point: You cannot touch it. But you will find, if you pleaſe, enough to retrench from other Things. Formerly, as now, the Kingdom of Tſi wrought the Stuffs and Habits for the Court. Three Officers were expreſsly deputed for this, and they ſupplied the reſt: But then theſe Stuffs and Habits, amounted only to ten great Bales. At preſent, theſe Stuffs employ in the ſame Kingdom, Officers and Workmen without Number. This ſingle Article, amounts annually to ſome ſcores of (*) Wan. The Moveables of Gold and Silver for the Court, are wrought at Shû and Quang han. Theſe are computed to amount to five hundred Wan in the Year. The Expences of the Overſeers of your Work about the Court, and the Workmen, either employed for your Self or the Queen, amount annually to five thouſand Wan: You maintain in your Stables near Ten thouſand Horſes; theſe conſume a great deal of Corn. There goes frequently from your Queen (I have ſeen it my ſelf more than once) Tables, not only rich and well appointed, but even loaded with Veſſels of Gold and Silver. Theſe are Preſents ſhe makes to ſome one or other, and often to People whom it does not become her to treat with ſo much Honour. What will the Amount of your Queens Expences be? I cannot exactly tell; but they muſt be very great. In the mean Time, your People are in Miſery. A great Number of your poor Subjects are dying of Famine. Many Coarſes lie above Ground expoſed to the Dogs; and this too happens, while your Stables are full of Horſes who feed upon Corn, and are ſo plump and wanton, for the moſt Part, that either to take down their Fat or their Mettle, they muſt every Day have a breathing. Ought Things to go thus under a Prince, whom Tyen, [Heaven] by placing on the Throne, has appointed as the Father and Mother of his People? Is that Tyen then become blind?

Theſe exceſſive Expences began properly under (†) Vû ti. He filled his Palace with all the handſome Girls he could gather from all Quarters of his Empire, they amounted to Five thouſand. Under Chau ti, who was young and weak, Ho quang had all the Authority. This Ho quang was ignorant both of Reaſon and Religion. After he had heaped up in the Palace a uſeleſs Maſs of Gold, Silver and Jewels, he made a curious Search after Birds, Fiſhes, Turtles, Oxen, and extraordinary Horſes, Tygers, and even Leopards, with other ſuch wild Beaſts; all to ſupply Ponds and a Menagery, which was in the Inſide of the Palace to divert his Women. An indecent Thing, if ever any was ſo contrary to the Will of Tyen, and I even believe, notwithſtanding of what Ho quang pretended, contrary to the Orders that Vû ti had left him on his Death-bed.

Since that Time, the Evil has increaſed. Under Swen ti the moſt Women were entertained. Such a Chu hew would have had a hundred, and all the rich Men as many. Within Doors, Numbers of Women had ſcarce any other Employment than to bewail their Fate, and to vent a thouſand Imprecations. Without, appeared a Company of uſeleſs Men. An Officer, for Inſtance, of an ordinary Rank, entertained for his Diverſions, ſome Dozens of Comedians. In the mean Time, the People ſuffered: Multitudes died; and one would have ſaid, that all Endeavours had been uſed to people Tombs, and to diſpeople the World. The Court was the Source of this Evil, but it is now become almoſt general. Every one ſets it up as a kind of a Law for himſelf, that that he ſhould follow what had been in Vogue for ſo many Reigns. This is the preſent State of Things, and I cannot think upon it without the moſt ſenſible Grief.

(*) A Wan is 10,000 Ounces of Silver.

(†) This is only to be underſtood with reſpect to the Dynaſty of the Han.

I conjure your Majeſty, to go a little farther back than theſe latter Reigns, to examine with Attention, and to imitate the laudable Frugality of ſome of your Anceſtors, to cut off two Thirds of the Expences of your Court, in Moveables, Habits, and Equipages.

The Number of the Children you may hope for, does not depend upon the Number of your Wives. You may chuſe from among them a Score of the moſt Virtuous, and ſend the reſt off in Search of Huſbands: Forty Horſes are ſufficient for your Stables. Of all the vaſt Parks you now poſſeſs, if you pleaſe, you may reſerve one: Give the reſt to be cultivated by poor People. In a Time of ſuch Miſery and Barrenneſs as the preſent, are not the Retrenchments I propoſe, indiſpenſible Duties? Can you be ſenſible of your People's Sufferings, and not endeavour effectually to remove them? Would that be to anſwer the Deſigns of (*) Tyen? That Tyen, when he makes (†) Kings, does it for the good of the People. His Deſign, doubtleſs, never was, to place a Man in that Station, that he might divert himſelf as he pleaſed. Don't preſume too much, ſays the Shi king, to thoſe who reign, upon what Tyen has done in your Favour. You may meet with a troubleſome Reverſe. To diſcharge the Duty of a King, is not ſo eaſy a Matter. (‡) Shang ti examines you very ſtrictly. Don't divide your Heart.

A Gloſs.] Ywen ti took this Remonſtrance ſo well, that he retrenched his Habits, his Moveables and his Horſes: And forbad that any of the Beaſts in his Menagery to be fed with Fleſh; diſmiſſing all his Comedians; and giving to the People great Part of his Parks.

Under the Emperor Swen ti, when they were Deliberating about the Means of laying up Proviſions for the Armies on the Frontiers: Chang chang propoſed that Criminals, with an Exception of ſome Crimes, might have it in their power to redeem themſelves by Furniſhing a certain Quantity of Grain: Upon this Syau Whang chi, made the following Remonſtrance.

THE People at the ſame time, have in their Hearts two Principles very oppoſite, the one of Good, the other of Evil. They have a Stock of Goodneſs and Juſtice, but they have likewiſe, a Fund of Avarice and Intereſt; againſt both which, they ought to be fortified by Inſtructions and by Laws. Yau, as great a Prince as he was, during the Courſe of his Reign, never could extirpate from the Hearts of his Subjects all Paſſion and all Intereſt: But he took his Meaſures ſo well, that Paſſion and Injuſtice yeilded to Reaſon and Equity. Under the deſtructive Reign of Kyé, Corruption, tho' at the greateſt Height, had never entirely ſtifled in the Hearts of the People, the Principles of Virtue and Equity, but that of Avarice was their Predominant. This is properly the Difference betwixt theſe two Reigns; a Difference, to which thoſe who are intruſted with Rule cannot enough attend.

It is propoſed to your Majeſty, that thoſe convicted of certain Crimes, may be permitted to ranſom themſelves, by furniſhing a Quantity of Corn. This I cannot approve of, for when two Men are equally guilty, why ſhould the one eſcape becauſe he is rich, and the other die becauſe he is poor? Shall the Heinouſneſs of Crimes then no longer be the only Rule of Puniſhment? Shall Poverty and Riches have any Share in it? Are we then henceforward to ſee two Laws eſtabliſhed, where indeed there is but one? This is a Diſorder which muſt infallibly be attended by another. For as ſoon as this Innovation is known, where is the Son, or where is the Brother, that to ranſom the Life of his Father, of his Brother, or any other of his Relations, will not uſe all imaginable Methods to ſave them? Their Hopes of Succeſs will render them blind to Danger: What a Source of new Crimes will this afford? For one Man whoſe Life Money will ſave, there will be ten who will loſe theirs under the Puniſhment. This is, at the ſame Time, to weaken the Love of Virtue and the Force of our Laws. When theſe Baſes of Government are once ruined, I doubt much, if your Miniſters, let them be as able as Chew kong and Chau kong, can ever re-eſtabliſh them.

In former Days, the Granaries of the Prince were open to the Subject, Did they want? He furniſhed wherewithall to ſupply their preſſing Neceſſities. If they were free of all theſe Neceſſities? He allowed his People to live in Plenty. We read in the Shi king theſe Words: Have Pity upon thoſe poor People who ſuffer. Apply yourſelf to ſuccour them preferably to us. In this Paſſage the Princes addreſſed Tyen: And thus the Poet chuſes to expreſs their Goodneſs and Compaſſion for their People. But we find at the ſame Time, a ſuitable return of Zeal on the People's Part for their Sovereign. The Poet makes them ſpeak thus: Water, inſtantly Water; and render fertile the Domain of our Prince; then extend that Bleſſing to our Lands. Tho' our Times fall ſhort of thoſe of the Ancients, the Zeal of your Subjects ſtill ſubſiſts: They are loaded with Duties to ſupply the Exigencies of our Frontiers: A Poll Tax is added to the Tax; your Subjects ſuffer a great deal, and are not inſenſible of their Miſery: Notwithſtanding of which, they make it their Duty to furniſh all the neceſſary Charges. No body remonſtrates againſt theſe; they being, the ordinary Means of providing for the Safety of States. But for the Method that is now propoſed, it is a direct Breach of the Laws: It naturally tends to make ten Men periſh for one, there is no Choice to be made. Your Virtues, Sir, and the Care you have taken for the Inſtruction of your People, have put Things upon ſo good a Footing, that your Government will reflect no Diſhonour upon Yau and Shun; but you would degenerate, ſhould you follow the Council that has been given you.

The Effect of this Diſcourſe.] Swen ti laid this Diſcourſe before Chang-Chang, who notwithſtanding perſiſted in his former Opinion, which drew a Reply from Syau whang chi, wherein he expoſed at large the Inconveniences that had followed upon a like Experiment. This Reply made the Emperor drop the Project of Chang-Chang.

A Remonſtrance of Lyew hyang to the Emperor Ching ti, upon the extravagant Expences he had been at, and which he ſtill continued to lay out upon Interment of the Princes of his Houſe.

SIR; I find in our I king this Maxim, which is principally calculated for Princes. "You live happy; do not forget, your Happineſs may ſoon change. You find yourſelf now ſettled on the higheſt Pinacle of Fortune, remember that you may tumble down." This is the way to render the Repoſe you now enjoy in your own Perſon durable, and to tranſmit the high Station you now fill to the Deſcendants of your Family. A wiſe Prince cannot do better than to examine Hiſtory, and attentively to weigh the different Events which are there pointed out, and to trace back and to ſound their Springs, to diſtinguiſh what is worthy of Praiſe or Blame, that he may the better profit by what he reads. By this he will, at leaſt, have one Advantage, that he can readily point out this Truth, ſo proper to inſpire with a reſpectful Dread; That there never was, till this Day, a Family to which Tyen has for ever aſſured the Empire.

Confuçius reading the Shi king, and coming to a certain Paſſage in the Ode, which is intitled Ven vang; "How terrible, cried he, with a Sigh, are the Judgments of Tyen! And how great is this Truth; That the firſt Care of a Man ought to be, to leave, as an Inheritance to his Deſcendants, a large ſhare of Virtue!" How true is it, that without it, all other Goods are uſeleſs and tranſitory? If Tyen had ordered it otherwiſe, how could Princes have been kept in their Duty? Or how could Subjects have been animated to Virtue? Thus ſpoke Confuçius, in bewailing the Lot of the Wi tſe, and that of the Ing, who were become Subjects of the Chew. Yau himſelf, that wiſe, that virtuous Prince, could not render his Son capable of the Empire, and choſe another for his Succeſſor. Yu and Tang, in Spite of all their Cares, could not perpetuate Virtue in their Houſe, and the Empire paſſed to another Family. How many Changes of Dynaſties have happened ſince that Time! Kau ti, the Founder of yours, ſeeing himſelf Maſter of the Empire, entertained the Thought of removing his Court to Lo yang(A). Lyew king repreſented to him, how needleſs that Expence would be. Kau ti immediately deſiſted, and fixed his Court at Quang chong. There he frequently called to mind the Fates of the Dynaſties of Chew and Tſin. This firſt, ſaid he, had many great Princes, to whom I cannot, I cannot be compared. It has, however, at laſt degenerated, and is now loſt. The laſt had only two Princes, both without Virtue, ſo it was ſoon at an End. Full of theſe Thoughts, he carefully avoided the Faults of Tſin, and applied himſelf, as much as Circumſtances would allow him, to imitate the firſt Chew. In ſhort, during his whole Reign, he was extremely attentive, vigilant, and circumſpect. That wiſe Prince underſtood in its full Extent, what I have cited from Confuçius.

Hyau wen being at(*) Pa lin, in examining the Situation of the Place; finding that on the North Side the Mountain was not very ſteep, appeared very uneaſy and thoughtful: Then addreſſing himſelf to the great Men who were about him, he told them the Reaſons. I am thinking, ſays he, how I may beſt ſecure from Inſults the Tomb of (†) Kau tſû; and I am contriving for that Effect a Pile of the largeſt and hardeſt Stone, with the beſt Cement that can be made.

Chang che ſhi anſwered: "If there is nothing in the Tomb to excite Avarice, if it had all the "Thickneſs and Solidity of Mount Nan, it is the ſame thing, as if it had many Openings. If "there is nothing in it to prompt Avarice, it is ſecure without a Rampart". And, indeed, what has a Prince to dread after Death? But it is otherwiſe with his Family and the State. Their Proſperity and their Ruin depend upon many Things. This demands our Precaution; the little Expreſſion, Chang che ſhi, is full of Meaning: It expreſſes what I would ſay. Hyau wen underſtood it well, and left off his intended Expences.

Formerly, ſay our Books, the Corps of the Deceaſed was cloathed in ſtrong thick Habits, and placed in ſome remote Spot built about with Faggots, without any other Security. Afterwards, ſome wiſe Men judged it requiſite to change this Cuſtom, and brought in Uſe the double Coffin. It is ſaid this Change was made under Whang ti. This Whang ti was himſelf buried under Mount Kyau: As Yau was upon Tſi in. Both their Burials were very frugal, and their Sepulchres no way magnificent. Shun was buried at Tſang û, without any other Attendants but his two Wives. The Place of Yu's Sepulchre is at Whey ki, without ſo much as a Tree growing round it. Where is the Sepulchre of Ching tang, and the other Emperors of his Dynaſty? Neither Hiſtory nor Tradition give us any Light into this Point. Ven vang, Vû vang, and Chew kong, have theirs at Pi. That of Mû kong King of Tſing is at Yong. That of Chu li tſe at Vû kû. All their Tombs are very mean, and it was a wiſe Precaution which theſe Princes took in ordering them to be ſo. With reſpect to their Children or their Subjects, 'twas the Effect of Wiſdom and Piety in them, to conform themſelves to the Royal Intentions. Chew kong was the younger Brother of the Emperor Vû vang. He was intruſted with his Funeral, and defrayed it at a very cheap Rate. Confuçius buried his Mother at Fang, in an old Tomb only four Foot high; but being much damaged by the Rains, the Diſciples of Confuçius not only repaired, but embelliſhed it. Their Maſter underſtanding this, "Alas, cried he, with Tears! Antiquity would not have acted thus."

(A) Now Ho-nan fû in the Province of Ho-nan.

(†) The ſame with Kau ti or Kau whang ti, Founder of the Dynaſty of the Han, and Father to Yen ti, or Hyau wen.

Yen lyu ki tſe making a Journey into the Kingdom of Tſi, his Son who was with him died on the Road as they returned. He cauſed him to be buried in the Habits of the Seaſon in a Grave not very deep, without any more Mold upon him, than was neceſſary to ſhew that a dead Body had been buried in that Spot. This done, he ſaid, weeping for his Son; "It is the Fate of our "Bodies to return to Duſt. It is an unalterable Decree that Rottenneſs ſhall penetrate every where, whatever Precaution we uſe to prevent it." The Place of his Son's Birth was but 100 Leagues diſtant from that of his Death. His Father cauſed him to be buried in the Spot where he died, without being at the trouble to (*) tranſport him to the burial Place of his Family. Confuçius on a Journey, underſtanding what Yen lyu had done and ſaid on this Head; He both approved and commended him, as being well verſed in the Rites. Confuçius was certainly a dutiful Son; Yen lyu an affectionate Father: Shun and Yu loyal Subjects; and Chew kong loved Vû vang as his elder Brother, and honoured him as his Emperor. Yet we ſee that all theſe great Men, as if they had acted in Concert with one another, ſhunn'd Magnificence and Expences in Funerals and upon Sepulchres. Was this Motive a mean Parſimony? Doubtleſs not: Who dares to ſuſpect them of that? But beſides other Conſiderations, they had this one, that they thereby leſs expoſed the Bodies of the Dead to the Inſults of the Living.

The King of Wen acted quite otherwiſe; he erected to his Father, without much regarding the Rites, a Monument equally ſumptuous and proud. Within ten Years he ſaw it demoliſhed and plundered by the People of Ywê; the ſame Thing happened to the five Kings of Tſin, in a Sepulchre where their dead Bodies were interred, together with a good deal of Riches. Theſe Riches were ſeen carried off, and the Remains of their Bodies were left in ſo pitiful a Condition, that one cannot think of it without Horror. At laſt Shi whang, the King of Tſin, becoming Emperor, he choſe for his Sepulchre the Mountain Li, whoſe Foundation he cauſed to dig, if we may ſo ſpeak, even to the (†) Center of the Earth. On its Surface he erected a Mauſoleum which might paſs for a (‡) Mountain. It was 500 Feet high, and at leaſt half a League in Circumference. On the Outſide was a vaſt Tomb of Stone, where one might walk as eaſily as in the largeſt Hall. In the Middle was a ſumptuous Coffin, and all around there were Lamps and Flambeaux, whoſe Flames were fed by human Fat. Within this Tomb, there was upon one Side a Pond of Quick-ſilver, upon which were ſcattered Birds of Gold and Silver: On the other, a compleat Magazine of Moveables and Arms: Here and there were the moſt precious Jewels in Thouſands. In ſhort, the Magnificence and Riches, either of the Coffin, the Tomb, or the Buildings wherein it was placed, is inexpreſſible. He not only expended immenſe Sums upon it, but it coſt him the Lives of a great many of his Subjects. Beſides the People of his Palace who had periſhed there, the Workmen who had been buried alive were counted by (§) Wan. The People no longer able to ſupport this Tyranny, all of a ſudden run to Arms, upon the firſt Signal of a Revolt. Theſe Works upon the Mountain Li were not yet finiſhed, when Chew chang encamped at its Foot; and ſoon after Hang ſi raſed theſe vaſt Walls, burnt theſe beautiful Buildings, penetrated into that proud Monument, carried off all its Riches, and made that Sepulchre a Place of Horror: However the Coffin ſtill remained there. It is ſaid, a Shepherd ſearching in the midſt of theſe Labyrinths for a ſtray Sheep, happened to drop ſome Fire, which caught the Coffin and conſumed it. Surely, never did any Prince carry his Magnificence farther than Shi whang, eſpecially with regard to his Sepulchre. You ſee what are the Conſequences. Can any thing more diſmal be conceived?

But to return. It is plain from Hiſtory, that always where there was moſt Virtue, there was leaſt Pomp, even as to what related to Sepulchres: That thoſe who are acknowledged, by all the World, to have been the moſt underſtanding of the Ancients, were the moſt removed from Pomp: That thoſe who valued themſelves upon their Magnificence on this Point, were ſuch as had no Reputation, either as to Wiſdom or Virtue; and that thoſe who had the ſmalleſt Share of both, always carried this Oſtentation and Magnificence the fartheſt: It appears, that the moſt ſumptuous and the moſt rich Tombs and Myau, were ſoon pillaged and demoliſhed. Can one deliberate, after this, upon the Courſe that he is to follow?

There was a Time, when the Chew beginning to degenerate, gave into Luxury and Expences. The reſt of the Government felt it. Ven Vang, a clear-ſighted Prince, ſucceeded them: He perceived the Cauſe of the Evil: He applied a Remedy: He revived a decent Frugality: And ſet the firſt Example himſelf. This Example had ſuch an Effect, that it put the Government upon a right Footing: His Reign was flouriſhing, and his Poſterity numerous; and it is his Memory which our Shi king, in the Ode Se kan, celebrates. On the contrary, Nyen kong, King of Lû, valued himſelf upon erecting fine Terraſſes, incloſing vaſt Parks, and magnificently adorning the Halls of his Anceſtors. He died without Poſterity, and the (‖) Chun tſyû does not ſpare him. Will any one after this, prefer Pomp to Oeconomy? Your Majeſty, at your Acceſſion, ſhewed your Value for, and gave more than one Proof of, this laſt Virtue. Your Moderation, eſpecially, was admired, in the Conveniencies which you propoſed to make at the ancient Sepulchre of your Family. You ſoon changed that Method in the new Sepulchre, that you have begun at Chang lin. What proud Terraſſes, or rather what laboured Mountains! How many private Coffins have been removed for it! We may count them by ten Thouſands. How much Money has been been expended, and the Charges already amount to more than a hundred Wan. The Dead hate you, the Living endure you, but murmur at you. The Breath of theſe Groans and Imprecations blaſts the Seaſons, and ſterilizes the Ground.

I am a Perſon without Underſtanding, but my way of Reaſoning is this: If the Dead know what paſſes here, ſurely, by diſturbing ſo many Coffins, you make a great many Enemies among them. If the Dead are unconſcious of what is done on Earth, what End can theſe profuſe Expences upon the Sepulchre of one Man, ſerve? Only one, which is, that they attract the Eyes of the Living. But Men of Wiſdom and Virtue, far from approving theſe Expences, only behold them with Regret. A People which is harraſſed, is far from reliſhing ſuch expenſive Leſſons of filial Piety. We ſhall ſuppoſe, that there are ſome Perſons abandoned to Wiſdom and Virtue, whoſe Inclinations lead them to Pomp, that applaud this Undertaking. Is there any thing in ſuch Applauſes that can flatter you? You, Sir, are naturally full of Goodneſs, Sincerity, and Uprightneſs. Your Genius is Superior, and never was there a Prince more capable to reflect a Luſtre upon his Dynaſty, or more cloſely to follow, even the moſt wiſe among our ancient Sages and ancient Emperors. Will you then, on the contrary, imitate the Faults of ſo bad a Prince as Shi whang? Will you, like him, diſregarding the Repoſe and Safety of your Empire, and the Sentiments of every wiſe and virtuous Man, undertake theſe proud and uſeleſs Works? Will you buy, at ſuch a Price, the Applauſe of certain worthleſs Sycophants? Nothing can be more melancholy if you do, nor can I help bluſhing in your behalf. You have many other Patterns to follow; amongſt the Ancients, Whang ti, Yau, Shun, Yû, Tang, Vû vang, Chew kong; amongſt thoſe who are more modern, Vû kong, Yen lyu, Confucius, &c. But without even going ſo far back as them, you find in Hyau wen, who was one of your own Anceſtors, an Example of this Kind, which you ought to follow; and in Shi whang one, which you ought to ſhun. To conclude, I adviſe you to abandon the Works of Chang lin, to fix on the ancient Sepulchre of your Family, and to regulate by the Counſels of all your great Men the Accommodations which ought to be made there.

A Gloſs.] Ching ti, at firſt, appeared touched with this Diſcourſe of Lyew hyang; nevertheleſs he did not follow his Counſel.

Another Remonſtrance of the ſame Lyew hyang, to the ſame Emperor Ching ti, upon his abandoning the Government to the Relations of the Empreſs.

SIR; There is no Emperor, who does not wiſh to maintain in his State good Order and Peace, during his Reign; and who does not propoſe to tranſmit his Crown to his Deſcendants; notwithſtanding of which, great Revolutions are not rare: And it is ſtill more frequent to ſee, at leaſt, dangerous Commotions in States. The moſt ordinary and immediate Cauſe of theſe Misfortunes is attributed, and I believe juſtly too, to Princes giving, or at leaſt permitting too great an Authority to certain of their Subjects. This appears evident in a great Number of Examples which are furniſhed us, by the ancient Book (*) Chun tſyû. In Times nearer our own, Chau vang, King of Tſing, ſaw his Kingdom brought to the Brink of Ruin, by making his Uncles on the Mother's Side, too powerful. However he was happy, in finding two faithful Subjects who ſupported him. Eul ſhi, the Succeſſor of Shi whang, gave himſelf entirely up to Chau kau. This laſt begun, by removing from about his Perſon every one whom he ſuſpected: After which, he freely abuſed his Power. A Revolt ſoon followed; Eul ſhi loſt his Empire and his Life, at once. This Example is not ancient, ſince to this Prince, who was the laſt of the Dynaſty of the Tſin, the Dynaſty of the Han ſucceeded.

But this very Dynaſty furniſhes us with an Example yet more recent: In the ſecond Generation, it ſaw itſelf at the Brink of Ruin. The Lyu, whom the Favour of the Empreſs, a Deſcendant of that Houſe, had raiſed, ſeiz'd the Helm of Government, and all Honours and Employments were engroſſed, either by them or their Creatures. They had the Command of the Troops, both to the North and South; their Pride and their Haughtineſs even exceeded their Power, and they were within one Step of mounting the Throne, which they were ready to take, when the Hew's of Kyang and of Chu hi, ſupported by ſome others of their Character, with a Courage and Zeal worthy of themſelves, oppoſed the Lyu, rooted them out, and confirmed the Throne to the Lyew(†)

The Wang (‡) are at this Time, what the Lyu were before. No leſs than 23 of them are raiſed to the higheſt Honours. One of them, who is Generaliſſimo of your Troops, abſolutely and arbitrarily diſpoſes of every Thing. Five others, who are of the ſame Family of the Lyew, carry their Pride and their Inſolence yet higher. They frequently cloak their Avarice, their Violence, and even ſometimes the moſt mean and the moſt ſhameful Paſſions, under the Pretence of public Good. When this Pretence cannot take Place, they have Recourſe to your and the Empreſs's Name. They make every one ſenſible of the Relations they bear to her, and what ſhe bears to you; and under this Title they attempt every thing. All the firſt Employments of the great Tribunals are filled with their Creatures. Is there any one of their Cabal who applauds them? Does he mount to the firſt Offices? Is there any Unwillingneſs expreſſed, that he ought not to be raiſed in that manner? The Effects of their Vengeance are ſoon felt. Happy is he, to whom it does not coſt his Life. They have in Pay vaſt Numbers of wordy Sycophants, who are always praiſing them every where. Even your Miniſters are in their Intereſt.

(*) This Book cites a great many; but as they are only Names of Men and Countries, I omit them.

(†) Family-Name of the Dynaſty, ſurnamed Han.

(‡) Name of the Family of the Empreſs, Conſort to the Emperor Ching ti.

You

You ſee truly, great Prince, upon what footing theſe Wang are, while the Princes of your Houſe are buried in Obſcurity. Thoſe amongſt them, whom they underſtand to poſſeſs any Degree of Merit, are removed to a Diſtance, by a thouſand Artifices. You are often put in mind, that you may entertain a Diſtruſt of them, of the Examples of the Princes of (*) Yen and Kay-chi: But they take care never once to mention the (†) Lyu and the Ho: In ſhort, never did the Whang ſi, under the Chew; never did the Hew of Yang, under the Tſin; nor the Lyu and the Ho, under the Han, your Predeceſſors, attain to ſo great a Pitch of Power, as have the Wang under your Reign. The ſame State never ſuffers two Powers ſo extremely oppoſite. Either your Houſe is in the utmoſt Danger, or that of the Wang ought to periſh. Remember of whom you are deſcended. Will it not be ſhameful for you to let your Empire paſs to meer Allies, and to reduce thoſe who are of your own Blood, to the moſt vile Conditions? If you have not a due Senſe of your own perſonal Intereſt, ſtudy at leaſt to ſupport the Splendor of your Anceſtors. This touches your own Honour: This touches even the Honour of the Empreſs; for it is a ſettled Rule with the moſt remote Antiquity, that a Woman ought to prefer the Family into which ſhe enters by Marriage, to that from whence ſhe is deſcended. The Security of the Happineſs of States muſt be begun at a Diſtance; and Troubles muſt be prevented before they arrive. By doing otherwiſe all is hazarded.

It is not yet too late if you pleaſe, but if you will believe me, do not delay it. Call near your own Perſon ſuch of the Princes of your Blood as have Merit, and make them enter into a Share of the Government; but above all, truſt the leaſt Part of it to your Allies. Hyau wen excluded them, and his Reign was peaceable. It is the true Intereſt of both Families, that your Allies ſhould be enriched by your Favours, in Conſideration of the Empreſs: That they ſhould have wherewithall to ſupport themſelves in Time to come on a good Footing; but that your Houſe ſhould reign and ſhould govern. This is the Method by which both of them, each according to its own Rank, ſhould continue and flouriſh for many Ages. But if your Majeſty ſhould act otherwiſe, there is all Reaſon to fear, that we may yet in our Days, ſee the tragical Events of which I have ſpoken, and that you will leave to Poſterity a melancholy Memorial of your Reign.

A Gloſs.] Ching ti having read this Remonſtrance, cauſed Lyew hyang to come into his Preſence; and ſhewing by his Sighs that he was very much touched with his Diſcourſe, he told him; You may depend upon it, that I will think upon and provide for every Thing, that you have repreſented to me. Beſides he raiſed him to a conſiderable Poſt in the Government.

Towards the Reign of Ching ti, People gave into all kinds of Superſtitions, and pretended Secrets, particularly into a Search after a kind of Immortality. In the Collection from whence I take theſe Pieces, there is a Diſcourſe of Kû yong, which repreſents to the Emperor the Vanity of theſe Reſearches, and concludes, by deſiring him not to ſuffer any one of theſe Mountebanks to appear at his Court. All his Proof conſiſts of Examples drawn from Hiſtory (‖); ſo that to point it out as I have done, is to give an Abſtract of the Diſcourſe.

A Petition of Mey fu, preſented to the Emperor Ching ti in favour of the Family of Confucius.

PRINCE; It is commonly ſaid, that every one ought to conform himſelf to the Rank that he bears: And that he who acts otherwiſe, is in hazard to diſpleaſe the Sovereign, and to feel the Effects of his Indignation. According to this Maxim, I ought to hold my Peace; and being but a petty Officer, ought not to propoſe any Thing that is conſiderable; but I own this is a Maxim that I cannot approve of. The fear of Puniſhment, and the hopes of raiſing my Fortune, no way affect me. 'Tis true, that if I am ſilent, agreeable to the humble Rank I poſſeſs, I may quietly paſs the Remainder of my Days; but then after my Death, my Body will be no ſooner rotten, than my Name ſhall be forgot. There is no degree of Reſt, and no Pitch of Fortune that I would purchaſe at this Price. My Ambition is not confined to this Life: I endeavour to merit, that after my Death, my Name may be ſeen engraven upon Monuments of Stone, and that my Figure may be ſeen gravely ſitting in a lofty Hall, before which there is a handſome Court. I ſhould be ſenſibly afflicted, ſhould I paſs my Life without being (‡) uſeful to my Country, and thus deſerve to be forgot as ſoon as I am dead.

This is what employs me Night and Day: And this is my Motive for preſenting to you this Petition. It is a common and a true Saying, That to preſerve others is the Means of preſerving one's ſelf, and that to ſhut up the Way to one's ſelf, is to ſhut it up to others; and accordingly every one receives either Reward or Puniſhment, in proportion as he does good or evil. Shi whang deſtroyed the Chew, and ſeized ſix Kingdoms. Under him Virtue was without Honour and without Reward. Under him, the Ceremonies, in honour of the Chiefs of our three famous Dynaſties, were diſuſed. In ſhort, he did all he could to extinguiſh the (§) true Doctrine. Thus he died amidſt Alarms and Troubles; his Son was killed, and with him his Poſterity periſhed. Puniſhments, which perfectly well agree to his Conduct with reſpect to others.

(*) Two Princes of the reigning Family, who had occaſioned ſome Commotions.

(‡) A Gloſs ſays, that he who procures Honours to the great Men of paſt Ages, does real Service to the State.

(§) The Chineſe ſays, Tyen Hyo, the Doctrine of Tyen, or the Celeſtial Doctrine.

Vû vang obſerved a contrary Conduct. Before he deſcended from the Chariot, which ſerved him to gain the Victory, he gave orders to preſerve the Deſcendants of our five Ti. He afterwards made the Prince of Ki, one of the (*) Hya, and the Prince of Song, one of the Ing, that they might be in a Condition to continue the Ceremonies with regard to the Chief of theſe Families, and to ſhew, at the ſame time, that he did not pretend to poſſeſs the Empire, ſo as not to do Good to others. Thus his Family, as a Recompenſe, multiplied ſo exceedingly, that the Number of thoſe who carried the Pictures of their Anceſtors into their Hall, formed, as it were, the Courſe of a fine River. At preſent, the Royal Family Ing, has no direct Heirs which are in Place; and Ching tang who was the Chief, has no body who continues the Ceremonies in his Honour. Is it not for this, that you as yet have no Heir?

According to the Interpretation which Kû lyang gives of a Paſſage of Chun tſyû, Confuçius and his Family are deſcended of the Ing. Your Majeſty would do very well, to honour them with the Title of Succeſſors in Chief to that Royal Family, in order to continue the Ceremonies. It is true, that they deſcend only in a collateral Line, but what does that ſignify? The firſt of a Family who becomes a Prince, becomes thereby Preſident of the Ceremonies; altho' it was formerly the Right of another. A Prince (†) of diſtinguiſhed Merit, tho' born of a Woman of the ſecond Order, is ſometimes juſtly preferred to the (‡) Son of the Wife. Beſides, an ancient Tradition ſays, that the Deſcendants of Perſons of Merit and Virtue, ought never to be without Lands. By much ſtronger Reaſons, thoſe of Confuçius, that eminently wiſe and virtuous Man, and who has the Advantage to be deſcended from the Ing, ought not. Ching vang celebrated the Funeral of the great Chew kong; his Uncle treated him only as a Chu hew. (§) Whang tyen, as it is ſaid, found that to be too little, and teſtified its Reſentment by a great Storm.

At preſent, the Hall of Confuçius is but little honoured, and his Deſcendants are in the Rank of mean People. It is not the Intention of the Whang tyen, that ſo great a Man ſhould not be reſpected in the ordinary Ceremonies, except by People of ſo mean a Condition. Confuçius, without poſſeſſing any Kingdom, had all the Qualities of a great King; for which Reaſon, Kû lyang called him a King without a Kingdom. Your Majeſty then with that Conſideration, can grant to his Deſcendants what I propoſe. Beſides that, I don't doubt but that this good Action will contribute to the Happineſs of your Empire. It is the Means of eternizing your Memory, and my Reaſon is this. Till this time, it has never been the Cuſtom to honour great Men in the Perſons of their Deſcendants: The wiſe Kings your Succeſſors, will follow this Cuſtom, and it will eternally be remembered, that it was introduced under your Reign: Is this a thing to be neglected?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Aim of Mey fû was to illuſtrate the Family of Confuçius, that he might more certainly obtain what he wanted.

The Gloſs.] Ching ti granted to the Family of Confuçius, what Mey fû propoſed.

Under Ching ti, on account of ſome extraordinary Phenomena's, a pretended Aſtrologer, propoſed to ſend a large Army againſt the Barbarians of the North: Adding, that when the Army was on foot, the firſt Officer of Diſtinction, who ſhould commit any Fault, ſhould be put to Death: That thereby the reſt might be ſtruck with Reſpect, and the Barbarians with Terror: That the bad Omens might be averted, and every thing might ſucceed. Ching ti half inclined to this Advice, and aſked the Opinion of Wang kya, who gave it in Writing as follows.

IT is not by empty Words, but by virtuous Actions, that you muſt try to gain the Hearts of the People. Tyen muſt be anſwered and obeyed by a real and ſolid Virtue, and not by a fair Outſide. No, that is not allowed, nor is it indeed eaſy to impoſe upon common People, and far leſs is it either allowable or poſſible to impoſe upon Shang tyen, or to eſcape his (‖) penetrating Sight. When he cauſes extraordinary Phenomenons to appear, it is either to keep Princes in their Duty, or to reclaim them. If they profit by this Warning, and if they ſeriouſly practiſe Virtue, the Minds of the People are ſatisfied, and Tyen obtains his Aim.

As for what certain Talkers ſay, who take Advantage of every thing to enhanſe their own Value, and who petend to ſee in the Stars, the Neceſſity and Succeſs of theſe Expeditions againſt our Neighbours, I am far from finding in their Diſcourſes, the true manner of anſwering and obeying Tyen. On the contrary, I think I ſee the melancholy Prelude of the moſt fatal Revolutions. Nothing, it is true, is more terrible, than to ſee a conſiderable Officer dragged for the leaſt Fault, with his Hands tied behind his Back, to the Gate of the Palace, there to undergo the moſt diſgraceful Puniſhment. But can all this Pomp of Terror hinder it from being ſaid with Truth, that it is always dangerous to ſtir without Neceſſity: And that the Advice of theſe Talkers, was not an Ad-

(*) The Hyau reigned before the Shan or Ing: And the Shan before the Chew, of which Vû vang was the firſt Emperor: Theſe are called the three Dynaſties.

(†) Some eminent Writers complain of this Uſage, and look upon it as an Abuſe.

(‡) The famous Ven vang is ranked in this Number, but it is always cried out againſt; and it is pretended, that it is ſcarce ever done without very bad Conſequences.

(§) The Character Whang is never applied but to the Emperor, and Tyen, as we have many times obſerv'd, to Heaven.

(‖) The Senſe of the Chineſe Expreſſion is Shin, which ſignifies Spirit, ſpiritual, impenetrable, all at once.

Advice to be followed. As for me, all that I ſee in the Councils given you, are either Flatteries in order to engage you in Enterprizes that are really very dangerous: Or, frivolous Reaſons founded upon new Conjectures, in order to induce you to an extravagant Severity. Is there any thing more capable to ſpoil the moſt Virtuous Prince, than Flattery? Is there any thing more ready to attract the Hatred and Curſes of the Subjects, than Expeditions, that are as hazardous as they are unneceſſary?

As for theſe trifling Reaſonings that are founded upon vain Conjectures, they viſibly wound the true Doctrine. And the extravagant Severity with which, by this Means, they would inſpire you, is diametrically oppoſite to Clemency and Gentleneſs; Virtues, upon which the greateſt Princes have always valued themſelves. Formerly Mû kong, King of Tſing, preferred the Advice of a certain Talker, to the wiſe Councils of his wiſe General Pe li lu; this coſt him the entire Ruin of his Army. Mû kong then openly acknowledged his Fault, but it was too late, for his Army was defeated: Believe me, that the Quality which bids faireſt to render a Prince famous in after Ages, is the Faculty of diſcerning thoſe who would impoſe on his Judgment, and his Care not to give into the Advice of People, who are without Experience, and without Wiſdom. Your Majeſty may be convinced of this, by reading Hiſtory: To which I adviſe you as much as poſſible: And I conjure you above all, never to take the firſt Advice that is offered, without a due Examination.

The Emperor Ngay ti had a Favorite, whoſe Name was Tong hyen, whom he loaded with Honours and Riches: This made every body repine at his Conduct. Wang kya upon this, made a Remonſtrance to the Emperor: Wherein, having laid before the Emperor, a full Account of the Favours he had heaped upon Tong hyen: Together with the Riches, the Pride, and the Vanity of that Favorite: He gave an Inſtance of two Perſons, who by a like Bounty, were raiſed under other Reigns, and whoſe Fortune had ſo far intoxicated them, that they threw the State into Confuſion, and likewiſe ruined themſelves. He concluded, with preſſing the Emperor to weigh theſe two Examples, and other Inſtances of paſt Ages, and to moderate his Favours with Regard to Tong hyen; were it for no other Reaſon, but for the good of that Favorite, whom theſe extravagant Favours could not fail to hurt. The Hiſtory ſays, that this Remonſtrance by no means pleas'd Ngay ti, whoſe Affection for Tong hyen was not at all diminiſhed: That notwithſtanding, he was aſhamed to act openly againſt the Remonſtrance; he took an indirect Method of increaſing the Riches of his Favorite. The Empreſs Conſort produced an Ordinance, either real or ſuppoſitious, by which the Empreſs Dowager left to Tong hyen an Eſtate, containing 2000 Families: This Ordinance was ſent to Wang kya the Miniſter of State, in order to put it in Execution. Wang kya immediately ſealed it and ſent it to the Emperor, with a ſecond Remonſtrance, which is as follows.

IT is a common and a true Saying, that Tyen is the Maſter of Dignities and Lands. Thus the Shi king ſays, when it ſpeaks of Sovereigns. "Tyen deputes under his Commands, a ca-"pable and a virtuous Man." In this Reſpect therefore, they who reign are in Tyen's Place. What then is more proper to inſpire them in their Diſtribution of Favours and Graces, with a ſerious Attention and a reſpectful Dread? Whoever therefore miſplaces them, is almoſt always puniſhed with the Murmurs and Curſes of the People, by the Diſorders of the Seaſons, by epidemical Diſeaſes, and ſuch like Plagues. No Man can be more alarmed than I am, to ſee on the one Hand, your Majeſty in a bad ſtate of Health, and on the other, the exceſſive Favours you heap upon a Minion, by laviſhing on him the higheſt Titles, by draining your Treaſures, and fearing, if I may ſo ſay, that they will not be ſufficient for him: In ſhort, in ſome meaſure, by degrading yourſelf, and ſtooping to raiſe him.

Hyau wen, one of your Anceſtors, was anxious to raiſe a certain Terraſs. But upon a Computation of how much it would coſt him, altho' the Sum was but moderate, and not above a hundred (*) Kin, yet he gave up his Project, notwithſtanding of his Inclination. Hyen your Favorite underſtands better Things. It is not rare to ſee him, tho' a Subject, draw out of the Royal Treaſury a thouſand Kin, in order to gratify ſome Family. This is what has not been ſeen ſince the moſt remote Antiquity: For this Reaſon, he is curſed all over the Empire. There is a Proverb in Country Places; That the Man who is pointed out with the Finger, never dies of a Diſeaſe. I tremble for Tong hyen; yet I underſtand, that an Order of the late Empreſs is produced, by which the Miniſters of State and others, are commanded to put him in Poſſeſſion of what formerly was the Eſtate of three Hew. For my ſhare, I am inclin'd to believe, that theſe late Earthquakes, theſe Rockings of the Mountains, and Eclipſes of the Sun, are ſo many Advices given you, not to raiſe the Subject above the Sovereign. Hyen, who has been for a long time overloaded with your Favours, has been ſeen inſolently to diſdain them, and when he had received Lands from you, to demand an Exchange: But after having obtained it, to return inceſſantly to the Charge, and fatigue you with new Demands: He being always importunate and inſatiable, and you always eaſy and condeſcending to his Deſires and Caprices: This has been obſerved for a long time. But as nothing is more contrary to the Reſpect that is due to you, and to the Good of your State, there is not one of your good Subjects, who does not behold it with Grief.

Your Health is precious, and you have as yet no Heir. Theſe Circumſtances demand of you a ſingular Application to gain the Heart of Tyen, to render yourſelf amiable to your Subjects, and thereby thereby to deſerve his auſpicious Protection. Yet this is what you do not in the leaſt think of; being entirely employed in making the Fortune of one Subject, you forget all the reſt, and even your own Health. Whence can it proceed, that you are ſo inſenſible of what ſupported Kau tſû in ſo many Exploits, I mean, the Deſire and Hopes of perpetuating the Throne in his Family? The Book (*) Hyau king ſays: " If there are at the Court of a Prince ſeven Officers truly zealous, and who have Courage enough to make reſpectful Remonſtrances upon occaſions, tho' that Prince be a little irregular in his Conduct, he will not, for all that, loſe his Crown." If I preſume at preſent, to ſend back to your Majeſty this Ordinance ſealed up, it is not becauſe I fail in my Reſpect to theOrders of the Court, nor that I court my own Ruin by offending you; it is becauſe I dare not produce it; it is becauſe for the Honour of your Majeſty, and the Good of your Eſtate, I am very much afraid, leaſt it ſhould come to the Ears of the Public: All I do, and all I ſay, is not in order to raiſe my own Value, or to make a Shew of my Zeal to your Majeſty. Be pleaſed to examine yourſelf, what other Motive could engage me to make theſe reiterated Remonſtrances, notwithſtanding of the Danger to which they expoſe me.

The Emperor Kang hi praiſes theſe two Remonſtrances of Wang kya, eſpecially the one I have now tranſlated: Several other Authors are cited, ſome dead, others living, who praiſe this Piece. Wang kya periſhed, but not entirely for theſe Remonſtrances, but for ſome other Affair which Tong hyen's Vengeance had raiſed againſt him. He was thrown into Priſon, where it is ſaid, he was ſtarved to Death. His melancholy Fate, ſtopped the Mouths of all the other zealous Subjects.

Under the Emperor Ngay ti, Tan yu a Tartar Prince to the North Weſt of China, wrote a Letter of Submiſſion, begging the Emperor's Permiſſion to come in Perſon, and to pay him his Homage. The greater Part of the Miniſters and Officers of State, looked upon this Requeſt as an Occaſion of a great, but uſeleſs Expence. Yang yong was of another Opinion, and preſented a Remonſtrance to the Emperor on that Head, where he lays before him at large, all the Troubles that theſe People had occaſioned ſince the Days of the Tſin. Repreſenting at the ſame time, that it was both for the Honour and Advantage of China, that theſe People ſhould ſubmit. He adds, that the Propoſal of Tan yu could not be rejected without irritating him, in which caſe, the Emperor muſt feel the Effect of it for a long Time. The Emperor, upon this Remonſtrance, accepted the Propoſal of Tan yu, and ſent him his Permiſſion for what he wanted. In the Book from which theſe Pieces are extracted, ſome Reflections, which an ancient Author named Hû yu, made upon the Events treated of in this Piece, are inſerted in the Margin.

A good many of our Emperors, ſays that Author, ſeeing every thing quiet at Home, have endeavoured to make Conqueſts abroad; and have valued themſelves upon ſubmitting thoſe People, which the former Dynaſties could not ſubdue. Such amongſt others was, Vû ti one of the Han, who during thirty Years, employed vaſt Armies againſt his Neighbours to the North Weſt, but without Succeſs. On the contrary, under the Reigns of Swen ti, Ywen ti, Ching ti, and Ngay ti, Princes, who never troubled their Head about making Conqueſts, theſe People ſubmitted themſelves, particularly in the time of Ngay ti, under whoſe Reign the Dynaſty Hû was much decay'd: (‡) U ſun paid him Homage according to the Rites, and more than Fifty petty Princes of the weſtern Kingdoms, had Seals which they received from our Emperor.

Tho' nothing, in Appearance, was more glorious, or more advantagious for China, for my Share, when I conſider it in that Situation, I compare it to a great Tree which ſhoots forth large Branches and thick Leaves, but whoſe Trunk and Root the Worms devour. The Tree, notwithſtanding of its beautiful Appearance, is in great Danger. Thus, our wiſe Kings of Antiquity, applyed themſelves carefully to regulate their Empire well at Home: This they made their principal Study, and were far from neglecting it, in order to form Deſigns abroad. O! How well did theſe great Men underſtand Matters?

Kong quang, a Miniſter under Ngay ti, propoſed to that Prince, to deſtroy the Palaces of ſuch of his Anceſtors, whoſe Times and Ranks were paſſed. This Propoſition appeared in general, reaſonable. All the Difficulty was, with Reſpect to the Palace of the (§) Hya vû, upon which there were different Opinions. Quan le, Pong ſwen, and ſome others, were of Opinion, that it ſhould be deſtroy'd, ſaying, that tho' Hyau vû was a very great Prince, and tho' the Empire owed him great Obligations, yet his Time being expired, according to the Degrees both of Succeſſion and Relation, his Palace ought to be deſtroyed. Lyew hing, Wang ſhun, and ſome others, were of a contrary Sentiment. They preſented upon that Head, a ſhort Diſcourſe to the Emperor. It conſiſted entirely in crying up the Reign of Hyau vû, who according to them, and to Hiſtory, was a very great Prince, and particularly a great Conqueror. They ended, by ſaying, that the (†) King determined nothing ſo clearly with Reſpect to the Number of Degrees, but that their Palaces might yet ſtand. They ſhewed by ſome Examples, that they have ſtood for ſeven Generations at one time: Ngay ti followed this laſt Advice, and the Palace of Hyau vû was preſerved.

Ping ti ſucceeded Ngay ti, but reigned only a ſhort Time. Vang pwen poſſeſſed himſelf of the Throne, and the Dynaſty of the Han was interrupted for upwards of twenty Years, Syew, otherwiſe called Wen ſhû, Grand-ſon of Kau tſu, reſtored it in the ninth Generation: And the Han having remounted the Throne, poſſeſſed it for upwards of 200 Years. This Reſtorer of the Dynaſty of the Han, has been Surnamed Quang vu.

In the 27th Year of his Reign, ſome body preſented a Memorial to him, to engage him to make War upon the Barbarians in the North Weſt: Which Propoſition he anſwered in the following Declaration.

I REMEMBER, that I have often read in the Whang ſhe kong, that what is flexible, altho' it appears weak, carries it from what is ſtiff and ſtrong. This is an Alluſion which lets us ſee, that what is called Force and Power, ought to yeild, and in effect does yeild, to Gentleneſs and Virtue. Thus it is uſually ſaid, When a Prince is virtuous, that which contributes to his Pleaſure, contributes to that of his People. On the contrary, when a Prince is without Virtue, his Pleaſures are of ſuch a Nature, as cannot be reliſhed by the Subjects. It is added with Reaſon, that the Pleaſures of the firſt Kind are durable, but thoſe of the ſecond Sort, are ſhort liv'd and fatal to the Enjoyer. The Prince who ſeeks to meddle in foreign Affairs, fatigues himſelf to no purpoſe. He who confines himſelf to thoſe at Home, eaſily brings them to a happy Period. Is a Prince in Peace? People attach themſelves to him: Are his Affairs perplexed? They take Occaſion to raiſe a thouſand Storms againſt him. Thence proceeds this Maxim, that the Prince who endeavours to extend his Territories, renders them deſart and barren: He who endeavours to grow in Virtue, ſees, that, at the ſame time, his Strength encreaſes. Is a Prince content with what he has? He can preſerve it without great Trouble. But would he invade the Property of others? He labours for his own Hurt and Deſtruction. Victories of that kind, are at the Bottom real Defeats. My Government is as yet very imperfect: My Empire is frequently ſubject to public Calamities: My poor People have Difficulty to ſubſiſt themſelves, and paſs their time very poorly: What ſhall become of them, if by ill timed Undertakings, I ſhould encreaſe their Miſeries.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] (*) Quang vû had been long at the Head of Armies, he knew well, how much the People ſuffered by War: So that it is not at all ſurprizing, that he took Care not to engage them needleſsly in it.

A Gloſs.] After this Declaration, no body preſumed to adviſe Quang vû to any Project of War.

Ming ti, the fourth Son of Quang vu, ſucceeded him. When he was (†) Tay tſe, he had Wen yong for his Preceptor, who being infirm, petitioned to be allowed to retire from Court. Ming ti, who was now Emperor, anſwered the Petition of Wen yong in a Writing, which I am now to tranſlate.

I HAVE had the Pleaſure to ſtudy under you from my Child-hood, for during nine Years Notwithſtanding of your Cares, I am yet a Man without Judgment, and without Underſtanding. Our five King are Extenſive: The Words of our ancient Sages are full of Myſteries and deep: It is all that forms a Genius of the firſt Order, to be able to penetrate to their Bottom: This is far above the Capacities of a Man, without Genius and without Abilities, like me. Your Aſſiſtance can yet be of great Uſe to me, and I am very ſenſible, how little I deſerve what you are ſo complaiſant as to tell me, when you aſk Permiſſion to retire. Others, beſides you, have uſed ſuch Terms to their Diſciples, but theſe Diſciples were, in effect, able Men, who had perfectly comprehended our King. Beſides, they were obliged to leave their Maſter by indiſpenſible Duties, and by Family Affairs. They gave him Teſtimonies of their Grief, which he anſwered by the Marks of Eſteem, which every one of them deſerved. As for me, I am far from deſerving thoſe which you beſtow upon me in your Petition. But ſince you abſolutely deſire to be gone, I dare not preſume to hinder you: I only recommend to you, to take care of your weak State of Health, and to ſpare nothing for that Effect, and in ſhort, to put a due Value upon your own (‡) precious Perſon.

Chang ti ſucceeded his Father Ming ti: In the ſecond Year of his Reign, there was a great Drought. His Adviſers attributed this Calamity, to his not raiſing the Relations of Empreſs Dowager. So it was immediately propoſed to the Emperor that they ſhould be raiſed, but this was oppoſed by the Empreſs Dowager, who cauſed the following Declaration to be publiſhed

THESE Talkers who attribute the Drought to my Relations being without Dignities, talk thus, either to flatter me, or from ſome other ſecret Motive. What they ſay, is without any Foundation; (§) Five Brothers of an Empreſs were made Hew in one Day: But this did not produce the leaſt Rain. Every one knows how many Commotions the Relations of the Empreſſes (*) Quang vû himſelf, in a Letter to one of his Officers, ſays: I have been ten Years in the Army, and have no reliſh for empty Compliments.

(†) Tay, ſignifies great, very great: Tſe, ſignifies a Son. To theſe two Characters, is commonly joined the Character Whang, and then they ſay Whang tay tſe, to expreſs that Son of the Emperor, who is appointed his Succeſſor.

preſſes have occaſioned under other Reigns; for which Reaſon, the Emperor and I judged it convenient, that my Relations ſhoud have no ſhare in the Government. I have often told this to my Son, who is the preſent Emperor, and yet he is preſſed to raiſe the (*) Ma upon the footing of the (†) Yu; Is that reaſonable? I have the Honour to be Empreſs, that is to ſay, (‡) Mother of the Empire. The Cloaths that I wear, are of Silk, but they are plain and without Embroidery. My Table is neither magnificent nor delicate. My Servants are cloathed with the moſt common Stuffs: And I am at no Expences, either in Ornaments or Perfumes. My View in this, is chiefly to ſet a Pattern to my Relations, that I may induce them to do the ſame. But inſtead of imitating my Conduct in this, I know that they make it a ſubject of their Raillery, and look upon my Frugality and Modeſty, as the Effect of ſordid Parſimony. Not long ſince, I paſt by the Gate called Yo long, where I met one of my Relations: Having ſtopt a little to aſk his News, I ſaw in his Train, a long Rank of Chariots together with a light and a numerous Troop of Horſemen, every one of which ſeemed to be a flying Dragon. His meaneſt Domeſtics were all richly cloathed. As my Servants and his were too near, I did not care to put myſelf into a Paſſion, or to give him a public Reprimand. But in order to bring him to himſelf, I took care, without telling him for what Reaſon, to cut of his Appointments for a whole Year. Notwithſtanding of this, I did not ſee that he endeavoured to reform himſelf, or that he ſhewed that he was ſenſible of the public Calamities. It is ordinarily ſaid; Who ſhall know the Subjects but the Prince? And indeed, I know my Relations and Servants better than any other. No! Whatever may be ſaid on this Subject, I will never abandon the wiſe Views of the late Emperor, or degenerate from the Virtue of my (§) deceaſed Father. I will take care not to renew the thing that has once already overthrown the Dynaſty of the Han.

The Emperor Ching ti, after having read over and over again, with great Sighs, this Declaration of the Empreſs Dowager, renewed his Inſtances with her, in the following Terms.

IT has for a long time, been uſual to make the Sons of the Emperor Vang or Kings, and the Brothers of the Empreſs, Hew. The one Cuſtom is as well eſtabliſhed as the other. Your Modeſty and Diſintereſtedneſs, certainly do you a great deal of Honour. But why would you hinder me from being as liberal and as beneficial, as any of my Anceſtors? Of three Uncles by the Mother whom I would make Hew, one is aged, and the other infirm. What Conſequences then are to be dreaded? If you do not yeild, I own to you, it will give me great Pain. So I beg that you would inſtantly conſent, that it ſhould be done.

The Empreſs anſwered her Son's Inſtances, by the following Declaration.

IT was not upon ſlight Grounds, and without due Deliberation, that I made my former Declaration. I am far from endeavouring to ſet up my Modeſty in Prejudice of your Liberality. What I have in View, is the real and the ſolid Good of both Houſes. Formerly the Empreſs (||) Tew propoſed, to make the elder Brother of the Empreſs (+) Wang, a Hew. Kau tſû, ſays Ya fû, in oppoſing this, made a Regulation, that none ſhould be raiſed to this Dignity, but a Perſon of the reigning Family, or of ſome Families, from which the reigning Family has had great Obligations. But what great Services have the Ma performed that they ſhould now be put upon the ſame footing with the Yu? Beſides, it is with Families that are raiſed and enriched in ſo ſhort a time, as with certain Trees, that are made to bear twice in a Year: This cannot laſt. In ſhort, I ſee but two Reaſons that can induce a Family to wiſh for Riches and Plenty: The one is, to do honour to their Anceſtors, by being in a Condition to acquit themſelves of the Ceremonies that are appointed on their Account: The other is, that they themſelves may live comfortably and happily. My Brothers have taſted more than ſufficiently of your Favours, to make them to do this: What Occaſion is there for them to have an Appennage? I oppoſe it once more, and I have ſeriouſly weighed it. Give over your Jealouſies and your Uneaſineſſes on that Account. The moſt ſollid Mark of Piety which I can give to my Anceſtors is, in ſecuring the Fortune of my Brothers, by checking its Growth. We are in dangerous Times. Corn is at an exceſſive Price; and the People are miſerable: This employs and afflicts me Night and Day. At ſuch a melancholy Juncture, ought I to be thinking to raiſe my Relations, and to ſacrifiſe to them, what I owe to the Empire; I who am its Mother? No! Speak no more of it to me; my natural Temper is well known: I am firm in my Reſolutions, and it is fruitleſs to irritate me by an obſtinate Reſiſtance. If we ſhall ſee happier Times when Peace and Plenty ſhall be diffuſed over all, then I will confine my Cares to my Grand-ſon: I will meddle no more in Government, let my Son act as he pleaſes.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] After praiſing the Wiſdom, Firmneſs, and Reſolution of this Princeſs; ſhe reflected, ſays he, upon the fine Inſtructions and Examples of her Father. Her Vigilance and Zeal, may ſerve as a Rule and a Mirror to the Empreſſes of all Ages.

Chong ti, one Day, entertaining the great Officers of his Guard in one of his Apartments to the South; in his Way thither, he happened to paſs through a large Hall, where the Habits and Moveables, which had been uſed by the Empreſs Quang lye, the Wife of his Grand-father Quang vû, lay. He ſeemed to be touched with ſeeing this, and changed Colour immediately; and he that inſtant ordered, that a Habit of Ceremony for each Seaſon, and upwards of fifty Trunks full of ordinary Habits ſhould be reſerv'd. He diſtributed all the reſt among the Vang, ſending each of them that which he had allotted him. He did more for the Vang of Zong ping who commanded the Frontiers. He accompanied his Preſent with a Letter, of which the following is a Tranſlation into our Language.

THE great Officer who came from you, has inſtructed me in every thing with Regard to you. I immediately gave him Audience, and approved of all your Steps. Notwithſtanding of the Diſtance I am from you, I frequently employ my ſelf in your Troubles and Labours: And you cannot believe with how much Sadneſs and Uneaſineſs I do it.

One of theſe Days, when I was to treat the Officers of my Guard, in an Apartment to the South, as I was going there, I paſt by the Hall, where the Things, which formerly Quang lye wore, were kept. Confuçius ſays: When we ſee any thing that has been worn by a Perſon whoſe Memory has been dear to us; and if that Perſon is no more, the Sentiments of Tenderneſs and Grief, naturally ariſe in our Hearts. I have proved the Truth of this on this Occaſion; you are too good a (*) Son, and too faithful a Friend, not to feel the ſame thing, when you receive the Preſent that I have ſent you, which is a Trunk full of the Habits which the Empreſs Quang lye has left behind her, together with the Ornaments of her Head: This, perhaps, will be ſome Comfort to you at the Time, when your Grief for the Loſs of her, may be greateſt. Your Deſcendants may hereby, likewiſe, ſee the Faſhions of the Habits of the Empreſs in our Times. The Family of Confuçius, as yet, preſerve his Chariot, his Chaiſe, his Bonnet, and his Shoes. Such is the Force of Wiſdom, that when it is eminent, it renders itſelf long agreeable. It would be natural at the ſame time, to ſend you ſomething which had belonged to Quang vû: But in the ſecond of the Years, named Chong ywen, all that he left behind him, was divided among all the Wang: I only augment my Preſent, with a Horſe from the Country of the (†) Wan. This Animal has ſomething ſingular about him, in that he bleeds at a little Hole, which he by Nature has upon his Shoulder. A Song, made under Vû ti, celebrates a certain Horſe, called Celeſtial, and which, as it is ſaid, Seated Blood. There is ſomething reſembling this, in the Horſe I ſend you. Alas! While I am writing you this, perhaps you are actually haſtening to ſtop ſome Incurſion, or to maintain the Poſts which our Troops poſſeſs. I frequently think on your Alarms and Fatigues, and am perfectly ſenſible of them. I recommend it to you, that you ſhould treat yourſelf well, and take care of your Health. I (‡) long much to ſee you ſoon.

Kyang ke, who was originally of Tſi, was poor, but virtuous. He more particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Piety towards his Mother, who was a Widow. All the Neighbourhood praiſed him ſo much to the Magiſtrates, that the Emperor being informed of it, made him a (§) Ta fû. Kyang kê becoming infirm, obtained Permiſſion to retire to his own Country: But he was not forgotten in his Abſence; Chang ti gave an Order in his Favours, conceived in the following Terms.

SOME time ago, one of the Ta fû, named Kyang kê, retired on Account of an Illneſs. I wiſh very much, to be informed about his Health. Filial Piety, which is the Foundation and Principal of all the Virtues, is likewiſe, as it were, their Crown. Kê, of all my Subjects, has diſtinguiſhed himſelf moſt in this Reſpect. When this Order comes to Hand, let him receive out of the Royal Granaries, a thouſand Meaſures of Corn. On the eighth Moon of every Year, let the Magiſtrate of each Place, give him Wine and a Sheep, and enquire from me about his Health. (‖) If any thing happens to him, let an Animal of the ſecond Order, be employed in the ordinary Ceremonies.

Ho ti, the fourth Son of Chang ti, ſucceeded him. When he mounted the Throne, the Empreſs his Mother, agreeable to the Intentions of the deceaſed Emperor, publiſhed the following Declaration.

THE Emperor Hyau vû, being to puniſh the (†) U and the Ywe, in order to ſupply the Expences of War, impoſed a Tax on Salt and Iron. The Invaſions of the Barbarians ſince that time, have been ſo frequent, that this has been continued ever ſince. The late Emperor ſtudied to diminiſh the Impoſts and Taxes. As for that upon Salt and Iron, finding it had been eſtabliſhed for a long time, and he himſelf not being free of the Apprehenſions of a War, he thought it not convenient to touch them. But Experience has let us ſee, that by the bad Management of the Commiſſaries, the People have been very much diſtreſſed; and yet the State has reaped no great Advantages. This gave him a ſenſible Pain, and induced him on his Death-bed, to order that the Tax on Salt and Iron ſhould be aboliſhed; and to give both of them up to the People;

(*) The Vang [or Wang] of Tong pang, was likewiſe Grand-ſon to Quang vû.

People; reſerving however, certain Rights payable to the ordinary Magiſtrates of the Place, according to the ancient Cuſtoms. In conſequence of that Order, we make the preſent Declaration, ordaining, that it be publiſhed throughout all the Empire, ſo that every one knowing our Intentions, may conform thereto.

Shang ti, an Infant three Months old, ſucceeded to Ho ti. The Empreſs was Regent. In the Book from which theſe Pieces are taken, there is one of that Princeſs; the Subſtance of which is as follows:

She bewails the Corruption of Manners, which ſhe attributes to the little Application that was beſtowed in ſtudying the King. She invites Perſons of Reputation, to inſtruct the Princes and Princeſſes of the Blood, of whom there were upwards of forty, each above five Years of Age. Several Schools were appointed with very good Maſters, over whom this excellent Princeſs watched with great Care. She did the ſame to the young People of her own Family.

Vû ti, firſt Emperor of the ſeventh Dynaſty, which was called (*) Tſin, recommends it to his Subjects, that they ſhould adviſe him freely.

THE moſt difficult Part of an Officer's Duty, is to make Remonſtrances to his Prince. If the Prince is difficult on this Head, he ſtops the Mouth of his moſt zealous and faithful Officers. This is what I cannot think of, without ſending up profound Sighs. I have formerly, by an expreſs Declaration, recommended to my Subjects that ſhould freely give me thoſe Advices, which they ſhall judge to be uſeful to me. In effect, I am reſolved to profit by them, as much as I can. To encreaſe this Liberty, I declare as follows. If a Remonſtrance is good and ſound at Bottom, tho' it is but in a homely Dreſs, and even, tho' there may be an inconſiderate Expreſſion in it; I will, that it be not imputed as a Crime to the Author, but that ſuch ſhall be wink'd at and pardoned. And that all the Empire may know, that People may now give Advice, without any Danger, I ordain, that Kong ſhau, and Ki mû fû, who were ſo much wanting in their Reſpect to my Perſon, be releaſed.

Kyen ywen ti, another Emperor of the ſame Dynaſty, undertook to reduce (†) U, and nominated Kyau yang kû General of his Troops, honouring him with ſeveral Titles: And amongſt others, with that of Kay fû. The latter, in order to excuſe himſelf, preſented the following Diſcourſe.

YOUR Majeſty, by a new Exceſs of Bounty, deſigns to put me at the Head of your Armies; and at the ſame time, to honour me with the Title of Kay fû, &c. I read that Order with Reſpect and Acknowledgment; but, in the ten Years ſince I firſt began to ſerve you, I have had but too many honourable and important Poſts. I know of how little Value I am, and how little deſerving the Poſts, with which your Majeſty has honoured me. And I deſerve yet leſs, thoſe with which you would now honour me. I likewiſe know, how great a Crime it is, for one to abuſe his Prince's Favour too long; theſe Thoughts employ me Night and Day; inſpire me with a juſt Dread, and turn thoſe Honours with which you load me, into Matter of Sadneſs. It is a Saying of the Antients; To receive the greateſt Honours and the largeſt Penſions, without having a well known Merit, and without having done very important Services, is to preclude from great Employments, thoſe who are capable of them; and to fruſtrate thoſe who have done great Services, of the Reward which they have deſerved. By Favour of an Alliance, I have been raiſed enough already, and perhaps too much. Your Majeſty ought to take care; and yet I ſee by an Effect of your Bounty, you deſign new Employments for me, and new Titles, yet more Illuſtrious. As I have not deſerved them by my Services, I dare not accept of them. That would be to diſhonour my high Rank, and at the ſame time, to expoſe me to a fatal Down-fall. I have been for ſome time thinking upon retiring, that I may guard the Tomb of my deareſt Father. But how can I do this, when I have theſe Poſts? I fear, leaſt I ſhould diſpleaſe you, if I ſhould refuſe your Favours. But on the other Hand I think, that I would do ill to accept of them. It is a Maxim of Antiquity, that one ought to know to circumſcribe himſelf, and eſpecially, a great Officer ought to take care to ſtop where he ought. This Maxim appears to me ſo eſſential, that notwithſtanding of my Defect of Virtue, I have it very much at Heart, to follow it. Within theſe eight Years, your Majeſty omitted nothing to draw Men of Merit to your Court, where you gave Employments to them all. But I do not ſee, that the Succeſs has anſwered your good Intentions. There is a great Likelihood, that many Men of Merit live in Obſcurity and Oblivion: That others are not advanced in Proportion to their Services: Notwithſtanding of this, if I am raiſed to new Honours and new Employments, can I accept of them without bluſhing?

I have been in Poſt this long time, notwithſtanding of my little Merit; but after all, I am far ſhort of the Rank, in which your exceſſive Goodneſs would now place me. Allow me, to mention ſome People, who are a great deal more deſerving than me. Li hi, Tſeng chi, and Li yun, are Perſons worthy of your Choice. The firſt, who is already Ta fû, joins to a perfect Diſintereſtedneſs, extended Views, an unſhaken Integrity, and a venerable Gravity. The ſecond, who is Ta fû likewiſe, watches with a ſingular Attention over his Actions, and never ſuffers the leaſt indecent Liberty; he is a Man in his perſonal Character, who is without Reproach, and who lives

(*) I write Tſin, not Tſing; tho' it ought to be done, in order to diſtinguiſh it from that Dynaſty, of which Shi vohang was Founder. Theſe two Chineſe Characters are quite different.

(†) The Name of a Kingdom which compoſed part of the Empire, but had revolted from the Dynaſty of the Tſin.

without ſoothing his Paſſions, or being contaminated with the Guilt of others, lives well with all the World. The third, who is likewiſe Ta ſû, is a Man, as underſtanding and diſintereſted as the other two, and beſides that, has an eaſy Air, and a great Simplicity of Manners. Theſe three great Men are grown old at Court; where they have always lived and ſerved with Honour. They have filled ſeveral Poſts, but their Families are far from being Rich. To prefer me to theſe great Men, would be to baulk the Expectations of all the Empire. I am ſo far from aſpiring beyond my Capacity, that I am thinking upon retiring, and I am reſolved to do it in a ſhort Time. The preſent State of your Affairs, obliges me to defer it a little. But permit me, and I beg it as a Favour, not to accept of your new Honours. Allow me to confine myſelf to the Station in which I am, and to repair to the Poſt upon the Frontiers, where my too long Abſence, may have already occaſioned bad Conſequences.

A Gloſs.] The Emperor did not yeild to the Excuſes of Yang kû, who was indeed a Man of great Merit, and beſides that, Twin Brother to the Empreſs. He was therefore made General, and in leſs than two Years he reduced U, which till that time, had ſubſtracted itſelf from the Dominion of the Tſin.

Lyew ſhe lays before the Emperor the Advantages of the Virtue Yang: It conſiſts in reſpecting, and willingly yeilding to, others.

OUR wiſe Kings of Antiquity, have much valued the Virtue Yang, and ſhowed a particular Eſteem for it. Theſe Princes had two Views in this; the firſt was, that it might procure them Men of Merit. The ſecond was, to ſtrangle Jealouſy, Intrigues, and Diſputes. Every Man eſteems Virtue and Merit: And every Man is glad to have it thought, that he poſſeſſes them. Our Antients knew this well; and when they recommended Deference, they were far from pretending, that by an ill judged Modeſty, Perſons of Merit and Virtue, ſhould yeild Honours and Employments to thoſe who had neither of theſe Qualifications. What they meant was, that Men of Merit paying Deference to one another, and mutually yeilding to one another, there ſhould be none amongſt them, either unknown or forgotten. Formerly, was any one named to a great Employment? He immediately excuſed himſelf, and propoſed filling up that Poſt, with a Perſon whom he judged more capable. If ſo laudable a Cuſtom were once revived, how eaſy would it be for a Prince, to form a juſt and a judicious Knowledge of the Perſons who ſerve him? It is to this Day, an Uſage, that when an Officer is upon the Point of being advanced, he excuſes himſelf, in Appearance at leaſt, for his want of Capacity. But we no more ſee that they propoſe another, for filling up the Poſts that is deſigned for them. Thus, properly ſpeaking, there is no more real Deference amongſt the Great: And for that Reaſon, ſays Confuçius, there can be nothing expected from the People, but Envy, Quarrels and Contentions. Alas! The Spirit of Envy reigns but too much amongſt the great themſelves, inſtead of the Spirit of Deference. Thence proceed two great Evils. Merit is frequently forgotten, and frequently, when it appears, it muſt grapple with Calumny.

When the Spirit of Deference obtains, thoſe who have real Merit, ſoon enjoy the Reputation that is their due: For every one when Occaſion preſents, endeavours to yield to them. And as no body cares to yeild to a Man whom he does not eſteem, if then Men without Virtue and Capacity fill Poſts, there will at leaſt be very few ſuch, and they can never be advanced higher. At preſent, great and midling Capacities are ſo blended together, that it is very difficult for a Prince to make a juſt Diſcernment of them, as formerly.

A King of Tſi, was very fond of the Inſtrument of Muſic Yu, and aſſembled 300 Men to play upon it in Concert; a certain Perſon, whoſe Name was Nan ko, who underſtood nothing of the Matter, ſeeing 300 Men playing all together, thought, that with a little Impudence, he might paſs in the Crowd. And in effect, he received Wages for a long time. When that King was dead, his Succeſſor gave out, that he was ſtill a great Lover of the Inſtrument Yu, than his Predeceſſor; But that he wanted to hear each of theſe 300 Men, play ſingly. At this News, Nan ko fled: How many Nan ko are got into Poſts, ever ſince the Virtue Yang, and all the laudable Cuſtoms that were its Conſequences has been diſuſed?

At leaſt, If Merit could break thro' that Crowd, and raiſe itſelf to the higheſt Employments it might continue there in Safety. But what has it not to dread now a-days? When Envy and Ambition have unhappily ſucceeded to the Spirit of this Virtue. In effect, to commit no Faults, belongs only to a Wiſdom and Virtue of the firſt Rate. Thus Confuçius commending Yen tſe, whom he loved beſt of all his Diſcipiss, thonght it a ſufficient Elogium to ſay of him, that*he never fell twice into the ſame Fault.* But if that Crowd of ambitious Hangers-on, with which the Court now ſwarms, finds their Acceſs precluded by a Man of a ſuperior Merit, it is ordinary for them to fret. Thence forward they lay themſelves out to ſpeak ill of them; they frequently calumniate them; at leaſt, they take great Care to obſerve them, and to inhanſe and aggravate the ſmaleſt Faults that eſcape them. However favourably a Prince is prepoſſeſſed for an Officer, if he hears frequent Complaints of him, he can't help enquiring into their Cauſes; if he finds them groundleſs, it is a great Happineſs. But if he finds they are juſt, he either diſſembles, and then his Authority gradually ſuffers, or he puniſhes with Rigour; and then the Number of Criminals become ſo great, that a Man has ſcarce Grounds for hoping any thing elſe, but to be comprehended in them, either ſooner or later. Thus, not only Men of Merit ſhun to appear in Public; but even they who are in Poſts, being apprehenſive of ſome troubleſome ſome Reverſe, retired as ſoon as they can. But what great Services can a Prince or a State hope for, from People who live in continual Alarms, and who are always providing for their own Safety? When Affairs come to that paſs, a Prince is much to be lamented.

But how ſhall theſe Evils be remedied? By re-eſtabliſhing the antient Practice, which in my Opinion, is not very difficult to do. Amongſt thoſe who are, at preſent, in great Poſts, or in thoſe Ranks that lead to them, there are many underſtanding virtuous Perſons; and if they are not very forward in propoſing others to the Poſts, to which they themſelves are named, it is not becauſe they are ignorant of the Value or Advantages of ſuch a Deference, but becauſe the Cuſtom is alter'd, and they follow the Torrent: When Shun gave the Poſt of Se kong, to Yu: This laſt reſpectfully excuſed himſelf, and earneſtly begged, that it might be diſpoſed of either to Tſi, Ki, or Kyew yu, as being more worthy than he. When J was named Yu quan, he preſented, Chu, Hû, Hyong, and Pa, as Perſons preferable to himſelf in his Opinion. Pe i did the ſame, when he was charged with the Care of the Rites. He would have yeilded to Quey or Long. In ſhort, in theſe antient Times, they who were raiſed, acted thus. The Uſage which obtains now a-days, of a Perſon who is raiſed to a Poſt, preſenting to the Emperor a Writing, by way of Thanks-giving, is, I think, a ſmall Veſtige of that, which was practiſed anciently with ſo much Advantage. Great Uſe may be made of this. There is nothing to be done, but to regulate in good earneſt, that theſe Writings, which contain only empty Thanks, or frivolous Excuſes, ſhall actually be rejected; and that none ſhall be preſented to the Prince, but thoſe which with this Excuſe ſhall point out good Subjects for filling up the Poſts in Queſtion. Every one doubtleſs will do this. And then it lies at the Emperor's Door, to compare thoſe who are propoſed to him, and to prefer in each Rank, thoſe to whom the Deference is paid, by the greateſt Number of Voices. Then a great many deſerving Perſons, who at preſent live retired, and are only employed on their own private Perfection, will be obliged to appear, and fill up the great Poſts of the State; even they, who court theſe great Poſts, will endeavour to merit by their Conduct, a good many Voices for themſelves. Thus the Choice of Officers ſhall be founded, if we may ſay ſo, on the Judgment of the whole Empire. The Prince ſhall ſee with the Eyes of almoſt all his Officers, the Merit of each of them. From thenceforth vain Diſcourſes, and ſecret Intrigues which ruin all, ſhall ceaſe. If then, they who at preſent fill the firſt Ranks, ſhould back this Propoſal before the Prince, and without reflecting that it comes from a Perſon of ſlender Underſtanding, ſhould get it put in Execution, I believe that they would thereby render to the State, the moſt important Piece of Service, that could at this time be expected of them.

Under the ſame Dynaſty of Tſin Yu pu opened a great College at Pan yang: He advertiſed it by a Writing, in which he explained its Rules. Upwards of 700 young Students repaired to it. At the firſt opening of the Claſſes, Yu pû made them the following ſhort Diſcourſe.

I BEHOLD you here, young Students, aſſembled in a very numerous Body, all of you deſtin'd, one Day, to fill the moſt important Poſts; all of you in the Flower of your Age, and full of a becoming Warmth. This Day, for you, is opened this new Academy. For what End do you come here? Doubtleſs you come to learn how to ſpeak well, how to write well, and above all, how to live well. You come here, to lay the Foundations of an eminent Virtue, to render yourſelf capable, of what is of the greateſt Dignity in the Common-wealth, and in one Word, ſeriouſly to ſtudy true Wiſdom.

It is of Importance to acquaint you, that at firſt, this kind of Study has nothing in it very agreeable, or very inviting: Nay, it frequently happens, that at firſt ſetting out, it is not much reliſhed. But in time, it is quite otherwiſe; different Exerciſes ſucceed one another; you perfect yourſelves by little and little, you acquire new Attainments every Day by reading, you make new Diſcoveries of yourſelves, you ſtudy to go to the Bottom of them; the Genius opens, the Heart dilates, and you feel the Value of this true Wiſdom: In its Search, you take a Pleaſure, which ſurpaſſes every other Pleaſure, and is fairly worth them all. In ſhort, a Man is agreeably ſurprized, to find himſelf intirely changed, without his almoſt perceiving after what manner this Change is brought about. Yes! the Tincture which the Heart and the Genius receives from ſtudying with Ardour and Conſtancy, is, for its Duration, beyond the moſt valuable Tinctures. Theſe laſt, either wear out or fade; but the other, when thoroughly imbibed, is ſubject to none of thoſe Diſadvantages.

That the Heart may take it in well, you muſt in ſome Meaſure imitate the Painters; theſe Artiſts begin by rightly preparing the Stuff which they are to paint; upon this Ground they lay the Colours which they deſign to give it. The wiſe Man act thus in Morality; within, his Heart is pure and upright; and without, his Actions are correſponding. This is eſſential and indiſpenſible: But every one can give it more or leſs Luſtre, according as his Diſpoſition is more or leſs happy, and according as his Application is more or leſs conſtant. Beſides, altho' the Capacity is not equal, yet when the Man is not improv'd by Study, the Defect does not lie in the Capacity ſo much, as in the Reſolution; A Man may be very well mounted, ſays the Proverb, tho' he does not ride the Horſe (*) Ki: A Man may be a good Diſciple, without being as well qualified as (†) Yen-tſe. The grand Point is Conſtancy. You begin to lop and ſaw, and then you immediately give over. If the Tree was tender or rotten, it could neither be pruned nor ſawed very quickly. On the contrary, by continuing your Toil, you can cut or cleave the hardeſt Marble.

(*) A famous Horſe.

(†) The moſt beloved Diſciple of Confucius.

Take Courage then, young Gentlemen, all you have to do in this College, is to ſtudy the great Rules which our antient Sages have left us. With the Helps you have, you may advance a great Deal in a few Years, and ſoon gain both the Eſteem and Reſpect of thoſe who are in Poſts about Court, and thereby early enter upon Employments. There are ſome People in the World, who, without retiring themſelves like you, without having the Advantages that you have, and even underPreſſures both from Nature and Fortune, have not failed to become excellent Writers, famous Miniſters, and very great Men: But theſe are very extraordinary Perſons, and cannot ſerve for a Rule. He who is not poſſeſſed of ſo excellent Qualifications, ſhould try, as it were, to form a large River, by damming up the Water by little and little: or to raiſe a Mountain, by heaping together the Grains of Sand. There are Enterprizes in Nature in which we cannot ſucceed, without Conſtancy: Such now is yours, young Gentlemen. But then, in caſe, that for a ſhort time, giving up all other Care, you ſhould apply yourſelf in good Earneſt, and with Ardour, and direct all your Studies to one Point, you will infallibly make a great Progreſs. And tho', perhaps, you may not all advance with an equal Pace, yet there is none amongſt you, but may make a very conſiderable Progreſs.

In the Book from which theſe Pieces are extracted, Yu pû is very much praiſed, who tho' living at a Time, when the Politeneſs, the Wiſdom, and the Eloquence of the Antients were very much neglected, yet endeavoured all he could, to recover them.

Under the ſame Dynaſty of the Tſin, the Emperor Ming ti, a little after he mounted the Throne, deſigned to give an important Employment to Yu long, who, under the preceeding Reign, had been advanced in the Army: Yu lyang (B), in order to excuſe himſelf, preſented the following Diſcourſe to the Emperor.

SIR: For upwards of theſe ten Years I have been in Poſts; it is rare for a Man to advance himſelf ſo faſt, and with ſo little Expence as I have done: For this, I am indebted to the Bounty of the late Emperor; and I have a due Senſe of Gratitude. But at the ſame time, I am not ignorant, that Favours ought always to bear ſome proportion to Merit, and that an exceſſive Favour by raiſing a Man too high, expoſes him to the moſt fatal Down-fall. To know where to ſtop, is a Maxim of Wiſdom, proper for all Mankind; and is more applicable to me, than any other Perſon. Tho' I am very far from being ambitious of new Honours, I am yet farther from a Deſire to obtain them, in prejudice of thoſe who are more worthy of them than me. Under the Reign of the late Emperor, I was raiſed to the higheſt Poſts of the Army; but I owed them leſs to my Merit or my Services, than to the Goodneſs which his Alliance with me inſpired him with. Yet as at that time, very few People well qualified were preſented to him, this Scarcity in ſome Meaſure, might juſtify the Honour he did me. At preſent, Things are on another Footing: Under the auſpicious Reign of your Majeſty, we ſee at Court, and throughout all the Provinces, a great Number of Perſons of the higheſt Merit, all equally devoted to your Service. But at this Juncture, to give me the Employments that your Majeſty offers, and to unite in my Perſon, all that is of greateſt Importance, both in the Gown and the Sword, allow me to ſay, looks, as if you deviated from that ſovereign Equity, which has rendered the Dawnings of your Reign ſo bright. It muſt, at leaſt give Occaſion to ſuſpect, that your Conduct is influenced by private Inclinations.

As I am Brother of the Empreſs, I belong to you in a ſtrict Senſe: You know how many Commotions the raiſing of ſuch Allies have occaſioned in paſt Ages, and how odious the Remembrance of theſe paſt Misfortunes renders any ſuch Choice to all the Empire, eſpecially when it is into a Poſt which gives the Perſon choſen, any Share in the Government. Profit by this Knowledge. Tho' I had Talents greater than I have; and tho' you judged that they might be very uſeful to you, yet it would be prudent for you to deprive yourſelf of them, rather than to go againſt a Prejudice ſo univerſal, and founded upon ſo many fatal Events. To endeavour abſolutely to overbear it, would be to nouriſh Suſpicions and Murmurs in the Hearts of your Subjects, and to expoſe yourſelf to the greateſt Misfortunes.

It is not even ſufficient, in order to guard againſt thoſe Inconveniences, that your Miniſters and great Officers, ſhould penetrate into the Uprightneſs of your Intentions, and approve of your Choice. For how can they go from Door to Door all over the Empire, to juſtify it? I am naturally as fond as any Man, to ſee my Riches and Honours encreaſe; and am far from being inſenſible of the new Honours which your Majeſty offers me. Beſides, the Manner in which you offer them, and your own high Station, makes me afraid, leaſt you be diſobliged at my Refuſal; and that this Refuſal ſhould expoſe me to the Loſs of my Dignity, or perhaps my Life. Tho' I have but little Underſtanding, yet I am not ſo blind, as needleſsly to expoſe myſelf to your Diſpleaſure, and all its Conſequences. But, being inſtructed by the Events of paſt Times, I am afraid of being the Occaſion of Commotions; and the Good of your State is infinitely dearer to me than my Dignity, or even my Life. For this Reaſon, I deſired more than once to retire. And it is this, which likewiſe engages me to refuſe the new Poſt, with which your Majeſty would honour me. Weigh, I beg of you, the Reaſon which I have freely laid before you, for my not accepting this Honour. If your Majeſty ſhall judge, that my oppoſing you in this Manner is a Crime, I will willingly undergo the Chaſtiſement, and look upon the Day of my Death, or the Beginning of my Life.

Ming ti yeilded to theſe Reaſons, and named another.

(B) One of theſe Names muſt be wrong, but we cannot ſay which.

The Emperor Hyau ven ti, by a publick Declaration, invited all the Subjects to aſſiſt him with their Counſels. After having ſet forth in his Declaration, all that we have ſeen in other Declarations of that kind; the Example of the wiſe and famous Emperors of Antiquity, and the Inconveniency of a Practice contrary to theirs: He concludes his Declaration in theſe Terms.

OUR Intention then is, and we heartily wiſh it, that all our Subjects, from the greateſt to the meaneſt of our Officers, the ſimple Literati, the Trades-men, the Merchants, and others, may ſet forth to us what they believe to be of Advantage to the State, and capable to contribute to the Happineſs of the People. Let theſe who judge any thing to be deficient in the preſent Government, eſpecially with Regard to what appears to them hurtful to Morals and Virtue, act in the ſame Manner. I recommend to all, not only not to conceal any thing of that Kind, but to ſpeak it out freely, and without Diſguiſe: It is not fine long Diſcourſes that I want. But ſhort full Memorials, which I my ſelf can examine. It will then be as eaſy for theſe who preſent them, to ſhun the Faults capable to offend me, as it is for me to draw from them, all the uſeful Inſtruction I hope for.

A Fowl which had four Wings and four Feet, was preſented to the Emperor Swen vû ti. Tſwi quang at that time, poſſeſſed at his Court the Poſt of Tay chang. The Emperor who eſteemed him, ſent to him, and aſked him what he thought of that Monſter. Tſwi quang took this Occaſion to give the Emperor ſome Advice with Regard to his Conduct. The whole Writing which he preſented, is as follows.

I HAVE read in the Hiſtory of the five Elements, which is a Book written in the Days of the Han, that under the Reign of Swen ti, in an Apartment of the Palace, a Hen became a Cock in his Feathers, but remained a Hen in all other Reſpects. Under the Reign of Ywen ti, in the Houſe of one of the Miniſters of State, a Hen became a Cock by little and little. She got his Head, his Neck, his Spurs, his Crow, and even called the Hens to her. In one of the Years nam'd Yong quang, there was preſented to the Emperor a Cock, from whom grew Horns. Lyew hyang, who was alive at that time, explained theſe Prodigies. He ſaid, that Hens being domeſtic Animals, repreſented thoſe who came about the Perſon of the Prince, and that theſe monſtrous Changes informed the Emperor, that he had People about him who were carrying on bad Deſigns, and were contriving to diſturb the State. He particularly pointed out She hyen, who was then a Favorite. In effect, in the firſt of the Years named King ning, She hyen was judged guilty, and verified the Prediction. Under the Emperor Ling i, in the firſt Year called Quang ho, a Hen happened to be entirely changed in her Feathers, and to be like a Cock all but the Head. The Emperor, having order'd the great Officers to deliberate upon this Point, and to lay before him the Reſult of their Reaſonings; Tſay i anſwered for the Reſt and ſaid: The Head is the principal Part of the Body, and is the Symbol of Sovereignty. All the Body of the Hen is changed except the Head. In order to anſwer this Omen as you ought, your Majeſty muſt entirely change your Manner of Government, otherwiſe, your Misfortunes will be very great. In effect, a little after happen'd the Revolt of of Chang ko, which threw the Empire into Diſorder. The then reigning Emperor, altered nothing of the Severity of his Government. He harraſſed his Subjects more, ſo that there were Rebellions on all Sides, and the Diſorder was general. Lyew kyang, and Tſay i, were two very underſtanding Men: and their Explanations were confirmed by the Event. Now, altho' the Fowl, of which we are treating at preſent, is different in its Figure from the extraordinary Fowls in thoſe Days; it nevertheleſs admits of the ſame Interpretation, and the Omen is very much to be dreaded. Theſe extraordinary Feet and Wings, are Symbols of ſome Perſons, who are caballing and plotting together to raiſe Commotions. Theſe Wings and Feet are of different Sizes. There are Commotions of ſeveral kinds: But neither theſe four Feet, nor theſe four Wings have their natural Bigneſs: Theſe Cabals are ſtill weak, and it is eaſy to diſconcert them.

It is a common Opinion, that Calamities and Monſters are Omens, and at the ſame time, Advices and Inſtructions to Princes. Thoſe Princes who are wiſe, ſee them, and enter into themſelves: Thus every thing turns out happily with Regard to them. On the contrary, Princes without Underſtanding, become yet more infatuated, which brings them to the greateſt Misfortunes. The Shi king, the Shu king, and the Chun tſyû, the Hiſtory of the Tſin and the Han, furniſh us with many Examples, of which your Majeſty is not ignorant. Is there not then in our Days, ſome new She hyen at Court? At leaſt, it is certain, upon our Frontiers towards the South, a great many People have periſhed: And the Fields have been ſeen covered with Bones, without any Burial. It is not without Grief and Murmurs, that the Living ſee this, and the Souls that belonged to theſe dead Bodies, are yet more ſenſible of this. The Troops ſent to I yang, likewiſe have ſuffered a great deal. Behold the Heat of Summer is come, and they are not yet returned: On the Side of Tong chew, very few People are returned, of a great many who were employed in the Convoys of Proviſions. In ſhort, the People is overwhelmed with Trouble and Miſery; and nothing is more common at preſent, than to ſee People who hang or ſtrangle themſelves in Deſpair. You may judge of the State of Agriculture every where. The Grounds and Trade were never in ſo bad a State: What loud Cries would Kya i and Kû yang, if they were alive, make in their Remonſtrances? You are ſet up as the Father and Mother of your Subjects: Inſtead of appearing ſenſible of their Sufferings, or effectually labouring for their Relief, you entirely abandon yourſelf to your Pleaſures, and hazard even your Empire. Why do you not call to mind how much this coſt Tay tſû: You are born with a very penetrating Underſtanding; make Uſe of theſe Qualifications; examine with a juſt Dread, the Views of Tyen ti: Treat your Officers according to their Ranks; but at the ſame time, keep them to their Duty. Remember Teng tong, and Tong hyen: It was even the Favour of their Prince, by being too exceſſive, that cauſed their Ruin. Acquit yourſelf at the ſtated Times, of the Ceremonies that are appointed; honour the Aged and the Wiſe; apply yourſelf to procure Peace to your People; give proper Orders for the Relief of the Poor, and for that effect, retrench your Expences in Entertainments, in uſeleſs Labours, in Concerts, and in Wine; ſet the Day apart for Buſineſs, and the Night for Reſt: Don't hinder ſincere and underſtanding People, from coming near your Perſon; baniſh all Flatterers. Then there will be nothing but happy Omens.

The Emperor took this Advice very well. Some Days after, Yu kau and ſome others, who had been plotting ſecretly, were diſcovered, convicted, and put to Death. For which Reaſon, the Emperor eſteemed Tſwi quang more than ever, and treated him with greater Diſtinction.

Under the ſame Dynaſty, King ching propoſed to the Emperor, to take off the Prohibitions upon Salt. In his Supplication he ſpeaks as follows.

THE Book of Rites, in the Chapter Ywe leng, ſays plainly, "That the People muſt not be prohibited from taking in Forreſts, in Mountains, in Meadows and Lakes, that which can ſerve to nouriſh them; ſuch as Veniſon, Fruit, and the like." It likewiſe requires the Proprietors ſhould be the firſt to invite them, and to conduct thither, ſuch as ſtand in need of any of theſe Things. But at the ſame time, it requires that whoever ſhall dare to uſe Force, or to carry off any thing by Violence, ſhall be condemned to Death without Pardon. This may be called a Willingneſs in every one to aſſiſt, and to communicate to another, part of what he himſelf has. It is true, that in the ſame Book of Rites, in the Times of the Chew, we read Prohibitions from fiſhing, &c. but it was only for a certain time, in order to prevent the young Fry from being deſtroy'd, and the Rivers and Lakes from being drained, by Peoples fiſhing out of Seaſon. Theſe Prohibitions were ſo far from being a Grievance, that they preſerved and encreaſed the Fiſhes, to the great Advantage of the People.

The firſt Care of a Father of a Family is, to provide plentifully for the Subſiſtance of his Children: This is what they pride themſelves in above any thing elſe. For a like, or a better Reaſon, the Sovereign, who is the Father and Mother of his People, ought to do the ſame. We never ſee a rich Father of a Family, refuſing a little Vinegar to his Children, or ſome ſuch Trifle capable to create an Appetite. Is it then becoming, that a Sovereign of a rich and powerful Empire, ſhould be leſs indulgent to his Subjects, and refuſe them the moſt common thing that Tyen [Heaven] has ordained for their Uſe. And yet this is done, by forbiding them Salt. I know that the Motive of this Prohibition, which is more antient than your Reign, or even your Dynaſty, is the Revenue, that thereby acrues to the Prince. But is not this like imitating a Man, who tho' he is rich, takes Care only of his Mouth and his Teeth, and neglects the reſt of his Body? Do not all the People, Men and Women, work for their Sovereign? That which they furniſh every Year, is it not ſufficient to maintain his Dignity, and to ſupport his Troops. Can a Prince, for whom ſo many People work, be in any Dread of Want? Is it reaſonable that ſuch a Dread, ſhould make him to forbid the People, from uſing what is preſented them by certain Ponds. The antient Kings acted quite otherwiſe. Their firſt Care was to provide for the Wants of their People, and thereby they rendered them docile and attentive to Inſtruction. This was what makes them ſo celebrated; and for this, the Shi king praiſes them. I am a Man, whoſe Knowledge is but ſmall, and whoſe Views are confined: But I love to read, and I read a great deal. When, after having ſeen in our antient Books, the Indulgence which our Kings had for their Subjects, I come to certain Books of modern Date, where I find Taxes upon Taxes: I can't help ſaying with a Sigh, What a Difference there is betwixt ancient and modern Times? How much at large were People in theſe Days? How confined now? Many Dynaſties have ſucceeded one another without lightning the Yoke: Your Dynaſty, Sir, has the Honour already, to have begun well. It has almoſt aboliſhed the Taxes upon Corn and Stuffs. How many Encomiums has it already received, among the moſt diſtant People? Kings, whom their Dignity has raiſed above the Level of Mankind, ought likewiſe to carry their Virtue much higher. This is their Duty; nay their true Intereſt. Tay vang, by the Contempt that he expreſt of a Jewel, ſubmitted and devoted the whole People to his Perſon; on the contrary, in the Ode Kyê chu, we have a King repreſented to us who is odious and unhappy, for having over-burdened his People. Tho' your Predeceſſors have carried their Goodneſs to their Subjects to a great Height, yet I ſhould wiſh for the Honour of your Reign, that your Majeſty would carry it yet a little higher. It is ſaid, that two things are commonly very fatal to Princes. Too great Prodigality in their great Men, and too much Avarice in themſelves. If it is unworthy of a Prince, and even dangerous in him to make a Difficulty in parting with his Treaſures; how much more ſo will it be to diſpute with his People the Profit of a little Salt. It is a common and a true Saying, That it is better for a Prince to hoard up in his Subjects Houſes, than in his own Granaries and Coffers. When this Hoard is in the People's Hands, they are ſatisfied, and the Prince is rich. But when all is heaped up only in the Royal Granaries and Exchequer, the People are poor and diſcontented. When the People are diſcontented, how can they be profitably inſtructed, or ſucceſsfully inſpired with the Love of Virtue.

tue. When they are poor, can the Prince be long rich? I therefore wiſh, that your Majeſty, improving upon the Goodneſs of your Anceſtors, would take off the Prohibition from the Salt Pits, and only make ſome Regulations for preſerving it in Plenty.

The Emperor having ordered this Supplication to be deliberated on, the Chief of his Counſel were of Opinion, that the Prohibition ſhould ſubſiſt. It is very antient, ſaid they: And in the preceeding Dynaſties, when there were Deliberations for the ſame Effect, it was always concluded to maintain them. It is true, that in Progreſs of Time, it occaſioned Murmurs, and ſome Commotions among the People; but this muſt not be attributed to the Prohibition, but to the Negligence and Malice of the Commiſſaries.

Notwithſtanding of the Advice of the Counſel, the Emperor cauſed the following Declaration to be publiſhed.

IT is true, that the Prohibition upon Salt is very antient, and has, as it were, paſt into a Rule, yet all the Dynaſties do not reſemble one another. Some of them have been more ſolicitous to promote the Good of the People than others. As for me, if any thing appears capable to advance the Happineſs of my People, or to facilitate their Devotion to the Rites, and the Love of Virtue: That is a ſufficient Motive for me to embrace it, provided it is conſiſtent with Reaſon. This appears in what was propoſed to me by King ching; ſo that as ſoon as the proper Regulations for preſerving the Salt Pits are made, let the Prohibitions be taken off. Let this our preſent Order be publiſhed and executed.

After the Emperor Ven ti, Founder of the Dynaſty of the Swi, had reduced the Kingdom of Chin,(†) all his Officers applauded his Victory, and propoſed the making Choice of ſome Mountain, where they ſhould repair to perform the Ceremony of Fong chen. Ven ti rejected this Propoſal, and that they might not renew their Solicitations, publiſhed the following Order.

I SENT one of my Generals, to reduce to Reaſon, a petty rebellious Kingdom. The Expedition was ſucceſsful, and what then? Yet every one flatters and applauds me. I am even preſſed, notwithſtanding of my Defects in Virtue, to perform the Ceremonies of Fong chen, upon ſome famous Mountain. As for my ſhare, I never heard that Shang ti was to be moved with trifling empty Talk. I abſolutely forbid any one ever to ſpeak of this to me again.

A Letter of the ſame Emperor Ven ti, Founder of the Dynaſty of the Swi, to Tang the King of Korea.

EVER ſince (‡) Tyen raiſed me to the Throne, I have had nothing ſo much at Heart, as the Happineſs and Quiet of my Subjects. By leaving you in Poſſeſſion of the maritime Countries, I thereby intended to make known to all the World, how much removed I am from all Avarice; and that all I propoſe by reigning, is, that I may render my Subjects content and virtuous. I may likewiſe pretend, that you on your Part, remain in your Duty, and that you in Proportion, enter into the ſame Views, and like a good Subject, imitate my Examples. And yet I underſtand, that you diſturb your Neighbours: It is ſaid, you ſtreighten (§) Ki tan, and deprive it of all Liberty. You exact Contributions of more Kinds than one, from Mey ko. Whence proceeds that Itch of Oppreſſion? Or how dare you to haraſs the States which are in Subjection to me? If you are in want of Labourers, I have Plenty: Why don't you call for them? For ſome Years, you have fooliſhly been buſied in heaping up Stores and Proviſions, you have your Agents for that Effect, diſtributed thro' all Quarters; and you drain theſe little States. Why is all this done? If you have not formed bad Deſigns, and fearing, leaſt they ſhould be diſcovered, you act every thing underhand.

An Envoy was diſpatch'd from my Court to you; my Intention in ſending him was to give you, as one of my foreign Subjects, a Mark of my Goodneſs and Eſteem. But I deſign'd at the ſame time, that after having informed himſelf of what related to your Subjects, that he ſhould give you ſome Advice on my Part, on the Manner of Government. Nevertheleſs, you cauſed him to be watched under your own Eye, and ſhut him up in his Houſe as in a Priſon. You concealed, as much as you could, his Arrival from your Subjects. You prohibited the Officers of your Court, from whom you could not conceal him, from viſiting him; in ſhort, you have, as it were, ſhut both his Eyes and his Ears, and you appeared frightned, leaſt he ſhould have been able to inform himſelf of the State of your Affairs, but I have taken care to be informed in another Manner, of all your Steps, which are not like thoſe of a good Subject. I have put you in Poſſeſſion of a great Extent of Ground, and the Title and Honours of a (*) King. In ſhort, I have loaded you with Favours; all the Empire knows I have: And yet, all this is not ſufficient to make you ſenſible of my Goodneſs. You want Gratitude; you expreſs a diſtruſt of me; and you render yourſelf ſuſpected, by ſending, under different Pretexts, Perſons, who ſecretly examine all that paſſes at my Court. Is this the Conduct of a faithful and a blameleſs Subject?

Notwithſtanding of all this, as I impute your Faults, partly to the little Care I have taken to inſtruct you in your Duties, I am willing to forget what is paſt. But you muſt amend, and anſwer my Indulgence, by a ſincere and real Submiſſion: You muſt exactly fulfill the Duties of a foreign Subject: You muſt follow and imitate my Government: In Place of hating and harraſſing ſing theſe other Strangers, who are your Neighbours; you muſt, by your Example, inculcate upon them Submiſſion and Virtue: And above all things, you muſt remember, that tho' they are weaker than you, yet, like you, they are my Subjects. But do not think to impoſe upon me by vain Appearances: A thorough Change muſt be wrought upon you, if you deſire that I ſhould treat you as a good Subject. And then being ſatisfied with your Amendment, I will never decree your Puniſhment. Our wiſe and ancient Emperors, above all things, eſteemed Gentleneſs and Juſtice: Notwithſtanding, that I come far ſhort of the Virtue of theſe great Princes, yet I make it my Duty to imitate them. All my Empire knows this: And that alone, ought to free you of all Dread and Diſtruſt.

If, after the Aſſurances I have given you, I ſend Troops againſt you, what will all my Subjects ſay of me? But above all, what will the Strangers that are ſubdued, like you, to my Empire, ſay? Free yourſelf therefore of your Suſpicions; change your Conduct, and be eaſy. It is true, I have ſubdued Chin: But if you continue in your Duty, that ought not to alarm you: All the World knows that Chin forced me to puniſh him. After being many times pardoned, he attacked the Hew of Fong, who was faithful to me, and killed a great many of his People. He plundered on all Sides, and had the Boldneſs to advance even to my Frontiers. I had oftner than once, during the Space of ten Years, given him Advices with Regard to his Conduct. But inſtead of profiting by them, he grew inſolent upon my Goodneſs, and truſting to the (*) Kyang, which bounds his Territories, he valued neither my Advices nor my Threatnings. He even encreaſed the Number of his Forces, and ſeem'd to defy me with his Inſolence. Being forc'd to it by ſo open a Rebellion, I ſent againſt him, one of my Generals with only a few Troops: This Expedition laſted but for a Month. One Morning, avenged me of ten Years obſtinacy, and the Defeat of Chin was followed with univerſal Peace. Both the Shin (†) and Men rejoyced at this. You alone, I hear, are alarmed, and uneaſy: I ſee the Reaſon but too well. As it was not the Fear of Chin that engaged me to treat you well, ſo his Defeat is no Motive for my oppreſſing you. But if I were of an Humour to do it, who could protect you? What Compariſon is there betwixt the Waters of (‡) Lya, which are upon your Frontiers, and the great Kyang which covered Chin? Is your Country more populous, than that of Chin? Doubtleſs not. And if I ſhould puniſh your paſt Faults, as they deſerve, it would coſt me but little. I would have no more to do, but to ſend againſt you, ſome of my Officers: But I do not love to hurt any body. For which Reaſon, I follow the more moderate Courſe; I adviſe you, inſtruct you, and give you Time for your Amendment: If you anſwer my Gentleneſs as you ought, you may live eaſy and happy.

(§) Tay tſong, the ſecond Emperor of the Dynaſty of the Tang, whom Hiſtorians have compared with the moſt famous Princes of Antiquity, drew up a Writing, upon the Difference betwixt good and bad Government, and upon the difficulty of reigning well. As he drew it up chiefly for his own Uſe, he entitled it the Mirror of Gold, or the Precious Mirror.

AFTER having each Day, ſpent the neceſſary Time for diſpatching the Affairs of my Empire, I take a Pleaſure in reviewing and reflecting upon the Hiſtories of paſt Ages. I examine the Manners of every Dynaſty, the good and bad Examples of all their Princes, their Revolutions and their Cauſes. I have always done this with Profit, and I have done it as often as I can mention. Every time I read, what is ſaid of Fo hi and Whang ti, and the matchleſs Government of Yau and Shun, I always ſtop. I feel, I admire, I praiſe, and all this, without wearying. When I come towards the End of the Hya, the Ing, the Tſin, and certain Reigns of the Han, I am ſeized with an uneaſy Dread. I ſeem to walk upon a rotten Board, or upon a thin Surface of Ice over a deep River. When I reflect from whence it proceeded, why under all the Princes who have wiſhed to reign in Peace, and to tranſmit their Empire to a numerous Poſterity, there has yet happened ſo many Troubles and Revolutions: I find that the moſt common Cauſe, was the little Care which theſe Princes had to reflect upon themſelves, and the Averſion they had to hear any thing that could diſcompoſe them. Thus in the End, they became blind, both to their Duties and their Defects; and this Blindneſs occaſioned their Ruin: With what a Dread does this Reflection inſpire me.

It is in order to ſhun this Blindneſs, that after having ſeen by reading Hiſtory, what are the Principles of good Government, and what are the Springs of Commotions; of all theſe I compoſe a Mirror for my ſelf, in which I may behold my Faults, in order to endeavour to amend them. The moſt eſſential Character of good Government is, not to raiſe any to Poſts, but Men of Merit and Virtue. A Prince who acts thus, reigns happily; but there is nothing more dangerous and fatal for a State, than a contrary Conduct. Is a Prince in any Difficulty? He never fails to conſult his Miniſters and his other great Officers. If theſe are all underſtanding zealous Men, let the Danger be ever ſo great, it ſeldom ends in his loſing all. And what cannot be enough lamented, is, that Princes, heedleſs of this Choice, are intirely taken up with empty Pleaſures. Ah! how much better would it be for them, to make a Pleaſure of their Duty: But above all, of a Duty ſo important as is the Choice of good Officers, eſpecially good Miniſters!

It is commonly ſaid, that Shun and Yu, theſe two great Princes, loved no Pleaſure, and that, on the contrary, the two Tyrants, Kyé and Chew, loved it much. I am of a different Opinion. The bad bad Conduct of Kyé and Chew, coſt them a thouſand Diſquiets, abridged their Days, conſequently diſturbed their Lives, and rendered them of a ſhort Duration. Can this be called the Love of Pleaſure? On the contrary, is it not to have a true Taſte of Pleaſure, to love it like Shun and Yu, who owed a long and quiet Life to their Virtue, and who calmly taſted the Pleaſures of a happy and peaceful Reign? It muſt be allowed, that Complexions and Diſpoſitions are very different; ſome are good, and others bad: And that there are different Degrees in each Kind. The Virtues and Actions of Yau, Shun, Yu, and Tang, give us ground to believe, that (*) Tyen has diſtributed them very juſtly. It was not thus of Kyé, Chew, Yew and Li: as may be ſeen from the brutal Cruelties of theſe bad Princes. However, we may truely ſay, that the Happineſs of Princes and States, depends leſs upon their Complexions and natural Diſpoſitions, than their Care of keeping that juſt Mean in every thing, which common Senſe dictates.

We read in Uki, that a Prince of (†) Sang applying himſelf ſolely to certain Exerciſes of Virtue, and neglecting to keep his Army on Foot, loſt his State; that the Prince of I periſhed likewiſe, but for a quite different Reaſon, he laying all his Streſs on his Forces, and neglecting Virtue. Therefore Confuçius ſays, that the Government of a State, ought to be juſtly tempered with Gentleneſs and Reſolution, with Severity and Mercy. And indeed, Goodneſs and Juſtice ſhould always go Hand in Hand; to make too great Conceſſions to the one in Prejudice of the other, is a fundamental Fault, and may be attended with very bad Conſequences. What a Conduct therefore is it, for a Man to deviate from both the one and the other? And what would one ſay of a Man, who was abſolutely deſtitute of Goodneſs? An Emperor raiſed to the higheſt Degree of Honour, to which a Man can riſe, is obliged at once, to love his People, and to endeavour to make them happy. Two Things are requiſite for this: Good Order and Security. As for good Order, Regulations muſt be made, and they muſt be ſupported with Example. As for Security, an Army muſt be kept on Foot, to intimidate Enemies from undertaking any Thing upon the Frontiers. For as it is by no means convenient, to terrify the People by a ſtanding Army; it is likewiſe rare, that Gentleneſs alone, and the Virtue of a Prince, can over-awe the Barbarians, and ſecure the Frontiers. When the great Fiſh, Kin, appears above the Water, the Billows become ſmooth. When the (‡) Whang, and the Ho, plunge, or dive under the Water, there is no fair Weather to be expected: It is their Flight in the Air, which prognoſticates that.

A very important Point for a Prince, is to know how to accommodate himſelf to the different Tempers of Men, and to profit by their ſeveral Talents. It is an univerſally received Maxim, that as he who intends to build a large Houſe, ſhould begin, by chuſing a good Architect, and then to proceed to buy Materials proper for his Plan: In the ſame Manner, a Governour ought to begin by chuſing his Miniſters, in order to aſſiſt himſelf by their Underſtanding and by their Councils, in the Government of his Subjects. In attentively reflecting upon the paſt Dynaſties, I obſerve, that when the Prince had a ſolid Love for Virtue, he never wanted virtuous People about him; but when he ſhewed a Paſſion for Building, and other Works of Art, all the able Men in that Way appeared: If he loved hunting, he got a parcel of excellent Hunts-men about him: Was he enchanted with Muſic? He was preſented with Crowds of People from Chin and Wey: Sometimes it might happen, that the Prince debaſed himſelf ſo far, as to love Painting, and ſuch like Ornaments. Then (§) Yen and Chau were in Vogue. When all Avenues are blocked up to ſincere Remonſtrances, then few zealous, or faithful Perſons are ſeen at Court. Is a Prince fond of Applauſe? Numerous are the Crowds of his Flatterers. Our Ancients, indeed, had a good deal of Reaſon to compare a Prince to a Veſſel, and the People to the Liquor that it contains. As the Liquor takes the Figure of the Veſſel, ſo the Subjects commonly imitate the Prince. How great a Motive ought this to be for him to aim at Perfection? But as the fineſt Stone requires to be poliſhed, in order to become a fine Veſſel; thus Man ſtands in need of Study and Application, in order to acquire true Wiſdom.

Ven vang and Confuçius had their Maſters: And if theſe great Men had need of Maſters, how much more have others? ſo that one of the moſt remarkable Differences betwixt a good and a bad Prince, is, that the good Prince ſighs for Perſons of Merit and Virtue, in the ſame manner, as the Labourer expects his Crop; and receives them with the ſame Joy, as the Huſbandman, who has a little before been threatned with Drought, ſees a plentiful Shower fall upon his Fields: On the other Hand, a bad Prince, commonly has an Averſion for any Man, who has more Merit than himſelf: And admits none about his Perſon, but thoſe who are without Merit and without Virtue. O how hard it is, for a Man thoroughly to diveſt himſelf of the bad Inclinations, to which he has a long time been habituated! Vang pwen, and Sun hau, at firſt, counterfeited to be good Princes: But as they acted only by Intereſt, and as their pretended Virtue was only Hypocriſy and Diſſimulation, they did not long hold it out. They returned to their natural Byaſs; People knew them, and abandoned them: A Bark of plain Boards joined together only with Glew, cannot hold out long, againſt the large Billows. A Horſe, who is bred up on purpoſe, in order, on ſome Occaſions, to make a hundred Leagues at a Stretch, if he is put to the Trial, frequently burſts before the Journey is ended: This exactly was the Caſe of Vang pwen and Sun hau. We ſaw ſaw verified in their Perſons, as in a great many others, our antient Proverbs. That as the (*) Shin cannot be made uſe of, when we would meaſure large Stones: Thus, a midling Capacity will not do for great Things, &c. And the moſt ſimple Virtue, if it is conſtant, is more worth, than the moſt political Cunning. Oh! what a Difference is there betwixt Prince and Prince, and Man and Man. Kau tſû reſpected Li tſong ſo much, that he held up his Train, to do him the greater Honour. Syu chew, being diſobliged with the wiſe Advices of Pi kan, inhumanly ordered his Heart to be pluck'd out. Ching tang always had a real Eſteem, and a cordial Love for his Miniſter I yun. Kyé had a wiſe and zealous Miniſter in Long pong; and yet he cauſed him to be put to Death. Chwang, King of Tſû, after having held a Council, and diſcovering a Superiority of Genius over all his Miniſters, went from the Council Board (†) melancholy and thoughtful. This Melancholy hung about him, even in his eaſier Hours. On the contrary, Vû hû, rejoyced and triumphed in a Manner, in ſuch a Superiority. The Reaſon of this is, that Princes who are without Capacity, want either to conceal or perſevere in their Faults; but Underſtanding Princes, want to be acquainted with their Failings.

(‡) The Names of two Water-Fowl. Theſe Allegories admit of a double Senſe: The Billows denoting the Irruptions of the Barbarians, which the Power of Arms, figured under the Fiſh Kin, quells: And by the Birds Whang and Ho, the People, who ſhould be eaſy and ſatisfied, while the State is without any Commotion; or elſe, by the Fiſh Kin, is denoted brave Perſons, who are capable to head Troops: And by the Birds Whang and Ho, thoſe who are fitted for Governing, and muſt be drawn from Obſcurity, and put in Poſts. If we apply theſe Allegories with what goes before, the firſt Senſe appears the moſt natural; But if to what follows, the laſt appears to be the Meaning.

When I caſt my Eyes upon Kau tſû and Ching tang, I compare the Reigns of theſe great Princes, to theſe Years, that are remarkable by a juſt Temper of Heat and Cold, and by a Regulation of the Seaſons, which diffuſes Plenty over all. It is ſaid, that when the Empire is well governed, Ki ling, an Animal of an auſpicious Omen, appears. Were not Kau tſû, and Ching tang, real Ki ling in their kinds? I own, I think they were. When I next conſider the Kyé and Chew, I think, that I ſee in their Reigns, theſe direful unhappy Years, which the Irregularity of the Seaſons, renders barren and fatal. Theſe Years, uſually produce a great Number of deſtructive Inſects, and even frightful cruel Monſters. Alas! Were not theſe wicked Princes Kyé and Chew, Monſters themſelves? How much Inſtruction do I not find, in reflecting upon theſe two Oppoſites. I know very well, it is ſaid, that Tyen has more or leſs favourable Conjunctures for States. That is true: But that does not hinder the Happineſs or Unhappineſs of States, from depending on the Conduct of Men. Was there not under Ching tang, a ſeven Years Drought? This Prince having pared his Nails, devoted himſelf as a Victim. Immediately there fell a Rain, for a hundred Leagues all round. In the Time of one Emperor, Mulberry-Trees were ſeen all of a ſudden, to grow in the Palace. This Prince ſtruck with a Prodigy, which was explained to him, as being very dreadful, ſolidly applyed himſelf to Virtue; and inſtead of the Dangers that threatned him, he receiv'd the Homage of the Ambaſſadors of ſixteen Courts, at his Palace. Who then dares ſay, that it is not the Buſineſs of Princes to make their States happy?

Some ſay, that it is a very difficult Thing to reign: Others ſay, it is eaſy. The firſt, to prove their Opinion, reaſon thus: The Dignity of Emperor, raiſes a Prince above the reſt of Mankind: He has an abſolute Power: Rewards and Puniſhments are in his Hand: He not only poſſeſſes the Riches of his Empire: But he likewiſe can, as he has a Mind, ſerve himſelf with all the Abilities and the Talents of all his Subjects. What then can he wiſh for, which he may not obtain? Or what then can he undertake, which he may not execute? They who are of the contrary Opinion, reaſon otherways: If a Prince, ſay they, ſhall fail in his Reſpect to Tyen, Prodigies ſtreight appear, and Monſters are born. Does he exaſperate his Subjects Minds? He is often puniſhed by an untimely Death, as happened to Vû i and Chew. Would he indulge himſelf in any Paſſion, as for inſtance, bringing Things of greater Rarity and Value, from afar? In making large Parks, fine Ponds, great Buildings, lofty Teraſſes? He muſt for theſe Ends, load the People at leaſt, with Averages, and Agriculture muſt thereby ſuffer. Hence proceed Scarcity and Famine. The People groan, they murmur, they faint. If the Prince is inſenſible, and neglects to remedy this: He is look'd upon as a Tyrant, born, not to govern, but to oppreſs, the People. He is the Object of public Curſes: What worſe can he dread? But every Prince, who values his Reputation, ought, as much as he can, to be watchful in his Endeavours, to diminiſh the Taxes, to ſhun every thing that can overload the People, and to procure their Happineſs and Tranquility. But he cannot do all this, without very great Self-denial, and without repreſſing his moſt darling Inclinations: Then, it is eaſy enough.

There is another Difficulty yet greater; which is the right Choice of Perſons who are put in Poſts, and the employing each of them according to his Talent. A Man, whom the Prince very much eſteems, and looks upon, as equally capable and virtuous, may have many Failings, and even, Vices. Another, whom all the World deſerts for real and well known Faults, may have, at the ſame time, ſome good Qualities, of which an advantagious Uſe may be made. When this proves the Caſe, what Courſe muſt be followed? Should a Prince reject a Man who has Abilities, he thereby deprives himſelf of an uſeful Aſſiſtant. Should he know a Man to be vicious, and yet not abandon him: This has given Riſe to the moſt fatal Commotions in a State. Even they, who to all Appearance are blameleſs, have not always ſuitable Talents; nor ought they to be indifferently imployed in every thing. Kong cho was very ſerviceable to a great Kingdom. But Tſe tſan would have miſcarried there; yet he was Miniſter in a ſmaller State, where he did Wonders. Chew pû ſtammered, and ſpoke ill. (‡) Kau tſû did not, however, fail to make him a Hew, and he richly repaid that Honour, by confirming upon the Throne his Family, when it was almoſt ruined. Tſe ſû, on the contrary, was an eloquent Man, and a fine Speaker; and yet, notwithſtanding

(*) A Shin, is 1 tenth of a Tew, and a Tew is 1 tenth of a Tan, a Tan, for inſtance, of Rice, is 100, or at moſt, 120 l. Weight.

(†) He was afraid, that, in caſe he ſhould be in the Wrong, no body would put him right.

ſtanding of his fine Speeches, he never could raiſe himſelf: He was ſeen to beg for a Poſt under Ven ti, about his Menagery, and yet he could not obtain it.

Out of different Talents, always to make the beſt Choice, and that too, among Perſons, whoſe Talents are the ſame, are difficult, but neceſſary, Things, in order to reign well. There is a Difference, not only in Talents, but in natural Diſpoſitions, in Tempers, in Conditions, in Inclinations, and even in Virtues. In all theſe Kinds, there are different Species, and different Orders in every Species. What Difference, for Example, is there between the common (*) Hyau and a Hyau of the firſt Order? The firſt conſiſts, in chearfully ſerving the Father and the Mother, in never failing to them in Point of Reſpect, and in providing for all their Neceſſities. The ſecond exerts itſelf, in procuring the Good of the State, in re-eſtabliſhing Peace in Families, and in exactly obſerving all the Rites. Shun poſſeſſed the Virtue Hyau in an eminent Degree, and yet he had not the good Fortune to pleaſe his Parents. Tſen tſan, poſſeſt the Virtue (†) I in in a very exalted Meaſure; Yet he was not the Perſon, whom Confuçius praiſed the moſt of all his Scholars. Confuçius ſaid, that a Son has not the true Virtue Hyau, if he indifferently obeys all that his Father commands: And that a Miniſter, who implicitly gives into all the Views of his Prince, does not poſſeſs the Virtue (‡) Chong. Thus the great Chew kong, being leſs afraid of diſpleaſing his Prince, than of not ſerving him honeſtly, ſecur'd the Peace of his Empire, by the juſt Puniſhment of a Criminal who was dear to his Prince. I ya, on the contrary, in order to aſſure his Fortune, took Care always to accommodate himſelf to his King's Inclination: When (§) Quan chong was dead, he was advanced, and he ſoon threw every thing in Diſorder. (‖) Ki ſing, upon a preſſing Occaſion, bravely expoſed himſelf to certain Death, that he might ſave a Perſon whom he acknowledged as his Prince. (⊥) Ywen yang, that he might gratify a private Reſentment, reduced the Empire, within two Inches of Ruin. In Chû ywen and others, Fidelity and Uprightneſs have been ſeen, not only without Reward, but even in Miſery and under Oppreſſion. In Tſay pi, and others, Treaſon has been covered with the moſt ſpecious Outſide.

Does not all this prove the Difficulty of reigning well? This Difficulty would be ſtill greater, had we not theſe Hiſtories, where an attentive Prince may learn to diſtinguiſh real and faithful Subjects, from ſelf deſigning Flatterers. The Kings of Tſin, owed it to the Bravery and Ability of Pe ki that they became Maſters of the Kingdom of Chau: And yet one of them put him to Death. Ya fû, under the Emperor King ti, prevented the Diſaſters, that otherwiſe might have attended the Rebellion of the tributary Princes; and yet, under that ſame Emperor, Ya fû ended his Days, under the Hands of an Executioner. Wen chong was treated in the ſame manner by the King of the Ywe, tho' that Prince, without the Advice of Wen ſhong, could never have ſubdued his Enemy U. In ſhort, U ſi, as a Reward of long and very faithful Services, had a Sword, with which he had orders to kill himſelf. We ſhall ſuppoſe, that theſe great Men were Criminals; but did they deſerve to periſh in this Manner? Surely not. It was Injuſtice and Paſſion, on the Part of the Princes. As for Chau kau, Han ſing, Hing pû, and Chin hi; altho' all of them had their Merit, and ſome of them had done very important Services, yet they forgot, and belyed themſelves; Thus their Puniſhment was warranted by Juſtice. But their Faults ſhould have been wiſely prevented; and it is a Blemiſh in Kau tſû, who was ſo great a Prince, that he did not know how to preſerve Perſons of ſo extraordinary Qualifications, who had ſerved him ſo well. The Founder of the Dynaſty of the Han, in this reſpect, was much inferior to its Reſtorer Quang vû. This laſt, knew how to reward his Generals as well as Kau tſû. But like him, he did not expoſe them to be forgotten by him. It is thus, that a Prince ought to act, with Regard to thoſe, to whom he in ſome meaſure, owes his being raiſed, or preſerved upon the Throne. It is a bad Reward of their Services, to expoſe them to loſe their Fruits.

The Difficulty of reigning well, in my Opinion, may be enough ſeen from what I have already ſaid; but we ſhall render it ſtill more perceptible. As a Prince is elevated in a high Rank above the reſt of Mankind, he is in the moſt conſpicuous Point of Light. If he commands any thing that is not agreeable to the moſt exact Reaſon, he not only does himſelf a conſiderable Injury, but he is deſpiſed by every wiſe Man: Does any Action or Geſture eſcape him, which is unbecoming his Majeſty? A general Sneer goes round among both great and ſmall. Does he advance any one to Poſts? Then there riſe a thouſand jealous Murmurs. Has he Regard for a Recommendation? All the Candidates cry out, that every thing is beſtowed by Inclination and Intereſt; and that nothing is given to Merit. If he raiſes a Man of acknowledged Merit, to the firſt Employment; it is immediately attributed to Chance, and not to the Diſcernment of the Prince. By good Luck, ſay they, for once, he has not blundered. Is any one in Poſt, who has not ſo great Merit?

(*) Hyau, Reſpect and Love for Parents. The Senſe of this Character is more ample here.

(†) I in, Goodneſs, Charity, Clemency. This Word is ſometimes put for Virtue, or any virtuous Man in general.

(‡) Zeal and Loyalty for ones Prince.

(§) He was firſt Miniſter to Chwang wang, King of Tſi; and very ſtrongly recommended to that Prince, never to put I ya in Poſt.

(‖) Kau tſû, the Founder of the Dynaſty of the Han, while he was diſputing the Empire with Hyang yu, was beſieged in a City; his Army being at a great Diſtance, Ki ſing, who commanded in the City, marched out in form; ſeeming as if he would ſurrender himſelf, and abandon Kau tſû. This News cauſed great Joy in the beſieging Camp. The Guards grew careleſs, and Kau tſû, flying out of another Gate with ſome Horſemen, forced the Guards, and ſaved himſelf. Hyang yu having entered into the City, ſummon'd Ki ſing to give up Kau tſû. I have deceived you, anſwer'd Ki ſing, that I might give him an Opportunity to eſcape. Hyang yu, in a great Paſſion, ordered Ki ſing to be burnt on the Spot.

(⊥) Ywen yang, was the Enemy of Shau tſo: The firſt had given the Emperor a uſeful Advice, which had been followed. As it related to a Tributary Prince; Ywen yang, that he might ruin Shau tſo, by his Intrigues, alarmed all the Tributary Princes, who took up Arms againſt the Emperor. They were appeaſed by ſacrificing Shau tſo. This was what Ywen yang wanted.

Merit? People never ſcruple to ſay, that the Prince has no Underſtanding. If a Prince ſpeaks pretty frequently, he is a Caviller. Does he ſpeak little? There is nothing in him; and he does not know how to inſtruct thoſe who are about him. Does he follow the Dictates of his Humour, and ſhow ſome Paſſion? He ſpreads over the Court, and through the whole Empire, a very prejudicial Terror. Is he moderate, eaſy, and indulgent? The Laws and his Orders are ill obſerved. Are the People at eaſe? The (‖) Officers have too much to do, and are diſcouraged. Are the Officers ſatisfied? The People are harraſſed, and complain. All the Empire is like a great Tree, of which the Court is, as it were, the Trunk and the Root. Cannot a Prince then know, all the diſaſterous Events that afflict his State? No Skin, no Hair, ſays an antient Proverb. The eſſential Point therefore to a State, is, that the Court be provided with good Miniſters. That is true, but Miniſters like (*) I in and Fû ywé, are very rare.

The Court being provided in good Miniſters, the next Point of Conſequence is, to have faithful, able, and indefatigable Generals on the Frontiers. But the (†) Whey ſhang, and the Li mû, are hard to find at preſent. Beſides, when a Prince is ſo happy, as to find People of ſuch a Merit, he cannot help taking a liking for them. After he is inſtructed of the Danger a Man ſuffers on the Frontiers, he does great Violence to himſelf, in ſending Perſons, whom he loves, thither: He knows, that on the other Hand, if he fails to ſend them, he is in danger to ſee the Leaves of his great Tree fall, and its Branches cut down. Nay, perhaps the Tree periſh intirely: What does not a Prince, who has an equal Share of Goodneſs and Wiſdom, ſuffer when this is the Caſe? As for me, when I am revolving theſe Thoughts in my Mind, I feel all the Weight of Royalty: But being yet more ſenſible of another's Pains, than of my own, I frequently ſay, to myſelf: If a Prince, who is an abſolute Maſter, has ſo much to ſuffer, what muſt they ſuffer, who without being Maſters like him, ſhare and bear with him the Weight of Government? The I king ſays, The Chineſe Books do not drain their Subjects. Thus, Words ſeldom give the exact Meaning of Thoughts, in all their Extent. I have aimed at nothing in this Diſcourſe, but to expreſs in a few Words, that which employs me inwardly. Tho', according to the Proverb, He who ſuffers, has ſome Comfort in ſinging his Pains; yet this is not the Reaſon why I have taken up my Pen. I am yet farther, from endeavouring to dazzle the Sight by a ſhining Diſcourſe. I ſtrive to inſtruct myſelf: This is my End. But at the ſame time, I do not at all bluſh, to lay before all wiſe Men in this Writing, my Thoughts and my Sentiments.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Nothing is better conceived, or better expreſt, than what Tay tſong ſays of Government in general, and of the Choice of Officers in particular. This is remembring Antiquity to purpoſe. Tay tſong did more; he imitated it. His Government almoſt equall'd that of our three famous Dynaſties.

The ſame Emperor Tay tſong, in the third of the Years called Chin quan (A), made the following Ordinance.

THE Virtue (†) Hyau, is the Foundation of all the other Virtues. It is the moſt eſſential Inſtruction. In my Youth, I received good Leſſons upon this Virtue. My Father, and my Maſter, did not only make me repeat the Book of Verſes, the Book of Rites, and others, but at the ſame time, they let me ſee the great Springs, upon which the Good of States and the Government of People depend. With theſe Advantages I extirpated by one Expedition, all the Enemies of the State; and ſecured Quiet and Liberty to my People, who had juſt emerg'd from beneath Oppreſſion. Beſides, my Heart is full of Goodneſs; and if at any Time, I have diſcovered more Juſtice and Severity, than Clemency, the Reaſon is, becauſe there are Crimes, to which Mercy cannot be abſolutely extended; in the ſame manner, as there are ſome Enemies, with whom we muſt neceſſarily uſe Force and Courage. I have had nothing in View, but the Good of the whole, and the Peace of the Empire. Paſſion has no ſhare in what I have done. The Emperor, my Father, when he retir'd to Ta ngan, charged me with the Government. I was obliged to obey him. As I feel all its Weight, it is all my Employment. I am in the Inſide of my Palace, and amongſt my Queens, as if I were in a frozen Valley. Frequently do I paſs whole Nights without Sleep. I riſe before Day. All my Words and Thoughts, are directed to anſwer, as far as I am able, the Goodneſs of (‡) Tyen, and the Intentions of my Father. That I may better ſucceed herein; being full of Compaſſion even for the Guilty, I want to regulate Puniſhments anew, to prevent and relieve the Miſery of the People; to puniſh and check thoſe who oppreſs them; to invite near my Perſon, and to put in Poſts, Men of Virtue and Merit; to open a wide Door to Remonſtrances, and to take away from thoſe who would preſent them, all Dread; that I may thereby, if poſſible, make new Acquirements in Knowledge, every Moment.

(‖) In the Chineſe it is Quan; under which are comprehended equally, all the Judges, Magiſtrates, Officers of War &c. Some French Books have uſed another Expreſſion, calling them Mandarins. This, if one has a mind, may ſerve here; and in other Paſſages, where I have uſed the Term Officers. I muſt only inform the Reader, that the Word Mandarin, has no Reſemblance to the Chineſe Sound. I believe it is a Portugueze Word, and is derived from Mandar to Ordain.

(A) The third of the Years Chin quan, anſwers to the third Year of his Reign, and of Chriſt, 629. Theſe Names of Years are, as it were, Epochas, Marks, or Titles, by which the Years of every Emperor are deſignated; for the Chineſe never mention their Emperors, whether dead or living, by their proper Names, out of reverence to them, as if they were too ſacred to be pronounced. The curious chronological Table of the Chineſe, publiſhed by P. Fouquet, [as already obſerved, P. 133. Note L.] gives us theſe Epochas of the Emperors, ſome of whom have had no leſs than ten, during the Courſe of their Reign. Without this Table we ſhould have been at a Loſs to fix the Dates of the Decrees, which the Miſſionary who tranſlated them from the Chineſe, ought to have done, for his Readers ſatisfaction.

My

My Application in all this, is ſo conſtant, that I don't even allow myſelf one Day of Relaxation. My great Paſſion is, that every thing may be regular; that my Subjects may follow Reaſon in all things, and may be ſolidly virtuous. Thus, when I ſee any thing not in its proper Place, and any of my Subjects vicious, I immediately take myſelf to Taſk, for the ſmall Talent I have for Inſtruction, and effectual Reformation: I have good Reaſon for doing all this. For in ſhort, the Shu king ſays, Virtue, when pure and ſolid, touches (§) Shin: What effect then, muſt it not have upon the People? I am told from different Quarters, that the People enter into their Duty; that Robberies are become rare; and that the Priſons in ſeveral Cities are empty. I learn all this with Pleaſure: But I forbear to attribute it to my Care and Example. My Reflections on this Head, are as follows; People are weary, ſay I ſo my ſelf, of Commotions and Rapines: They are now returning to the Paths of Virtue: Theſe happy Diſpoſitions muſt be improved, in order to endeavour the Converſion of the whole Empire. My military Expeditions have occaſioned me to run over a great Part of the Provinces. At every Village I came to, I ſigh'd and beat my Breaſt, at the Miſery of the poor People: Being convinced of it with my own Eyes, I did not allow one Man to be imployed in the uſeleſs Averages. I did my beſt, to make all my Subjects live at Eaſe, to the end, that Parents might be more able to educate their Children well, that their Children on their Parts, might acquit themſelves better of all their Duties with Regard to their Parents, and that the other Virtues may flouriſh with the Virtue Hyau.

In order to make known to my whole Empire, that I have nothing more at Heart; When this Ordinance is publiſhed, let there be given in my Name, and on my Part, in every Diſtrict, five Meaſures of Rice, to thoſe who diſtinguiſh themſelves by their Hyau; two Meaſures to every one who is Fourſcore Years of Age; Three to thoſe who are Ninety; as many to thoſe who are a Hundred, together with two Pieces of Stuff: Beſides, at the Beginning of every Moon, let a Meaſure of Rice be given to every Woman who brings forth a Son. As for they, whom the Calamities of the Times have forced to abandon their Country; let ſome be at Pains to perſwade them to return, and at their Return, let them be furniſhed at my Expence, with what may put them on Foot again, in the ſame Condition as formerly. I likewiſe ordain, the general Officers of every Province, to examine carefully, which of their ſubaltern Officers are excellent, which good, and which bad, in order to ſend me a ſealed Liſt of them. That each Officer in his Diſtrict, take care to inform me if there are any, no matter in what Station, in whom is deſcerned a true Talent for Buſineſs or for War, or have diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their Virtue; let a Memorial for this Effect be drawn up. Laſtly, if there are any, who, having been a little debauched in the late Commotions, have reclaimed themſelves ſo far, as to amend in Time of Peace. I likewiſe want to be informed about them. To bewail ones Faults, and to correct them, is a Thing, that many of our ancient Kings, whoſe Example I much value, have eſteemed. Let this preſent Ordinance be immediately publiſhed. It is a common and a true Saying, that one Day being unhappily loſt, the Loſs is frequently felt for three Years. The Empire cannot be too ſoon inſtructed in my Intentions.

In the third of the Years, named Chin quan, Li ta lyang was raiſed to the Dignity of Ta ſû, and had the Government of all the Territory of Leang chew given him. Some time after, a Deputy of the Emperor Tay tſong paſſing that Way, ſaw an excellent Hawk, and immediately propoſed to Ta lyang, to make a Preſent of it to the Emperor. Ta lyang gave it to the Deputy, in order to ſend it if he thought fit. In the mean Time, he ſecretly conveyed to the Emperor, a Memorial conceived in the following Terms.

YOUR Majeſty, long ago, openly laid aſide the Diverſion of Hunting. Yet one of your Deputies has aſked a Bird for you, for that Purpoſe. He either did it becauſe he well knew your Inclinations in that Point, and thought that it would give you a Pleaſure; or he has done it of his own Head, and without knowing your Intentions. If the Latter was the Caſe, he muſt be a very weak Fellow, and very unfit for his Employment; But if he knew your Intentions, your Majeſty muſt have changed your firſt Reſolutions, and as it were, annulled your former Orders.

TAY TSONG's ANSWER.

YOUR rare Ability for Affairs, both of Peace and War, joined to a ſingular Honeſty, and an unſhaken Firmneſs, induc'd me to commit to your Care, the Management and Safety of a People, at a great Diſtance from me, and almoſt Forreigners. I am extemely well ſatisfied with the Manner in which you diſcharge this important Truſt. I am charmed with the Honour you acquire, and I have always in my Mind, your Services and Zeal. I have not indeed tried the Officer, who was the occaſion of my being preſented with the Hawk; but I have a due Eſteem for the good Advice you ſend me on this Occaſion, at ſuch a Diſtance, and for your Care in recalling to your Memory, the Paſt, in order to my being inſtructed with Regard to the Future. I read your honeſt Heart thro' all your Writing, and while I read, I ſighed, and inceſſantly praiſed you. Am I not happy, ſaid I to myſelf, in having ſuch an Officer? Never deviate from your Honeſty; perſevere to the end, in worthily filling the high Rank you poſſeſs. To this Conduct, ſays the Shi king, the Favour of the Shin, and the greateſt Proſperity, are inſeperable. In the Opinion (§) Shin, ſignifies a Spirit. I have elſewhere tranſlated it Spirits; the Reader may uſe it as he has a mind. For the Text does not determine, neither here nor in other Places, whether it be of the Singular or Plural Number.

nion of our Antients, an Advice given in Seaſon, is a very rich Preſent. The Advice I have now got from you, certainly has its own Value; and to ſhew you that I eſteem it, I ſend you three Veſſels of Gold, which are not indeed maſſy, but they have been uſed by me. One of the moſt proper Methods for your worthily filling your important Employments, and your ſupporting your high Reputation, is, to employ your leiſure Hours, in reading ſome uſeful Book. That I may animate you to this, I augment my Preſent, with a Copy of the Hiſtory of the Han, written by Sun. The Facts are there laid down in few, but well choſen, Words, and the political Obſervations are maſterly: So that one may ſay, that this Book contains the Subſtance of the great Art of Governing, and the mutual Duties of Sovereigns and Subjects. I hope that you will read this Book with the greater Care, as you receive it from me.

Towards the End of the Years, named Chin quan, the ſame Emperor Tay tſong, compoſed, for the Inſtruction of his Son and Heir, a Book, intituled the Rule of Sovereigns. This Book conſiſted of twelve Chapters. The firſt was intituled, Concerning what regards the Perſon of the Sovereign: The ſecond, Concerning his advancing Relations: The third, Of the Care in ſearching for wiſe Men: The fourth, Of the Choice of Officers: The fifth, Of Readineſs to hear Advice and Remonſtrances: The ſixth, Of his Care to baniſh Backbiting and Calumny: The ſeventh recommends, The avoiding of Pride: The eighth, The Love of a decent Frugality: The ninth treats, Of Rewards and Puniſhments: The tenth, Of Application in promoting Agriculture: The eleventh treats, Of the military Art, of which a Prince ought not to be ignorant: And the twelfth, Of the Learning, which he ought principally to eſteem and cultivate. All theſe Matters were treated in ſuch a manner, as ſerved both to form the Prince to Virtue, and to teach him how to govern well. Tay tſong addreſſes this Book to his Son, and begins with the following Preface.

THESE twelve Chapters, tho' they are ſhort, contain the great Rules of our ancient and wiſe Kings, and the Duties of good Princes. On a Prince depend Troubles or Peace, the Ruin or Proſperity of his State. It is eaſy to know theſe Rules, and to be acquainted with theſe Duties: But the great Point is to follow, and to fulfill them: This is not ſo eaſy: And it is ſtill more difficult to perſevere invariably in them, to the end. It muſt not be imagined, that theſe wicked Princes, knew no other Path, but that of Vice; and that our wiſe and virtuous Emperors, whoſe Memories are ſo much celebrated, were unacquainted with all Paths, but thoſe of Virtue. Both the one and the other, knew the two different Roads: But the one is downwards, and eaſy to follow; The other leads over Heights that ſeem fatiguing. Groveling Souls, without regarding the other, follow the eaſy Path, which conducts them to their Ruin. Great Souls, on the contrary, without being diſcouraged at the Difficulty, bravely take the other Road. But the Proſperity which ſoon attends them, rewards their Courage. Thus Men, by their different Conduct, become happy or unhappy, and all that is told us of the Gates of good and bad Fortune, are either allegorical Repreſentations of what I have now mention'd, or elſe, they are mere Fictions.

If (†) you would reign as you ought, you muſt tread the Paths of the great Souls. Propoſe to yourſelf as your Patterns, and take for your Maſters, our wiſeſt Princes. Do not confine yourſelf to what I have done. He who endeavours to imitate our greateſt Princes, frequently comes far ſhort of them. If a Man aſpires only at what is midling, he bids fair not to reach even that. No! Nothing, but a virtue of the firſt Rate, ought to be your Pattern. For my ſhare, ſince I mounted the Throne, I have committed many Faults. I have been over curious about fine Stuffs and Embroideries, and even Pearls and precious Stones. To make a conſtant Uſe of theſe, as I have done, is guarding very ill againſt the Paſſions. I have adorned my Buildings with Sculptures, I have gone ſo far, as to raiſe ſome Terraſſes. This cannot be done, without acting too inconſiſtently with what is called a Praiſe-worthy Frugality. I provided myſelf in Dogs, Horſes and Hawks, even from the moſt diſtant Countries. It is an empty Curioſity which breaks in upon Diſintereſtedneſs, and perfect Temperance. In ſhort, I have made ſome Journies of Pleaſure, by which, many have ſuffered. This diſcovers a groſs Ignorance of one's Self, and a great Diſregard of others. Don't make my Example, your Authority. I look upon it, as being ſo faulty, that it might have been attended with fatal Conſequences. If it has not, it is owing to my having on the other Hand, re-eſtabliſhed the Empire in Peace and Tranquillity. If I have wronged any of my Subjects, I have much oftner relieved their Neceſſities, and I commonly ſupplied them with Plenty. The Advantages attending my Victories, my paternal Cares, and my Goodneſs, have made them either to forget my Faults, or bear with them without repining. They even praiſe and applaud me; but notwithſtanding of all that is ſaid of my Reign, I acknowledge a great many Faults, upon which I cannot think without Shame and Repentance. If you imitate theſe Faults, what will you not have to dread? You, I ſay, to whom the Empire as yet owes nothing, and who owe the Empire, only to the Happineſs of your Birth. But if, by aſſuming Inclinations worthy of your Rank, you practiſe and promote Virtue; if you undertake nothing but what ſhe authoriſes, your Life will be happy, and your Reign glorious. If, on the contrary, you ſhall abandon yourſelf to your Caprice and Paſſion, you will forfeit your Empire, and loſe your Life. It requires Ages to eſtabliſh, and but Moments to ruin, Empires. Nothing is more eaſy than to loſe a Throne, but great is the Difficulty in riſing to it by Merit. Can a Sovereign then be too watchful and attentive?

(†) He ſpeaks to his Son.

An

An Author, named Hû ſan ſeng, ſays of this Preface. Tay tſong, here acknowledges and confeſſes his Faults: This is very commendable; but it appears, that he writes all this for his Son; and the great failing of this Prince, was his Love for Women. Notwithſtanding this, Tay tſong does not give him one Caution againſt this Paſſion: Nothing is more true than the Saying, that Parents never know the Faults of their Children.

An Author, called Ting fong, reaſons otherwiſe upon the ſame Subject, and ſays: According to the Maxims of our Antients, nothing is more commendable in Princes, than not to doat upon Women. Tay tſong, who in this Rule of Sovereigns, ſo exactly inſtructed the Son in every other Point, never ſpoke of this important one. Was this becauſe, perceiving that this was his own weak ſide, he was afraid, ſhould he mention it, of giving People Occaſion to talk? One thing is certain, that Kau tſong his Succeſſor, had ſo blind a Paſſion for a Woman during his Life, that he left her when he died, the Government of the Empire, which had well nigh ruined all. The Silence of Tay tſong, upon ſo important a Head, ſeems to confirm what is too much verified in other Reſpects; That Princes have commonly ſome darling Faults, which they do not like ſhould be touched upon.

The ſame Emperor Tay tſong, marching in Perſon towards Korea, and arriving at Ing chew, gave order, that the Bones of the Officers and Soldiers, who had died in the War of Lyau tong, ſhould be carefully looked for and collected. He cauſed them all to be brought together, near the City Lyew chew. He then ordered the Magiſtrates of the Place, to prepare an Animal of the firſt Claſs. He next performed in honour of the Dead, the Ceremony called Tſi: He likewiſe made uſe of a (*) Tſi wen of his own Compoſition, and wept ſo bitterly, that all his Army was deeply affected.

A Declaration by one of the Emperors of the Dynaſty of the Tang.

IT is a true Saying, That Pearls and precious Stones are of no Uſe, either for Food or Raiment. They do not of themſelves, protect us from Cold or Hunger. It is the ſame, with diverſe other vain Ornaments. Ven ti, one of the Han, very rightly ſays, That Sculpture, Ingraving, and ſuch like Arts, are detrimental to Agriculture: That Embroidery, and other Works of that Kind, do, moſt perniciouſly, divert Women from employing themſelves, as formerly, in making uſeful Stuffs, and Garments for common Wear. That wiſe Prince aſcribed to theſe Diſorders, the Cold and Want which his People underwent. Kya i, who lived in the Reign of Ven ti, carried theſe Reflections yet farther. A Man, ſays he, who does not eat twice a Day, ſuffers Hunger; and, if he lets a Year ſlip, without making himſelf any Cloaths, he endures Cold in the Winter. Now, when a Perſon undergoes Cold and Hunger, nothing can reſtrain him: In ſuch a Caſe, the tendereſt Mother cannot reſtrain her Child; and therefore, by a far more cogent Reaſon, how ſhould a Prince reſtrain his People?

Raiſed, as I am, above the People, above the Nobles, and above the Kings, loaded, in Spite of my Debility, with the Care of making my Empire happy, I inceſſantly apply my ſelf to it, ſo far as to forget, even my neceſſary Meals and my Sleep. I would gladly revive Simplicity and Innocence in my Empire: Yet, as that is not to be hoped for, while our People are in Want, I would fain have every individual Family ſufficiently provided for. But alas! I am unable to bring that about. My Granaries are in a manner, empty, and the Scarcity ſtill continues. If there happen but the leaſt Drought or Inundation, my People will, as heretofore, be reduced to feed upon Bran. When I ſearch for the particular Cauſes of this Calamity, I find myſelf to be the ſole Occaſion thereof: By the Delicacy of my Table, and Richneſs of my Attire, I have taught my Subjects, high Feeding and Luxury.

In ſhort, People follow the Inclinations of Princes, and not their Inſtructions; it being very rare, that a Sovereign's Exhortation reclaims thoſe whom he hath corrupted by his Example: And, accordingly our prudent Monarchs of old, made their own perſonal Conduct, the principal Springs of Government. By this means, they effectually corrected all Abuſes, and made their Subjects virtuous. In Times nearer our own, ſome Princes, without being able to equal, have imitated them with Succeſs? And why ſhall not I do the like? For me to aim at inſpiring my People with good Oeconomy and Frugality, with Simplicity and Integrity, while they behold me uſing choice Silks, Pearls, Embroidery, and coſtly Gems, is to attempt an Impoſſibility (†). Yes, I at length know it to be a certain Truth, that it behoves the Sovereign to ſet the Example; and I will do it.

All my Gold and Silver Moveables, with other Ornaments of thoſe Metals, ſhall be melted down for the Payment of my Troops, and ſuch like Occaſions: And as for my rich Garments, my Pearls, Diamonds, and other precious Stones, Things ſufficiently uſeleſs, I am inſtantly going to deſtroy them all in a Fire, before my Apartment; to convince my whole Empire, that I abhor and deteſt Luxury. Since a ſincere and upright Heart, has the Power to move Tyen or Heaven, I likewiſe reckon, it may touch my Subjects; and that, at leaſt, they will obey ſuch of my Orders, as they ſhall ſee ſupported by my Example. To begin with my Palace, I ordain, that the Queens, Princes, and Concubines, do henceforward array themſelves in Garments, whoſe finery, ſhall conſiſt ſolely in being neat and decent. I forbid their wearing Pearls or any other Ornaments of Price. (‡) I will, if poſſible, bring Matters to ſuch a Paſs, that Gold ſhall be no more eſteemed than (*) A Kind of Funeral Oration.

(†) The Chineſe Original ſays, It is the ſame, as thinking to ſtop a Pot of Water from boiling, by increaſing the Fire under it; or not to be wet, and yet leap into a River.

(‡) In the Chineſe, is ſpeceſied one particular Sort of Ornament, named Tſii, made of the Feathers of a certain Bird, of a violet Colour, very rare, and highly eſteemed. [It is mentioned before.]

than common Earth (*): I will, at leaſt, abſolutely baniſh Luxury. Moderation and Frugality are the Means, whereby People's Wants are to be relieved: It is my Deſire, that theſe Virtues ſhould flouriſh in my Empire. Let this my preſent Declaration be immediately publiſhed, and be it known unto all Men, that ſuch is my Will and Pleaſure.

In the fifth of thoſe Years, ſtiled Whey chang, (z) Vu Tſong, one of the Emperors of the Dynaſty of the Tang, publiſhed the following Ordinance.

UNDER our [firſt] three renouned Dynaſties, there never was the leaſt mention of Fo: (†) It has been only ſince the Dynaſties of the Han and the Whey, that this Sect, which introduced Images, began to ſpread itſelf over China. Thence downwards thoſe foreign Cuſtoms have been eſtabliſhed inſenſibly, for want of taking proper Care to prevent it, and are ſtill gaining Ground daily. The People are unhappily bigotted to them, whereby the State is a Sufferer. In the two Courts, in all the Cities, and in the Mountains, nothing is to be ſeen but Bonzas (‡) of both Sexes. The Number and Magnificence of the (A) Bonzaries, are every Day augmenting: Multitudes of Artiſans, are perpetually employed in making for them, Images of all Sorts of Materials: Vaſt Quantities of Gold and Silver, are conſumed to adorn them. Many People forget their Prince, their Parents and Relations, to ſtation themſelves under a Bonza Maſter. (B) There are alſo many wicked Wretches, who abandon Wives and Children, to ſeek among the Bonza's Sanctuary, to ſcreen and protect them from the Laws. Can any thing be more pernicious than this? Our Anceſtors held it for a Maxim; that if there was but one Man who did not labour, and but one Woman who neglected employing herſelf in ſomething appertaining to the Silk Manufactures, ſome one in the State was ſenſible of the Omiſſion, and underwent either Cold or Hunger. How then muſt the Caſe be, in theſe our Times, when infinite Swarms of Bonzas, both Male and Female, are fed and cloathed by the Sweat of others, and employ in all Parts, at an immenſe Coſt, vaſt Numbers of Workmen, in building and adorning ſtately Edefices? (C) Are we to ſeek for any other Cauſe of that Poverty, to which the Empire was reduced, during the Dynaſties of the Tſin, Song, Tſi, and Lyang, and of all the Impoſtures and Knaveries, wherewith thoſe Times abounded?

As to our Dynaſty of the Tang, the Princes, who were its Founders, after having ſucceſsfully employed the Force of Arms to reſtore the State to its priſtine Tranquillity, took care to eſtabliſh it by prudent Laws; and in order to affect it, far from borrowing any thing from that vile foreign Sect, in the very firſt of thoſe Years, ſtiled Chin quan, the Emperor Tay tſong, declared himſelf againſt it: But he proceeded with too much Lenity and Indolence, ſo that the Evil has only increaſed. For my own Part, after having read, and ſeriouſly conſidered the ſeveral Repreſentations made to me on this Subject, and having maturely deliberated thereon, with wiſe and intelligent Perſons, I am come to a Reſolution. It is a Grievance, and ſome Remedy muſt be applied. All my well affected and experienced Officers, throughout the Provinces, preſs me to ſet a Hand to the Work: This, in their Opinion, is the Way to dry up the Spring of thoſe Errors, which overſpread the whole Empire, and to re-eſtabliſh the Government of our Anceſtors. they think it is the common Intereſt; and that the very Life of our People, conſiſts in doing it. after this, how can we excuſe ourſelves from applying the Means? Here then follows what I do ordain. 1. That more then 4600 great Bonzaries, [or Monaſteries] which are diſperſed throughout the Empire, ſhall be entirely demoliſhed: Conſequently the He and She Bonzas, (D) who have their Abode in thoſe Bonzaries, and by a moderate Computation, amount to no fewer than 26 (E) Wan, muſt again become Seculars, and pay their Shares of the uſual Taxes. 2. That there be alſo deſtroyed upwards of four (F) Wan of leſſer Bonzaries, which are ſpread up and down the Provinces: And conſequently all the Lands thereunto annexed, amounting to ſeveral Wan of Tſing, (§) muſt revert to our Domains: Likewiſe, that fifteen Wan, [or 150,000] of Slaves, appertaining to the Bonzas, be inrolled by the reſpective Magiſtrates, and accounted as part of the People. With regard to ſuch out-landiſh Bonzas as are come hither, either from Ta tſing, (+) or Mû

(*) He alludes to a Saying of Kau ti, firſt Emperor of the Dynaſty of the Tſi. Viz. If I reign only ten Years, I will make Gold and Earth bear one Price. [See P. 109.]

(z) In the French it is ou Tſong, as if Tſong was another Name, of the Year Whey chang, which was the 5th of Vû tſong. See the laſt Note in this Page.

(†) The Name of a certain Sectary of Hinduſtan, whoſe Doctrine paſſed into China, not long after the Birth of Chriſt.

(‡) I uſe this Word [Bonza] ſays our Author, becauſe it is uſed in other French Books; tho' it is not of Chineſe Original [it was firſt brought into Europe by the Portugueze, who ſeem to have coined it; The Chineſe Word being Seng or Ho-ſhang, which the Author ought at leaſt to have given us.]

(A) This Word ſeems to be coined by the Jeſuit, who tranſlated theſe Declarations, to ſupply the Place of Monaſteries, which Name he is not willing to give them: tho' in Effect, they are ſuch, and are ſo called by other Miſſionaries, in ſeveral Parts of this Work.

(B) They are Sanctuaries for all Sorts of Villains, like the Romiſh Monaſteries; which for that Reaſon, will equally fall under the Laſh of this Declaration.

(C) Has not the ſame Complaint been made againſt the Romiſh Clergy; and ought not the Romiſh Princes to mind thoſe Arguments coming from a Chineſe, which they diſregard in Proteſtants, as the Effect of Prejudice?

(D) For there are Bonzaries of Women, as well as of Men; juſt like the Monaſteries and Nunneries in popiſh Countries.

(E) A Wan is 10,000, ſo that 26 Wan, amount to 260,000

(F) Or 40,000.

(§) A certain Land Meaſure ſo named.

(+) Several Europeans pretend, that Ta tſing is Paleſtine; at leaſt, it is certain from a Monument ſtill extant, that under the Dynaſty of the Tang, ſome Chriſtian Prieſts came into China, who had Churches in more than one Part of the Country, and lived in common. But we cannot eaſily diſcover by this Monument, whether they were Catholics, or Neſtorians: [Nor does it matter which they were. But ſince they are ſayed in the Monument, to come from Ta tſing or Tan tſin, it appears from the Ordinance, that they underwent the ſame Fate as the Bonzas; nay, what is more remarkable, are conſidered themſelves as Bonzas: Which ſhews, there appeared to the Chineſe, the ſame conformity between their Religion and that of the Bonzas, which we have already obſerved, and ſhall, in its proper Place, ſhew there is between the latter and the Romiſh. The Generality of thoſe who read the French will find it difficult to know, when, and by what Emperor, this Decree was made; for his Name is omitted or Mû hû pa, to propagate the Law, profeſſed in their reſpective Regions, and are in Number, about 3,000: It is my Decree, that they alſo return to a ſecular Life; To the end, that the Cuſtoms of our Empire may be uniform, and unmixed. Alas! The putting them on their ancient Footing has been but too long deferred: Why ſhould they be deferred any longer? It is a Matter ſettled and concluded on. At Sight of this preſent Ordinance, let every one proceed to Execution. Such is our Will and Pleaſure.

A Gloſs ſays, That this Decree was actually executed, ſome few Particulars only excepted. That two great Bonzaries, with thirty Bonza's belonging to each, were left ſtanding both in the Northern, and the Southern Court; that one Bonzary alſo was ſuffer'd to remain in every Government, with a certain Number of Bonzas; that thoſe Bonzaries were diſtinguiſhed into three different Orders; and that the Number of Bonzas was not alike in all of them.

Wey ching's Remonſtrance to the Emperor Tay tſong.

IT effectually behoves a Prince to love the Good and hate the Wicked; to place near his own Perſon, Men of Virtue and Merit; and to remove from about him, thoſe who are deſtitute thereof. By entertaining the former, he furniſhes his Court with ſelect Perſons: By keeping at a Diſtance the latter, he avoids being ſurprized by the Artifices, which Intereſt and their Paſſions are on every Occaſion, ſuggeſting to them. As to the reſt, there is no Man ſo bad, but that he has one laudable Quality, and does ſome little Good: Nor any, however prudent and virtuous, but has ſome Foible, and is ſometimes guilty of ſlight Faults. But then the Imperfection in this latter, reſembles a minute Spot or Blemiſh in a fine Jewel; while the little Good which the former has in him, may be compared to the ſharpened Edge of a Knife-Blade, made only of Lead. This Blade, may indeed be uſed once: But is it, on that Score, held in any Eſteem? On the contrary, a ſkilful Jeweller, does not refuſe a beautiful Gem, on account of a ſmall Blemiſh. To ſuffer ones ſelf to be impoſed on, or captivated by ſuch ſlight good Qualities as may be found in a Man, otherways monſtrouſly vicious; and to be diſcouraged at ſlender Defects, in a Perſon otherways of Virtue and Capacity, is to confound the moſt differing Scents, and to be unable to diſtinguiſh a Diamond of the higheſt Value, from a common Pebble.

But it is a much greater Misfortune, when a Prince, ſufficiently qualified to diſtinguiſh Men of ſollid Virtue and real Merit, from ſuch as have neither, neglects to invite the firſt, or reject the laſt. You, Great Prince, have an intrepid Courage, joined with a moſt penetrating Wit and Diſcernment; a moſt majeſtic Air, and uncommon Capacity, unite in your Perſon. But you do not, methinks, ſufficiently temper your Love and your Hatred; and that redounds greatly to your Prejudice: Hence it proceeds, that notwithſtanding your Fondneſs for Men of Virtue and Merit, the Choice you make, is not the moſt exact: Hence it proceeds, that you have ſtill in your Court, Flatterers, whatever Averſion you have to Adulation. But you, more eſpecially, ſuffer yourſelf to be carried too far, by your Averſion to Evil. When you are told Good of any one, you ſeem not to believe it: Are you told Ill of one? you inſtantly take it for granted. How great ſoever your Talent may be, it is ſtill better you ſhould be diffident thereof. Your Conduct in this Particular, ſeems to me, liable to many Inconveniences. How comes this to paſs? It is thus.

As it is the Property of honeſt Men, to ſay what Good they know of others: On the contrary, it is the Cuſtom of baſe Spirits, to ſpeak Ill of every one indiſcriminately. If the Prince eaſily believes the Ill which is told him, and is not ready to believe the Good he hears of People, he takes the direct Way to incourage Slander and Calumny: Which of courſe would be opening the Gate to wicked Men, and ſhutting it againſt good ones. This is a Failing of evil Conſequence; for it puts, as if it were a Wall of Seperation, between the Sovereign and his virtuous Subjects. Do any Troubles afterwards happen to ariſe? Are the Prince and State in any Danger? There are none found at Court to apply a Remedy. There are two Sorts of Intimaces, which ought well to be diſtinguiſhed: The firſt is, that of good Men among themſelves. Of this Tie, Virtue is the Knot. They mutually eſteem each other. This Eſteem engages them to aſſiſt and ſupport each other on every proper Occaſion; but it is always by honourable Methods. The ſecond is, that of baſe and wicked Souls: Tho deſtitute either of Love or Eſteem, they fail not uniting thro' Intereſt, and helping each other in their Intrigues. The firſt of theſe Unions has nothing in it but what is juſt, and muſt be uſeful to the Prince: The ſecond is pure Cabal, nor is there any Thing more pernicious. The Misfortune is, that one may be miſtaken for the other; and in ſuch Caſe, the Conſequences are terrible. For if the Prince takes for Cabal, what is ſayed or done, by Perſons of Virtue and Merit, in behalf of one another, he keeps on his Guard, he miſtruſts, and ſhews them no manner of Reſpect: If, by a ſecond Error, he takes for a ſincere and upright Zeal, the Liberty, wherewith ſome buz in his Ears, Calumnies againſt this and that Perſon, and believes all they tell him, it is ſtill much worſe; For he will baniſh from his Preſence, his beſt Subjects, or at leaſt, grow diffident of them. This they will ſoon perceive: But in removing the Cauſe or diſguis'd (See before Note z) in the Title of the Ordinance: (whether by a Miſtake of the Printer, or with Deſign by the Tranſlator, to conceal this remarkable Event, I ſhall not pretend to ſay,) and only the Year of his Title mentioned; but that Circumſtance helps to diſcover the Secret: For by the Chronological Table (mentioned P. 133. Note t. and 514.) the fifth of the Years, named Whey chang, (or as it is written in the ſaid Table Quey chang) is the fifth Year of the Emperor Vû tſong, which falls in the Year of Chriſt 845, when conſequently this Ordinance was publiſhed. The Difference between the Title of Years in the two Authors, happens by an eaſy Miſtake in the Printer or Engraver, of an H for a K, or a K, for an H: Du Halde writing it Hoei tchang and Fouquet, Kuei tchang.]

Cauſe of his Jealouſy, they may not give him all the Light which would be neceſſary. Such of his inferior Officers as are privy to the Intrigues, dare not once open their Mouths to make a Diſcovery. From the Court, this Evil ſpreads itſelf into the Provinces; and if it be not ſpedily plucked up by the very Root, its Conſequences are always very fatal. Nothing, indeed like this, has happened yet, nor will, tis to be hoped, in your Time. Your Majeſty's Views are, undoubtedly, extended beyond the preſent Juncture: You will prudently turn any Miſtakes, you may have committed of this Kind, to your Advantage; and know how to repair them to your Profit. But what may not be apprehended during ſome weaker Reign, and under a Prince leſs diſpoſed readily to recollect and correct himſelf? Your Majeſty cannot do it too ſoon. Be afraid of tranſmitting to your Deſcendants, amidſt ſo many ſhining Examples, the Faults I take notice of to your Majeſty. Let your Promptneſs, to rid yourſelf of it, teach them to ſhun it.

What I have been laying down, my Sovereign, properly ſpeaking, regards only the Choice of your Officers. I ſhall now offer a Piece of Counſel of a more general Concern, and ſo of more Importance, with Reſpect to your well Governing. It is, that you frequently conſult the beautiful Mirror (*) of Antiquity. Looking at ourſelves in a clear and ſtill Water, we behold our Faces, ſuch as they really are. A Prince, by comparing his own Conduct, with the Steps taken by the Sages of old, may paſs thereon a ſound Judgment. Informed thereby of his own Defects, the Error he commits, and what are his principal Duties, he leaves very little to be done by his Officers, whoſe Buſineſs it is to remark his Faults, and to give him Advice. He increaſes, as of himſelf, in Wiſdom and in Virtues. His Government grows daily, more and more perfect; and his Reputation augments proportionably. Conſequently, what's more worthy the Applications of a Monarch?

As to the reſt, the chief Care of our greateſt Princes, Whang ti, Yau, Shun, and Yu, was to make Virtue reign, and to inſpire their Subjects with the Love of it. In vain, would a Prince promiſe himſelf, by the Aſſiſtance of a Code, or Statute-Book, three Feet thick, to govern as they did, without taking Pains and beſtirring himſelf (†). In theſe happy Days, it was neither the Severity of Laws, nor the Rigour of Puniſhments, which regulated or reformed People's Manners: It was only the Virtue of thoſe Sage Princes. Careful not to allow any thing diſorderly in their own Conduct, and exerciſing on themſelves the ſtricteſt Juſtice, they treated their Subjects gently, and with Lenity: Whereby their Government, without being any way harſh or ſevere, was extremely vigorous. In effect, Mildneſs and Juſtice are the main Springs of Government: Theſe are the Springs, which in a State, ſhould give all Things their Motion; and if Chaſtiſements are uſed, they ought to apply them as the able Coachman does his Whip, by Intervals, and but very rarely.

What then moſt of all imports a Sovereign, is to be himſelf virtuous, and to inſpire his People with Virtue. Mankind are internally furniſhed with Reaſon and Paſſions; from whence outwardly proceed their good or bad Actions. Conſequently, the only way for them to root out all their Diſorders, is to regulate their Hearts. "To this end, our firſt rate Philoſophers have applied "their Care. Rightly to give Judgment in Cauſes, ſayed Confucius, is ſomething. I know ſome Men "capable of doing it. But what I would have, is, that ſome would do it in ſuch a Manner, as "not to need any farther Judgment thereupon." To ſucceed herein, what is to be done? The Way is prudently to regulate and eſtabliſh Rites; to inſtruct the People, to acquaint them with the Nature of their Paſſions, and arm them againſt Surpriſe from that Quarter; to oblige and encourage them to make Uſe of their Reaſon; to make tighter, if I may ſo expreſs it, the Ties of Nature, which is common to them, and inſpire them with a ſincere Affection for each other. This mutual Love, will eradicate all Inclinations to do harm; every one will ſtrive to perform his Duties, and Order will reign univerſally.

It will be in vain, to think of attaining this, by the Multitude or Rigour of Laws: Only Inſtruction, ſupported by good Example, can have ſuch a deſirable Effect. Accordingly, the wiſeſt of our Kings, have always aſſigned Puniſhments a Place many Degrees below Virtue and Morality: Nor did Shun, as the Shu king informs us, nominate Kyew yu, to preſide over the five Puniſhments, till he had firſt giving him orders to cauſe the five capital Inſtructions, to be thoroughly inculcated over all the Empire. Nay, farther: The End even of Puniſhments, is not merely to puniſh Faults, and make Malefactors ſuffer; but they are deſign'd, either to deter People from doing what is Evil, or to remedy ſome Diſorder; to widen the Path of Virtue, and ſtreighten that of Vice. In ſhort, Inſtruction and Example, ought to be the ordinary Occupations of Sovereigns. When they employ thoſe Means, every one imbibes great and generous Sentiments, and conducts himſelf by noble Principles; whereas, under bad Princes, however ſevere they may be in puniſhing, the Inclinations of the People being wholly baſe and corrupt, nothing is ſeen but Trouble and Diſorder.

It is, in proportion, the ſame, as to the Conduct of Magiſtrates, with Regard to the People under their Juriſdiction; and it may with Reaſon be affirmed, that the Figure of Metal has ſcarce more Dependance on the Form of the Crucible in which it is melted, or of the Mould it is to be caſt in, than have Peoples Manners on thoſe of the Princes and Magiſtrates, by whom they are governed: So that a Prince who ſhould imitate our ancient Kings, would revive thoſe happy Times.

(*) Poſſibly, this Diſcourſe was what induced Tay tſong to compoſe his Golden Mirror, whereof we have already given the Tranſlation, p. 510.

(†) The Chineſe has it, with his Hands a-croſs and doing nothing.

(‡) A famous Miniſter, by whoſe Aſſiſtance Whe kong, Prince of Tſi, became ſo powerful, that he was in a Manner, equal to the Emperor himſelf.

True

True it is, that thoſe great Monarchs have had very few perfect Imitators. But, even while the Dynaſty of the Chew was in its Decay, if the Government had not then, as formerly, Inſtruction and good Example for its Ground-Work, but greater Reckoning was made of the eſtabliſhed Laws, yet we find thoſe Laws to have been obſerved religiouſly. "A good Prince, (ſayed Quang "(*) chong) is guided by the Laws, and not by his own Views: He makes his particular Ideas "and Inclinations give Place to the general Opinion and Benefit; nor can he poſſibly proſper "otherwiſe."

Thus ſtood Matters during the firſt Year of your Majeſty's Reign. The Laws were your Rule: You obſerved them exactly in puniſhing Crimes; in doubtful Caſes, you ſet the Affair to be debated; you heard all the Suffrages with Patience, and you followed, without Heſitation, that Method which was moſt approved. Your People, made acquainted with your Decrees, and perſuaded of the Equity thereof, received them without murmuring. Your Officers, having Experience of your Steddineſs, in what you had once concluded on, dreaded no troubleſome Revocations, and ſeconded you zealouſly: Each had his Station and his Talents. But for ſome Years paſt, Things have changed. You gradually, nay, daily more and more, grow difficult, and even ſomewhat rigid. You ſometimes imitate thoſe Fiſhers, whoſe Net reſtrain the Fiſh on three Sides only, leaving them Room to eſcape on the fourth (†). At other Times, and that much more frequently, you imitate thoſe, who with Greedineſs hunt after the ſmall quantity of Fiſhes, which are to be found in the leaſt and the ſhalloweſt Rivulets (‡). Is a Choice to be made, but more eſpecially, are you to judge of a Fault? Your Humour and your Inclination, are the only Rules you then follow. Have you a Love for any Perſon? Let his Crime be ever ſo enormous, right or wrong, you excuſe him. Has any one the Misfortune not to pleaſe you? How light ſoever his Fault is, you find means to augment it, by diving into his very Intentions; and when any one makes you ſome Remonſtrance thereupon, you ſuſpect him guilty of Colluſion.

What follows ſuch a Conduct? Why, the Laws are rendered utterly uſeleſs; they are implored in vain, and the Magiſtrates dare not maintain them. You indeed, ſhut up their Mouths; but do not imagine, that in their Hearts, they acquieſce with your Decrees, and that thoſe Decrees are executed without Murmurs. We have a Law ſpecifying, That when the Criminal chances to be any Officer above the fourth Claſs, or Order, Care ſhall be taken, that all the ſuperior Officers, give in their Reports, touching his Crime. This Law was enacted in favour of the Accuſed's Rank and Degree. The View of thoſe who eſtabliſhed it, was, to ſcreen the Party from Calumny or Oppreſſion, and bring every thing to Light, which might prove to his Advantage. At preſent, quite contrariwiſe, this Law is groſely abuſed, in order to arm againſt the Accuſed, thoſe who have a Right of making the Report. Your Intentions being known to him, they ſearch for, and improve even the minuteſt Circumſtances, which may ſerve to aggravate the Faults; and ſeem afraid your Majeſty would be offended, if they did not repreſent them criminal enough. Nay, even when the Caſe is of ſuch a Nature, that no Law can be found whereby to judge him a Criminal, they examine him independantly of all Laws, and at length find means to make the Fault three times worſe than it really is. Your Mind, in the Point, is known; and this is the Reaſon why, for ſome Years paſt, all ſuch as are informed againſt, are in mortal Dread of having their Affair brought before you; and deem themſelves extremely fortunate, whenever it happens to be terminated in the Fa tſe (†).

As to the reſt, what you tranſact upon the Throne, and in your Court, your Miniſters and Officers do after the Example you ſet them, in their reſpective Tribunals. By this Means, Accuſations multiply; Proceedings are ſpun out; and, while the principal Point of Government is either neglected or forgotten, much Time is ſquandered in canvaſſing light Slips, and often mere Trifles. What will this pretended Exactneſs at length produce? It will occaſion Multitudes of Crimes, frequently very grievous ones, from the Method of puniſhing a ſingle Offence, and that often a trivial one; it will ſtop up the high Road to Juſtice, and increaſe the Numbers of Male-contents and ill-diſpoſed Perſons. This is not the way to baniſh Diſſenſions, or to cauſe Union, Tranquillity, and good Order, to reign in a State.

Hear what a celebrated Author ſays, putting his Words into the Mouth of a Prince. — "The "generality of People abhor filthy Debauches and Plunderings. Theſe Crimes I never pardon. "All People rejoice at it, and my Severity in puniſhing them, does not make me looked on as a "cruel Prince; becauſe I treat the Offenders anſwerably to the Idea of the Public, and the Horror which they have for thoſe Crimes: So that it is in Conjunction with the Public that I "judge them. The People have an Abhorrence alſo to Nakedneſs and Hunger: But it is a very "different Kind of Abhorrence; for every one, dreading them for his own Sake, compaſſionates "them in others. When therefore, I meet with any induced merely thro' Want to commit "a Fault, I am ready enough to pardon him; nor have I found that for ſo doing, the People "charged me, either with Partiality or Weakneſs. This is becauſe my Conduct herein, alſo cor-"reſponds with the Diſpoſitions of my Subjects: The Public pardons them at the ſame Time, "when I do. In ſhort, ſuch as I treat with Rigour, are, in the general Sentiments of my Peo-"ple, Objects of Abomination: And they to whom I ſhew Indulgence, are, alſo in the common "Opinion, Objects of Commiſeration. The Care I have thus to follow the common and gene-"ral Idea, gains me the Hearts of my Subjects, and ſo far prevails, that, without beſtowing many "Rewards,

(†) A Symbol, or Emblem, of Princes and Magiſtrates, who uſe Clemency and Compaſſion.

(‡) A Symbol of Rigour and greedy Exaction.

(†) A Tribunal or Court of Judicature ſo named.

" Rewards, I eaſily enough, bring them over to Goodneſs, and with puniſhing but rarely, effectu" ally turn them from Evil."

The Inference to be drawn from this, is, that in Matter of Puniſhments, a Prince who follows the general Idea and common Sentiment, hazards nothing; and that, tho' in following it, he ſhould puniſh certain Faults ſomewhat too lightly, his ſo doing would not be attended by any great Inconveniencies. On the contrary, when a Sovereign follows his own particular Notions, if he is a little too indulgent, People ſay he is weak, and that he opens a Door to Diſorders; if he is ſevere, he paſſes for cruel, and makes himſelf odious. Our ancient Princes were mindful of this in their Chaſtiſements, whenever they uſed any: But they depended very little thereon; it being their chief Care, by Inſtruction and good Example, to maintain the Bulk of their Subjects in Virtue, and bring back to their Duty ſuch of them as went aſtray. Alas! How different are the Meaſures taken now, eſpecially in criminal Caſes? No ſooner is any Officer accuſed and impriſoned, but you come to a Reſolution with Regard to his Affair, even before his Examination. For Form-ſake, this Examination is taken afterwards; and if the Perſon charged therewith does, right or wrong, bring the Informations to ſquare with your Intentions, which are to him but too well known, he is then a Man of Judgment and Ability: Or if the Judges, without determining upon the Nature of the Fault, or ſetting the Matter in a proper Light, according to Law, have private Recourſe to your Majeſty, and aſk your Pleaſure in the Affair, you then deem them zealous, faithful Officers. Such a Procedure is not the way to allure able Men into your Service, and attach them to you.

When a Man is to be judged, particularly, any old Officer of Conſideration, a good Prince ought to remember, that this Man, tho' accuſed, is nevertheleſs his Subject, and that he ſhould always retain for him a fatherly Affection. His Heart thus diſpoſed, he ought, as holding the Scale in his Hand, to examine without Prejudice, the Fault whereof ſuch Perſon is accuſed, ſearch into and weigh the Evidences: That done, if he is ever ſo little dubious, he ſhould recur to the Judgment of a Majority of his great Officers; and if the Caſe ſeems to them any way doubtful, it behoves him to lean towards the moſt favourable Side. They who bear the Sovereign's Commiſſion, ought likewiſe to come into the ſame Sentiments, and follow this Method, as that which in all Ages has been the moſt approved. Shun, in deputing Hew yu (A), his criminal Judge, expreſly recommended to him, Moderation and Compaſſion.

Under the Dynaſty of the Chew, when the Accuſation was of any Importance, Judgment was never paſſed, till after the three (†) Orders had given in their reſpective Opinions. When a Sentence had the Approbation of the Majority, it was then denounced definitively. This is what was termed, accommodating the Laws to the People's Sentiment. The Expreſſion is ſtill in Uſe; but, alas! How ſtrangely is the Senſe perverted? To admit into the Judgments given, Preſents, Alliances, Friendſhips, Enmities, and Revenge, is what they now call accommodating the Laws to the People's Sentiments. The ſuperior Officers, in this Point, ſuſpect their Subalterns; And what Poſſibility is there, that any real Zeal, or ſincere Attachment, can ſubſiſt amidſt all this Suſpicion and Diffidence? " Of old, ſays Confuçius, in criminal Judgments, they ſtrove as far as the Laws would " permit, to ſave the Lives of thoſe accuſed." At preſent, they ſeek for Pretences to condemn them to Death; to this End they ſtick not to ſtrain the Text of the Code, and have always ready ſome muſty old Statute or other, to authoriſe their ſiniſter Conſtructions. In a Word, they lay about to Right and Left, in Search of wherewithal to aggravate Faults.

Whey nan tſe ſays, If the Water is ever ſo deep (*), we may diſtinguiſh, from the Surface (‡), whether its Bottom be Gold or Iron. If the Water is not both deep and clear, it will not greatly abound with Fiſh (§). For my Part, when I find a Prince looking on one, who can cavil at Trifles, as a good and able Judge; holding for a faithful zealous Officer, him who abuſes his Subalterns; reckoning frequent Informations for ſignal Services: I compare him to one, who, to widen a Piece of Leather, ſtretches and pulls it till he tears it. In my Opinion, a Sovereign ought to take a quite different Courſe. It ſuits the Rank he holds, to be perpetually diſtributing his Favours; to reward liberally, and to puniſh ſparingly; yet, without caſting the leaſt Blemiſh on the Laws: For, in Truth, the Laws are, with Reſpect to Judgment, the very ſame as the Ballance is to Weight, or the Line and Level are to Judge of Plans. Therefore, to make Judgment depend on either Love or Hatred, on Humour or Caprice; or on the particular Views of any Perſon ſoever, is wanting to judge of Weight without a Ballance, and of Plans, without a Line or Level. Is it not wanting to be deceived?

Chu ko lyang (||) was, while he lived, Equity itſelf. He openly declared, " That his Heart was a Ballance, which neither Authority, Affection, nor Intereſt, could turn to any Side." And in this, he ſayed nothing but what was very true. And who was this Chu ko lyang? He was Miniſter of a State in a Kingdom of no great Extent. What Compariſon is there between him and our auguſt Emperors? How then happens it, that the Lord of ſuch a vaſt and flouriſhing Empire does not bluſh at bringing down upon himſelf the Curſes of his Subjects, by rendering their eſtabliſhed Laws ſubordinate to his own Views, nay, even to his particular Inclinations?

I come now to another Point. It frequently happens, that you are diſpoſed to amuſe yourſelf with certain Things, ſometimes of very little Moment; nevertheleſs, you will not have People take take Notice of your Doings, much leſs, ſuffer any to talk of them. On thoſe Occaſions, you are obſerved to fall of a ſudden into a Paſſion, or rather, to feign one, in order to frighten your Subjects, and tie up their Tongues from ſpeaking. If what you do is reaſonable, what Harm is there in its being known? If otherwiſe, what ſignifies your Endeavours to conceal it? We have a good old Proverb, which ſays, "The ſureſt way to keep ſecret what we would not have known, is not to do it." When any one is afraid of being over-heard, his beſt Way is to be ſilent. To expect that all we ſay or do, ſhall be concealed from all Mankind, or ſhall never be talked of, is a vain Imagination (*): The Pains we take about it is utterly uſeleſs; and all we gain by it, is to make others laugh at our own Expence.

Yau, placed at his Gate a great Drum, on which, whoſoever had any Advice to give for the public Good was to ſtrike, and that Prince gave him immediate Audience. Shun affixed a Board, whereon, every one had free Liberty to write down whatever he judged amiſs in the Government.

Tang had near his Perſon a particular Officer, whoſe Buſineſs was to regiſter what Faults he ſhould commit. Vû vang cauſed to be engraven, on the Moveables of his Apartments, the chief Maxims of the wiſe Tay kong. Thus did thoſe famous Princes, in the heighth of their Proſperity, not only watch over themſelves, but got others to do it alſo. Ever ſteady and impartial, they inſpired all their Officers with no leſs Confidence than Zeal; and Virtue eſtabliſhed among them a Harmony, as delightful as beneficial.

"A Prince truly virtuous, (ſayed Vû ti) takes Pleaſure in hearing Things told him, which are "naturally diſagreeable to others." In effect, to cheriſh faithful and ſincere Officers, and to drive from him Flatterers and Slanderers, is indiſputably, the beſt Courſe a Prince can take, both for his own Security, and the Welfare of his State. It has been experienced in all Ages, that no Dynaſty was ever known to periſh ſo long as the Sovereign and his Miniſters, united by the powerful Bond of Virtue, acted in Concert for the common Good. But it too often happens, that Princes, finding their Power well eſtabliſhed, and the public Affairs on a good Footing, have neglected able and zealous Men, in order to advance others, whoſe ſupple Diſpoſitions have rendered them more agreeable.

And you, Great Prince, recall to Mind, I beſeech you, the Beginning of your Reign, when being moderate, weary, and vigilant, you joyfully embraced whatever beneficial Propoſals were made you: If you chanced to make a Slip, how light ſoever it was, you repaired it inſtantly; you received even the harſheſt Remonſtrances with Pleaſure, which appeared in your Countenance; and accordingly, all Men of Capacity were eager to aſſiſt you with their Councels. But now, that you have nothing to diſturb your Quiet, when even the remoteſt Barbarians are your obedient Vaſſals, you ſeem to be quite another Man. Grown haughty and full of yourſelf, at the ſame time you exclaim againſt Flattery, and the Views which accompany it, you liſten with Pleaſure to Flatterers, who load you with Applauſes. You hold florid Diſcourſes, touching the Uſefulneſs of juſt and ſincere Remonſtrances; but at the Bottom, you like not to have any ſuch made you. Thus you gradually open the Door to Vice and Lucre. The Path of Virtue is more and more ſtopped up, and that ſo viſibly, that it is perceived even by thoſe who are leaſt attentive (†). This is no trifling Matter. It was by your former Conduct, that your Empire is become ſo well ſettled: By your preſent Conduct, it cannot avoid falling to Ruin. Is it poſſible you ſhould not ſee it? And, in caſe you really do ſee it, how chances you do not haſten to apply a Remedy? Ever ſince I had the Honour to ſerve your Majeſty, my conſtant Dread has been, leaſt Men ſhould ceaſe from ſpeaking to you with intire Freedom; and now, with Grief, I find, that ſuch Freedom of Speech is much out of Uſe to what it was heretofore.

In all the Memorials preſented you, relating to national Affairs, the Memorialiſts content themſelves with briefly hinting what Inconveniences have occured, or at moſt what are to be feared. As to Means of remedying, or preventing them, I do not obſerve that they make the leaſt Mention of any. But I do not at all wonder at it: Your Haughtineſs keeps you in too high a Sphere; And, even when you imagine you deſcend from it, you ſtill reſemble a Dragon (‡) armed all over with ſharp-pointed Scales. Men dread to approach you, and yet far more to irritate you by ſpeaking with Freedom. Such as at firſt dared not to explain themſelves fully, and touched on Matters gently, finding that was not ſufficient ſought how to compaſs their Deſign: But meeting with no Encouragement, they chuſe to remain ſilent; and this they the more readily incline to do, by Reaſon that were they even aſſured of bringing you at firſt to approve their Propoſals, as being both momentous and reaſonable, they have always Room to fear that your Favorites, not reliſhing them, will make you alter your Mind; and that all the return they ſhall meet with from your Majeſty for their Zeal, will be ſome Affront. Even the People of your own Retinue, your Officers, and Domeſtics, who are perpetually about your Perſon, are in ſuch awe of you, that when there is a Neceſſity of informing you of what may give you Diſpleaſure, they ſtand looking on each other, none daring to open his Mouth. How then dare your Officers without Doors repreſent to you frankly every thing which their Zeal prompts them to? Your Majeſty ſays, in one of your late Declarations, "When my Officers have any Repreſentation, touching State-Matters, to "lay before me, they may do it: But let them not from hence expect that I ſhall come into all "the Meaſures they propoſe." Now, I am at a loſs to comprehend, how you could reſolve to expreſs expreſs yourſelf in this Manner; for ſurely it is not the Way to excite People to give you wholeſome Advice, but rather to deter them from it. Believe me, nothing but a noble and generous Zeal can induce a Subject to give his Sovereign Advice. It is known to be a delicate Point; and even when they meet with the utmoſt Encouragement from the Prince, it is much, if on ſuch Occaſions, the moſt Reſolute find not within them ſome Remains of Fear, which hinders them from ſaying All. To expreſs yourſelf then as you do, is with one Hand to open a Door for Councel, and to ſhut it with the other: So that one is at a Loſs what to depend on, or which Method to chuſe. The beſt Means you can uſe to procure good Councel, is for you to love it really and ſincerely. When, King of Tſi, affecting a particular Kind of Violet Colour, his whole Kingdom wore no other. A certain King of Tſû having declared that he liked ſlender Women, all the Ladies of his Palace faſted to get fine Shapes; and ſeveral of them died with over-faſting. Now, if a Deſire of pleaſing the Prince in ſuch Trifles, could have ſo much Power over Women and the very Populace, how much more might not prudent and zealous Officers be influenced by a Deſire to pleaſure him, and aſſiſt him with their wholeſome Council, if they ſaw he really loved it? But, when the Heart is not ſo diſpoſed Words are uſeleſs, nor can Appearances deceive.

Tay tſong, having peruſed this Remonſtrance, anſwered it with his own Hand, in the following Terms; viz. ---- "I have attentively read over your Diſcourſes, from Beginning to End: It is "throughout both, ſollid and preſſing; in ſhort, it is ſuch as I expected from you. I am ſenſible "of my own Want of Virtue and Capacity. I cannot think on our glorious Monarchs of anti-"ent Times, without extreme Confuſion. Had I not ſuch ſtout Rowers (*), how could I ſafely "croſs ſo wide a River? How can we, without ſalted (†) Mey-tſe, rightly give a Sauce the five "Reliſhes? As a Token of my Satisfaction, I make you a ſmall Preſent of 300 Pieces of Silk."

The Emperor Kang hi, greatly commends Wey ching's Diſcourſe: Divers Authors, both antient and modern, do alſo ſpeak in Praiſe of it. One of them compares Wey ching to Kay i and Tong chong ſhu, both of them famous under the Han Dynaſty. "They were all one and the ſame "Perſon (A) (ſays this Author) the only Difference between them, is the different Ages wherein they flouriſhed."

In the eleventh of thoſe Years ſtiled Chin quan, (B) the Emperor Tay tſong undertaking to build a great Palace at Fey ſhan, the ſame Wey ching diſſuaded him from it; by a Remonſtrance made on that Occaſion.

HE introduces it with an Account, from Hiſtory, of the unhappy Cataſtrophe of ſeveral Princes, attributing all to their fooliſh Extravagance. He dwells moſt on the Dynaſty of the Swi, which was of a very ſhort Continuance, and to whom the Tang Dynaſty had but lately ſucceeded. He gives Tay tſong to underſtand that he is taking the ſame Road, wherein the others loſt themſelves. ——

"The People (purſues he) have only changed one tyrannical Government for another, not "much unlike it. By purſuing this Courſe, you may arrive at the ſame Point. The leaſt that can "poſſibly happen is, you will leave to your Deſcendants a rifled exhauſted Empire, with a Load "of Maledictions from their Subjects. Now, the Groans and Execrations of a People bring "down the Wrath of the Shin upon both Prince and State: This Wrath is followed by freſh Ca-"lamities; Public Calamities naturally cauſe Troubles and Commotions. There are but few "Princes who have not a Love, either for Reputation or for Life: How comes it to paſs, that "you take not this into Conſideration?"

In the ſame Year, Wey ching preſented another Diſcourſe to the Emperor Tay tſong.

HE begins with telling him, as in the preceeding ones, that his Majeſty is no longer the ſame Perſon he has been; that he is become haughty, &c. And after animadverting to him, That if it be the Water (‡) which bears up the Bark (§), it is likewiſe the Water which ſwallows it up, he propoſes to him ten Points whereon to meditate, according to as many different Situations, in which his Heart might chance to find itſelf.

Does a Prince (ſays he) find vaſt Deſires grow in his Heart? It behoves him to remember this Sage Maxim, ſo uſeful to all Men, and ſo very neceſſary for Sovereigns; Learn to be content with what ſuffices. —— Does the Exigence of Affairs require ſome military Expedition? We have another Maxim, which on that Occaſion he ſhould weigh with Attention: Know when to ſtop ſeaſonably. As the End and Motive of this Expedition are to reſtore Order, when Order is once reſtored, then is the Seaſon to ſtop. —— Is he tempted to ſtudy how he may diſtinguiſh himſelf? Does he, with ſuch View, meditate ſome Enterpriſe? Let him think, That nothing is more glorious to a Man, and eſpecially to a Sovereign, than Humanity and Moderation, which give him the Maſtery over himſelf. —— Does he find riſing in his Heart, any Motions of Pride and Haughtineſs, which his high Rank and Dignity have inſpired? Let him reflect, That the greateſt Rivers, and the very Sea itſelf, are lower than the ſmalleſt Brooks, without loſing their Advantages.——

In his rural Diverſions, let him never forget the antient Rule, of incloſing the Game on three Sides only (*). If Indolence or Lazineſs attacks him, let him call to Mind the Saying: To begin well is of no Signification, except you likewiſe end well. —— If he perceives or fears, that Matters of Moment are, or will be, concealed from his Knowledge: Let him thoroughly examine his Heart; let him utterly baniſh thence, all Prejudice, all Humour and Caprice, all particular Affections and Averſions; in a Word, let there be a perfect Vacuum: He then will never want zealous and faithful Subjects, who will acquaint him with whatſoever it concerns him to know. With regard to the Care he ought to take, to prevent wicked Men from impoſing on him with Calumnies and falſe Reports; the moſt effectual Method is, To be himſelf ſo virtuous, that wicked Men dare not approach him. In the Diſtribution of Rewards, let not a Fit of Good-humour carry him too far; and when he is to inflict Puniſhments, let not Anger have any Part therein.

In the firſt of thoſe Years ſtiled Shin kong, (A) the Empreſs Vû hew, greatly harraſſing her People, in order to preſerve, and puſh farther, certain Conqueſts, Tyen jin kye, made her the following Remonſtrance.

I HAVE conſtantly heard it ſaid, That Tyen hath placed the Barbarians in the Regions abſolutely diſtinct from our Territories. The Empire under our ancient Princes, was bounded by the Sea, Eaſtwards; Weſtward, by Lew ma; Northward by the Deſart Ti o no; and its Southern Bound, was what goes by the Name of the U ling (†). Theſe were the Barriers which Tyen had ſet between us and the Barbarians. It appears from our Chronicles, that diverſe Lands, into which our three firſt famous Dynaſties never introduced either their Knowledge or their Arms, are now Part of your Dominion. Your Empire is not only far more extenſive than thoſe of the Ing and the Hya (‡), but it even ſurpaſſes that of the Han. And does not all this ſatisfy you? Why ſhould you carry your Arms beyond them, into barbarous and uncultivated Countries? Why ſhould you drain your Treaſuries, and harraſs your People, by attempting needleſs Conqueſts? Why will you prefer, to the ſollid Glory of Governing a flouriſhing Empire in Peace, the vain and imaginary Honour of conſtraining a few Savages to wear Caps and Girdles?

Shi whang, under the Tſin, and Vû ti, under the Han did ſo: But our five Ti (§), and our three Whang, never did any thing like it. Now, to prefer the Examples of Shi whang and Vû ti, to thoſe of our moſt illuſtrious ancient Monarchs, is to hold the Lives of Men as nothing, and make you hated by all your Subjects. Shi whang himſelf, ought to be a warning to you: The Fruit of all his Exploits was, that his Son loſt the Empire. Vû ti, one of the Han, imagined, that by the Hoards his Predeceſſors had left, he might extend his Dominions. He undertook four Wars ſucceſſively, and maintained them well enough; But his Treaſure being quite exhauſted, he was obliged to burden his People, and the Miſery ſoon became general: Fathers ſold their Children, Huſbands, their Wives; infinite Numbers periſhed thro' mere Want, and Robbers, in numerous Bands, ſwarmed in every Quarter. At length, Vû ti opened his Eyes, and giving over his military Deſigns, applied himſelf to the peaceable Government of his Empire; and, to convince the whole World of his Repentance and Intentions, in nominating Hew (‖) to be his Prime Miniſter, the Title he conferr'd on him was, Fû min hew (†). This Alteration in Vû ti, procured him the powerful Aſſiſtance of Tyen. One of our old Proverbs ſays, A Coachman fears being over-turned, where he has ſeen another over-turn. The Compariſon, tho' ſomewhat low, may, for its Senſe, be applied to what is ever ſo great.

He next lays down at large, the vaſt Expences of a War; and concludes, with exhorting the "Empreſs, "not to go to ſeek thoſe Piſmires in their Holes, but only to keep the Frontiers well "guarded."

The ſame Empreſs Vû hew, whom her imperial Conſort left Regent at his Deceaſe, ſet aſide, and baniſhed the Heir to the Crown, then a Minor. She, long after, recalled him, on a Remonſtrance made her on that Occaſion, by Sû ngan heng: But, as ſhe ſtill continued ruling ſingly, tho' far advanced in Years, without ſaying a Word of reſtoring the rightful Prince, who was of fit Age to govern, the ſayed Sû ngan heng put the following Remonſtrance into a little Box, and ſo got it privately conveyed to her Hands.

A TRULY faithful and zealous Officer, never lets his Zeal give Way to the Times, either in Hopes of gaining the Sovereign's Favour, or thro' a criminal Fear of loſing it. A real Philoſopher, does not, thro' Apprehenſion of Death, or Deſire of Life, omit doing what is actually his Duty. When, therefore, a Prince's Conduct appears faulty, there is Reaſon to impute it, partly to his great Officers taking no notice thereof. The late Emperor, on his Demiſe, (*) intruſted to you, jointly with the Prince his Heir, the Government of the Empire. But, alas! Even under Yau and Shun, there were found a Kong kong, and a Quen. Certain Diſcontents have occaſioned occaſioned a Diviſion, between your Majeſty and that young Prince; which I attribute to the Unhappineſs of the Times, but others, to your Ambition. "The Expreſs, ſay they, wants to "dethrone the Li (*), and tranſmit the Empire to ſome other Family: Elſe, conſidering her "great Age, why does ſhe not ſuffer her Son to reign?"

That which I myſelf ſay, and which ſeems to me to be Fact, is, that your Court ſwarms with Sycophants, and the Door is ſhut againſt wholeſome Counſel. As the Empire is attacked by Barbarians, and your People ſuffer at the rate they do, you will find it very difficult to preſerve them, and free yourſelf from the preſent Embaraſs. This Empire which you now rule over, is the ſame that once appertained to thoſe illuſtrious Monarchs Yau and Ven vang. The Swi (†), who lately poſſeſſed it, having by their ill Conduct, become unworthy thereof, ſaw themſelves ſet upon from every Quarter. While like Deer they fled, Numbers of Crows aſſembled: Then appeared, like an Eagle, (‡) or a flying Dragon, our illuſtrious Founder of the Tang; who, after he had reſtored a Calm in the Empire, was acknowledged as its Sovereign. He ſtipulated with all the Grandees, that only the Li ſhould be made or ſtiled Vang; and that the other Titles of Dignity (§) ſhould not be beſtowed on any, but thoſe who had deſerved them by their Services. Accordingly, he gave a few of them to ſuch, as had ſerved him well already. The Agreement was confirmed by Oath; nay, even Blood was drawn to that effect. If then your Majeſty now fills the Throne, it is not therefore ever the leſs the Throne of the Tang. "A Magpy, ſays the Shi king, builds her Neſt, and the Bird Kyew places herſelf there afterwards." You are a Woman, and born a Subject; yet you are become Empreſs and Miſtreſs. How comes this to paſs? Doubtleſs, it was done with no other View, but that you ſhould take Care on your Part to act conformable to the Deſigns of Tyen (or Heaven) and win People's Hearts. There was a Time, when, diſguſted with the Conduct of the Heir, who had not then attained to Years of Maturity, you had Thoughts of ſubſtituting in his Stead his Brother Vang, of Syang. But, reflecting afterwards, that this Prince was the younger, and rightly fearing to ruin the Royal Family, by creating therein Trouble and Diviſion, you wiſely conformed with the People's Wiſhes, by recalling the rightful Heir from his Exile. This Prince is now of ripe Age; he has withall, many Virtues; he is your Son, and you are his Mother: All this notwithſtanding you envy him the Station whereof he is ſo worthy, and with-hold what is his Due.

It is a true Saying, "That thoſe in the Provinces generally follow the Court's Example." By dealing ſo unjuſtly by the right Heir, what Sort of Example is it you ſet the whole Empire? What Hope is there, after this, of reforming its Abuſes, of eſtabliſhing good Manners, and more particularly, of propagating Tenderneſs and Piety in Families? With what Front dare you henceforwards appear, at the Burial-Place of the late Emperor and his Anceſtors? You have hitherto, indeed, reigned alone and peaceably: But know you not, that Things are never nearer their Fall, than when they have attained their utmoſt Perfection? That which is powr'd into a Veſſel already full, runs over upon the Ground. It is often ſo very neceſſary to come immediately to a Reſolution, that to make the leaſt Delay will ruin our whole Deſign. For my Part, it ſeems to me, that both Tyen and Men, are ready to declare in favour of the Li (||).

Beſides, why, at your Years (for the Water, which is almoſt all run out, will ſoon ſtrike the Bell) (4) why ſhould you ſtill, I ſay, fatigue yourſelf both Day and Night? Why do you not throw off the heavy Load of Government, and charge the Prince with it? Your Repoſe is abſolutely concerned; and, if you are more ſenſible of any thing elſe, it alſo concerns your Honour. This Action will gain you the greateſt Praiſes at preſent, and it ſolely depends on you, to have it tranſmitted to Poſterity, by Songs and Hiſtories. I therefore exhort you to it, as to a Thing of high Importance to the Tranquillity of the whole Empire. I am of Opinion, that I ought not to prize a ſhort Life, and fail in Duty to my Country by a criminal Silence. I therefore intreat your Majeſty, to ſpare a few Moments from your great Occupations, to examine at leiſure theſe my weak Arguments. If your Majeſty does me the Juſtice to look on me as a ſincere and loyal Subject, I conjure you, without Delay, to do what I propoſe. But, if you aſcribe my Remonſtrance to any other Motive than that of my Zeal, and are thereat offended, it is in your Power to puniſh me for it, and, at the Expence of my Head, to convince all your Subjects that you cannot bear the Truth.

For the better Underſtanding of the foregoing Peice, it is neceſſary to ſubjoin what follows.

Vû hew, was originally a Girl of mean Condition; it is even ſayed that ſhe was a Slave: But Kaû tſong, became ſo greatly enamoured with her, that he made her Empreſs. When he was dying, he appointed a Succeſſor, who was already of ſome Age: However, he declared at the ſame time, that it was his Will the Empreſs ſhould govern in Conjunction with his Son. This Prince being married, grew very fond of his Father in Law, whom he advanced, and enriched to ſuch a Degree, that all the Nobles made him on the Occaſion pretty home Remonſtrances, which were received very ill by the Prince, and cauſed no change in his Conduct. The Lords then addreſſed themſelves to the Empreſs, who laying hold of this Opportunity to reign by herſelf, baniſhed her Son at a great Diſtance from Court. Many People however were diſpleaſed with this Proceeding; but the Grandees having been diguſted with the Prince, had themſelves, ſelves ſet on the Empreſs, who beſides was very much dreaded. Thus the Exile and Diſgrace of the Prince continued for ſeveral Years, and the Empreſs governed alone.

Sû ngan heng, lay on the Watch for a proper Opportunity, which having found, he adviſed the Empreſs to recall the Prince, and reſtore him to his juſt Rights. The Empreſs conſented to it, and the Prince returning to Court, was declared Succeſſor as before; but that was all, for ſhe ſtill retained the whole Authority. As the Prince was of a mature Age, and ſeemed to have amended his Faults, every one murmured at the Empreſs for nor not reſigning the Government, which right belonged to him: But none was bold enough to ſpeak to her, for fear of her Reſentment; Beſides, ſhe was ſo beſieged by certain Flatterers, who were her Favorites, that it was very difficult to get a Petition conveyed to her. However, Sû ngan heng more couragious than the reſt, and encouraged by the Succeſs he met with the firſt time, found means to incloſe the following Remonſtrance in a Box, which none but the Empreſs herſelf was to open.

The Empreſs diſſembled: But ſtill let Things remain as they were. At length, falling ſick, the Grandees took that Occaſion to addreſs the Prince to mount the Throne. On his agreeing to the Propoſal they told him, the firſt thing he had to do was to put to Death the two Favorites of the Empreſs, in whom ſhe put moſt Confidence. The Prince conſented, and marching to the Palace with ſome Troops, ſeized thoſe Miniſters, and ſtruck of their Heads. The Empreſs being informed hereof, demanded by what Authority, they came with Force, to take and put her People to Death? She was anſwered, they had done it by the Princes Order, and that he was preſent. The Empreſs then ſaid, without diſcovering the leaſt Concern, theſe two Men had offended him, and he was reſolved to puniſh them. I am well enough ſatisfied, let him retire to his own Palace. (*) To which it was replied, that, to obey her orders was not convenient; that ſhe being ſo old and infirm, could no longer take that Care on her, which ſuch a vaſt Empire required: That it was time for the Prince to aſſume the Government, and that they entreated her to approve thereof. As ſhe was not in a Condition to oppoſe it, ſhe was obliged to give her Conſent, and a few Months after died.

In the ſixth of thoſe Years, named Tai, the Emperor Te tſong (A), publiſh'd the following Declaration.

TO be a Sovereign, is to have received from Tyen (Heaven), an Order to ſubſiſt the People. For this Reaſon, a good Prince loves his Subjects, not only as his Children, but even as his own Perſon. He takes Care to feed the Hungry, and cloath the Naked, and yet he thinks he has not done too much, nor is his Goodneſs ſatisfied; it always employs his Heart, either in the Care of rendering his Subjects happy, or in the Grief and Confuſion of not having fully ſucceeded. In good Times, his Granaries are in the Hands of his People, and all his Subjects are at their own Eaſe: The old Men want for nothing, and without Troubles or Diſquiets, they ſee their Children's Children multiply. The Averages are few and eaſy. The Rule of which our antient Princes laid down, was, three Days Work of a Man in a Year for each Family. In ſhort, when Peace and Harmony obtains in a State, it is eaſy to promote Virtue there likewiſe: Alas! I have been burthened with the Government theſe eight Years, yet I have not been able to reach, or even come near, this. But this is not owing, notwithſtanding of my Defect in Virtue, to my not doing all that lies in my Power for that effect, and to my not wiſhing if I could, to do more. But the Irruptions of the Barbarians, and the Troops that muſt be kept on foot to ſecure our Frontiers, and other neceſſary Expences, have put me out of a Condition to relieve my People, and have obliged me ſometimes, even to load them with new Taxes. There has been one continued Succeſſion of Inundations and Droughts. We cannot ſay, that we have had one plentiful Year. The Huſbandmen abandon the Fields; Fathers ſell their Children; and the High-ways are full of poor People, whom Neceſſity have obliged to leave their Country and their Relations. It is not ſo much their Fault as mine, that thus they forget all their moſt natural Sentiments. I have neither Skill enough to prevent their Neceſſities, nor Virtue enough to inſpire them with the Courage and Patience which theſe Extremities require. This gives me real Grief, and the greateſt Confuſion: Night and Day I think of nothing elſe. Till ſuch time as I can relieve my People, as the Territory which depends upon this Court has ſuffered moſt, I free it for one Year, of all its Averages, and all its Taxes. And I ordain, that my Officers ſhould fall upon ſome Method, for the Relief and Support of the Poor.

On Occaſion of the Rebellion of certain Chu chê, the Emperor Te tſong, travelled into Lyau tong. The Army of Rebells was defeated, their Chiefs were taken, and upon the Emperor's reſolving to publiſh an Indemnity, the Soothſayers told him, that the Royal Family was ſtill threatned with ſome new Misfortunes: And that in order to avert them, it was neceſſary to change ſomewhat in the preſent Names and Titles. The great Men propoſed, that he ſhould add a Word or two to his own Surname, and Lû chê, as the only Perſon who oppoſed it.

SIR, ſaid he, addreſſing himſelf to the Emperor, all theſe Surnames and pompous Titles, are not of ancient Uſage. To aſſume them even in the moſt flouriſhing and happy Times, would diſcover a Want of Modeſty. But to encreaſe them at ſo melancholy a Juncture as the preſent, would be very improper, and might be very hurtful. If you are poſitive to regard what theſe Soothſayers pretend, I mean, what they ſay with Regard to changing the preſent Titles and and Surnames, it would be better, inſtead of increaſing your own, which would render you odious, to teſtify your Reſpect for the Advice which Tyen has given you, by retrenching them.

The Emperor took the Advice of Lû che very well, and reſolved to change only the Name of the Years. And then he cauſed to be ſhewed to Lû chê, a Declaration minuted by a Secretary of State, and aſked his Opinion of it.

Sir, anſwered Lû chê, The Actions of a Sovereign, are what properly and effectually touches the Heart. Diſcourſes are commonly empty, and, if they are not well executed, they have not the leaſt effect. While you publiſh a Declararation in ſuch Circumſtances, you cannot appear too modeſt, you cannot too much aggravate your own Failings, nor ſhow too earneſt a Deſire of reforming yourſelf. The Emperor agreed to this, and ordered Lû chê to draw a Declaration up, which he did in the following Terms.

Declaration of the Emperor Te tſong, drawn up by Lû chê.

THE beſt Means by which a Prince ought to govern aright, and promote Virtue in his Empire, are, a ſincere Affection for his Subjects, a generous Self-denial in their Favours, a continual Care to correct his own Defects, to repair the Faults he has committed, and to preſs to Perfection: Ever ſince I mounted the Throne, to which I ſucceeded by my Birth-right, there has ſcarce been any thing but Troubles. Theſe Troubles have obliged me, ſometimes to neglect the ordinary Ceremonies with Regard to my Anceſtors; and have ſo much taken up my Mind, that I have not, as I ought, employed myſelf to acquire Virtue. While with Grief I reflected over and over again, upon theſe firſt Years of my Reign, which I have employed ſo ill, it is time, ſaid I to myſelf, it is time to begin to repair them, by publickly acknowledging that I have loſt them, by laying open, without diſguiſe, the melancholy Effects of my bad Conduct; and by expreſſing a ſincere Deſire, to obſerve a better, in Times to come.

My Anceſtors, theſe illuſtrious Founders of our Dynaſty Tang, after having, by their Valour and their Virtue, delivered the People from Oppreſſion, and given Peace to all the Empire, eſtabliſhed an admirable Order. In this, they were aſſiſted by a great Number of excellent Officers in all Ranks, whoſe Zeal they wiſely animated, and whoſe Services they generouſly rewarded. Things being put upon ſo good a footing, continued there; and behold! at the End of 200 Years, (*) you ſucceed to your Anceſtors in their Poſts, and to my Father in his Throne. Ever ſince my Acceſſion, my greateſt Fear has been, leaſt I ſhould fall ſhort of their Wiſdom and Virtue; and to do my utmoſt to imitate them, has been my conſtant Reſolution. But being educated by Women in the Heart of a Palace, till I was pretty well grown up; I at this Day, feel the Effects of an Education, ſo unſuitable to a Prince. Being quite ignorant of the Affairs of Government, I entered into Poſſeſſion of a peaceful Empire: But I have not had ſkill enough to prevent that which may diſorder it: Unacquainted with the Fatigues of Huſbandmen, unmindful of the Hardſhips of Soldiers, I have not imparted as I ought, the Effects of my Bounty to either the one or the other of theſe Profeſſions; by this, I have given them a Right to doubt of my Affection, and a Handle to treat me with Indifference. Beſides, inſtead of employing myſelf in acknowledging my Defects, I have undertaken uſeleſs Wars upon ſlight Grounds. There has been nothing but the Motions of Troops, of Convoys, and Recruitings. I have encreaſed the ordinary Taxes. Here, I have exacted Chariots, there, Horſes. There is not a Province in all the Empire, but what has ſuffered by theſe Proceedings; My Officers, and my Soldiers, after being obliged to fight ſeveral times in one Day, have ſpent whole Years, without laying aſide, either their Head Pieces or their Armour; far from the Burying-places of their Anceſtors, far from their afflicted and forlorn Wives. My People being obliged to leave the Lands without Culture, for continual Averages, have been over-whelmed at once, with Toil and Miſery, and reduced to wiſh for Death, under the Hands of an Executioner, rather than for ſuch a Life.

Mean time, Tyen, above me, gave me frequent Advices, by chaſtiſing me; yet I cannot profit by it: Below, Men are breaking out into Murmurings, of which I am not inform'd. Thus Miſery increaſed by little and little, till a rebellious Subject has endeavoured to take the Advantage of this Diſorder, and has puſhed his Inſolence to the utmoſt Exceſſes. Forgetful of all ſhame and dread, he has ſpread Tumults thro' all. The People and the Nobles, have all ſuffered by this; and he has carried his Boldneſs ſo far, as even to inſult the Tombs of my Anceſtors. I am the more ſenſibly concerned at this, as I myſelf have been the Occaſion of it: And I never think of it, without the greateſt Confuſion, and the moſt lively Grief. Thanks to the Protection of (†) Tyen ti, which comes from on high, the Shin and Men, united themſelves in my Favour. My Miniſters, and my Generals, have unanimouſly done their utmoſt, to ſhow their Zeal and their Abilities; my Forces have ſerved me well: The Rebel is defeated, and taken. I muſt now endeavour to remedy the paſt Evils. It is for an Introduction to this, that I publiſh the preſent Declaration.

While I am inceſſantly employed in remembering my paſt Faults, my Officers of all Ranks, without (*) He addreſſes his Diſcourſe to the great Officers.

(†) I have not as yet tranſlated Tyen, which has occurred frequently by itſelf, and is again to be met with in this Piece. He ſeems to have determined the Senſe of the Word Tyen in the firſt Line of the Emperor Te tſong's Declaration p. 527.] Here, and in other Paſſages, the Character Ti, which commonly ſignifies the Earth, is joined to it. As I have always left the Reader to judge of the Senſe of Tyen, by that of the Paſſages with which it is connected, I likewiſe leave him to judge of the Senſe, which it is proper to affix here, and in other Paſſages, to the Characters of Tyen and Ti, when joined together; and if it is better to make Lû che ſay, that the material Heaven and Earth, powerfully protect; and that the Protection of the material Earth, comes from on High; or to underſtand the Figure in the ſame Senſe as the Expreſſion Chau ting, which literally implies the Court and the Hall, or, the Hall of the Court, ſignifies the Emperor; and Tong kong, or the Eaſtern Palace, ſignifies the Hereditary Prince &c.

without excepting the greateſt, in all the Writings they addreſs to me, outvye one another in giving me new Titles: I have never accepted of them: I never wiſh'd for them. I have only been ſo complaiſant, as to allow, ſome Days ago, that upon the Advice of the Soothſayers, a certain Affair might be taken into Conſideration. But reflecting ſeriouſly upon it yeſterday, I found myſelf ſeized with Dread. Alas! Said I to myſelf, to (*) penetrate, to comprehend, and as it were, to incorporate with the moſt impenetrable (†) Ing yang, is to deſerve to be called (‡) Shin: To unite one's Virtue with Tyen ti, is to deſerve to be called a (§) Shing. Can a Man, without underſtanding like me, ſupport theſe Titles? To govern peacefully and ſucceſsfully, to promote good Order over all, is what we call (‖) Wen. To know the proper Management of Arms, in order to maintain, and eſtabliſh a happy Tranquillity in the State, is what we call being (†) Warlike. Can theſe Epithets agree with me? Yet, theſe are the magnificent Titles, my Officers laviſh upon me in their Writings. If, notwithſtanding my Unworthineſs, I ſhould accept of them, ſhould I not therefore render myſelf ſtill more unworthy? And would not that be a new Subject of Confuſion for me?

I therefore forbid, that henceforth any one, be who he will, either at the Court, or in the Provinces, in their Petitions, or other Writings, ſhould give me the Titles of Shin, Shing, Wen, Vû. Man, who is ſubject to ſo many Paſſions, is likewiſe ſubject to Inconſtancy: Sometimes he follows Virtue, ſometimes Vice. Both one and the other, greatly depend upon the different Junctures, in which the Perſon is: And when the Prince, by his Wiſdom and Example, does not promote Virtue, we need not then wonder, that Diſorders and Villanies are very frequent. If therefore I, who hitherto have not known how to give my Subjects the Inſtructions and Examples I ought, ſhould treat with Rigor, all thoſe who have committed Faults, it would be a Kind of Injuſtice, or at leaſt, too great Severity in me. After this, I would not dare to allow myſelf to be called the Father and Mother of my People, a Title ſo eſſential to a Sovereign.

I therefore deſign, in the Beginning of this Year, to renew myſelf, and to pardon what is paſt: The Year, which now commences, and according to the ordinary Courſe, ought to be called the fifth Kyen chong, ſhall be called the firſt Yuen hing. And I give an univerſal Indemnity, for all Faults that have been committed until the firſt Day of the ſaid Year. Li hi kyé, Tyen ywé, Wang, Uſſun, are Perſons, who formerly did great Services; ſome in the Cabinet, others in the Field: I have not been able to gain them: My Conduct towards them, has inſpired them with Diſtruſt and Uneaſineſs: They have ſhared in the laſt Commotions: But their Faults, tho' grievous, are nothing in Compariſon of mine. It is a common Thing, when a Prince goes aſtray, that his Subjects ſhould go aſtray likewiſe. Have I really been an Emperor? What Effects of my Power and my Goodneſs have been felt? But it is time that they ſhould be felt, and that all the Empire ſhould be acquainted with the Effects which my Repentance hath had upon me, and the benevolent Inclination, with which it inſpires me: I pardon Li hi kyé, and the three others: I even give them a full Pardon: I re-inveſt them in their former Ranks; and I will treat them henceforward, as if nothing had happened. (*) Chu hau, is the Brother of Chu tſe: They are both together at preſent, in Priſon: But they were far diſtant from one another, when Chu tſe rebelled. It has not been proved, but that the younger of theſe two Brothers, was firſt acquainted with the Deſigns of the elder. Otherways, I would carry my Goodneſs as far as it would go. But without any further Examination, tho' he helped his Brother, and by that committed a very great Crime, yet, I willingly grant him time to reform.

As for the Troops diſbanded towards the North and South of (†) Whang ho, all I require of them is, that they retire to their former Poſts, by the ordinary Roads, without offering any Violence or Harm to any one whatſoever. As for Chu tſe, he is an ungrateful perfidious Villain. He has joined the greateſt Inſolence to Rebellion and Perfidy. He has committed Outrages, he has plundered and demoliſhed the Tombs of my Anceſtors, ſo that I dare not pardon him. Such as have joined him in his Rebellion, whether People or Soldiers, great or inferior Officers, as they have been deluded by his Artifices, or forced into his Meaſures by his Violences; if they return to their Duty, no farther Notice ſhall be taken of them. Talents are differently diſpoſed of. A Man, who cannot ſucceed in one kind of Buſineſs, may do Wonders in another. But as the Architect who plans a Building, heaps up Materials of all Sorts: In the ſame manner, a Prince, who lays out great Projects, does not confine himſelf to Perſons of one Kind; and he rejects no Man, who can be good for any one thing. Far leſs ſhould he reject for ever, thoſe who being otherways Men of Merit, have had the Misfortune to make ſome Slip, by which they have loſt their Poſts: Provided they become Wiſe at their own Expences, they effectually reform, and therefore ought to be the Object of my Clemency. If therefore, among thoſe antient Officers, whether great or ſmall, who for ſlight Offences, have been degraded, broke, or even baniſhed, any one is found, in whom a rare Talent, or an uncommon Capacity is diſcover'd; let ſuch be preſented to me, and I will diſpenſe with the common Rules, by giving them new Poſts, according to their Qualifications.

(†) The Name of a River. Ho, ſignifies a River, Whang, Yellow; which implies, that its Waters are tinged yellow by the Land thro' which they run.

All you brave Officers of my Army, whoſe Zeal and whoſe Valour have been long unſhaken, have lately given greater Proofs than ever of both, by ſo ſeaſonably flying, either to defend the Capital, or to Lyau tong, to make head againſt the Rebels. Never ſhall I forget, either your toilſome Marches, or your generous Combats. I know well, how much both the State and my Family owe to you. I want to eterniſe the Memory of your Services, by honouring your Families, and giving you Lands and Revenues. Such of the Soldiers who ſignaliz'd themſelves upon the late Occaſion, ſhould likewiſe have ſome Diſtinction. If any amongſt them, has unhappily committed any Fault that is criminal, let his Puniſhment be diminiſhed three Degrees below what the Law ordains. I grant to their Sons and Grand-ſons, the Diminution of two Degrees. To die generouſly in Defence of one's Prince and Country, is a thing which our ancient Sages have much eſteemed. To gather together the Bodies and the Bones of the Dead, in order to pay them the laſt Duties, is a thing recommended by the Book of Rites. Theſe two Kinds of goods Works, tho each of a different Species, have for their Principle a juſt and a tender Compaſſion. We ordain and enjoin the Magiſtrates of the Cities of all Ranks, that, if within their Juriſdiction, any Officers of War die in our Service, they carefully look for their Bodies, and cauſe them to be tranſported immediately to the Place of their Departure: And there if they have no Families, that the Magiſtrates ſhall honourably diſcharge their Burials, and the Ceremonies Tſi, according to the Cuſtom; That they proportionly act in the ſame Manner towards thoſe, whoſe Bodies or Bones are yet upon any Field of Battle: That the Magiſtrates of the Neighbourhood ſhall gather them together, and bury them decently.

The Neceſſity of keeping up our Troops in the Field, has harraſſed our People for the Convoys. The Villany of ſome Commiſſaries, has likewiſe very much encreaſed their Yoke. At preſent, ſince my Exigencies are not ſo preſſing, I am willing, not only to diminiſh theſe oppreſſive Averages, but to make them a little amends for what they have ſuffered, I ordain, till I can do better for them, That the Taxes upon Marches, upon Buildings, upon Wood, upon Canes, upon Tea, upon Varniſh, and upon Iron, be henceforth aboliſhed. And becauſe the Territory depending upon our Court, has ſuffered more than all the reſt, as it is the Place which the Rebels have over-run, ravaged, and burnt: I remit to it, the half of the Summer Taxes. In that Part of theſe Territories where I halted with my Army, when I marched out againſt the Rebells, the Inhabitants of the Place provided every thing in great Order: This was a great Relief to my Troops. In that Spot let a Banner be erected, which may inform all the World of my Faults, and of their good Services. Let Fong tyen, which was hitherto but a Town, be a City of the third Order, and bear the Name of Chi; and let all its Dependances be exempted for five Years, from all Impoſts.

The firſt Principle of a wiſe Government is, to honour Virtue; Earneſtly to ſearch for Men of Virtue and Merit, is the chief Duty of a Prince: Theſe are Maxims univerſally received in all Ages: I call them to Mind, and meditate upon them Night and Day: With Grief I ſee that inſtead of pure Virtue, Artifice and Contention prevails yet chiefly at my Court. Shall this then be the Age, in which there are no more truly wiſe Men. Doubtleſs, they are not extinct; but they have retired, and have no Regard to my Words. They obſerve my Conduct, and probably that prevents them from appearing; therefore this Day, I earneſtly recommend it to all the Magiſtrates of my Empire, that each in his own Diſtrict, ſhould obſerve, if there are not ſome one of theſe wiſe Men who bury in a Retreat, a ſublime Virtue and rare Talents; who contented with genuine Virtue, practiſe it in Private, without Shew or Ambition. Let me be acquainted, without failing, of as many of theſe wiſe Men as ſhall be diſcovered. I ſhall take Care to invite them according to the Rites, and will omit nothing to engage them in my Service.

Likewiſe, if any one, whoever he is, is diſcover'd to poſſeſs an unſhaken Uprightneſs and Sincerity, which qualifies him freely to repreſent to me, what ever is for the common Good; a profound Knowledge of our antient Monuments, which may render him capable of labouring with Succeſs to reform the Manners of the People; or a ſingular Genius for War, ſo as eaſily to become a General; I will, that all ſuch be preſented to me.

In like Manner, I enjoin all Magiſtrates to keep an exact Liſt of all Orphans, old Men, Widowers and Widows, and other Perſons who are deſtitute of Support, and are not in a Condition to earn their own Livelihood; and let them be relieved according to their Neceſſities. We likewiſe enjoin the two firſt Officers of each City, to appear in Perſon, at the Gate of the Houſe of every old Man who is above ninety Years of Age, in order to inform themſelves of their Health and their Wants. If any Man or Woman ſhall excell in the Virtue proper to his or her State, more eſpecially if a Woman ſhall diſtinguiſh herſelf by Modeſty, or a Child by filial Piety: Our Intentions is, that a Banner be erected at their Houſe, and that all their Lives, they ſhall be exempted from ſuch Averages as are leaſt diſpenſable.

It is the Quality of War to drain a State, it therefore behoves us at preſent, more than ever, to live frugally and ſoberly. I deſign to ſet an Example of this, by circumſcribing myſelf for the Benefit of my Subjects. Of all my Tributes and ordinary Taxes, I ſhall only exact ſo much as is juſt neceſſary for the Support of my Troops, and to defray the Ceremonies regulated with Regard to my Anceſtors. I abſolutely remit the reſt to my Subjects; being ſorry and aſhamed by reaſon of the Lowneſs of my Exchequer, that I am not in a Condition to ſatisfy my Inclination, by giving them more ample Rewards, and greater Largeſſes. Moreover, if in theſe our preſent Letters, any thing has eſcaped our Attention, which may render the Benefit of our Amneſty in compleat; compleat; I ordain the great Officers of our Court and Provinces, to draw up an exact Memorial of what they conceive proper to be added. In the mean time, we declare, that whoſoever after the publiſhing of theſe Preſents, ſhall preſume, either in Juſtice, or otherways, to reproach any one of a Fault for which he has our Pardon, ſuch a one ſhall render himſelf criminal, and incur the Penalty due to that very Fault. If either in the Mountains, or elſewhere, any Arms are ſtored up or concealed; we ordain, that they ſhall be produced in the Term of 100 Days, under the Pain of being treated as guilty of Rebellion. In ſhort, as by the antient Regulations, thoſe Declarations that carry an Indemnity in them, ſhall be forwarded at the Rate of (*) fifty Leagues in a Day: We Will, that the ſame Regulations be obſerved in this Caſe; to the End, that the Extremeties of the Empire may be the ſooner informed of it.

A Gloſs.] This Declaration cauſed a general Joy all over the Empire: Particularly in Shang tong; it ſo much affected the Officers of War and the Soldiers, that they ſhed a great many Tears.

The (†) firſt Years of Te tſong's Reign, being troubled with ſeveral Commotions, and that Prince attributing the Fault to himſelf, in a Converſation he had with Lu chê: The latter talked to him in the following Terms.

GREAT Sir; I am very far from blaming your Modeſty. In this you imitate our greateſt Princes Yau and Shun. Permit me, however, to inform you of the Conduct of your Miniſters, who diſorder every thing. He then particulariſes Lû ki. Te-tſong modeſtly taking upon him the Defence of his Miniſter; What ſay you to this, ſays he to Lu chê: You now forget your Uprightneſs, you have not the Courage to attribute the preſent Misfortunes to me, but to others: But after all, they ought not to be attributed to Men. In all Ages, is it not well known, that the Riſe and Fall of Empires, is regulated by the Order of (‡) Tyen? Lû chê retiring without making any reply: But a few Days after, he preſented to the Emperor the following Writing, in which having in a livelo Manner laid open the Defects of the Government, he concludes thus.

You ſee, Sir, what in reality cauſes Commotions and Rebellions. The Evil reaches farther than you imagine, and you alone are ignorant how far it extends. While rebel Troops aſſemble and march with flying Colours, inſulting even your Palace in broad Day; there is not the leaſt Guard at your Gates to defend them, nor even a ſingle Sentinel who dares ſay who goes there? Where are theſe Officers, by whoſe Eyes you ſee, and by whoſe Ears you hear. Daunted with the Danger of which they themſelves are the Cauſe, they neither have the Honeſty to inform you of its Nature, nor Courage to check its Progreſs, at the Hazard of their own Life. Yes I ſay, and maintain it, that your Miniſters are very blameable: And I dare averrit it; it is likewiſe a Fault in you, to attribute all to the Order of Tyen. Chew, that Pattern of wicked Princes, did the ſame. When it was repreſented to him, that his Diſorders and his Cruelty ruined him: It is Tyen, anſwered the Tyrant, who has made me Emperor, and upon him depends my Deſtiny. On the contrary, we find, that the Shu king makes a wiſe Prince ſpeak in a very different Manner. The Author ſpeaks as follows.

"Tyen looks upon what I do, in the ſame Light in which my People ſees it; and Tyen hears my Words with the ſame Sentiments, with which they are heard by my People. All then that Tyen ſees, and all that he hears, is that which paſſes amongſt Men." One muſt not imagine to himſelf an Order of Tyen which does not relate to, or has no Connexion with the Actions of Men. Nothing is more unreaſonable than to neglect ones Duties, and to impute Miscarriages naturally attending ſuch a Neglect, to the Orders of Tyen. The Text of the I king ſays: Tyen is propitious; and Confucius commenting upon that Text, ſays; The Expreſſion (§) Yew, ſignifies the ſame thing with the Expreſſion Tſu. But who are they whom Tyen favours? They who are tractable and Docile. Who are they whom Men uſe to relieve? They in whom is ſeen Sincerity and Probity. To ſtudy ones ſelf with Submiſſion to Tyen, and never to be defective in Faith to Men, are the Means of obtaining Aſſiſtance. The I king treating of the Relation of Men to Tyen, and of the Aſſiſtance and Favours which the latter grants or denies to the former, immediately lays it down, that an Action is good or bad, to which ſome Good as a Reward, or ſome Misfortune as a Puniſhment, ſymbolically anſwers. Hence it evidently appears, that the Orders of Tyen with Regard to Men are not ſuch, as that nothing depends upon Men themſelves. In effect, it was never ſeen, that a State, wherein Reaſon and Virtue prevailed thro' all the Degrees of Men, was ever at the ſame time viſited by Tyen with fatal Diſorders. Neither was it ever ſeen, that an Empire in which Irregularity univerſally prevailed, has been bleſt by Tyen with the Enjoyment of a flouriſhing Condition and a profound Peace. No; never, never, was ſuch a thing ſeen.

But if your Majeſty has ſtill any Doubt of what I ſay, behold, without going very far, how you may point out this Truth with your Finger. Ever ſince, by ill concerted Wars, and never ceaſing Levies, the Forces of your Empire have been drained, and your Subjects alarmed and rendered diſtruſtful; there has been nothing but ſuſpicious Intrigues, and Cabals on all Sides. One would think he beheld the Sea toſſed by the Fury of the Winds. Every body ſays loudly in this vaſt Capital, that if this continues ever ſo little, ſome melancholy Event muſt neceſſarily happen. But tell me, I beg you, are all they who talk thus, ſkilled in the Art of Divination? Have they by (§) Both the one and the other ſignifies to aid and to ſuccour. But Tſu is more vulgar, Yew is more ſublime, and may ſerve to denote more than human Aſſiſtance.

by the myſterious Secrets of that Art, diſcovered the Order of Tyen? It is plain, that they only talk from their Obſervation of the Minds of the People, and the preſent State of Affairs. In this they are in the Right. Hence, in effect, ſpring Commotions and Rebellions, and not from what we call the fatal Revolutions of Times.

I am well aware of what is ſaid, that a long and a too great Proſperity, is the Forerunner of Confuſion; and that out of Confuſion ariſes Order: That there are States whoſe Ruin has been preceded by no Calamity; and others, amidſt impending Dangers and Misfortunes, have become flouriſhing: All that is truth in this, inſtead of contradicting, confirms my Obſervation. For inſtance, How is it, ſays one, that Proſperity introduces Confuſion? Becauſe too much Proſperity, unleſs Men are upon their Guard, naturally inſpires an exceſſive Confidence, and an indolent Security. In what Senſe, ſays another, does Order riſe from Confuſion? It is, becauſe Trouble awakens and excites Attention and Vigilance, and gives Opportunities for Men of Merit, to exerciſe their Talents.

To make a juſt Application of all this, a large Detail muſt be made of all the Defects and Diſorders, that are the Source of the preſent Calamities. But it is not neceſſary that Things ſhould come to this Paſs; for that which I pointed out to your Majeſty in the Beginning of this Diſcourſe, is ſufficient; if your Majeſty thinks upon that, it will verify again at this time, that out of Confuſion itſelf, Order may ariſe. There is one Method by which this may be brought about: No Severity, and much Virtue. This is the only Secret I know. In ſuch an Extremity as Things are in at preſent, he who follows this Method, ſupports and raiſes himſelf; he who leaves it, is ruined. Every Mean amidſt theſe Extremes is dangerous; think on it ſeriouſly. To prefer the Judgment of the Public to your private Views, to follow Reaſon, and not your own Inclinations, as your Guide; to baniſh from your Perſon thoſe Sycophants, whoſe Hearts are yet more deſigning, than their Tongues are ſmooth; to employ Men of real Merit, to chaſe Diſſimulation and Artifice from your Court and Councils; and in their ſtead, to introduce Sincerity and Uprightneſs, by ſetting the Example yourſelf: This is the high Road in good Government, which is eaſy to be known, and impoſſible to be miſtaken. There is even no Occaſion to waſte your Spirits, in order to tread in it with Succeſs. You only have Occaſion for a little Reſolution and Conſtancy, in order never to leave it. If you have theſe, I may boldly aſſure you, that you have nothing to fear, either from your Subjects, or from thoſe fatal Revolutions to which you ſeem to attribute the preſent Calamities, and that your Reign will be glorious.

The ſame Emperor Te tſong, talking one Day with Lû chê, told him, " You have hitherto repreſented to me, that the Prince compoſes but one Body with his Subjects, and eſpecially with the Officers he employs; ſo that there ought to be among them, no Diſtruſt Suſpicion or Reſerve: And that thus the Prince ought to have, and to expreſs a ſincere Diſpoſition, to profit by the Advices of all Kinds of Perſons. I have done this, and what has been the Conſequence? I know not how many Talkers have impoſed upon me. They drive a Trade with their Eloquence, and ſeem at that Price, to buy the Right of being formidable. They put me in the wrong, whether I am ſo or not, and theſe Gentlemen always raiſe themſelves at my Expences. You ſee that for ſome time I have dropt Remonſtrances, without declaring myſelf with regard to what they contained. It is not from Indolence, that I have relaxed from theſe Cares in State Affairs." The Reaſon of my Silence, is what I have told you. Lû chê ſome Days after, preſented the following Remonſtrance upon that Head.

SIR: I have always heard it ſaid, that amongſt Men, there is no (*) Aſſiſtance without (†) Confidence, and no Confidence without Sincerity. Thus, all our antient Sages have held theſe two Virtues in ſingular Eſteem. An ancient Tradition goes ſo far, as to ſay, That by this, all Buſineſs ought to begin and end: And without this, all Buſineſs would ſoon be at an end. If this Truth holds in the ſmalleſt Affairs of common Life, how much rather ought it to have Place in Affairs of State? Can then a Sovereign, whoſe firmeſt Support is the Sincerity and Uprightneſs of his Subjects, and eſpecially of thoſe whom he immediately employs, diſpenſe with the Practice of thoſe Virtues? Doubtleſs not; and permit me to tell your Majeſty, that you deſpiſe them, when you think that theſe Virtues have done you wrong. It is a common, and in ſome meaſure, a pretty true Saying, that common People have but little Underſtanding: But it may likewiſe be truely ſaid, that they underſtand a great deal in ſome Points: If they concern either themſelves or their Duties; they frequently are miſtaken, or in doubt. But when it concerns their Prince, then nothing eſcapes them, they perfectly well diſtinguiſh his good or bad Qualities, they ſee through all his good, evil, and moſt ſecret Inclinations, and publiſh them. They ſtudy and imitate all his Actions.

That which is true of the People in general, is ſtill more ſo of the Perſons, whom the Prince employs in particular. Do they ſee their Prince uſe any Artifice with them? They treat him with the ſame. Are they ſenſible that he diſtruſts them? They are cautious and upon their Guard; being entirely taken up with the Care of keeping themſelves in Poſt, they give themſelves very little trouble about any thing elſe, having no Regard for their Duty, or Zeal for their Prince, but in Proportion as he treats them with Honour and Gentleneſs. In ſhort, as the Shadow follows the Body which forms it, and the Words, the Voice which pronounces them, thus, (*) Sin, ſignifies to believe, to truſt, Confidence, Faith, Fidelity. The Context determines its Senſe.

(†) Ching, ſignifies Sincere, Upright, Sound, Perfect, Sincerity, Uprightneſs. The Context likewiſe determines its Senſe.

Thus, the Generalitity of thoſe Perſons whom the Prince employs, conform themſelves to his Conduct. If a Prince, who is not ſincere and upright, require Sincerity and Uprightneſs in his Officers, he may deceive them for the firſt time; but they won't truſt him a ſecond. No! It is only by carrying Sincerity and Uprightneſs to the higheſt Perfection, that a Prince has a Chance to find either of theſe Virtues in his Servants. Does an Officer of War in your Reign, actually forget what he owes to you and the State? You ſend others againſt him, who fight and extirpate him. Some one of your Miniſters or other Officers, are deficient in ſerious Affairs: You order him to be tried. In ſuch Junctures as theſe, tho' they are frequently very delicate, why ſhould thoſe whom you entruſt with the Execution of your Orders, obſerve them? Why ſhould they impartially do ready Juſtice upon the Guilty? Becauſe, finding in theſe unworthy Subjects only Ingratitude, Art and Treachery, they find a Prince full of Gentleneſs, Sincerity, and Uprightneſs. So true it is, that it infinitely concerns one never to deviate from theſe Virtues. Stick cloſe therefore, I conjure you, ſtick cloſe to theſe inviolably. Practiſe them conſtantly; and tho' you are obliged, for that Effect, to make great Efforts, yet they will be well employ'd: And I am perſuaded, you never will have cauſe to repent of them.

The antient Tradition ſays: Where is the Man who does not commit Faults? The Point is to know how to correct them. Chwang wey, in our antient Books, praiſing the Virtue of Ching tang, thought he paid him a great Compliment, by ſaying, "that he ſpared for nothing in order to correct himſelf." Ki fû, being willing to exalt the glorious Reign of Swen vang, ſays, that all that was defective in that Prince, was abundantly ſupplied by Chong ſhan fû, his firſt Miniſter. Ching tang, certainly, was a Prince of uncommon Wiſdom, and eminent Virtue: Chong wey, who was a Man very virtuous, and very underſtanding, was Miniſter of that Prince, and ought to have known him very well; yet he did not go ſo far as to ſay, that he committed no Faults: But was ſatisfied with praiſing his Care in correcting them. Swen Vang was likewiſe a very great Prince. The Dynaſty of the Chew was ruin'd: He had the Honour to raiſe it by his wiſe Government. Ki fû was an underſtanding Man, and a very good Judge of this Kind: And yet in praiſing his Maſter, he never ſaid, that he wanted no Qualification neceſſary for good Government; always ſuppoſing, that his Prince would take care to ſupply what was defective in himſelf, by the Aſſiſtance of a good Miniſter.

Whence, I think, we may conclude, that according to the Idea of our Antients, nothing is more to be eſteemed or praiſed, eſpecially in a Prince, then a conſtant Care to correct his Failings, and to repair his Faults. They had good Grounds for judging in this Manner: For there is no Man, even from the moſt Ignorant and Stupid, to the moſt Knowing, who is not ſometimes miſtaken, and don't ſometimes commit Faults. The Difference betwixt theſe two Characters is, that the former acknowledging their Faults, profit by them, and correct them; but the others, by a falſe Shame, ſeeking to cover them, and to excuſe them, never endeavour to amend them, and commit ſtill greater.

In Antiquity leſs remote; when Things ruſhed to Ruin, Flattery prevailed among Miniſters, and Pride among Princes. Throwing out, as it were in Concert, that ſincere Confidence which formerly prevailed, and was ſo ſtrong a Link in Life, they ſubſtituted in its Place, the Grimace of Ceremony. A Man then could not approach or leave the Perſon of his Prince, without having recourſe to mean Flatteries; but it was all Show. Men of Merit, being over upright and ſincere, could not comply with this Change; and thereby ſuffered. The Bad, whom Intereſt render'd fawning, made their Advantage of this, the Sovereigns then began to be intoxicated with their Meanneſſes and Flatteries, and at the ſame time, a thouſand Diviſions ſprung up amongſt themſelves, from their Avarice and Ambition. In ſhort, it is hardly to be expreſſed, what Evils were occaſioned then and afterwards by this affected Complaiſance and artful Flattery, which unhappily undermined that honeſt Liberty and noble Openneſs, which formerly prevailed, and ought always to prevail, at the Courts of Princes.

Tay tſong, one of your moſt illuſtrious Anceſtors, united Gentleneſs and Juſtice, the civil and the military Virtues, in the higheſt Degree. By this Wiſdom and Valour, he eſtabliſhed Peace and Order in the Empire, ſo that few Reigns have been more flouriſhing than his. But at preſent, what is he moſt praiſed for, and what has he been moſt praiſed for ever ſince his Reign? You know well, that it is his Ardour in procuring Remonſtrances, and his Manner of receiving them. Is not this alone ſufficient to make your Majeſty comprehend, that in effect nothing is more glorious for a Sovereign, and nothing bids fairer to eterniſe his Memory.

Your Majeſty ſays, that your Officers have ſuch a way of repreſenting Things, that whatever is good, they take care to attribute to themſelves; and whatever happens wrong, to their Prince. I own this is a Fault in them; but after all, it is ſuch a Fault, that inſtead of obſcuring your Virtue, if you pleaſe, it may be the Means of brightning it. To admit Remonſtrances conceived in theſe Terms, to ſhew no Uneaſineſs at them, but to let them paſs current, would be a maſterly Stroke in you, worthy of yourſelf, and tending to your Honour. Beſides, what does your Majeſty gain by following an oppoſite Courſe? When you reject theſe Remonſtrances, do you hinder them from having a Run in the World? For my ſhare, I believe it is quite otherways, and that ſuch a Conduct in you, does not a little contribute to ſpread them the more. It is true, that by theſe Means you prevent the like coming to your Hands again; but then at the ſame time, you hazard your never receiving any more that are uſeful. Ought the Door to be ſhut to all Advices, for ſuch a Trifle as that?

The truly wiſe Man takes care never to relax, even in the ſmalleſt Affairs: He keeps well with all, and he diſpleaſes none. The moſt eloquent Diſcourſe makes no Impreſſion upon him, if at the Bottom, it is not ſupported by Reaſon and Experience: When both the one and the other give a Sanction to any Propoſal that is laid before a wiſe Man, he is not ſtartled at an ill-turned Period, or a homely Expreſſion. Does he find a Man that agrees with his Views? He does not, for all that, conclude, that he is in the right. Does another differ from him? He does not therefore conclude, that others are in the wrong. He does not ſuffer himſelf to be dazled with what is extraordinary and ſingular, ſo as to embrace it; nor to be ſo much prepoſſeſſed with what appears vulgar and homely, as to reject it entirely for that. A Perſon makes a Diſcourſe to him, which appears empty, and without any Tendency, and that too in very harſh Terms: Yet he does not preſume immediately to pronounce, that he is impertinent. Another lays down his Propoſal in very ſmooth, plauſible, clear Words, and the Advantage accruing by it, appears to him conſiderable and certain: And yet he is not very forward in aſſuring himſelf that he is an able Man, and that he muſt follow what he propoſes. He examines every thing at his own Leiſure: He weighs every thing maturely: After which, he takes what is beſt from every one. It is by obſerving this Method, that a Prince may promiſe himſelf, that he ſhall never be ignorant of any thing, that it imports him to know.

On the other hand, Propoſitions which are dangerous to all Mankind, are much more ſo to a Prince. The moſt common may be reduced to four; namely, that of an extravagant Confidence, that of Suſpicion, that of Contempt, and that of Paſſion. Is a Prince abandoned to the firſt of theſe? He approves every thing that is told him by any one, be who he will, without examining it very cloſe; and this Approbation frequently has dangerous Conſequences. On the contrary, is a Perſon ſuſpected? He may well propoſe fine things, and ſupport them with ſolid Reaſonings; but as his Intentions are ſuſpected, theſe Reaſonings have no Weight. Is a Man undervalued? Whatever he propoſes is deſpiſed, and frequently he himſelf ruined. Is a Prince poſſeſt with a ſtrong Paſſion for any thing? Every worthleſs Wretch, who can be a Tool to his Paſſion, is raiſed to Dignity and Poſts. A Prince, thus following Paſſion and Prejudice in Defiance of Reaſon, becomes hateful to Men of Probity and Virtue, who no longer care to ſerve him. How then can he ſucceed in governing right?

It is a good Subject's Duty, to endeavour to render himſelf uſeful to his Prince. His Inclination and Intereſt in this, go Hand in Hand with his Duty. Therefore, he deſires to be near the Perſon of his Prince, to be known to him, and to make him acquainted with his Views. Princes, on their Parts, commonly endeavour to know their People thoroughly. However, it frequently happens, that a Man of Merit finds it difficult to gain Admittance to his Prince, who on the other hand, has oftimes no leſs Difficulty, to be perfectly acquainted with thoſe he employs. Whence proceeds this? From nine Faults; of which, ſix relate to the Sovereign, and three to the Subject. 1. A Deſire to overbear every body upon all Subjects. 2. To make a Show of Wit. 3. A Spirit of Contradiction and Wrangling. 4. His hating to hear Truth. 5. The having too ſevere a Haughtineſs, or 6, too violent a Temper. Theſe are the ſix Faults relating to the Prince; and theſe produce three on the Part of the Officers. 1. Artful Flattery. 2. An intereſted Reſerve. 3. A cowardly Meanneſs. Theſe are Faults that ſtifle Zeal in the Subject, and are a great Hindrance to the Princes knowing Mankind; which is a Science ſo difficult, that it puzzled Yau himſelf. A Prince, ſubject to the Faults I have pointed out, does not fail ſometimes to flatter himſelf, with having fathomed the Capacity or Weakneſs of his Officers, by an Objection which he ſtarts, or an Anſwer which he draws from them. Oh! how much is he deceived!

In ſhort, to deſire to govern well, and not to make it your principal Study to gain the Hearts of your Subjects, is purſuing wrong Meaſures: Without this, never did any Prince ſucceed. But what Meaſures muſt be purſued, in order to gain the Hearts of the Subjects? You muſt ſtudy to court, and to ſearch for Men of Merit; you muſt even make Advances to them, in order to bring them over to your Service. I ſay you muſt court and ſearch for Men of Merit; for if a Prince acts in the ſame Manner with all the World indifferently, Men of Merit will not come near him at all. Nothing then is more important for a Prince, than juſtly to diſtinguiſh true Merit. This is certain; but then it is no leſs certain, that if the Prince hates ſincere Advice, and loves Flattery, he is frequently deceived. One commonly ſucceeds by accommodating himſelf to his Sovereign's Views, and by flattering his Inclinations; to oppoſe him, and tell him diſagreeable Truths, is always a dangerous and tickliſh Affair, and frequently coſts the Adviſer dear. It is true, there have been wiſe Princes, under whom the contrary has happened; and who were ſo far from frightning Truth away, that they always received her with Encomiums, and crowned her with Rewards: And yet, theſe Princes themſelves, had Reaſon to be afraid leſt the Zeal of Subjects ſhould be too delicate in exerting themſelves on that Head. How would it be under a Prince, whoſe ſuſpicious ill Temper, and Tranſports, ſhould prove ſo many Barriers to ſtop this Zeal?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] As to the Principles of this Diſcourſe, there is nothing more juſt, or more diſtinct.

In the ſecond of the Years named Ywen ho (A), there were Complaints againſt the great Officers of the Provinces; they being accuſed of harraſſing the People, and extorting from them large Sums, under Pretence of ſome Gratuity which they were raiſing for the Emperor. Hyen tſong, who then reigned, publiſhed an Ordinance, in which he very much bewail'd this Abuſe. In the Concluſion of it, he abſolutely prohibits all the great Officers of the Provinces to preſent any thing at Court, beſides what was regulated, and exactly to obſerve the ſtated Times for raiſing the ordinary Taxes. Notwithſtanding this Ordinance, which was publiſhed in the Spring, Fey kyun, who commanded in the Country of Yang yang, truſting to an Officer of the Palace, who was in his Intereſts, privately cauſed Baſons, and other Moveables of Silver, weighing upward of 10,000 Ounces, to be preſented to the Emperor, who accepted of them all; but the Secret took Air. Li kyang taking up the Pen, in the Name of many others in Concert, with whom he preſented to Hyen tſong the following Memorial.

SIR: Among the great Qualifications, and eminent Virtues, which render you equal, or ſuperior to ſo many of your Royal Predeceſſors; all your Empire, more eſpecially, admires your ſingular Penetration, which gives you ſuch an Inſight into the Miſery of your People, and that paternal Goodneſs, which inceſſantly engages you to relieve them. Worthleſs Officers abuſing your Name, levy large Sums upon your People, beſides the ordinary Taxes. A Preſent they make to you, ſerves as a Screen for their Avarice; for the greater Part of it goes to their own Coffers. This Diſorder could not eſcape your Penetration; and you no ſooner was appriz'd of it, than in order to apply an effectual Remedy to it, you prohibited that any thing ſhould be preſented to you, beſides your ordinary Revenues, which ſhould be collected at ſtated Times. Your Ordinance upon this Head, publiſhed laſt Spring, drew Tears of Joy from us. Your People, both when they read it, or heard it read, made loud Demonſtrations of their Joy, by Feaſts and Songs. We now, ſaid one to another, we now live in the moſt happy Days: Let us celebrate the Virtues and Beneficence of that Prince who has reviv'd them.

Such were the Sentiments which your Ordinance, publiſhed laſt Spring, produced in the Hearts of your Subjects. But at preſent, when you have aboliſhed it, by receiving the Preſents of Fey kyun, what do you think is their Diſcourſe? They ſay, that no Streſs is to be laid upon your Ordinances; that you want only to ſave Appearances, and that the Deſire of amaſſing Riches is your ruling Paſſion. What can give a greater Wound to your Virtue than this? Fey kyun, if we may judge by this Action, is far from being a good Officer: His Conduct, with regard to you, is artful. Why ſhould he preſent you with that Plate, againſt ſo poſitive and ſo late an Ordinance? The moſt favourable Conſtruction that can be made of ſuch a Step, is, that he did it to ſound you, that he might take his Meaſures according to the Manner in which you accepted of the Preſent. His way of Reaſoning with himſelf would then be this; If the Emperor rejects this Preſent, I muſt act uprightly, and do my Duty; If he accepts it, this Ordinance is only for Form ſake: He is pleaſed with what is offered him; we may act in our own Way, and behave in our uſual Manner, to thoſe who are under us. But are not ſuch Actions and Reaſonings, a Failure in Obedience, Fidelity, and Uprightneſs? In a word, are they not Crimes?

However, as Fey kyun is one of your greateſt and moſt powerful Officers of War: Beſides, as he poſſeſſes a Poſt of the greateſt Importance by its Neighbourhood to Strangers; if, for theſe or other Reaſons, your Majeſty is unwilling to puniſh him according to Law; let us, at leaſt, hope that your Majeſty, in order to preſerve your Ordinance in Force, will inſtruct your Subjects of the Provinces anew in your real Intentions, and, for the Credit of your Government, will be pleaſed to cauſe an expreſs preſſing Order to be iſſued out in Form, ordaining, that the Plate ſent by Fey kyun, ſhall not remain in the Palace, but be inſtantly ſent back to the ordinary Treaſurers.

Hyen tſong having read the above Memorial, at firſt appeared ſurprized, and a little touched. But ſoon recompoſing himſelf, he cauſed Li kyang to enter, and he talked to him in the following Terms: The Multiplicity of my Affairs is ſuch, that it is impoſſible for me to keep each of them preſent in my Memory. In effect, I have permitted Fey kyun's Preſent to be received, but it was merely thro' want of Reflection. As for Fey kyun, he is excuſable in one Point: When he ſent off his Preſent, my Ordinance was only yet on the Road, and had not reached him: But the Money ſhall, according to the Requeſt contained in your Memorial, be paid back immediately to the ordinary Treaſurers: This was actually done that ſame Day, and the Emperor gave an Advice, as follows, to all the Miniſters of State.

Behold ſo many Pieces of Plate, with which Fey kyun preſented me, contrary to my Orders: But as his People were upon the Road before he had received them, he is leſs blameable, and I pardon him. As for the Plate itſelf, we let you to know, that according to our Orders, it ſhall actually be remitted to our ordinary Treaſurers.

This Declaration of the Emperor's agreeably ſurprized all his Miniſters, who complimented one another in common, by Writings drawn up on purpoſe: And they learned with Joy, both at Court and in the Provinces, with how much Facility the Emperor yielded to Remonſtrances.

This is the Subſtance of what is related in an hiſtorical Gloſs, by one of the Perſons, who, by order of the Emperor Kang hi, was ſet over the Edition of the Collection, from which theſe Pieces are extracted. Two Authors of Reputation are cited in the Margin, who ſay, that this was not the the firſt time that Hyen tſong had iſſued out Ordinances, which he was not at all diſpleaſed to ſee broken. They ſpeak of this Emperor, as a Prince of no Character in Hiſtory, as one who was covetous of Money, and ſuffering himſelf to be guided by his Eunuchs. This laſt Evil, ſays Hû in, was doubtleſs the greateſt, and the Cauſe of the other. Ly kyang, and others, would have done much better, had they in their Remonſtrances, gone directly to the Ground of the Evil: Becauſe they did not this, their Remedies had a bad Effect.

The ſame Emperor Hyen tſong, having received a certain kind of a Bone, which was ſaid to be a Bone of (*) Fo, cauſed it to be introduced, with Ceremony, into the innermoſt Parts of his Palace, where he kept it guarded with great Reſpect for three Days, in order to cauſe it to be tranſported ſolemnly into the Temple of that Sect. The People, the Literati, the Kong, and great Numbers of the (†) Vang approved of this Feſtival. Han yu, who was only She lang in the Tribunal of Crimes, preſented the Emperor with the following Remonſtrance.

SIR; let me be permitted reſpectfully to repreſent to you, that the Doctrine of Fo is, at the Bottom, a vile Sect of ſome Barbarians. It began to inſinuate itſelf into our Empire, under the laſt Emperors of the Han; at leaſt, it is certain, that anciently it was not known. Whang ti, it is ſaid, reigned a hundred Years, and lived a hundred and ten. Shau hau reigned ninety Years, and lived a hundred. Chwen hyo reigned 79 Years, and lived only 98. Ti ko reigned ſeventy Years, and lived 105. Yau reigned ninety Years, and lived one hundred and eighteen. Shun and Yu, each lived 100 Years. Under theſe great Princes, the Empire enjoyed a profound Peace: Their Subjects being happy and contented, lived to a good old Age. Yet Fo and his Sect were not yet known in China: Ching tang, the firſt Emperor of the Shang, likewiſe lived his hundred Years. Ven vang and Vû vang, the firſt of the Chew, lived, the one 97, and the other 93 Years. Surely it was not Fo who made them reign and live ſo long; for no Fo was yet known in China.

Ming ti, on the contrary, reigned but eighteen Years. His Deſcendants were always in Trouble, and ſucceeded always ſoon to one another, and ſoon loſt the Empire. The Worſhip of Fo did not end with the Dynaſty of the Han; on the contrary, it encreaſed. Notwithſtanding this, in a very ſhort time, a great many Dynaſties ſucceeded one another, namely, the Song, the Tſi, the Lyang, and the Chin. And of all theſe Princes, Lyang vû ti alone reigned for a long time. This Prince, from his Bigotry to the Sect of Fo would not kill Animals, even for the (‡) Tſi of his Anceſtors. He reduced himſelf to one Meal a Day, and that conſiſted of Pulſe and Fruits. In ſhort, three times during his Reign, did he debaſe himſelf to honour Fo by Meanneſſes unworthy of his Rank. Where did all this end? He was beſieged in Tay ching, and preſs'd ſo cloſe by Hew king, that he died of Famine, and his Empire paſſed into other Hands. Theſe Princes, who have founded their Empires upon the Honours they paid to Fo, have been ſtill more unhappy. Let us then conclude, that the Service of Fo is, at leaſt, an uſeleſs Thing.

The illuſtrious Founder of our Dynaſty, Tang, when he became Maſter of the Empire, entertained a Thought of extirpating this Sect. He put the Affair under Deliberation: But unhappily they who were in Poſt, were Men of a narrow Way of thinking. They were not converſant in Antiquity, and, for the moſt part, they were ignorant of the Doctrine of our ancient Kings, which is ſo agreeable to all Times: So that, inſtead of profiting by the good Diſpoſitions of Kau tſû, to extirpate that Error out of China, they let the Propoſal drop. How heartily do I curſe them, whenever I think of this!

Your Majeſty, whom ſo much Wiſdom, and ſo much Valour, exalt above the moſt of the Princes who have reigned theſe many Years; your Majeſty, I ſay, in the Beginning of your Reign, prohibited this Sect from building new Temples, and any of your Subjects from becoming a Bonza in time to come. This makes me believe, and ſay with Joy, that at leaſt, under your Reign, the Deſigns of Kau tſû will be executed. Yet, your Orders have as yet been without Effect: This is too much Condeſcenſion already. But beſides, how can you yourſelf annul them by running into an Extreme directly oppoſite? It is ſaid to be by your Majeſty's Orders, that all the Bonzas aſſemble ſolemnly to conduct in Proceſſion one of the Bones of Fo, into the inner Part of your Palace, where you deſign to place it with Honour in an exalted Hall. Notwithſtanding the Poorneſs of my Judgment, I know well that your Majeſty, tho' you have given Orders about this Pomp of Worſhip, Proceſſions and Prayers, is no way devoted at the Bottom to the Sect of Fo. I know well, your real Motive is; that you may render the Joy which fills all Hearts, more ſolemn, for this plentiful Year. Indulging this Diſpoſition, you have a mind to give ſome Spectacle, or new Diverſion; and for that Reaſon, you have permitted this Pomp of extraordinary Ceremonies.

For in ſhort, is it probable, that a Prince, ſo underſtanding as you are, ſhould have any Belief in that Sect? No! I am perſwaded you have not; but the ignorant ſtupid Vulgar, are eaſy to be ſeduced, but hard to be reclaimed. When they perceive that your Majeſty pays theſe outward Honours to Fo, they are convinced that you really honour him: And they don't fail to ſay; Our great and wiſe Emperor, giving himſelf ſo much ado about honouring Fo; why ſhould we poor People ſpare our Perſons and Lives? There needs no more to perſuade them, by Dozens and Hundreds, to burn their Heads and Fingers. The only Conteſt then among them will be, who ſhall ſhall ſooneſt ſquander what he has, in order to take the Habit of a Bonza. At leaſt, from Evening to Morning, the Roads leading to the Bonzaries will be filled with Pilgrims. Old and Young will be ſeen running thither in Crowds; and for fear of what may happen, diveſt themſelves of what they have. They will go ſtill farther, and if this ſhould be prevented by rigorous Prohibitions affixt to the Bonzaries, there will be ſimple People enough found, who will ſlaſh their Arms and other Parts of their Bodies in honour of Fo (A).

This Abuſe, you muſt be ſenſible, will be greatly prejudicial to good Morals, hurt our Policy, and render us ridiculous to all the World. But what was this ſame Fo? A barbarous Foreigner, whoſe Tongue and Cloaths were different from ours. He never was capable to ſpeak that Language, which our antient Princes have tranſmitted to us: Nor did he ever wear any Cloaths made in the Faſhion regulated by theſe great Men. He either was ignorant of, or neglected, the moſt eſſential Duties of Prince to Subject, and of Son to Father.

In ſhort, let us ſuppoſe that this Fo were ſtill alive, and that his Prince had deputed him in his Name, to repair to your Court to pay you Homage; how would your Majeſty receive it? At moſt, after a ſhort Audience, you either would treat him hoſpitably according to the Rites; and make him a Preſent of a compleat Habit, or elſe you would order him a Guard which ſhould have an Eye to his Conduct, and which ſhould convey him to your Frontiers, without allowing him an Opportunity of endeavouring to ſeduce your People. In this manner would you treat Fo. If he were yet alive, and ſent hither by his Prince, why then ſhould he be ſo much revered ſo many Years after his Death? Where then is the Decorum of introducing in Pomp into your Palace, and to its innermoſt Parts, whoſe Acceſs is ſo ſeverely prohibited, a rotten Bone, the ſorry ſtinking Remains of his Carcaſs? Reſpect the Quey ſhin, ſaid Confuçius, but don't go near them. It has been ſeen in Antiquity, that Chu hew being obliged to perform a funeral Ceremony without the Bounds of his own State, was afraid of troubleſome Conſequences: And that in order to guard againſt the Badneſs of the Omen, he ſent one of theſe U, who, by uſing the Herb Lye and other Formalities, averted the Misfortunes.

At preſent, your Majeſty, without taking any Precaution, and without the leaſt Neceſſity, draws near a rotten ſtinking Bone, and ſtops to look at it. Notwithſtanding this, your Officers keep Silence, and ſuffer you to do it, the Yu tſe themſelves, who by their Employment are more oblig'd to ſpeak, have not made the leaſt Remonſtrance. Indeed I bluſh with Shame. Give up, I conjure you, give up that Bone to your Officers of Juſtice: Let them caſt it into the Water or the Fire, and thus root up the Evil. Thereby you will prevent the Progreſs of thoſe Suſpicions and Doubts, which you have given Riſe to in your Empire, prepoſſeſs Poſterity againſt theſe Errors, and verify by your Example, that Sages of the firſt Rate, in concerting and executing their Deſigns, far exceed the Generality of Mankind. Oh! How glorious and how graceful would that be in you? Oh! What a Joy would that give to me, and to every truly zealous Subject! Dread no troubleſome Conſequences: I take theſe all upon my ſelf. If Fo really can do any thing, let him diſcharge all his Wrath upon me. Shang tyen, who ſees us inwardly, knows that my Sentiments anſwer to my Words, and that I am incapable to prevaricate. Happy ſhould I be, if your Majeſty would indulge my earneſt Prayer. I ſhould not then know how to expreſs my loyal Gratitude.

Hyen tſong, having read this Writing, was in ſo reat an Anger, that he deſigned to put Han yu to Death. But he was appeaſed at laſt by Tſwi kyun, Fey tû, and ſome others. He was ſatisfied with baniſhing Yan yu to the Provinces, where he gave him a Poſt much inferior to that he had at Court.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Expreſſions here are cloſe and full of Honeſty; and at the Bottom, reaſonable and ſenſible. It ought to have been ſufficient to have reclaim'd the firſt Man of the Literati of that Dynaſty from the vulgar Errors, and to have given a Value for its Author.

I leave the Reader to judge, both of the Diſcourſe of Han yu, and what the Emperor and he ſays of it, by which he will know in what manner the Chineſe reaſon, when they refute ſtrange Religions.

OUR antient Kings, by eſtabliſhing different Employments for the common Good, intended that each ſhould acquit himſelf of his own, with Exactneſs and Faithfulneſs, and that they who failed ſhould be caſhiered, and even puniſhed with Death. At preſent, amongſt all the Officers of your Empire, We the Cenſors, without contradiction, are they who moſt uſeleſsly fill ſome Employments at your Court, and do the leaſt for our Appointments. It was not thus under Tay tſong: That Prince, who was the Honour of your Family, had Wang quey, and Wey ching: He had them always near his Perſon, even in the Time of his Diverſions. He gave them ſo much Employment, that he formed no Enterpriſe, and gave no Orders without taking their Advice. Thus, what was too hard for the Capacity of that Prince, when aided by the Underſtanding of theſe two great Men? Nothing was better laid down, than the Projects that were undertaken under that glorious Reign; nothing was ever better conceived, than the Declarations and Ordinances that were then publiſhed. Tay tſong treating his Cenſors thus, was only afraid of making too few. When the three firſt Orders aſſembled to take ſome important Reſolution with regard to War, he always cauſed one of the Cenſors to aſſiſt, and to make the Report to him. The great Officers, who are by their Poſts, as it were, the Eyes, Ears, and Arms of their Sovereigns, had then in Tay tſong, not only a vigilant Head, but a good Father, who devoted them to his Perſon by a tender Generoſity, and animated them to his Service by an entire Confidence. As every thing, tho' propoſed by the Prince himſelf, was freely rejected at the Council Board if it was bad; ſo every thing that was good, was eagerly embraced. Thereby Succeſs became ſo ſure, that in leſs than four Years there was ſeen an admirable Order in the Empire: And the Chiefs of our barbarous Neighbours came themſelves with their Arms to guard our Emperor. What was the Reaſon of ſo great and ſo ready a Succeſs? Was it the Force of Arms? No, it was the Acceſs which the Prince granted to his Perſon, it was his Manner of receiving Counſels, and the Zeal of his Officers, eſpecially his Cenſors, to give him good ones.

How much are Things now changed in this Reſpect! All the Office of Cenſors, at preſent, is reduced to the Appearance they make in their Rank, at certain Ceremonies. But what is the Duty of their Poſts by their Inſtitution? It is carefully to obſerve the Prince, and to ſupply, by their Advices, every Failing, both in his perſonal and political Character. It is to propoſe openly, in full Audience, and in full Council, capital and eſſential Points, and ſome others in particular under their Hand and Seal. Theſe ſeveral Years, there have been no Audiences or Councils as formerly, nor any Channel regulated for theſe Writings.

Behold then the Subſtance of the Cenſors Poſt now. When a new Order is publiſh'd, when any Retrenchment or extraordinary Regulation is made, if they appeared blameable to the Cenſors, they could under their Hands and Seals repreſent the Inconveniences, and propoſe their own Opinions. Alas! ſay I to my ſelf, when I think of this, when one has even the Freedom of reaſoning with the Prince upon Affairs, and to ſuggeſt to him Precautions againſt future Dangers; in ſhort, when at the Council Board and in private Audiences, one labours with the Prince in the Government of the State; yet it does not fail ſometimes to happen, that he has difficulty enough to make him yield and quit his own Opinion, and to keep in his Favour againſt Sycophants and Backbiters. How can we, by a ſimple Remonſtrance, or by an Advice given under our Seals, cauſe Ordinances to be revoked after they are publiſhed, Things already eſtabliſhed to be aboliſhed, or draw from the Prince one of theſe honourable Declarations, of which we had formerly ſo many, and of late, ſo few Inſtances? No, that is not a thing to be hoped for. It appears ſo impracticable, that he who makes Remonſtrances, or gives any Advice with regard to Government, is look'd on as a Knight Errant, ſometimes, as an Incendary. Things being on ſuch a Footing, I cannot, notwithſtanding my Defect of Merit, hinder myſelf from bluſhing, while I uſeleſsly fill a Poſt which Wang quey and Wey ching poſſeſſed under Tay tſong. If your Majeſty looks upon me and my Colleagues, as Perſons incapable to aſſiſt, or unworthy to approach you, we conſequently are unworthy to poſſeſs the Rank we fill at your Court; we ought to be broke and baniſhed.

But if your Majeſty has put me in Poſt, with a Deſign that I ſhould be uſeful: If with the ſame View you continue to me the Penſion and Honours annexed to my Rank, I beg that you would give me an Opportunity of fulfilling its moſt eſſential Duties. Formerly, the firſt Cenſors were of the Privy Council, as much as the Prime Miniſter was. Beſides, the firſt Cenſors were frequently about the Perſon of the Prince, who called them from time to time, by an expreſs Orders: He always received them with an Air of Goodneſs, which aſſur'd them, as it were, that their Advices would be agreeable. If your Majeſty will be pleaſed to re-eſtabliſh Things upon that Footing, I ſhall endeavour on my Part to anſwer your Goodneſs, and worthily to fulfil the Duties of my Function; I will lay before you my weak Thoughts, and perhaps I may be ſo happy as to propoſe ſome that may be of Uſe to your Service. But if your Majeſty ſhall find nothing in them but what is frivolous and trifling, let me be puniſhed, and die the Death of a Traytor. It would be leſs ſhocking for me, to lay down my Cenſorſhip, than to poſſeſs it on the Terms I do now.

A Memorial preſented to an Emperor under the Dynaſty of the Tang, to induce him to rank (*) Han wen kong in the Number of thoſe who accompany Confucius, in the Buildings erected to his Honour.

THE Sages of the firſt Rate are glad to be known, provided their Wiſdom can be uſeful. There is one thing admirable in this, which is, that ſooner or later, they have Juſtice done them. Some are in Poſts during their Life, and become the Glory and Happineſs of their Age: After which, they are entirely, or very near, forgot. Others, who during their Life-time are neglected, are honoured after their Death: And their Memory for many Ages encreaſes in Fame. Confuçius was of the laſt Sort. From the Times of the (†) Han to thoſe of the Swi, the higheſt Titles that the Emperors have conferred upon him, have been thoſe of (‡) Kong or Hew. At laſt, under our Dynaſty Tang, he got the Title of (§) Vang. The Titles of his Scholars were always changed in Proportion; being made Kong or Hew, when before they were only King or Ta fu. Tho' filial Piety has been always look'd upon, as the Virtue moſt capable to move Tyen ti, and to touch Quey ſhin; Tſen tſe, whom this Virtue rendered ſo famous, nevertheleſs remained, for the Space of five or ſix hundred Years, among the common Rank of Diſciples: And it was only by our Dynaſty Tang, that he was advanced to be one of the ten (||) Ché. Theſe were happy and charming Regulations, if ever there were any ſuch.

In the Middle of a dark Night, if the Moon appears all of a ſudden, her Splendor appears the more bright. It is the ſame with the Sun, where he riſes from behind the thick Clouds that had long concealed him. The longer the Time is ſince it thunder'd laſt, the louder will the next Thunder be.

be. The Wiſdom and Memory of (*) Chong chi, which was neglected or deſpiſed under the (†) Chew and the Tſin, known and reſpected, but in too ſmall a Degree, under the Han, buried, and as it were extinguiſhed under Tſin, the Song, the Chin, and the Swi, has at laſt, under our Dynaſty Tang, happily and gloriouſly, in one Day, been avenged of the Injuries of ſo many Ages.

If the Dead are conſcious, it is eaſy to judge of the Sentiments, which theſe great Men entertain about theſe Changes. But our Dynaſty Tang itſelf has had a Man, whoſe whole Life was employed in the Maxims of Confuçius, who has diſplayed their Worth in his Diſcourſes and Writings, and expreſſed it in his Morals and Actions: In the former, he is on a Level with (‡) Yen and Min, in the latter, with Hyew and Hya. Yet he has not a Place at the Feaſt celebrated in Honour of Confuçius. This I think is very inconſiſtent with the Zeal of our Dynaſty in Honour of Confuçius, and inconſiſtent too with the Honour, which the Zeal of our Dynaſty has always expreſſed for departed Sages. One Wen chong tſe, without much deſerving it, enjoy'd this Honour for a long time; and can it be denied to Han wen kong? None ever deſerved it better than he did. He declared an open War with the Sects Yang, Me, Fo, Lau, and ſingly reduced them to the greateſt Extremities. He fairly and vigorouſly maintained the Doctrine of Confuçius; he maintains it at this Day in his Writings, from whence Thouſands of learned Men draw, at the ſame time, the ſame Zeal againſt the falſe Sects, the ſame Love of Virtue, and the ſame Art of governing a-right, which he himſelf drew from Confuçius. Thus he ſays in one of his Works, If there had not been ſo great a Maſter as Confuçius, I would not have called myſelf a Scholar. And ſurely, if he had lived with Confuçius, he had at preſent poſſeſſed a diſtinguiſhed Rank in the Monuments erected to the Honour of that great Maſter.

Under our Dynaſty Tang, a Score of Men, famous each in his ſeveral Age, for being attached to the Books of Confuçius, have been pitched upon to have a Place on that Account in the Hall, and at the Banquet of Confuçius. I do not at all blame this; there is nothing in it but what is uſeful and reaſonable: But if this Honour has been granted to twenty Perſons, of whom moſt had not well penetrated into, or comprehended the profound Senſe of Confuçius: How can it be refuſed to Wen kong, the Glory of our Dynaſty, who ſo well expreſs'd it in his Conduct, and raiſed its Value in his Writings? I therefore beſeech your Majeſty to give Orders, that a Place may be aſſigned to this great Man; and I doubt not, but ſuch an Order will inſpire into your Subjects a new Ardour for Study and Virtue.

In the eighth of the Years named Pau ta, on occaſion of ſome extraordinary Phenomena, the Emperor publiſhed the following Declaration.

WE find in the Book Chun tſyû, a great Number of Solar Eclipſes, Earthquakes, Comets, extraordinary (§) Showers and Hail. At preſent, we ſee theſe extraordinary Phenomena renewed; Whether the Faults of the Princes draw them on us, or if it is the charitable Warnings of Tyen, [Heaven] whoſe Heart is full of Goodneſs; they ought equally to inſpire us with a reſpectful Dread. With theſe Sentiments, upon ſeeing theſe Prodigies, I call to Mind, that formerly my Armies being in the Country of the Min and Ywé, the Officers and Soldiers there, committed great Exceſſes: Without reſpecting the Will of Tyen, or being touched with the Neceſſities of Men, they ruined Agriculture, and brought the People to Miſery. Tho' they did this without my Orders, and againſt my Intentions, yet their Sin falls upon me, and I acknowledge that I am guilty. That I may teſtify my Repentance, and, in ſome meaſure, repair my Faults, I grant an Amneſty to all the Criminals of my Empire, and I ordain, that Care ſhall be taken, effectually to relieve the Poor, eſpecially ſuch as are deſtitute.

In the firſt of the Years called (B) Twang kong, Tay tſong, the ſecond Emperor of the Dynaſty Song, gave the Title of Vang to four of his Sons in different Provinces, where they already commanded, and addreſſed to them the following Diſcourſe, which he publiſhed in form of a Declaration.

Declarations under the Dynaſty of the Song.

DURING the Years named Hyen te, while the (+) Chew reigned, I was ſcarce ſixteen Years of Age, and followed my deceaſed Father, who commanded the imperial Armies, and who reduced to Obedience Yang chew, Tay chew, and other Places. Being early accuſtomed to carry Arms, I frequently fought againſt the Rebels, and killed many of them with my own Hand. My Brother, who during that time was employed in reducing Lû ho, being informed by my Father's Letters of my Courage and Conduct, ſaid; It is well, we have a worthy younger Brother. At Eighteen I joined him, and was preſent at the famous Expeditions of Kyan quan, I chew, and Mo chew. My Brother mounting the Throne a little after, had two Wars ſucceſſively upon his Hands, againſt two Rebel Officers. He marched againſt them in Perſon, he committed to me the Care of defending the Capital, and of maintaining Order through all. He returning victorious, I had the Command of his principal Troops, and the Government of Kay fong. My Conduct there, during ſixteen or ſeventeen Years, is well known. The Literati and the People, the Huſbandmen and the Soldiers, all praiſed it, and I had the Pleaſure to ſee the Wicked

Wicked themſelves reform by my Cares. In ſhort, during the (*) thirteen Years that I have reigned, you know how averſe I have been to all Luxury and fooliſh Expences; you have neither ſeen me oppreſs my People by uſeleſs Expeditions, or by Voyages of Pleaſure abroad, nor lead a voluptuous ſoft Life at home: Above all, you have ſeen me upright and ſincere, without Affectation, and without Vanity in my Words or Conduct.

As for (†) you who are born to Royalty and Plenty, you have been delicately bred up within a Palace; and this makes me fear, that being unacquainted with the Miſeries of the People, and negligent of diſtinguiſhing Vice from Virtue, you may commit a great many Faults. I have a thouſand things to lay before you on this Head: But I ſhall confine myſelf to recommend to you ſome of the moſt eſſential Points. Know therefore, that as you are the Sons of an Emperor, you ought above all things to vanquiſh and curb your Paſſions. That you may be aſſiſted in this, always hear with Attention, and take in good Part the Advice that ſhall be given you, either with regard to your Faults or Defects. Never put your Cloaths on, without compaſſionately reflecting how many Cares and Pains the Stuffs that you wear have coſt. While you are at your Meals, reflect upon the Sweat and the Toils of the Huſbandman. If you are to take a Reſolution to decide an Affair, or judge in a Cauſe, put yourſelf in the calmeſt Diſpoſition: No Joy, no Anger. I have a great many Affairs to go through, but that does not at all fatigue me. Was I ever ſeen to expreſs either Impatience or Diſguſt? I give a great many Audiences: Was I ever known to ſhew, I will not ſay Diſdain or Haughtineſs, but not to treat every one according to his Rank, and with due Civility? Above all, I recommend to you carefully to avoid Defects, to which Princes who have Spirit and Capacity, are very liable. Don't truſt too much to your own Underſtanding, nor deſpiſe the Advices of them, whom you believe to be leſs capable than yourſelf. It was a good Saying of our Anceſtors; I look upon a Man who contradicts me, as my Maſter, becauſe he wants to inſtruct me, and to be uſeful to me. But I dread him, who applauds and flatters me, as my Enemy; for he looks to his own Intereſt, and not to mine. Don't forget theſe Maxims, but practiſe them; and thereby you will keep your Footing and come to a happy End.

Remonſtrance of Yun chu to his Emperor, with regard to three Faults which he found in him.

VEN TI, one of the Han, was a Prince of ſingular Virtue; and yet Kya i at that time found ſomewhat to bewail in his Government. Vû ti, one of his Succeſſors, had reduced and ſubdued all his barbarous Neighbours; and yet Sin lo and Yen ngan did not fail to inculcate upon him the Ruin of Tſin, as if he had reaſon to fear the ſame Fate. Theſe two great Princes were ſo far from being angry with theſe Advices, that they took them very well. Thus, the Empire continued without Interruption, for upwards of ten Generations. Eul ſhi, the Son and Succeſſor of Shi whang, who was the ſecond and laſt Emperor of the Tſin, and Tang ti, the ſecond and laſt Emperor of the Swi, acted quite otherways; therefore they periſhed in a very ſhort time. I am far from deſigning to compare a Prince ſo gentle and virtuous as you, to either of theſe two laſt. But I beg you at the ſame time, to examine how neceſſary it is, that Things ſhould be on as good a Footing now, as they were under Ven ti and Vû ti. Towards the Weſt, there is a Nation ſometimes ſubmiſſive, and ſometimes jealous: You have very powerful Enemies towards the North. Both the one and the other are attentive to what paſſes in the Empire, and are ready to take Advantage of any Commotions that ſhall happen. Thus, notwithſtanding of the Peace your Empire actually enjoys, your Majeſty has reaſon to be afraid, and to block up every Inlett to the ſmalleſt Diſorders.

Beſides the Care of watching over the Frontiers, and of opening a Door to Advices, which I cannot enough recommend to you; my Zeal for your Glory and the common Good, obliges me to repreſent to you three Things. In the firſt Place, you are inconſtant in your Government, you frequently alter your Edicts. In the ſecond Place, you often miſplace your Favours, and do not always make a right Choice of the Perſons whom you employ and truſt. In the third Place, you are extravagant in your Gratifications, which are commonly ill judged. There is nothing eaſier for your Majeſty, than to ſhun theſe three Defects. It depends only upon yourſelf: You have no more to do, but heartily to will it; to which I exhort you, and ſo much the more, becauſe it appears to me, that at laſt they may be attended with bad Conſequences.

Let us touch a little upon each: To what do the People truſt, if not to the Words and Edicts of their Sovereign? Anciently, when one was publiſhed, every body run eagerly to read or to hear it; now-a-days it is otherways. They are coldly received. Every one who talks of them, ſays; This is not conſtant, we can't depend upon this Edict: Another very different, or perhaps directly contrary, will be ſoon publiſhed. In this manner People talk: This Inconſtancy which renders your Edicts deſpicable, cannot fail to diminiſh, by little and little, the Reſpect that is due to Sovereign Authority.

I hear People ſometimes reaſon upon this Inconſtancy, and the Cauſe to which they attribute it is as follows. The moſt part of your Officers lay before you a Regulation: Beforehand they weigh its Advantages, and lay them before your Majeſty; you approve of them. If another, whom you love and value, comes, and in a private Audience, puts Things in another Light, concluding that the former Regulation was by no means convenient; your Majeſty immediately changes your Opinion. Therefore, when your zealous and underſtanding Officers ſee the Fruit of their Zeal and their Wiſdom vaniſh, they cool, and are diſcouraged. The ſecond Inconvenience of your your Inconſtancy is this; the Sovereign alone can diſtribute Dignities and Poſts, according to the Merits and Services of each. Things not long ago have been much changed not only the being related to the Empreſs, but even the Poſt of a Eunuch of the Palace, or the Merit of having ſome Connexion with them, is a Title of being advanced very quickly. This Method which has been opened one of theſe Years, is ſo well known, and ſo common, that it has got a Name; It is called the Within-door Way. I don't know, but that under the Reigns of ſome of the Dynaſty of the Tang, while Women were at the Helm of Affairs, ſuch Methods might be in Uſe then. But I know well, that theſe Reigns have been always look'd upon as the bad Times of the Dynaſty; that that Method was then called the indirect Way, and that theſe Examples are not to be follow'd. If among the Relations of Queens, or amongſt the Eunuchs of the Palace, there are found any Men of Virtue, Merit, or great Capacity, they ought to be advanced; but let it be in a quite different manner; and by the Deliberation of the Council, not by indirect ſneaking Methods: Theſe are unworthy of your Majeſty, and liable to great Inconveniencies. If your Officers who ſee theſe Inconveniencies, are ſilent, and wink at them, that is a great Breach of the Laws. If they vigorouſly oppoſe them, that would be to put a bar upon your Goodneſs, and to reſiſt your Will. To abandon the Defence of the Laws, is what zealous faithful Officers can never reſolve to do: To oppoſe your Goodneſs and your Orders, is what reſpectful Subjects will hardly do, for fear of weakening your Authority. This is a perplexing Dilemma. Beſides, I beg you would conſider, that the principal thing you require of your Officers, is a perfect Equity, which is never byaſſed by private Affections, or intereſted Views. You are in the right to exact this. But how can you obtain it, if in the Diſtribution of Honours and Poſts, you are inconſiſtent with yourſelf.

As for Gratifications, Princes ought to beſtow them; for by their Means, a Prince animates his Officers to ſerve him well. But beſides, that their Donor ought always to be tender of the common Good, there are likewiſe Rules to be obſerved in Gratifications. They muſt be properly made, and diſcreetly proportioned. But for theſe ſeveral Years, you have carried them to an exceſs. It is not rare to ſee you without any Reaſon, make large Preſents, ſometimes to a Domeſtic, ſometimes to a Groom of your Bed-chamber, and ſometimes to a Phyſician. Your Subjects know this very well, and ſay loudly, that your Majeſty is a very bad Huſband of what your Anceſtors have ſaved, and that you will ſoon exhauſt it all. The People indeed have not ſeen the inſide of your Coffers; nor can they know exactly what is, or what is not there. But on the one Hand, as they are acquainted with your Bounty, ſo on the other, they feel themſelves every Day loaded with new Taxes. Hence, they conclude, that your Exchequer is not very well furniſhed, and they ſuſpect that what you ſeek from them, you laviſh upon Sycophants. Yes! That People who ſaw with Pleaſure, the Valour and the Services of Wang quey richly rewarded, groans under leſs conſiderable, but more frequent and ill judged Gratifications. Theſe Thoughts which I have laid before you, are not my own private Sentiments alone, but thoſe of the Public. All the great Officers about your Perſon know this as well as me; but the Fear of diſpleaſing you, binds up their Tongues. By their Silence, the Government every Day goes from bad to worſe, and the Minds of your Subjects are exaſperated to a Degree that makes me tremble.

All I wiſh then, is, that you would inceſſantly regulate your Houſhold, and exert yourſelf in your public Character with that Application, that ſo vaſt an Empire requires. Then you will not want zealous loyal Subjects, who will aſſiſt you with their Abilities. The Laws by little and little, will be eſtabliſhed in their former Vigor; your Revenues being rightly managed, will ſuffice for the Exigences of the State, and the Security of the Frontiers. In ſhort, that I may end as I have begun, I beg that your Majeſty would conſider, that the Occaſion of the ſudden Ruin of the Tſin and the Swi, was, their having ſhut the Door to Advices, by taking them amiſs; and that a Conduct directly oppoſite, rendered the Reigns of Ven ti and Vû ti in the Times of the Han, glorious, and aſſured the Crown for a long time to their Poſterity.

A DISCOURSE by SHE KYAY.

UNDER the preſent Dynaſty, we have nothing but Impoſts, Taxes, and Prohibitions, and theſe too in the higheſt Degree. They obtain on the Mountains, and in the Vallies, in Rivers and Seas; upon Salt, and upon Iron, upon Wine and Tea; upon Stuffs and Silks, upon Turnpikes and Roads, upon Brooks and Bridges. Upon all theſe and many other Things, I every where ſee Prohibitions laid, &c. While theſe Prohibitions are rigorouſly and carefully enforced, I ſee on the other Hand, the Son abandon the Father, and the People withdraw from the Authority of the Prince; the Huſbandmen quit the Spade and the Plough, and the Women the Manufactures of Stuffs: The Tradeſmen, each in his way, every Day refine upon vain Ornaments; the Merchants traffic with Pearls and other uſeleſs Ornaments; the Gentlemen of the Gown neglect the Study of our ancient Books, whoſe Summary is Juſtice and Charity. Superſtition and Error become as ſo many Cuſtoms: Corruption creep into our very Language; empty Flouriſhes become the Faſhion; Numbers of People run about the Streets, and lead an idle Life. A great Number of Magiſtrates loſe their Time at Entertainments; Multitudes of People wear Cloaths far above their Ranks; Buildings become every Day more expenſive; Weakneſs and Innocence oppreſt by Force and Power. The great Officers ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted, and their Underlings to fleece the People. I ſee, I ſay, all this; and I ſee at the ſame time, that no effectual Remedy is applied, either for preventing or ſuppreſſing it.

And yet, according to the Notions of our Antients, thoſe wholſome true Notions, it was a perſonal Crime in a Son to abandon his Father, nay, it was a public Diſorder, and is always a great Abuſe. It is rebellious in a Subject to withdraw himſelf from Authority; for Men to abandon the labouring the Ground, and the Women the Manufactures of Stuffs, is to ſtarve both themſelves and others: For the Workmen to refine upon vain Ornaments, the Merchants to traffic in uſeleſs Toys, and the Literati to neglect Charity and Juſtice, is, for each, in his reſpective Profeſſion, to abandon what is Eſſential and Capital. For Superſtitions to eſtabliſh themſelves in China, is to introduce Barbariſm into the Empire. To bring a florid Stile in Vogue, is, as it were, to bury our King: So many idle Vagabonds running about the Streets, and our Magiſtrates loſing their Time at Feaſts, is abandoning both public and private Concerns. By the Prevalence of Luxury in Building and Cloaths, all Orders muſt be ſoon confounded. By Force and Power not being curbed, the Poor and the Weak are oppreſt. By great Officers ſuffering themſelves to be corrupted by Preſents, and the ſmall living upon Rapine, there is an End of Equity and Juſtice. Where is the Wiſdom in not prohibiting, or rather in not putting an effectual Stop to ſo great Evils, and in inforcing a rigorous Obſervance of, I do not know how many, Prohibitions, from whatever is neceſſary to Mankind? Is this the Government of our Ancients? But if any one ſhould aſk at me, what ſhould be done in order to re-eſtabliſh that wiſe Government, my Anſwer ſhall be in two Words: All that is done at preſent muſt be forbidden, and all that is forbidden muſt be done: Such was the Government of our Anceſtors.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Among Laws, there are ſome more ſome leſs important: Some are Capital and Eſſential, and ſome are leſs ſo. If they are confounded, and the latter are preferred to the former, the People do not know which of them to embrace. The Diſtinction that ought chiefly to be made in this Caſe, is very well laid down in this Piece, whoſe Stile is likewiſe lively and nervous.

An hiſtorical Gloſs ſays, that She kyay was an able, upright, reſolute Mn, who loved Good and hated Evil: But a little too greedy of Reputation. For which Reaſon, he ſeized all Occaſions of ſpeaking and acting. He thereby made himſelf Enemies who ſought to ruin him, and he had ſome Difficulty to eſcape their Vengeance.

Jin tſong having no Son, adopted one of his Relations who was a young Man, and created him hereditary Prince. The young Prince being weak and committing ſeveral Faults, the Emperor and the Empreſs had Thoughts of ſubſtituting another in his Room: But the Secret was not ſo well kept, but that the Prince was apprized of it. Upon this, they laid aſide their Deſign: And Jin tſong dying, the young Prince was declared Emperor. He falling ſick, and his Diſeaſe putting him out of a Condition to take care of his Affairs, the Empreſs Dowager took the Reins of Government in her own Hand, giving Audiences regularly, and conſulting about every thing with the Miniſters thro' a Curtain. As ſoon as the Emperor was recovered, ſhe reſigned the Government into his Hands. The Prince having been informed that Jin tſong and the Empreſs had for ſome time been conſulting to ſet him aſide, he inwardly owed them a grudge; and ſeemed uneaſy, that the Empreſs had during his Illneſs, taken upon her the Government. The Officers of the Palace ſiding with his Reſentment, treated that Princeſs very ill, and let her and her Daughters be in Want of a great many Things. At this Juncture, the Emperor being informed of the Services and Merit of Fû pi, nominated him to be Ting chê, which at that time was a very conſiderable Poſt; but Fû pi excuſed himſelf from accepting it, and laying hold of ſo fair an Opportunity exhorted the Emperor to behave otherways with Regard to the deceaſed Emperor, and the Empreſs Dowager who was yet living. He did it as uſual, in Writing; and it was in the following Terms.

SIR; I have a due Senſe of the Goodneſs with which you would reward me for ſome Services that my Duty bound me to perform to the Emperor your Father. But I would be much better pleaſed, if you yourſelf would endeavour to acknowledge the Obligations you are under to that Prince, and the Empreſs his Conſort who is yet alive. They choſe you as their Succeſſor to the Throne, out of a great many Princes of the Blood, who were as nearly related to them as you. If at preſent, you poſſeſs the glorious Title of the (*) Son of Tyen, if you are Maſter of the vaſt Riches of ſo great an Empire, it is merely thro' their Favour. A ſingular Favour if ever any was! A Favour for which it is not eaſy to make ſuitable Returns. In ſhort, a Favour which you cannot enough acknowledge. Yet, you not only neglect to acquit yourſelf of the ordinary Ceremonies with Regard to the late Emperor, but you are neither obſerved to pay the Reſpect due to the Perſon, nor to provide for the Exigencies, of the Empreſs Dowager who is yet alive. How! Is then the moſt ordinary Civilities too great a Complement to Perſons to whom you owe ſo much? Where is your Gratitude and Piety? Surely all the Empire expects other things of your Majeſty. While you were under the Hands of the Phyſicians, the World was leſs ſurprized at this Conduct. But ſince your Health is recovered, ſince you bear without any Inconveniency, all the Weight of Affairs; to fulfill all the other Duties of a Prince, and to neglect that of a Son, makes every Officer, both of your Court and in the Provinces, conclude, that your former Negligence was not ſo much occaſioned by your Want of Health, as your Want of Piety. As for my ſhare, I own that I don't underſtand the Motive that induces you to act in this Manner. Is it becauſe you imagined, that the late Emperor in his Life-time, diſcovered a Coldneſs towards you? Is it becauſe you have had unfavourable Accounts on that Head? It is a certain Truth, that the late Emperor if he pleaſed, might have named another Succeſſor beſides you; you; but he choſe you, and in Conſequence of that Choice, you are his Succeſſor. What ſurmiſes or ſuſpicions, even tho' they had a little Foundation, ought to efface a Favour ſo well known, ſo great, and ſo real.

As for the Empreſs Dowager, if, for ſome time, ſhe took the Management of Affairs upon her ſelf, ſhe did it at the Requeſt of your Miniſters and other great Officers, while you was not in a Condition to manage them yourſelf; but ſhe never pretended to be a Partner with you in Sovereign Rule. In ſhort, ſome time ago, ſhe reſigned to you the Government; ſince which time you have reigned and ruled alone. The reſt is paſt and ought to be forgot, nor does it become you to reſent it ſo long as you do. For theſe petty Reaſons of Uneaſineſs, even tho' they were real, to forget a Benefit of the firſt Order, is to imitate Yew vang, who is ſharply reprimanded in the Shi king, for a Fault in its kind, not ſo grievous as yours. I have a ſenſible Concern when I ſee you, inſtead of imitating Shun, a Prince eminent in ſo many Reſpects, particularly in that of his Piety towards his Relations, imitate Yew vang, a Prince who is ſo infamous in Hiſtory.

It is ſaid, that it is not the Empreſs Dowager alone, who muſt bear with your capricious Temper, your Reſentment I hear, extends even to the Daughters of the late Emperor, whom conſequently you ought to look upon as your Siſters. You have deprived them of their Apartments, and given it to your own Daughters. Being ſhut up in a Corner of the Palace, they receive from you not the leaſt Mark of your Goodneſs; you take no Care of them, and they are to you as Strangers. Permit me then to open my Heart, and to inform you of the Sentiments of the whole Empire, and of my ſelf more eſpecially. The late Emperor reigned for 41 Years. Under a Reign whoſe Happineſs was equal to its Length, the Empire felt the Effects of his Goodneſs. There is not one of his Officers who is not (*) pierced with his Gratitude: As no Man owes more to him than I do, being raiſed by him, from one of the poor ſimple Literati to the greateſt Employments, ſo no body has more ſincere, and more lively Sentiments of Gratitude for that good Prince, than I have. By this you may judge, how great the Concern of all the Subjects of your Empire, and of me in particular, is to ſee the Empreſs his Conſort, and the Princeſſes his Daughters ſo much neglected. I am ſo much affected with it, that I have not the Heart to accept of the Dignity to which you would raiſe me. What Proportion do my weak Services bear to the Obligations, which your Majeſty owes to the late Emperor and Empreſs Dowager? Such as a Thread, or a Hair of Silk bears to the whole Univerſe. How inconſiſtent is it to forget what you owe to them, for the greateſt of all Favours, and to reward the trifling Service that I have done you? How abſurd is it, not to be ſenſible of it? I own I am heartily ſo. What I wiſh above all things, is, that you would render to the late Emperor the accuſtomed Duties; and that as a good Son, you would honour the Empreſs. Beſides your owing this Example to all your Empire; it is the way to gain the Hearts of your Officers. As for me, when I ſhall ſee you change, tho' I ſhould live only upon Roots and Water, there are no Fatigues nor Hardſhips that ſhould diſcourage me, and no Danger that ſhould daunt me from ſerving your Majeſty with Pleaſure, to the laſt Breath of my Life. But at the ſame time, while, without ſuch a Change wrought, your Majeſty offers me every Day new Honours and the greateſt Riches, I cannot reſolve to accept of them. The State ſtill feels the wiſe Government of your Anceſtors: The Laws which they eſtabliſh'd are obſerv'd, the People are ſubmiſſive, the Officers vigilant, and every thing goes ſmoothly on. There is no occaſion for your Majeſty who is yet in Mourning to diſturb yourſelf, or to give a very cloſe Application to Affairs. That which is moſt preſſing, and in which, without you, your Officers can do nothing, is, to take care of whatever relates to the Empreſs Dowager, and the five betrothed Daughters of Yin tſong: Upon you alone, depends their Fortune, and you alone can make them happy. If you act as a dutiful Son and Brother, you will attach the People to your Perſon, and draw upon yourſelf and your Poſterity the Aſſiſtance of Tyen. I ſay, that you will attach to you the People; Make a fair trial, they will be ſenſible of it, and you will be able to point out the Truth of this Promiſe. I ſay, that you will draw upon yourſelf and your Poſterity, the Aſſiſtance of Tyen. This Point, tho' it be a little more obſcure, yet is as certain as the other. Don't pretend to ſay, that Tyen neither hears nor ſees; That Men are very ſhort ſighted, and what have I to fear? You would be hood-winkt if you thought ſo. Behold, what I thought it my Duty to repreſent to you, while I excuſe myſelf from accepting of the Honour which your Majeſty is pleaſed to do me. I own, it is both imprudent and raſh to talk ſo freely. But I dare to aſſure your Majeſty, that what I have here laid before you, is the Dictates of my Honeſty and Zeal. Happy would I be, if your Majeſty would think it ſo; and inſtead of finding Fault with my Boldneſs, profit by my Honeſty.

A Gloſs.] This Remonſtrance was without effect, or at leaſt, without any Anſwer. Fû pi repeated it ſix or ſeven times. But the Emperor Ing-tſong always rejected his Excuſes: At laſt, that Prince by a public Declaration, ſhewed a Reſolution to alter his Conduct, and then Fû pi accepted of the Poſt that he offered.

Diſcourſe of Se ma quang to the ſame Emperor Ing tſong, upon filial Piety and Equity.

IT is a (†) common and a true Saying, that in point of perſonal Perfection, filial Piety is the Chief of all Virtues, and Equity is the Soul of Government. Confucius in his Book upon filial Piety, ſays, that this Virtue is the Principal and the Foundation of all others. He adds, that he who

(†) In the Chineſe it is literally; Your Subject has heard ſay, 'tis a common Phraſe with them in this kind of Writing.

who does not love his Father and Mother, and does not behave to them with all due Reſpect, tho' he loves the reſt of Mankind, and treats them with all the Reſpect imaginable, cannot in Juſtice paſs for a Man, either of Virtue or Honour; and in effect, is neither the one nor the other. For never did a Tree without a Root ſhoot forth fair Branches. The late Emperor Jin tſong, by adopting you, and calling you to Empire, made you the nobleſt Preſent which was in the Power of Man to make. (*) That Prince is now no more; but he has left an Empreſs and five Daughters. Theſe as they were neareſt to him, ſo they ought to be deareſt to you: and you ſhould expreſs for them, all poſſible Concern. You cannot fail in this, without anſwering very ill the Intentions of Jin tſong, and the Obligations you owe him. Formerly, when the Empreſs Dowager governed in your Palace, the Officers of your Houſhold reſpected her. Both Great and Small were watchful to ſerve her. At preſent, when ſhe has reſigned to you the Cares of Government, and meddles no more in Affairs, I apprehend no Alteration with Regard to her will happen. Some of the Officers of your Palace may be idle Fellows, and may neglect, and ſerve her ill. She is Mother of the Empire, and all the Empire ought to have it at Heart, that ſhe be happy and ſatisfied. But all the Empire, Sir, relies upon you, and you have more Obligations than one upon you, to take all the Care of this which you are capable to expreſs.

I likewiſe fear, that there are Fire-brands in your Palace, who interpreting in their own Manner, the Words and Actions of the Empreſs, make Reports of both, which ſerve either to cool, or to exaſperate your Majeſty. If there are any of ſuch a Character, they won't fail to maſk themſelves under the ſpecious Pretexts of Fidelity, Loyalty and Zeal. But they are at the Bottom mean Souls, who have nothing in View but their own Intereſt, and who endeavour, by the Diſpoſitions which they either believe or ſee to be in the Prince, to make their own Advantage. If then you diſcover any of theſe abandoned Sycophants, ordain, without hearing them, that they ſhall immediately be put into the Hands of Juſtice and tried. One Example which you ſhall make of this ſort, will ſtop the Mouths of all others of that Kidney. On the contrary, if you lend an Ear to ſuch Diſcourſes, there will be no end of Backbitings and Calumnies, and they will infallibly be attended with fatal Diſorders; this is a Point of the Importance, and deſerves your Attention.

In ſhort, it is a received Maxim, and has become as it were proverbial: In Matters of State the Prince alone ought to decide, but in domeſtic Affairs, the Empreſs ought to rule; I therefore wiſh that your Majeſty deciding all foreign Affairs by yourſelf, would leave all Affairs within Doors to the Empreſs, together with the Diſtribution of all the Gratuities and Poſts there, at leaſt, that nothing of that kind be done without her Advice and Conſent. Every thing then will be in order; you will ſee your Mother, who is above you, happy, and the Officers and your People under you, teſtify their Satisfaction, by Encomiums and Songs. If, becauſe this Order is not eſtabliſhed, the Officers of your Houſhold ſhould be neglectful, and fail in their Services to the Empreſs; if any of them by falſe Reports, ſhould embroil you with her, this muſt be known without Doors: Perhaps the Empreſs ſhall fall ſick out of Vexation; what a Diſhonour will that reflect upon you? How can you anſwer for it in the Face of the Empire? All the Good you can otherways do, will not be able to cover your Shame. This is the Tendency of my firſt Propoſition, which was; That filial Piety is in point of perſonal Perfection, the Chief of all Virtues.

In the Chapter of the Shu king, which is called (||) Hong fan, when the Author comes to recommend it to the Prince to be equitable, and never to be influenced in his Actions by private Inclinations or Averſions; he lays ſo great Streſs upon that Point, that he inculcates the ſame thing in ſix different Manners, that he may the better ſet forth its Importance. He who governs a State, ſays Chew jin, ought not to repay private Services done to him before he mounted the Throne, with public Rewards. Much leſs ought he to employ the Rigour of the Laws, that he may gratify a perſonal Hatred. We read in the Ta hyo (‡), he who would promote Reaſon and Wiſdom in his Conduct, ought to keep his Heart equal and ballanced. But the Heart loſes that Equality and Ballance, when private Love or Hatred gives it a Byaſs to one Side or other. From being but one of the Princes of the Blood, you were raiſed to the Throne on which you now ſit; this was a wide Step. It was natural enough after this Riſe, that you ſhould retain ſome private Favour or Reſentment, towards thoſe who had formerly done you ſome good Office, or given you ſome Diſguſt: But beware, for theſe Affections and Diſquiets ought not to influence your Government.

The great Rule of Sovereigns, is, to reward Virtue, and to puniſh Vice; to advance Men of Probity and Merit, and to baniſh all who want both. Honours and Poſts, being the moſt precious Treaſures of States, a Prince ought not to diſtribute them to his Subjects, whoſe only Merit is, that they agree with him in ſome particulr Notions. Far leſs ought he to make uſe of the Chaſtiſements regulated by the Laws, to ſatisy a private Reſentment againſt thoſe who have tranſgreſſed them. Formerly, Dignities and Poſts were diſtributed before an Aſſembly of the whole Court, and Criminals were executed in the Face of the World: As if the Prince would thereby ſignify, that his private Inclinations had no Part in all that was done; that he diſtributed Rewards to Perſons whom the Public would not think unworthy, and that they whom they judged worthy of Death, were condemned at the ſame time by the public Voice.

At preſent, there is a great Mixture among the Officers of your Empire. There are amongſt them Men of Virtue and Merit, but they are mixt and confounded in the Crowd. The Good and (*) The Chineſe has it He is retired far off in Aſcending; I have already taken Notice, that the Chineſe Politeneſs ſhuns the blunt Expreſſion of He is dead, and employs more ſoft Terms, according to Perſons and Circumſtances.

and the Bad are upon a Footing. This is a Diſorder infinitely prejudicial to the Good of the State, and I could wiſh that your Majeſty would ſeriouſly apply to remedy it. The Thing you muſt do for that effect, is as follows. Lay yourſelf out to know thoſe thoroughly, whoſe Virtue and Capacity are greater than ordinary, and who are thereby moſt capable to anſwer the Hopes of the Public. Such as you know to be Men of this kind, draw immediately out of the Crowd, advancing them to the firſt Poſts; and tho' they had formerly the Unhappineſs to diſpleaſe you, yet do not fail to promote them in proportion to their Services. Act in the ſame manner with Regard to Puniſhments: However great the Favour be you have for any one, yet if he is guilty of any Crime, and for that deteſted by worthy Men, and condemned by the Voice of the Public, do not allow yourſelf to relent ſo far as to pardon him. By this Conduct, there will ſoon be no more any Men of Merit out of Poſts, nor any weak Perſons in them. You will advance Virtue, you will make Vice tremble, and promote Order throughout all your Court. All your People will feel its Effects, and you will build their Happineſs upon your Wiſdom. And reciprocally making their own Happineſs yours, by their Loyalty and Submiſſion; your illuſtrious Poſterity will, in order to reign in Peace, have no more to do but to imitate you.

But on the contrary, if your Majeſty, leading an idle Life in your Palace, and abandoning yourſelf to your Pleaſures, ſhould devolve your Authority upon ſome one of your Officers; if, without examining who has, or who has not, Merit; without diſtinguiſhing genuine Virtue from Vice artfully diſguiſed, or regarding any Conſequences, you put all indifferently into Poſts, the firſt who ſhall preſent: or which is worſe ſtill; if making your Inclinations or Reſentments your Rule, if you ſhould baniſh from you all thoſe who have formerly diſpleaſed you, and advance only thoſe whom you have always inclined to favour; if you uſe the Power of rewarding, only that you may gratify Sycophants who have no Merit, and who have done no Service, and that of puniſhing, only that you may check zealous loyal Subjects, whoſe Uprightneſs is all their Crime; then every thing will ſoon ruſh to Confuſion, both at the Court and in the Provinces: There will be no more Law, no more Order, no more Peace: Can any thing be more fatal both to the Empire in general, and to your Majeſty in particular: Theſe are the Reaſons why I ſaid that Equity is the principal Point of Government, in the ſame manner as in perſonal Perfection, filial Piety is the firſt of all Virtues. Upon the Value or the Contempt which a Prince ſhews for theſe two Virtues, more than upon any thing elſe, depends the Happineſs or the Unhappineſs of his State; and the Glory or Shame of his Reign. Weigh this Truth, that you may be the more animated to the right Practice of theſe two capital Virtues.

A Gloſs.] Se ma quang, the Author of this Diſcourſe, was a dutiful Son, a firm Friend, and a loyal Subject; he was a Man of approved Probity, of a reverend Gravity, ſingular Temperance, and unſhaken Uprightneſs: He was Miniſter to four Emperors, and was never known to prevaricate.

Another Diſcourſe of the ſame Se ma quang, to the ſame Emperor Ing tſong, on Occaſion of the public Calamities.

SINCE your Majeſty came to the Throne, there have been many extraordinary Phenomena, and public Calamities. Black Spots have appeared in the Sun; and Inundations and Droughts have ſucceeded one another. During the Summer of the laſt Year, the heavy Rains begun, and did not end till Autumn was over. Towards the South Eaſt of your Court, in a Country where there were upwards of ten Cities, great and ſmall Houſes were ſwallowed up in the Waters, or ſeen floating and ſwimming upon the Tops of Trees. How many Families were thereby ruined? Thus univerſal Miſery prevail'd on all Hands: The Son was ſeperated from the Father, and both the one and the other were overwhelmed under the Weight of their Calamities. Parents ſold their Children, and Huſbands their Wives, at as low Prices as we now commonly give for the vileſt Animals: The Famine was ſo great at Hyu and Ping, that the neareſt Relations were ſeen to eat one another.

To this watry Autumn a Winter ſucceeded, not as it ought to have been, cold and dry, but moiſt and temperate, ſuch as the Spring uſes to be. Plants and Trees ſhooted forth out of Seaſon; and in the Spring came very boiſterous Winds. At laſt, in the Summer, the infectious Diſeaſes made a horrible Ravage over upwards of 100 Leagues of Land. The Houſes were filled with the Sick, and the Highways with Burials. In the Beginning of this Spring, the Crop appeared prodigiouſly fine, and then the People began to breathe, in hopes of a plentiful Harveſt, which they were juſt about to reap, when there fell ſo extraordinary a Rain, that in one Day and a Night, the Rivers and Brooks overflowed, and forced the moſt rapid Torrents to run againſt their Streams, overturned the higheſt Bridges, covered the talleſt Hills, made a wide Sea of the level Fields, and ravaged the Harveſts.

Here in your Capital, the Deſolation is as great; the Inundations has carried off all the Barriers, and has undermined all the Gates and Walls: The Tribunals of the Magiſtrates, the public Granaries, and the Houſes of the Soldiers and People have all ſuffered. Numbers of People have periſhed, either by being buried under the Ruins of their Houſes, or ſwallowed up in the Waters. Doubtleſs, theſe Calamities are very extraordinary; I don't know if their Parallel has happened for many Ages. Is not your Majeſty frightned? Are you not thinking upon a ſtrict and a ſerious Examination, into the Cauſes that have contributed to draw down ſo great Calamities? My Zeal has led me to think for you, and I believe that on your Part, three Cauſes principally contribute, Firſt your Conduct with Regard to the Empreſs Dowager. This Princeſs who is full of Wiſdom and Goodneſs became your Mother, by adopting and deſigning you, in Conſert with Jin tſong, for the Empire. Ever ſince you enter'd into the Palace, ſhe has expreſſed for you all the Cares of a Mother. When Jin tſong died, and you were ſick, that Princeſs kneel'd before the Imperial Apartment, knocking the Ground with her Fore-head, ſo as even to wound herſelf, in praying with the utmoſt Earneſtneſs for your ſafety. After this, how could you on the Report ſome envenom'd Tongue, who exaſperated you againſt her, allow yourſelf to be perſuaded, that this Princeſs did not entertain for you all the Sentiments of a good Mother? Tho' this ſhould be partly truth, is it allowable for a Son to diſpute with his Father and his Mother, and to entertain only for them, the Tenderneſs and Reſpect which he judges to be proportioned to the good or bad Treatment they give him. Who ever heard ſuch a Maxim maintained?

There is another Maxim better eſtabliſhed, and univerſally received. A great Favour, Tradition tells us, ought to cancell all the little Cauſes of Diſcontent. The late Emperor drew you from the Government of a Province, for which you was likewiſe indebted to him, to place you upon the Throne, and to make you Maſter of the Empire. What has he required of you as a Return for a Preſent of that Nature? That, at his Entreaty, you would take a Concern about the Empreſs his Wife, and the Princeſſes his Daughters. Yet you loſt your Temper, as ſoon as that Prince was put in his Coffin, and even before he was buried, you ſhut up the Princeſſes in a retired Apartment; you never almoſt ſaw them; you abandoned both the Mother and the Princeſſes her Daughters, to the Diſcretion, or rather to the Negligence, of ſome mean Officers. Permit me, in this Affair to reaſon from Leſs to Great. Imagine with yourſelf, that one of the common People has ſome Arpents of Ground to ſubſiſt himſelf, his Wife and his Daughters upon; finding himſelf advancing in Years, and without a Son, he adopts a young Man, one of his Relations, and makes him his (*) Heir. The Latter finding himſelf Maſter of the Eſtate, no ſooner ſees his Father dead, than he abſolutely diſpoſes of his Goods according to his own Fancy, without ſhewing any Regard for his Mother, or any Care for his Siſters. They might well ſigh, groan, and bewail themſelves: But he was inſenſible of all. What Idea do you think, all the Neighbourhood would entertain of a Son of ſuch a Character? How would he be look'd upon? What would be ſaid of him? Such a Conduct then would loſe the Character of a Peaſant in his own Village: And what ought an Emperor, upon whom the Eyes of all his Subjects are fixt, to expect from a Conduct, a great deal more extravagant. How is it poſſible that he can be beloved?

In the ſecond Place, the late Emperor, who was naturally eaſy and gentle, was always in Pain, when he was obliged to contradict thoſe he employed. During the laſt Years of his Reign, he was violently tormented with a Pain in his Breaſt, which diſabled him from attending the Cares of Government; ſo that he was forced to devolve them almoſt entirely upon ſome one or other of his Officers. It is to be wiſh'd, that he had always made a right Choice; but Intrigues and Intereſt were often ſeen to prevail over Virtue and Merit. Whatever Care the Authors of theſe Injuſtices took to ſcreen themſelves, they could deceive only the heedleſs unattentive Vulgar. Men of Senſe ſaw and bewailed the Evil: But not knowing how to help themſelves, as the Prince was in ſuch a Situation, they kept ſilence. All their Comfort was, that a young Prince, as you were, mounting the Throne, you would examine every thing by yourſelf, inſtruct yourſelf in every thing carefully, and vigorouſly maintain the Sovereign Authority. They then hoped that all incapable Perſons would be removed, that Men of Merit would be advanced, that pure Equity would regulate all Rewards and Puniſhments, in ſhort, that by this wiſe Conduct, the Court and all the Empire would ſoon change its Face.

Theſe were our Hopes, but we have not ſeen them fulfilled; even in the Beginning of your Reign, you appeared to be as much fatigued with the Weight of Affairs, as ever Jin tſong was, when bowed down with Sickneſs, in the latter Part of his Reign, you abandoned the Deciſion of Affairs more than he did, to certain Officers; and one would have ſaid, that you was afraid to have ſeen clearly into their Conduct. Great Numbers of Memorials have been preſented to you, ſome of them were of the greateſt Importance; you paid no Regard to them. Under Pretence of letting Things go as they were formerly, you examined nothing to the Bottom; and while you attentively applied to Trifles, you neglected the material Part of Government.

Officers, who are abſolutely worthleſs, without Virtue and without Merit, are in Poſts: You know them, and yet ſuffer them to continue, as if you had not the Courage to remove them. The Empire does not want for Men of Parts, who join a great deal of Wiſdom and Probity to very great Abilities. You are convinc'd of this, and you know them to be ſuch: Notwithſtanding of this, you never mind them. Such a Step is dangerous, and ſubject to great Inconveniences which are pointed out to you, and you are ſenſible of them; and yet you take that very Step. Another Meaſure is good, you know it is, and you are taught to point out the Advantage of it with your Finger; and yet you dare not declare yourſelf and ſay; My Pleaſure is, that this Meaſure be purſued. Then they who ſerve you, perceive this Weakneſs, and take Advantage of it, or rather they abuſe you. As they are at preſent more Maſters, than they could be in the latter Part of the laſt Reign; they are likewiſe more inſolent. Their Caprice, or their Intereſt, decides every thing. Theſe Gentlemen don't bluſh at promoting the moſt Worthleſs, and at acquitting the moſt Guilty: In one Word, they dare do every thing, and ſtick at nothing. Thus it is that you govern in the Empire, but do you hereby worthily anſwer the Expectations of the World.

(*) The Daughters in China don't inherit any thing from their Parents.

In

In the third Place, you have, it is true, fine natural Parts: But have you a larger ſhare of them than Yau, Shun, Yu, and Ching tang? You ought, after the Example of theſe great Princes, to endeavour to improve ſo fine a Ground-Work, in profiting by the Abilities of wiſe Men. But this is what you have never been known to do. On the contrary, if you have any thing in your Head which you reſolve to execute, you can be diverted from it with the Reaſons that expoſe its inconvenience. No! The braveſt Soldiers don't defend a Place in which the Enemy has beſieged them, with greater Reſolution than you defend your own Opinion. You never once reflect upon any thing that contradicts it. To act in this Manner, is not acting according to the Maxims of our ancient Sages, in uniting many Rivers to form a large Sea. A wiſe Prince hears and weighs every thing without Prejudice. When he examines the different Views, he does not ſay; This here is mine, and that there is anothers. This Perſon is my near, and that my diſtant, Relation. This was firſt ſuggeſted to me, and that came but late. Theſe Circumſtaces never ſway him either to one ſide or the other; he ſeeks the beſt courſe, and that determines him entirely. But how can he diſtinguiſh this beſt Way, if he lays himſelf open to Prepoſſeſſions.

The Shu king ſays, " If any one offers an Advice contrary to your Inclinations and your No" tions, that is a Reaſon for preſuming that it is good, and for weighing with greater care its " Uſefulneſs and Advantages. Another Advice agrees with your Views, for which Reaſon, you " ought to pay the greater Deference to the Reaſons that are againſt it." But if, contrary to theſe Maxims, you hear with Pleaſure, and imbrace with Joy, only what is agreeable to your Notions, if you reject, and are even angry at, every thing elſe; the natural Effect of this Conduct will be, that Flatterers will appear, and that Men of Probity will retire. Is this the way to procure Happineſs to your Subjects, and Glory to your Reign? Your Dynaſty from its Beginning, after the Example of other Dynaſties, eſtabliſhed Cenſors, who were in a manner the Eyes and the Ears of the Prince: So that neither Miniſters nor others, dar'd to conceal any thing from him that concern'd him to know. All the Affairs which come to Court, paſs through the Hands of Miniſters. They deliberate, they decide, and under the Favour of the Prince, they promulgate that Deciſion: If it happens that a Cenſor, according to the Duties of his Poſt, ſhould make any Repreſentations to you upon their Deciſions, and lay before you their Reaſons: Your Majeſty, inſtead of examining his Memorial by yourſelf, immediately delivers it into the Hands of thoſe very Perſons whoſe Deciſions are cenſured, and you follow their Judgment. Where are they who have ſo much Uprightneſs, as to acknowledge that the Advices of another, are better then what he has reſolved upon himſelf; far leſs are there any found, who own that they have done wrong, and that they are blame worthy. All that your Majeſty gains by acting in this manner, is, that you acquire the Reputation of being a Prince who loves no Advice, and who deſires to have none. As for your Officers, they have the Advantage of being abſolute Maſters, and quiet Poſſeſſors of Sovereign Authority.

The three Points which I have touched upon are not ſecret, all the World is very well apprized of them. Every faithful zealous Officer bewails them. But they are afraid of ſome Emotion of Anger from you, or ſome Reſentment, almoſt as terrible, from the intereſted Perſons. For which Reaſon they dare not talk to you. In the mean time, Sadneſs, Uneaſineſs, and Indignation, poſſeſs the Hearts of your good Subjects; the more theſe Sentiments are ſuppreſt, the more violent they are. And I am not at all ſurprized, that they have drawn down theſe intemperate Seaſons. If I have the Boldneſs to talk thus, it is only that I may beg you to conſider, that as you are above Men, ſo Tyen is above you, and to conjure you to anſwer the Deſigns of Heaven, and the Deſires of your Subjects. You cannot do this better, than by effectually remedying the three Points which I have touched upon. Acquit yourſelf towards the Empreſs Dowager with all the Duties of a good Son. Take Care to pleaſe her, and make it your Buſineſs to render her happy and contented. Extend your Goodneſs to the young Princeſſes your Siſters, have an Eye upon their Wants, and ſettle them when it is time. Delegate the ſovereign Authority to no Perſon, for it belongs to yourſelf alone. In your Choice of Officers, diſtinguiſh true Merit: In Rewards and Puniſhments, regard nothing but the Importance of the Services, and the Heinouſneſs of the Crimes. Give an utter Excluſion to all Flatterers, and baniſh ſuch of them as are in Poſts. Open a Door to Advice, hear without Prejudice all that is given you; and follow with Courage and Conſtancy, that which is the moſt wholſome. Beſides, it is not enough to teſtify by Words, that you will in Time to come, obſerve this Conduct; you muſt ſhew it by your Actions; and theſe Actions too, muſt be the Effect of a firm and ſincere Reſolution. Nothing can reſiſt this Sincerity when it is perfect; even Stones and Metals have more than once yeilded to it. How then can Men reſiſt it. But if you are deficient, Appearances will produce nothing. No, they won't make the ſmalleſt of your Subjects move. Far leſs can you hope that it will touch Tyen. Do not deceive yourſelf, ſays the Shi king, by ſaying he is far exalted above us &c. Notwithſtanding of his being exalted above us, yet he is near both to our Words and Actions, which he ſees and hears. Scarce do our Thoughts riſe from our Hearts, but Tyen is immediately acquainted with them; muſt he then preſent himſelf to your Eyes under a human Shape, and ſtrike your Ears with the Sound of a ſenſible Voice? I know of how little value I am, and of how little uſe to you, yet I thought myſelf obliged to tell you my Opinion and my poor Sentiments, which your Majeſty may examine and weigh at Leiſure.

Another Remonſtrance of the ſame Se ma quang, to the ſame Emperor Ing tſong.

TOWARDS the End of the third Moon of this Year, I had the Honour to exhort your Majeſty to publiſh a Declaration, which might open a Door to Advices. A few Days ſince, your Majeſty knowing that I had return'd to Court, ordered that Declaration to be regiſter'd the fifth Day of the fifth Moon. No Man could be more ſenſible than I was, when I firſt received theſe News. Beſides its being extremely agreeable to me to underſtand, that your Majeſty deſign'd to agree to my Propoſal, the Advantage which I hoped would thereby accrue to the State, was a ſtill greater Cauſe of Joy to me. But when I read over that Minute, I own to you, that I found things in it which I could not reliſh. Let me die a thouſand Deaths rather than to diſſemble. Nothing could be better than the Beginning and End of this Declaration: But towards the Middle of it, we read theſe Words. " But if any one, in preſenting to us Memorials, Advices or " Remonſtrances, ſhall ſpeak from Inclination or Intereſt, if, forgetting his Station, he ſhould " touch too freely upon the great and ſecret Springs of Government; if he ſhould find fault in " other Terms, with things that are eſtabliſhed and practiſed; and in order to enhance his own " Value, if he ſhould oppoſe the Deſigns of the Court, ſell and abandon himſelf to Popularity, " eſpouſe its Inclinations and Abuſes, that he may raiſe an empty Reputation: As all this will " be very hurtful if it go unpuniſhed, I cannot diſpenſe with my effectually puniſhing thoſe who " ſhall be herein culpable."

Sir; I have heard it conſtantly and truly ſaid; When a wiſe Prince treats his Officers with Goodneſs, and expreſſes a Value for them; when baniſhing Diſtruſts and Suſpicions, he, as it were, ſets their Zeal at large; then, theſe Officers on their Part, being free from Dread and Uneaſineſs, are entirely taken up with the Care of ſerving him well. As they are ſecure of the Heart of their Prince, they likewiſe open theirs to him, and ſuffer him to be ignorant of nothing which they think can be of Service to him. You, by an unſeaſonable Precaution in a Declaration expreſsly made for exciting your good Subjects to aſſiſt you with their Advices, inſert ſix Reſtrictions conceived in ſuch a manner, that any who ſpeaks, if Advantage is taken againſt him, cannot eſcape his Ruin. In my Opinion, no more effectual way could have been fallen upon to have ſhut up every bodies Mouth.

Let us in the mean time ſuppoſe, that any one ſhall ſpeak. Let him blame or praiſe ever ſo little in his Diſcourſe, nothing is more eaſy than to ruin him, by ſaying that he ſpeaks from a Motive of private Favour or ſecret Intereſt: If an Officer who is in Poſt ſhall tranſiently touch ever ſo little, upon what in a ſtrict Senſe ſhall not be found within his Sphere, he may be ruined, if his Enemies pleaſe to accuſe him of having forgotten his Rank. He who ſhall treat of what may trouble the State, and aſſure its Repoſe, may paſs, if one has a mind, for having too freely touched upon the great Springs of Government: If by accident, a Perſon ſpeaks of a Matter, to which any ancient Edict relates, he may paſs as a Man who at an improper time, blames Things that were eſtabliſhed and practiſed. Zeal further inſpires ſome one occaſionally to declare againſt a new Regulation, which for ſome time paſt may have made a Noiſe; and if he expoſes its Inconveniency, he is accuſed of endeavouring to make himſelf popular, by oppoſing the Views of the Court. Laſtly, none dare endeavour to touch the Prince with the Miſeries of his People, without expoſing himſelf to be condemned as a Fire-brand, a ſeditious Perſon, and the Head of a Rebellion. Things being thus, I can't ſee any thing upon which one can expreſs himſelf with Safety.

Surely a Declaration in ſuch Terms, inſtead of procuring Memorials and Advices, will deprive you of them more than ever. I then very earneſtly requeſt you, to ſtrike out that middle Part, and to fill it in another manner, agreeable to what I laid before you in the thirtieth of the third Moon. It concerns the Good of your State and your Honour, that there may be no Room to ſuſpect, that while you demand Advice, you really deſign to ſhut the Door againſt it.

In the ſixth of the Years named Kya yew, Chin kyew, was very intimate with two favorite Eunuchs of the Palace, and obtained the important Employment of Kyu mi, managing ſo by his Intrigues, that not only Affairs that regarded War, but all others paſt through his Hands. Tang kyay, Fan tſe tau, Lin whey, Chau pyen, and Wang tau, who were Cenſors, openly attacked him, and preſented Remonſtrances upon Remonſtrances againſt him to the Emperor. Chin kyew recriminated, and accuſed his Aggreſſors of caballing: As theſe laſt had pointed out the Patrons of Chin kyew, the Emperor had taken their Advices as a Reproach to himſelf for being governed by the Eunuchs, and this Reproach had picqued him. The Meaſures he took were, to break Chin kyew and the Cenſors at the ſame time, and to give each of them different Employments in the Provinces. Ngew yang ſyew, who was afterwards one of the moſt famous Men of the Song Dynaſty, began then to be upon the Ranks. Altho' by his Employment, he was a Subaltern of the Kyu mi, he ſided with the Cenſors, demanding that they ſhould be recalled and re-eſtabliſhed. For this effect, he preſented the following Remonſtrance.

SIR; Since the Beginning of your Reign, you have been ſeen to open a very large Road to Remonſtrances; if it ſometimes happened that there was any exceptionable Paſſage, and which deſerved Puniſhment, you graciouſly pardoned it, that you might not damp the Zeal of your Officers. I ſee, nevertheleſs, that ſometime ago, in one Day, you have proſecuted the five Cenſors, who have accuſed Chin kyew, you have deprived them all of their Poſts, and baniſhed them them from your Court. You cannot imagine what a Surprize this Order of yours has occaſioned both in the Court and in the Provinces; and how many Suſpicions it has ſtarted. As I have not ſeen the Remonſtrances of the Cenſors, I know not exactly the Strength or Weakneſs of their Reaſons, but I know that Tang kyay, Fan tſè tau, &c. have been long in Poſts, that hitherto they have behaved in them with Honour, and have at your Court always had the Character of being blameleſs Men. How can you think, that all at once giving the Lye to their former Probity, they would ſurprize and deceive you? No! ſo extraordinary, and ſo ſudden a Change is not naturally to be imagined.

Surely it muſt be owned, that the Office of Cenſor has always been attended with its Difficulties, tho' it has met with different Ones at different times, or rather, under different Reigns. Is a Prince naturally uneaſy, haughty, cruel, and as averſe from being willing to hear his own Faults, as he is eager to ſearch for, and eaſy to believe thoſe of others? Then his Miniſters and great Men are alarmed and in dread. In ſuch Times as thoſe, it is a dangerous and a difficult thing to adviſe a Prince with regard to his Conduct; the moſt able have not ſucceeded in this. But then it is an eaſy and a ſafe thing to ſooth a Miniſter or any great Officer. On the contrary, is a Prince gentle, moderate, obliging, ſevere to himſelf, and indulgent to others, as ready to juſtify thoſe whom he employs, as he is to condemn himſelf? If it happens at the ſame time, what is natural enough, that a Miniſter, or ſome great Man, being ſupported by People within Doors, has Authority in his Hands, and has Opportunities to be acquainted with every thing before the Emperor, having it in his Power to make any one ſenſible of the Effects of his Vengeance: In ſuch Junctures, nothing is more eaſy, than to give Advice to the Prince upon his perſonal Faults; but it requires ſurely a great deal of Courage to attack a Miniſter: Whoever is ſo hardy as to do it ſeldom ſucceeds. This has been the Experience of all Times, and deſerves ſome Attention.

The ſame Experience tells us, that Princes, according to different Circumſtances, have more or leſs Difficulty to form a right Judgment of what is laid before them; and to know how to do it is a great Art. Two oppoſite Parties make a Repreſentation to a Prince, each producing its own Reaſons, and placing them in the moſt favourable Light for themſelves. Each repreſents himſelf as a zealous, faithful and diſintereſted Perſon: Each, if you believe himſelf, has nothing but the public Good at Heart. How ſhall the Prince determine himſelf? If he thoroughly knows thoſe who ſpeak; if he knows that ſuch a Man is upright and faithful; that ſuch another has a mean Soul, and is Maſter of the Art of Diſſimulation; if in their Diſcourſes he clearly perceives, that ſuch a thing is for the Good of the State; ſuch another is really private Intereſt, cloathed in the ſpecious Name of public Good, then he has no more Difficulty to determine himſelf.

Theſe are the Means that are laid down, by which, a juſt Judgment, as much as it is poſſible to make, may be formed. A Diſcourſe is preſented to you, in which the Perſon who preſents it talks without any Circumlocutions, in clear expreſs Terms, tho' perhaps a little blunt: You find that he propoſes things not at all conformable to, but entirely diſagreeing with your Views and Inclinations. The firſt time you read this, you find Reſentment and Anger riſe in your Mind; but compoſe yourſelf, and know that this Man is a faithful and zealous Subject. There comes a ſecond Diſcourſe whoſe Expreſſions are ſoft and ſmooth, but void of all Meaning; yon find that the Perſon therein ſtudies to juſtify your paſt Orders, and to join with your preſent Views: Immediately you feel Complaiſance and Joy. Repreſs theſe Motions, and diſtruſt yourſelf, leaſt the Author is a vile Flatterer who ſacrifices the Good of the State, and your Glory, to his private Intereſt. In the ſame manner, one of your firſt Officers makes Repreſentations to you, upon an Affair within his Sphere, by reiterated Remonſtrances in the Face of the whole Empire. He has no ſooner either ſpoke or written than the whole World is acquainted with it. The Public ſpeaks, examines, and judges of, it. Where is the Man that will ſay, that it is poſſible to impoſe upon the whole World? It is therefore to be preſumed, that his Propoſals and his Repreſentations are purely the Effect of his Zeal. Another lays before you his Opinion, with regard to things not within his own Sphere. He conceals himſelf in order to do it; he demands a ſtrict Secrecy: He uſes every Mean to engage his Prince to determine himſelf, without communicating the Affair to any other. This carries an Appearance of his great Eſteem for theAbilities of his Sovereign; but at the Bottom, it commonly proceeds from ſome ſecret Intereſt, which he is afraid ſhould be laid open. The Experience of all Times have authoriſed theſe Rules. A Prince who knows how to follow them, perceives without any great Difficulty, and that too pretty juſtly, the different Motives that influence the Perſon who ſpeaks. We have at preſent in the Perſon of your Majeſty, a temperate, an aſſiduous, and a laborious Prince, who pardons nothing in himſelf, who loves to be inſtructed in his Faults, even when he is told of them roughly and bluntly. Bnt with regard to thoſe who ſerve you, and eſpecially the Officers whom you imploy, you are quite different; to them, you are all Civility, Beneficence, and Indulgence. You would commit a real Violence upon yourſelf to change them, you have their Reputation at Heart, you ſuppport them as much as poſſible, and being full of Indulgence towards them, cannot perſuade yourſelf that they can render themſelves unworthy. So that I believe I may venture to ſay, that we live in thoſe Times which I have touched upon, wherein nothing is eaſier than occaſionally to adviſe the Prince with regard to what relates to his own Perſon, but it is very dangerous for any one to preſume to touch upon any thing that regards the Perſon of thoſe who are about him.

What I have ſeen ſince I came to Court, is as follows; In one of the Years named King yew, Fan chong yen was ſo bold as to ſpeak in Quality of a Cenſor, with regard to the Conduct of Lyu i, kyen one of the Miniſters, but it coſt him his Poſt, and he was ſent to a City of the Province as a private Magiſtrate. In one of the Years named Whang yew, the ſame Tang kyay, of whom we are now treating, ſpoke loudly in Quality of Cenſor againſt Wen yen po, who likewiſe was a Miniſter; he met with the ſame Fate as Fan chong yen. The ſame thing happened ſome time after to Chau pyen and to Fan tſe tau, for having ſupported Lyang ché againſt Lew kang and his Cabal. Two Years ago, Han kyang was baniſhed to Tſay chew, for having cenſured Fú pi. Laſtly, very lately, Tang kyay, Chau pyen, Fan tſe tau, Lyu whèy, and Wang tau were broken, for having remonſtrated againſt Chin kyew. Among ſo many Cenſors, who have been turned out of Poſt within the Space of twenty Years, I don't know one who was treated ſo, for having perſonally offended the Sovereign.

This makes me ſay, that at preſent, we may ſafely and ſucceſsfully adviſe the Prince with regard to his perſonal Conduct; but that an undaunted Courage is requir'd in the Man who dares to attack the Miniſter, and he ſeldom or never ſucceeds when he does: If your Majeſty will reflect ſeriouſly upon that Paſſage of Hiſtory which I have now recalled to your Memory, I think you will naturally enough conclude, that this proceeded from the Zeal and the Courage of Tang kyay and his Collegues. Of all theſe five Cenſors that have been lately broken, Lyu whey is the only one who lately came into Poſt. The other four have been long in that Office. Tang kyay for a like Affair was baniſhed into Quang ſi, where he would have died, if your Majeſty had not reſtored him to Life, by permitting him to change the Air. Fan tſe tau and Chau pyen, have once already met with the ſame Fate, and paſt many Years as ſimple Magiſtrates. All three were reeſtabliſhed in their Poſts. All three remembred their paſt Diſgrace, and ſaw well when they attacked Chin kyew, they had ſtill greater to fear. Notwithſtanding this, they did attack him; their Duty told him that they ought to ſpeak; and they bravely did ſpeak. This ſurely deſerves the Title of being faithful Subjects; they having acted always like themſelves, and diſcovered an unſhaken Reſolution. Their Collegue Wang tau, was one of the poor Literati, without Riches and without Friends: Han kyang becoming accidently acquainted with him, found in him true Merit. He became his Protector, and drew him out of Obſcurity that he might make him Cenſor. Soon after, Han kyang becoming Chong ching, enter'd into Conſpiracies againſt the Good of the State. Wang tau vigorouſly oppoſed him; and ſupported the Intereſts of the State againſt his Artifices and Ambition; but Han kyang ſtill perſevering in his Conduct, he was adjudged guilty and to be ſeverely puniſhed. It is well known, how natural it is for one to have a Regard for his Benefactor, and to ſupport, or at leaſt to excuſe him, when there is Occaſion: But if a Man, as Wang tau has done, prefers his Duty to all other Conſiderations, and ſubmits all the Sentiments of perſonal and private Gratitude to the common Good; he can act only from a Principle of ſtrict Honeſty and uncommon Equity. Such, Sir, ſuch were the Cenſors who have been lately broken. I don't flatter them in the Picture I have drawn of them: All the World will eaſily diſcover its Likeneſs.

Is it to be preſumed, that Perſons of that Character, even ſuppoſing that they were deceived, could have any other Motive for attacking Chin kyew than their Duty, or any other View than that of the public Good? Some perhaps, in order to render them odious, may have repreſented them as plotting, and entering into a Conſpiracy form'd to diſturb the great Officers, and render themſelves formidable. But upon what is this Accuſation founded? An Occurrence that is quite modern and very well known, deſtroys it too much. Laſt Year, Han kyang informed againſt Fú pi, who was a Miniſter of State. Was Tang kyay and Fan-tſe-tau ſeen to lay hold on this Occaſion, to join with the Informer? On the contrary, they and their Collegues, with their ordinary Equity, made your Majeſty and the whole Empire ſenſible of the Artifices of the Accuſer, and the Innocence of the Accuſed. Where then is the pretended League, and the pretended Conſpiracy of the Cenſors? No, Sir, Suſpicions of this Nature, can never fall upon Perſons of their Character,: Likewiſe it appears, that your Majeſty has not entirely believed it, elſe you would have treated them in another Manner, and deprived them of the Ranks they held. But your Majeſty could not reſolve to let them be without Poſts, ſo you entruſted each of them with pretty important ones. They were given to underſtand, that they were baniſhed with Regret. In effect, beſides it's being a Loſs to your Court, it ſtops the Mouth of every one elſe, and the State muſt infallibly ſuffer. It were to be wiſhed, that your Majeſty being more attentive to the Zeal, the Diſintereſtedneſs, and Conſtancy of the Cenſors, had given leſs Ear to the vain Suſpicions of their Adverſaries. But this Evil, ſuch as it is, is eaſy to be repaired. Any Faults which they may have committed, has been ſufficiently puniſhed by baniſhing them. Let your Mercy now take Place; that you may inculcate upon your good Subjects the Diſintereſtedneſs, Zeal and Liberty of Speech, recall and reſtore Tang kyay and his Collegues. All the Empire will then applaud you.

DISCOURSE of the ſame Ngew yang ſyew, upon the Sect of (*) Fo.

IT is upwards of 1,000 Years, ſince China had the Misfortune to be infected with the Sect of Fo; and for theſe thouſand Years there has been no time in which Men of Senſe have not always deteſted it, and have not wiſh'd it in their Power to deſtroy it. Our Emperors have more than once prohibited it by their Edicts, and it was often thought that it was aboliſhed: However, it always revived with new Force, and things came to that Paſs, that after many and unſucceſsful Endeavours, this Evil was look'd upon as incurable. Is it then effectually ſo? No! It is only that wrong Meaſures are taken to remedy it. A good Phyſician, if he treats his Patient well, examines amines the Symptoms and the Cauſe of his Diſeaſe. If he finds that it proceeds from a Weakneſs of Conſtitution, or a Lowneſs of Spirits, he goes ſtraight to its Source, without directly attacking any of the accidental Circumſtances by his Remedies. He endeavours to enliven the Spirits, and to ſtrengthen the Conſtitution, and then the Symptoms fall of courſe.

The Misfortune which we now bewail muſt be treated in the ſame Manner. Fo was a barbarous Foreigner, at a great Diſtance from our China. His Sect probably ſprung up ſince the time of our three famous Dynaſties. But Virtue and Wiſdom at that time prevailed in the Empire. The People were well inſtructed in their Duties, and the Rites were in their Vigour. How then could the Sect of Fo find an Entrance here? After theſe three firſt Dynaſties the Government was not the ſame. The Inſtruction of the People, and the Practice of the ancient Rites, were both neglected. This Negligence encreaſed by degrees; and in 200 Years time it grew to ſuch a Height, that the Sect Fo profited by it, and pierced into the Heart of the Empire where they ſettled. Let us then go to the Source of ſo great an Evil; let us revive the Government of our ancient Kings; let us inſtruct the People as we ought; let us re-eſtabliſh the ancient Rites all over the Empire; and the Sect of Fo will fall, &c.

Confuſion in a State always productive of Superſtition and Error.

The reſt of this Diſcourſe is not tranſlated; it is very long, and reduced to two Points: The firſt explains the antient Government. He finiſhes his Explanation by ſaying, that from the capital City, where the Court reſided, to the ſmalleſt Villages, there are public Schools, where there are ſome choſen young Men, who having formed themſelves at their Leiſure under good Maſters, are capable to inſtruct others in their turns. In the ſecond Place, he extends his Propoſition by ſaying, that the only way to deſtroy the Sect Fo, is to re-eſtabliſh the ancient Government, and eſpecially the Inſtruction of the People, and the Practice of the ancient Rites. Upon this he quotes the Example of Mong tſe, who without minding direct Refutations, ſtrongly recommended Charity and Juſtice to his Fellow-Subjects, and thereby made them abandon the two Sects Yang and Mê.

IT is a common and a true Saying, that it is very difficult to become able in the Art of Reigning. But what are theſe Difficulties? The greateſt conſiſts in a right Choice of a firſt Miniſter, and knowing how to employ his Abilities properly. Beſides, it is a received Maxim, that when a Prince has choſen a prime Miniſter, he muſt repoſe in him a real Confidence. Otherwiſe, the Miniſter will be always in an Alarm, and will never dare to propoſe, or to undertake any thing: Conſequently, if he were the ableſt Man that ever was, his Ability can be of very little Uſe to him; and he never can perform any thing great. On the other Hand, to devolve all upon one Man, and to ſubmit nothing that he ſhall ſpeak to Deliberation, or elſe to neglect all other Advices and to reject all other Remonſtrances; beſides its diſcontenting a great Number, is to expoſe one's ſelf to the greater Misfortunes. Let us ſuppoſe a Prince acts thus, and that he forms ſome Enterprize upon the bare Advice of a Miniſter, without having held a Council, and againſt the Sentiments of a great Number, and the ſtrongeſt Remonſtrances: If the thing by accident ſhould ſucceed, it is much to be fear'd, that the Prince, exulting in the Succeſs which he owes to Chance, and praiſing his Miniſter exceſſively, ſhall ſay in a triumphant Manner, We ſee more clearly than theſe wiſe Men. We ſhould have been wrong to have had any regard to their Advices and their Remonſtrances.

A Prince with theſe Diſpoſitions is much to be bewailed. It is true, bad Succeſs will ſoon reclaim him; but a Misfortune may be ſo great, that it may be felt when it is too late to retrieve it. A great many Princes have been thereby ruined, as we may ſee in our Hiſtories. Two Examples are as follow: (*) Fû kyen poſſeſſed a very large Dominion: He had good Soldiers, and could have raiſed nine hundred and ſixty thouſand Men: Throwing his Eyes upon a little neighbouring State, from his high Degree of Power, he harboured a Deſire to become Maſter of it. It is, ſaid he to himſelf, but a ſmall Spot of Ground: What Forces have they to reſiſt me? The Conqueſt is both ſure and eaſy: Upon this, he made every thing ready. All his Subjects were againſt this Enterprize, which was equally unjuſt and unſeaſonable. The beſt Heads in the Kingdom made Remonſtrances againſt it, even his own Son oppoſed it; but nothing avail'd: for the Prince, being intoxicated with his own Notions, found Mû yong chwi, one of his Generals, who confirmed him in it. Why, Sir, ſaid he to him, do you hear ſo many People? What effect can their Diſcourſe have, but to darken your own Underſtanding? This is an excellent Man, ſaid the Prince. I have found none but him, who, like me, is diſpoſed to ſecure the Peace of my State by this Conqueſt. The Troops immediately took the Field, and advanced Southwards to Shew chun. The Enemy poured upon them before they were aſſembled, and gave them a total Defeat.

Fû kyen did not ſucceed better in his Enterprizes towards the North, eight hundred thouſand Men either periſhed, or were loſt there: The ſame thing happened to Tſin tay under the Tang. This Prince took it in his Head, to take the Command of Tay ywen from Tſin, and to baniſh him to Kyun chew. All the underſtanding loyal People that were at Court, no ſooner heard of this, than they did all that lay in their Power, to ſhew the Emperor that the Reſolution was unſeaſonable. The Prince in the Night-time, while he was all alone, called in Sve wen yu his Favorite, who then filled the Poſt of Kyu mi; What think you, ſaid he, of my Deſign? A great many don't don't reliſh it: 'Tis a Proverb, anſwered the Minion, that he who builds a Houſe upon the Side of a High-way, can't finiſh it in three Years. Why do you hear ſo many People? Who can give you better Advice than yourſelf? The Emperor pleaſed with this Anſwer, ſaid to him; A Sooth-ſayer lately promiſed me, that I ſhould this Year, find a Man capable to ſecond me in the Deſign I have to make my Kingdom flouriſh. I have exactly found him in you: He then ordered Sve wen yu to draw up an Order againſt Tſin. Next Morning, when the Counſel knew of it, they grew all pale. Six Days after, News came, that Tſin being informed of it, had rebelled and advanced at the Head of a great Army. The Emperor being ſeized with Terror and Fright, cried out; It is that Wretch Sve wen yu, who has thrown me upon this Precipice. He trembled while he was ſpeaking theſe Words; and was drawing his Sword to kill him with his own Hand. Sir, ſaid Li ſong, ſtopping him, you repent too late; for the Evil is done. And indeed, as the Misfortune was imminent, and none ſaw any Remedy, the Emperor and all the Counſel diſſolved into Tears.

Fû kyen and Tſin tay, each in his Time, followed the Advice of one Man who fell in with their Notions; but their Ruin which was the Conſequence, is a Proof of the Danger of this Conduct. And yet Fû kyen propoſed nothing leſs with his General Mû yong chwi, than to ſecure a laſting Peace to his vaſt State by a Conqueſt, which appeared to him equally eaſy and ſure. Tſin tay likewiſe looked upon Sve wen yu as his Oracle. He reckoned that by his Aſſiſtance he could aggrandiſe his Empire, and make that flouriſh. So true it is, Princes are frequently blind in their Choice of thoſe they employ.

But by your way of reaſoning, ſays one, a Prince ought to put no Confidence in his Miniſter, however cautious he may have been in the Choice of him. This quite miſtakes my Meaning. When kong the King of Tſi, put Confidence in Kong chong; Syen chu, the King of Shû, truſted in Chu ko lyang; and both of theſe Princes did right. But was not all that theſe two Miniſters adviſed, approved by the wiſeſt Men? Was it ever known that any body remonſtrated againſt what theſe Princes ordained by their Counſels? If the Body of the Officers had given a contrary Advice to theſe Princes, or if the People had groan'd and murmur'd, it is to be preſumed, that they would not have obſtinately purſued the Advices of one Man, and have rendered themſelves odious to all beſides, and have drawn down upon themſelves the Curſes of the People.

There is, in my Opinion, a Difficulty ſtill greater in the Art of Governing well; which is, to hear and to form a right Judgment of all. There comes every Day to the Ears of the Prince, Diſcourſes of a good many different Kinds. Sometimes Flattery ſpeaks; and in order to gain a favourable Audience, ſhe embelliſhes her Diſcourſe with Art and Eloquence. Sometimes a Zeal which indeed is ſincere, but diſreſpectful and blunt; and conſequently very importunate. To hear both the one and the other with proper Precautions, is a thing which has its own Difficulty; but does not ſurpaſs the Capacity of a Prince, who has a little Underſtanding and Penetration: As Complaiſance and Flattery commonly pleaſe every body, eſpecially Princes, a little honeſt Bluntneſs and Freedom in contradicting them, naturally diſpleaſes them: On ſuch Occaſions, it is a very difficult thing for a Prince not to allow himſelf to be either overreach'd or put in a Paſſion; yet after all, it is not beyond the Power of an ordinary Wiſdom and Virtue.

What then is the grand Difficulty? It is as follows; A conſiderable Enterprize is ſet on Foot; ſome propoſe to the Prince, to ſucceed by Means which are not very difficult, and ſeem to be very plauſible, but are at the Bottom very unſure. Others open a way to him, which he ſees would conduct him to the Point he ſeeks: But they are repreſented to him as ſo perplexing, and ſo full of Difficulties, that it appears to him as it were impracticable. I ſay, that it is not then eaſy for a Prince to judge aright and to take proper Meaſures. One or two Paſſages of our Hiſtory, may illuſtrate my Opinion.

At a time when all the Empire was in War, the Prince of Chau, had an Officer of War called Chau ko, who talked the beſt upon theſe Matters of any Man in the Kingdom; ſo that he did not ſcruple to give himſelf out as the firſt Man in the Practice of military Affairs. His Father, who was an Officer of Reputation, and grown old in Arms, frequently talked with his Son upon the Art of War; but he could never puzzle him with his Queſtions. Notwithſtanding this, he never looked on his Son as a Man capable to command. On the contrary, he frequently ſaid with a Sigh; If ever my Son is at the Head of the Army, the Empire muſt ſuffer. The old Man dying, the Emperor ſoon after named Ko, to the Command of his Army. His Mother demanded Audience of the Prince, and told him what ſhe had frequently heard her deceaſed Husband ſay: But the Prince had no Regard to what ſhe told him: So Ko was confirm'd in his Poſt. He then attacked the King of Tſin, and loſt the Battle with his Life: The Conſequence of his Defeat was, that more than four hundred thouſand Subjects of Chau, ſurrender'd themſelves to Tſin.

When Tſin ſhi whang was about to ſubdue the Country of the King, he aſked an Officer of War, named Li ſin, how many Troops he would need for that Purpoſe. Li ſin, being young and brave, anſwered, that two hundred thouſand Men would be ſufficient. This Anſwer was very agreeable to Shi whang. However, meeting with Wang tſyen an ancient General, he aſked his Opinion likewiſe; he anſwer'd, that it would require ſix hundred thouſand Men, otherways he was not ſure of Succeſs. Shi whang being nettled at this Anſwer, ſaid to Wang tſyen, you are old, and your Age renders you a Coward. So he immediately named Li ſin to command his Army, and gave him two hundred thouſand Men with Orders to reduce King. Wang tſyen inſtantly took leave of the Prince, and retired to Ping yang. A little after, Li ſin was beaten, and ſuffering the Enemy to take Poſſeſſion of ſeven large Cities, ſhamefully returned home. Shi whang acknowledging knowledging his Fault, went in Perſon to Ping yang, and made his Excuſes to Wang tſyen, preſſing him to take the Command of the Troops againſt King. I have told you, anſwered Wang tſyen, and I tell it you again, I muſt have ſix hundred thouſand Men. Shi whang promiſed to let him have them: When theſe Troops were got together, Wang tſyen advanced againſt King, and happily conquered him.

Theſe Paſſages of Hiſtory prove what I have advanced with regard to certain perplexing Junctures which a Prince may be in. But how ſhall he act in the End? An Officer makes very reaſonable Propoſals: He lays down Expedients, and anſwers Difficulties; every thing he ſays, appears as practicable as it is advantageous. Behold Chau ko and Li ſin: Was it not Wiſdom in the Prince to employ them? Yet they ruined all. Another lays down very difficult, and ſeemingly impoſſible Propoſals. Is it not natural to drop them? This was Wang tſen's Caſe: Nevertheleſs you muſt return to theſe, or renounce your Project entirely. In a Caſe of this kind; to hear what every one propoſes, and to take the proper Meaſures, is what I call difficult.

Moreover, if Shi whang and the Prince of Chau took the wrong Meaſures, there was one thing which, in my Opinion, contributed very much to it. The old experienc'd Generals, far from diſſembling, either with themſelves or their Maſters, the Difficulties of an Enterprize, and being willing to ſecure its Succeſs, lay theſe Difficulties out, as being rather greater than in effect they are. This is diſpleaſing to Princes, who expect to find no Obſtacle to their Deſires. On the contrary, young Officers who are newly advanced, endeavour to enhance their own Valour, and to over-rule other People. They are all Fire and Fury: They ſuffer themſelves to be hurried away, and every thing to them appears eaſy. This commonly pleaſes Princes, eſpecially thoſe who are ambitious of the Title of Conqueror: Theſe hear with Pleaſure, and believe with Eaſe, an Officer who, for a ſmall Expence, takes upon him the Succeſs of an Enterprize, which they have at Heart. This is too ordinary to Princes; and theſe two, whom I have mentioned, committed this Fault, which coſt them dear. But after all, that which was committed by the Prince of Chau was ſtill more conſiderable, nor could he ever afterwards retrieve it.

An Hiſtorian ſays, that Lyen po commanded the Troops of Chau before Ko. Tſin, who was afraid of that old General, uſed Stratagems to have him changed. He ſpread abroad a Report, that he was afraid of Ko; and that he was ſure of Victory, provided he had not to do with him. He took Care that this Report ſhould be communicated by way of Secret, at the Court of Chau. That Prince was caught, and notwithſtanding a good many Remonſtrances, he named Ko his General. But alas! This Ko, was at the Bottom, no other than a fine, frothy Speaker. His Father who knew him well, judged him incapable of Commanding; his Mother acquainted the Prince with this, and all the Officers judged in the ſame manner: Even the Enemy knew his real Character. The Prince alone, who was concerned more than any other, always ſhut his Eyes upon this Point, and in ſpite of all the World ruſhed upon his own Ruin. An enormous Fault, but a Fault of which, ſince that time, we have ſeen many Examples.

Tay tſong, the ſecond Emperor of the Tang, once ſet 300 Priſoners free upon their Word of Honour, that they would return at ſuch a time; which they punctually did, and notwithſtanding that they all had deſerved Death, he gave them all their Pardon. Ngew yang hew, who wrote the Hiſtory of the Tang, compoſed a ſhort critical Diſſertation upon this Subject; which is inſerted in the Collection from which theſe Pieces are extracted, and is as follows.

Unſhaken Honour, and generous Equity, are Virtues proper for Men of Virtue and Honour, and are as dear to them as their Lives. As for the Bad, as all their Principle is to fear Puniſhment, So Puniſhment ought to be their Portion, eſpecially if they are Men who by their Villainy have already deſerved Death. I find in the Memoirs of the Dynaſty Tang, that in the ſixth Year of the Reign of Tay tſong, at one time, more than 300 Criminals were freed upon their Word of Honour, and each of them was ſuffered to go to his own Houſe, provided that they ſurrendered themſelves at a ſtated time. Is there any thing elſe in acting thus, than promiſing to one's ſelf to find that Faith and Generoſity in the moſt Vile, which can only be found in the moſt Wiſe and moſt Virtuous? And yet theſe Criminals who were freed, all ſurrendered themſelves at the Day appointed. No body expected this: Muſt we therefore conclude, that becauſe an honeſt Man keeps his Word even at the Hazard of his Life, therefore the ſame Honour ſhall be found in ſo great a Number of Rogues? It is not natural to think this.

It may perhaps be ſaid, that the Goodneſs of Tay tſong, in enlarging ſuch a Number of Criminals, had Force enough to change theſe 300 Perſons; and that Gratitude has a great Power over the Minds of Men. To this I anſwer: I ſee very well, that Tay tſong both thought and ſaid this. But who knows when he enlarged them, if he did not ſay to himſelf: The Mercy which I ſhew them, will eaſily make them underſtand that if they return they will be pardoned; ſo that they will infallibly return. Who knows, I ſay, whether Tay tſong did not reaſon in this Manner, and whither this was not his Motive for enlarging them? Who knows, on the other hand, but that theſe Criminals actually laid their Account with being pardoned; and that it was not upon this Hope alone that they had the Courage to return? For my ſhare, when I examine this Action, I think I ſee, both on the one Part and the other, Artifice, Intereſt, and Vanity. As for what is called Goodneſs, Honour, Generoſity and Virtue, I ſee no ſuch thing. Tay tſong had been ſix Years upon the Throne: All the Empire had, during that time, felt a thouſand real Effects of his Goodneſs. Theſe 300 Men ſhared it in common with others; and yet they had not amended, but had even rendered themſelves worthy of Death. To ſay that a Freedom for ſome Months had changed them all of a ſudden, ſo as to make them look upon Death as a Welcome to their Country; and to make them neglect Life when in the Balance with Honour and Juſtice, is, I think, to talk of an Impoſſibility. What Proof would you have, ſays one, to perſuade you that ſuch a Return was actually owing to theſe Motives? I anſwer: If Tay tſong, finding that theſe Criminals were returned, had inflicted upon every one of them the Puniſhment he deſerved: If he had aftewards enlarged others for ſuch a time; and if theſe others had returned like the firſt, and ſurrendered themſelves up at the time appointed; I ſhould have then attributed the Return of the ſecond to their Honeſty and Gratitude. But if a Prince ſhould think it proper to do this frequently, he would thereby authorize Homicide. Our ancient Kings never acted in this Manner; their Laws and their Sentences were founded upon Nature, and a Knowledge of the human Heart. They were never ſeen to deviate from theſe Principles, or by equivocal Experiments to endeavour to attract vain Encomiums.

Ngew yang hew has written, not only the Hiſtory of the Tang Dynaſty, but likewiſe that of the five Dynaſties, each of which laſted but for a very ſhort time; and all of them continued but for ſome Dozens of Years, that fell betwixt the Tang and the Song. Upon one of theſe Princes becoming Emperor from his being the Lord of (*) Shû, and periſhing in a very ſhort time, Ngew yang hew takes occaſion to expoſe the Vanity of what the Vulgar call happy Omens. His Diſcourſe, which is inſerted in the Imperial Collection, from which theſe Pieces are extracted, is as follows.

ALAS! Ever ſince the Times of the Tſin and the Han, nothing is more commonly thought on, or at leaſt talked of, than good and favourable Omens. Tho' there have not been wanting Men of Senſe, who have written very well againſt this Abuſe, yet it ſtill ſubſiſts. Thoſe which are commonly eſteem'd good Omens for Princes, are the Long, the Ki ling, the Fong whang, the Quey, and that which is named Tſû yu. But I find in the hiſtorical Memoirs of Shû, that theſe pretended good Omens were never ſo frequent, as when a certain Prince of that Country made himſelf Emperor. Yet all the World knows, that he was ſcarce ſeated upon the Throne, than he fell from it, and miſerably periſhed. If any one ſhall ſay that theſe Omens did not relate to that Prince, I would aſk, to whom then did they relate? For beſides it being certain that they all appear'd in his Time, they could not be applied to any other in particular, nor to the Empire in general, wherein there never were any Diſorders and Commotions. What then is this ſame (†) Long? It is an Animal which appears ſo ſeldom, that he is looked upon as inviſible; and for that very Reaſon has paſt as being ſomewhat very myſterious. He loves, as it is ſaid, to mount into the Clouds, and riſes even into Heaven; and then he is ſatisfied. As ſoon therefore as he ſhall be ſo laviſh of himſelf, if we may ſo ſpeak, as to become viſible, he ſhall then be no longer myſterious: And when he is ſeen here in Lakes and Rivers, he is out of his Element, and conſequently diſſatisfied. How then can one draw an Omen from this? Beſides a ſingle one does not always appear, for they are ſometimes ſeen in Troops. For my Part, inſtead of drawing a good Omen from this, I look upon it as monſtrous. The (‡) Fong whang is a Bird, which flies as far from Men as poſſibly he can. Antiently, under the happy and flouriſhing Reign of Shun, Whan was ordered to be Precedent of the Muſic; which he rendered ſo compleat and harmonious, that even the Birds and the Beaſts were ſo charm'd with its Sweetneſs, that they danc'd and leap'd when they heard it. It happened that in theſe Circumſtances, that the Fong whang appeared likewiſe. Afterwards it was vainly concluded, that the Apparition of the Fong whang was the Effect of the Prince's Virtue, and a Preſage of his happy Reign. This was an empty Concluſion. For how many times afterwards was the hong whang ſeen to appear under Princes without Virtue, and in Reigns without Luſtre: Nay, we may venture to ſay in Times of Confuſion and Horror. The ſame may be ſaid of the (§) Ki ling, an Animal with four Feet, that I have ſaid of the Bird Fong whang: He flies from Men as far as he can. Formerly when Ngay kong, Prince of Lû, was hunting, he found one: But the Animal turned about his Back upon him, and without giving him one Look, fled away. Ngay kong cauſed him to be followed and taken; and he was brought to the Prince, but in Chains, and againſt his Will.

Confuçius relating this Fact in his Chun tſyû, expreſſes it in four Words, which contain two ſatirical Strokes. He ſays: That as he was hunting in the Weſt, he caught a (||) Ki ling. When our Hiſtorians mention Hunting, they always mark out the preciſe Place. In every other Paſſage of the Chun-tſyû, Confuçius obſerves this Method very exactly. In this Paſſage he uſes an indeterminate Expreſſion, in the Weſt; thereby giving us to underſtand, that Ngay kong exceeded, and did not confine his Hunting to this or that Place, but run over a vaſt Country. Confuçius adds, that he took a Ki ling. This is a very rare Animal, and very ſeldom to be met with. Confuçius thereby intimated the inſatiable Avarice of Ngay kong, who drained every thing, and from whom not even the moſt retired Haunts of Animals could eſcape. This Paſſage of the Chun tſyû is, in reality, an ingenious Cenſure upon the Conduct of Ngay kong.

(*) Now the Province of Se chwen.

(†) The Europeans have tranſlated this Word Dragon, but I have never yet met with any body who has ventured to tell me, that he has ever ſeen a Long, a Fong, a Li ping,, or a Ki ling.

(‡) Other Europeans, before me, have tranſlated the two Letters by the Word Eagle.

(§) Some Europeans have tranſlated theſe two Letters by the Word Unicorn.

(||) Beſides the Chun tſyû here cited, an Ode of the Shi king is entitled The Footſteps of the Ki ling, but it does not mention its Appearance.

But

But Superſtitions gradually gained Ground after the Death of Confuçius. The Ki ling was then made a happy Omen for Princes: A thouſand idle Stories conſequently were ſpread abroad, and gained Credit to this falſe Notion. A Fong whang appeared under Shun. As he was a very wiſe and virtuous Prince, and as his Reign was very happy, it might be then allowable to acknowledge in the Fong whang ſuch a thing as a happy Omen. But ſince that time, the Fong whang having appeared in the moſt melancholy and diſaſterous Times, there is not the leaſt Foundation to ſay, that the Apparition of this Bird ever conveyed with it what was called a good Omen. There is as little Foundation to what is ſaid of the Ki ling: For, in ſhort, no Ki ling ever appear'd under our greateſt Princes, ſuch as Yau, Shun, Yu, Tang, Ven, Vû, Chew kong. Antiquity never mentions it but once, and that too in a Time of Trouble. Whereupon, then, can the Opinion which I have refuted, be founded.

The Tortoiſe is likewiſe given us as a good Omen. As for me, I know that this is a blewiſh Animal, which we frequently meet with in our Rivers, and is often ſeen even in the Mud. This Animal after it is dead is of Uſe. I know that the (*) Pû quan value it, and that Tay in his Book of Rites, puts a living Tortoiſe among the Number of good Omens: That according to the ſame Book, the Virtue of the Prince is eminent, when it cauſes the Tortoiſes to come into the Rivers of his Palace. But I know likewiſe that this Book is a wretched Compilation heap'd together from all Hands, and with very little Judgment; in ſhort, it is a very bad Book. We now ſhall ſpeak of what is called Tſû yu: I own I am ignorant of what it is, or if by theſe Words we are to underſtand Animals, or ſomewhat elſe. I know that in the Shi king we read theſe Words, "Alas! Alas! Tſû yu." Kya i ſays upon this Text of the Shi king, that Tſû was a Park of King Ven vang's, and that Yu is the Quality of him who had the Charge of it. Theſe Words were interpreted thus in the Time of (†) Quay. But lately, Interpreters have made them the Names of two Animals, whieh they ſay are of good Omen: And as Tſû yu is not mentioned in another Paſſage, it is not eaſy to convince People otherwiſe, who are poſitive in this Opinion. As to Tortoiſes, Dragons, Unicorns, and Eagles, which the Vulgar make good Omens for Kings; it is certain that they have appeared in the unfortunate, diſaſterous Times of five Dynaſties; and they were never ſeen more frequent, than when the King of Shû, endeavouring to raiſe himſelf likewiſe, had very near periſhed. The moſt zealous Eſpouſers of theſe pretended good Omens, are ſurely much puzzled about this Paſſage of Hiſtory. I profit by their Perplexity, I attack their vain Credulity, and I endeavour to undeceive them.

The ſame Ngew yang hew ſpeaks of the Times of the five Dynaſties, in the following Terms.

IN the Hiſtory of the five Dynaſties, I don't fail to find fine Examples. There were three Men who then lived, of an unſhaken Honeſty and Diſintereſtedneſs: There were ten who generouſly laid down their Lives for their Prince. What I think extraordinary, and what raiſes my Indignation, is, that tho' at that time, as at all others, there were Men of Learning in Poſts, and Men who gave themſelves to imitate our ancient Sages, I don't find a ſingle Man among theſe, who has done any thing worthy to be recorded. The three illuſtrious Perſons whom I have mentioned, were all of them Men of the Sword; was it therefore, becauſe at that time, among the Literati, there were no Men of Merit and Virtue? Doubtleſs not. It ought rather to be attributed, partly to unattentive, unthinking Princes, who did not uſe proper Means to attract them to their Service; and partly to the Averſion the Literati of true Merit, had to Troubles, and their thinking that Times ſuch as theſe were, not worthy of their Cares. There is not, ſaid Confuçius, a Village of ten Families, wherein the Prince may not find ſome Subject who is Loyal and Zealous: And I believe he ſpeaks Truth. In effect, in the little Hiſtories of theſe Days, we meet with pretty ſingular Paſſages. The following is of a Woman, by which we may conclude, that if the virtuous Literati did not then appear, it was not becauſe there were none of them in the Empire. A Magiſtrate, whoſe Name was Wang ing, who had a Poſt at ſome Diſtance from his own Country, died in extreme Poverty, leaving behind him a Son who was very young. His Wife, the Name of whoſe Family was Li, ſoon after ſet out on her Return, carrying along with her the Bones of her Huſband, and leading her Son by the Hand. When ſhe came to the Territory of Kay fong, ſhe enter'd into an Inn, where the Landlord, not knowing what to think of a ſingle Woman with a Child, refuſed to give her Lodging. As Night drew on, the poor Woman begged very hard, and ſhewed great Unwillingneſs to leave the Houſe. The Landlord loſing all Patience, took her by the Hand, and thruſt her out of Doors. Then lifting her Eyes to Heaven, ſhe cried with a lamentable Voice, 'Shall it then be truly ſaid, that being the Widow of Wang ing, I was touched by another Man?' At leaſt, I ſhall not ſuffer this unhappy Hand to diſhonour my whole Body. When ſhe had ſpoken thus, ſhe ſnatched up an Ax, with which ſhe gave herſelf ſo ſevere a Blow that ſhe cut her Hand half off. The People who were paſſing by, ſtopt at this Sight, and all the Neighbourhood run to her: Some ſigh'd, ſome wept, and others bound up the Wound. The Magiſtrate being acquainted with her Story, procured her good Medicines, ſeverely puniſhed the Inn-keeper, took care of the Patient, and told her Hiſtory at the Court. Oh! with what Shame ought this ſingle Action to inſpire the Literati of theſe Times!

Hya tsû having been depriv'd of the Poſt of (*) Kyu mi, Ta yen was put in his Place; this laſt was the Friend of the Miniſters Fû pi, Han ki, Fan chong yen, and of Ngew yang hew, *who was Cenſor. SIR: In all Times, Engagements equally honourable and virtuous, and Cabals unworthy and dangerous, have been confounded together: In all Times, this Confuſion has laid a Foundation for unjuſt Accuſations. Happy the Accuſed, who, like us, are under a Prince, who is capable to diſcern Men of Worth and Probity from mean baſe Souls. A Prince of this Character ſoon perceives, that when the former unite, the Links of the Chain which binds them together are Reaſon and Virtue, and its End is, the Public Good. He ſees, on the other hand, that the Union formed by bad Men, is founded only upon Intereſt. But can this be called an Union? For my ſhare, I believe no ſuch thing ſubſiſts among them. Each of them has ſome View, either of Ambition or Avarice. While he thinks that he can be aſſiſted by others, he appears attached to them; but when theſe Inducements ceaſe, and greater come in his Way, theſe Gentlemen are ſeen to deſtroy, abandon, and betray one another mutually: Nay, tho' they were allied by the neareſt Tyes of Blood, nothing can bind them. Men of Honour don't act thus: The Rules of the moſt upright Reaſon, and the ſtricteſt Equity, are what they propoſe to themſelves inviolably to preſerve. Their chief Buſineſs lies in giving, every Day, new Proofs of their Zeal to the Prince they ſerve: All they dread to loſe, is their Virtue and Reputation. Theſe are their Maxims, theſe their Exerciſes, and theſe their Intereſts. Do they intend to endeavour to become more virtuous, and to preſs to Perfection? They keep in the ſame Tract, they as it were march in Company, and mutually aid one another. Does it concern the Service of the Prince and State? Each of them, for that effect, contributes all he poſſibly can, without ever relaxing or prevaricating: Such is the Union of Men of Honour, and ſuch the Factions they form. Thus, by how much it imports the Prince to prevent, or to diſperſe the Wicked, who are united only in Appearance, by ſo much it is advantageous to him to cheriſh that ſincere Union which among Men of Merit, ſometimes forms the Love of Duty and Virtue.

In the Time of the great Emperor Yau, the Officers of the Court were as it were divided into two Parties: One conſiſting of four bad Men, of which Hong quang was the worſt: The other conſiſted of eight Ywen and eight Ki; that is to ſay, of ſixteen Perſons equally wiſe and virtuous, and perfectly united amongſt themſelves. Yau baniſhed the four bad Men, and joyfully cheriſhed the Union of the ſixteen good ones. Then every thing was in Order, and never was any Government more perfect.

When Shun mounted the Throne, there were at his Court, at one time, Kau yu, Whan, Hew tſi, Ki, &c. in all 22 Perſons, and in the moſt diſtinguiſhed Ranks. The Union amongſt them was great; they reciprocally eſteemed, and praiſed one another upon all Occaſions. They contended who ſhould yield to one another the higheſt Rank. This ſure was a great Party; Shun profited by it. His Reign was happy; and the Memory of his Government is celebrated to this Day.

The Shu king ſays, The Tyrant Chew had under him ſome Millions of Men, but every different Man had a different Heart. Vû vang advanced againſt him with 3000 Men, but all theſe 3000 had but one Heart. Under the Tyrant Chew, as there were as many Hearts as there were Perſons, there conſequently were no Alliances nor Parties. The 3000 under Vû vang, having but one Heart, they may therefore be look'd upon as one great Party: To this ſuppoſed Party it was, that Vû vang owed his Succeſs.

In the Times of the later Han, while Hyen ti reigned, under the fine Pretence of Party and Cabal, all the Literati in the Kingdom were ſearch'd out, ſeiz'd upon, and impriſoned. When the Rebellion of the Yellow Caps happened, all the Perſons of Zeal and Wiſdom being in Priſon, the Confuſion was very great. The Court then opened its Eyes, repented, and ſet at Liberty theſe pretended Caballers. But this Repentance was too late; for the Evil had gained ſo much Ground, that it could admit of no Remedy.

Towards the End of the Dynaſty Tang, the like Accuſations were renewed. This Abuſe ſtill encreaſed, and under the Emperor Chau tſong it grew exceſſive: This Prince put to Death the very beſt Men of his Court, for this pretended Crime. The Inſtigators of this credulous Prince, by by his Order, cauſed a great Number of Men of Merit, to be drowned in the (*) yellow River; joyning a poor Clench of Wit to that Cruelty, and ſaying, that theſe Gentlemen, who piqued themſelves ſo much in being pure and (†) unſtained, ought to drink of theſe muddy troubled Waters. The Conſequences of theſe Diſorders were, that the Tang Dynaſty ended. Let us recapitulate all theſe Paſſages of Hiſtory.

Among all the Emperors who have yet reigned, none of them had Subjects ſo averſe from uniting, as that bad Prince Chew, the laſt of the (‡) Shang. Every one of them minded only himſelf; and this was owing to that Tyrant. Never did any Prince take more Precautions to keep good Men from uniting together than Hyen ti, the laſt of the Han, did. He kept them all ſhut up in very cloſe Priſons. Never did any Prince treat Men who were united by Virtue, ſo cruelly, as Chau tſong, the laſt of the Han, did. Theſe Princes therefore periſhed miſerably, and ruined their Dynaſties. No Court had ever Officers more united, than that of Shun. This Prince never thought proper to expreſs any Diſlike at this, but employed every one according to his Capacity: He had no Reaſon to repent of this. And Poſterity, far from blaming, commends, and ever will commend him, for knowing how to diſtinguiſh in this, as well as in all other things, betwixt Men of Honour and groveling mean Souls. Vû vang owed his Succeſs and his Empire to the Union of 3000 Men, who all had but one Heart. When they who are united, how ever great their Number may be, are Men of Honour and Probity; their Union is as advantageous to the Prince and the State, as it is agreeable to themſelves. I preſent to you theſe Paſſages of Hiſtory as a Kind of a Mirror, wherein every Sovereign, in my Opinion, may diſcern clearly enough, that which may be dangerous or uſeful in every Incident of his Life.

Diſcourſe of Chin hau to the Emperor Shin tſong, upon the principal Part of the Art of Government.

SIR; I moſt reſpectfully tell you, that the great Art of Reigning conſiſts in rightly examining the true Doctrine of Antiquity; and in following it: In thoroughly underſtanding and penetrating into the Difference between Good and Evil; and in knowing where the one begins, and the other ends; laſtly, in rightly diſtinguiſhing betwixt Subjects who are loyal and zealous in Reality, from thoſe who are only ſo in Appearance. But when the Prince knows how to do all this, he muſt likewiſe poſſeſs a determined Reſolution, and attach his Heart immoveably to Good with an upright Intention. If a Prince is not well founded in what is called the Principles of Reaſon, Juſtice and Equity; if he has not clear diſtinct Notions of all theſe, he is ſubject to lend an Ear to a thouſand bewitching Diſcourſes, which eaſily ſeduce him to take Bad for Good: And if his Reſolution is not firmly determined, he will ſoon quit the Good he has already embraced. A Prince ought to lay it down as a Principle, never to deviate from the Maxims of our ancient wiſe Men. Let him propoſe to himſelf, to imitate the Government of our ancient Kings, and not to hearken to the Maxims which the Corruption of latter Ages has, as it were, eſtabliſhed. Let him labour to perfect his own Underſtanding: Let him put Confidence in deſerving Perſons: Let him abſolutely, and without Regard to any, baniſh from all Employments, thoſe who want either Honeſty or Virtue. Let him advance and raiſe none to the firſt Ranks, but Men of approved Wiſdom. Thereby he may hope to revive the happy Times of our three ancient Dynaſties. But the greateſt Misfortunes of States, commonly proceed from ſmall and inſenſible Beginnings. You muſt therefore poſſeſs a continual Attention, beſides a firm and determined Reſolution: An Attention which never becomes habitual, but by exerciſing it by little and little, tho' with Conſtancy. For this Reaſon, our ancient Kings, even in the Time of their Diverſions and during their Meals, cauſed ſome Inſtruction to be read to them; and kept near their Perſons a Man of approved Honeſty, who was capable to aid them in this Exerciſe; and thereby they became famous and virtuous Princes. Behold then, Sir, I ſpeak it with Reſpect and Obedience to you; behold, what I wiſh with regard to you.

I wiſh that your Majeſty would make Choice of learned and virtuous Men, who being free from the Trouble of Employments, may entertain you in a manner that is agreeable, but proper to cheriſh your Virtue. I wiſh, out of all the wiſe Men in your Empire, that you would chuſe thoſe Perſons for Cenſors, who have the openeſt Sincerity and firmeſt Reſolution: And give them to underſtand, that you ſeriouſly recommend to them carefully to examine the Faults committed in your Government, and the Abuſes eſtabliſhed therein, in order to inform you of them with Freedom. Your Majeſty, every Day thus acquiring Underſtanding, will greatly ſtrengthen the good Foundation which you have already laid; and in the End, ſucceed in eſtabliſhing a Form of Government upon the noble great Rules of our Ancients. At preſent, we ſee with Grief frequent Troubles ariſing in the State: There are nothing but Robberies on all Sides. The Corruption of Manners is grown to ſuch a Height, that People now bluſh at nothing. So that we may truly ſay, that you do not expreſs a Value great enough for Virtue, and that you don't ſhew Ardour enough for true Wiſdom. Make the Maxims of our ancient Sages your ſole Study, and the Examples of our ancient Kings your Patterns. Apply yourſelf in good earneſt to follow theſe Maxims and Examples, for that is the Means of procuring the Happineſs of your Subjects.

(‡) The Name of a Dynaſty.

Diſcourſe of Wang ngan ſhê to the Emperor Jin tſong, who had reigned a long time, and neglected the Affairs of Government.

SIR: To judge by the Hiſtory of paſt Times, when a Reign is long, it is not enough that the Prince is neither too violent nor too cruel. He muſt have for his People a tender conſtant Compaſſion, which renders him attentive to their Exigencies, otherwiſe, there frequently happens very fatal Troubles. The longeſt Reigns that have happened ſince the Days of the Han, were thoſe of the two Vû ti; one, of the Dynaſty of the Tſin, the other of the Dynaſty Lyang. Theſe two Princes had a great deal of Spirit and Capacity. In the Beginning of their Reigns they did great things; but as they had not a great enough Stock of Tenderneſs for their People, they at length relaxed: Having neither Wars abroad, nor Commotions at home, they lived as it were from Day to Day, without thinking of what might happen, and above all things, they were far from imagining that they had ought to fear as to their own Perſons: Yet they had Difficulty to eſcape the Fury of the Rebels, and had the Mortification to ſee the Palace of their Anceſtors inſulted and demoliſhed; Their Wives and Children in the greateſt Want; Their Fields drenched in the Blood of their Subjects, and Hunger kill thoſe who had fled from the Sword. What a Grief was it for a good Son thus to ſee his illuſtrious Anceſtors diſhonoured, what a Grief was it to a Father, for ſuch is a Prince with Regard to his Subjects, to ſee his Cities and Fields filled with the Dead! They never imagin'd that any ſuch thing would happen. They ſaw but too late, that theſe unforſeen Misfortunes were the Fruits of their Indolence.

In effect, the Empire is as it were a fine Veſſel equally large and precious: In order to preſerve it in a fixed firm Situation, it requires all the Force of the wiſeſt Laws. And in order to keep it ſafe, it muſt be committed to the Cuſtody of the moſt underſtanding faithful Men. But if a Prince is not animated with the moſt tender and conſtant Love for his Subjects, he is in time weary'd out by the fatiguing Cares, which the Support of the Laws and the right Choice of his Officers require. Months and Years paſs without his giving himſelf any Trouble: And while he thinks only upon living quietly, Things appear to go on in their Channel: This Tranquility perhaps may laſt for ſome time, but it is difficult to prevent fatal Commotions from happening. You, Sir, have a very penetrating Underſtanding, with a great deal of Wiſdom and Capacity: You likewiſe love your People; but I entreat you to conſider, that you have now reigned for a long time, and in order that you may not be expoſed to the Fate of the three Princes I have mentioned, your Love for your People muſt animate you to ſupport with Conſtancy, thoſe Cares that are neceſſary for aſſuring their Quiet, and the Glory of your Reign.

At preſent, the greateſt Poſts ſhould be filled with Men who are virtuous and capable; and the Laws vigorouſly enforc'd; yet they who rule, are the firſt to wound them by Regulations inconſiſtent with them. Amongſt your Officers there is a vaſt deal of Diſorder; and among your People a great deal of Miſery. Their Manners are every Day more and more corrupted: Abuſes increaſe; and in the mean time, your Majeſty enjoying the Honours and Delights of a Throne, remain inactive without minding the Choice of your Officers, and without informing yourſelf of what is requiſite for mantaining or reviving good Order. As for me, I own that my Zeal does dot permit me to ſee ſuch a Negligence without Grief and Uneaſineſs, nor even to wink at it. A Reign or a Life of this Kind, cannot be very laſting. The three Princes I have mentioned prov'd this; profit by their Misfortune, and don't think you have done enough for ſecuring the Repoſe of your Empire for ever. I dare ſay that if you regard this; you will have always ſome-what to do. Nay, I muſt add, that if your Indolence continue much longer, I very much fear that it may coſt you dear; and then, a uſeleſs Repentance will avail you, as little as it did any of theſe three Princes.

An (*) inveterate Diſeaſe, ſays the Shu king, requires a ſtrong Medecine which is nauſeous to take. I therefore intreat your Majeſty to be leſs ſenſible of the Nauſeouſneſs of the Remedy, than of the Danger of the Diſeaſe, with which you are ſo violently attack'd: Your Majeſty having done me the Honour to call me near your Perſon, and to make me Superintendant of the Officers in your Train, I have a particular Obligation to watch over every thing that may wound the good Order of your Court, the Repoſe of your State, or the Glory of your Reign. With theſe Views and from theſe Motives, I preſume to preſent you with this Remonſtrance; being perſuaded, that if your Majeſty will ſeriouſly reflect upon what I have laid before you, you will perceive its Importance better than any body elſe, and rouſe yourſelf to the great Advantage of all your Empire.

Extract of a DISSERTATION of the ſame Miniſter.

IN the Book from which theſe Pieces are taken, there is another of the ſame Author. It is a Diſſertation wherein he handles the Queſtion; Whether it is lawful for a Son to revenge his Father's Death with his own Hands? He pronounces in the Negative. To ſuffer ſuch a thing, ſays he, at a Time in which Laws are in Force, would be a great Diſorder. Others before him, have handled the ſame Subject, eſpecially two famous Literati under the Tang Dynaſty; namely, Han-yu, and Lyew tſe hew. They agree with Wang ngan ſhê, that Recourſe muſt be had to the Tribunals. Wang ngan ſhê propoſes an Objection drawn from the Book Chun tſyû, which is aſcribed to Confuçius, and from a pretty ancient Book of Rites. In anſwer to theſe two Texts, he ſays; That a Son's being authoriz'd to revenge the Death of a Father with his own Hand, is to be only underſtood of thoſe Times, wherein the Empire being in Confuſion and Diſorder, no recourſe could could be had to Magiſtrates: He likewiſe objects that which is found in an apocryphal Collection of the Ordinances of (*) Chew kong, who was famous for his Wiſdom and Equity. It is there ſaid, that a Son who kills the Murderer of his Father, provided he immediately declares it to the Magiſtrate, is not blameable. If, anſwers Wang ngan ſhê, there are Magiſtrates who are in a State to receive and to hear him, why does he not rather apply to them for Juſtice? No, there is no Appearance that this Regulation was made by Chew kong. Wang ngan ſhê in the ſame Diſſertation, taking it for granted, that it is a lawful thing, and even a Duty, for a Son to wiſh that his Fathers Death ſhould be revenged; in the Concluſion puts the following Caſe. The Empire is in Confuſion, the Laws have no Force; a Son purſues the Murderer of his Father; they who have the largeſt ſhare in the Commotions, and thereby have Power in their Hands, ſupport the Murderer in ſuch a Manner, that the Son cannot, without periſhing, revenge his Father's Death. What ſhall he do? Ought he to purſue the Dictates of that Revenge at the Price of his own Life, or to renounce his Revenge, that he may not leave (†) his Father without Poſterity. To have it in his Power to revenge the Death of a Father and not to do it, is inconſiſtent with the Tenderneſs of a good Son. To revenge his Death, and thereby to extinguiſh his Poſterity, is directly contrary to perfect filial Piety. My Opinion however is, (‡) that it is better to live and to bear with the Confuſion, which the not revenging a Father's Death may Occaſion; but to cheriſh in your Heart the Deſire of revenging, if poſſible without your own Death, the Death of your Father. This is all that depends on a reaſonable Man. The Poſſibillity of revenging or not revenging, depends on Tyen. To vanquiſh yourſelf and to reſpect Tyen; where is there any thing blameable in this?

A Picture of Wang ngan ſhê by Su ſyun, who ſeeing that Wang ngan ſhê of whom he had a very bad Notion, was riſing at Court, and was upon the Point of obtaining the firſt Poſts, he compoſed the Picture of a Perſon, and ſent it ſecretly to Chang ngau tau who was in Poſt, that he might give him to underſtand, that it was of Importance that Wang ngan ſhê ſhould not be raiſed any higher, or become Miniſter of State.

IN Affairs of this World, certain Effects follow certain Cauſes ſo naturally, that I think one may almoſt infallibly fortell them; tho' no body but a Man who is out of the Queſtion and entirely at his Eaſe, can do it with Succeſs. When the Vapours form a Circle round the Moon, every one ſays, We ſhall have Wind. When we ſee Sweat upon the Stones, we are told it will rain. Whence does it proceed, that from theſe Cauſes the moſt Ignorant can conclude what the Effect will be: And that in the Affairs of Life, moſt People, who are otherways very clear ſighted, do not perceive the natural Connection between certain Effects and certain Cauſes? It is becauſe Intereſt or Fortune trouble us without: One Man has his Hopes, and an other his Fears. Prejudices, form'd by our Paſſions, poſſeſs us within. We have an Inclination for one thing, and an Averſion for another.

Formerly, Shan kyu ywen having obſerved Wang yen, pronounced without any Scruple, that he would deceive the whole Empire and render the People unhappy. Quo ſwen yang having examined Lû ki: If ever, ſaid he, this Man is advanced, it will be at the Expences of our Poſterity. O how much more ſurely may we at preſent, pronounce what the infallible Conſequences of advancing (‖) a certain Man will be! For in ſhort, according to what Hiſtory relates to us of Wan yeng, he was a very dexterous Hypocrite, and had a certain natural Air of Politeneſs and Gentleneſs, which he abuſed, in order to ſurprize and gain thoſe whom it was his Intereſt to pleaſe. He was a Rogue and a Cheat: But he was neither covetous nor malicious. Under a Prince leſs weak than Whey ti was, Wang yen could have occaſioned no Trouble.

As for Lû ki, he was indeed a very bad Man, and capable of undertaking any thing: But he had neither Knowledge nor Politeneſs. His Air, his Diſcourſe, and his Manners, were every where forbidding. No Prince, but one as weak as Te tſong, would have ſuffer'd himſelf to be govern'd by a Man of ſuch a Character. From all this we may conclude, that the Predictions of Shan kyu ywen and Quo ſen yang, about Wang yen and Lû ki, may yet appear not entirely infallible.

At preſent a Man is raiſed, who has continually in his Mouth the fineſt Maxims of Confucius and Lau tſe, but in his Conduct he follows the Example of (§) Quan chong; he has formed a Retinue of certain Literati, whoſe Fortunes are diſproportioned to their Ambition: They and he have in their Conferences, formed a particular Jargon of their own. They give one another new Names, and ſtrive with one another, who ſhall beſtow the greateſt Encomiums upon this School Maſter of theirs. A Man needs not ſtick to ſay, that Hyen jen ywen or Mong tſe, are revived. Let us examine him a little nearer. At the Bottom he is a very bad Man, who conceals under certain

(*) The Regard which the Chineſe have for their ancient Sages, and their Books that are acknowledged as King, is ſuch, that when any thing containing in them, is clearly proved to be contrary to Reaſon, they ſay, that it muſt not be attributed to theſe great Men. If any thing is found in their King that is plainly trifling, they chuſe to ſay, that it is a Corruption of the Text, or an Addition of after Ages, rather then to allow that their King originally had any thing in it that is bad. [Is not this a much better Way of ſaving the Credit of their Canonical Books, than that of juſtifying ſuch Paſſages, and maintaining the Doctrines contain'd in them to be good and rational?

(†) This ſuppoſes that he is an only Son, and without Male Iſſue. Tho' Wang ngan ſhê does not expreſs this to be the Caſe.

(‡) We here perceive the Superiority of Chriſtianity over Philoſophy. Let us aſk Wang ngan ſhê a Queſtion: If vanquiſhing ones ſelf ſo, as even voluntarily to renounce the Deſire of revenging a Father's Death, and to leave Vengeance to that which you call Tyen, would not be a more compleat Conqueſt of yourſelf, and ſhew greater Submiſſion to what you call Tyen? This Queſtion would no doubt puzzle him: He would find this Doctrine ſublime: He would hardly ſay, No. And if he be ſincere, he will find where withal to correct him, by attentively conſidering my Words. [If this Doctrine be taken in too ſtrict a Senſe, no Man ſhould purſue a Criminal, Wickedneſs will abound, and penal Laws become uſeleſs.

certain Appearances, as much as he poſſibly can, a very extraordinary Malice and Avarice. In one Word, Wang yen and Lû ki, may be both found in one and the ſame Man. You may judge what we are then to expect.

As to his outſide Appearance: To waſh ones Face, and to clean ones Cloaths, are Cares that every one takes about himſelf; on the contrary, he affects a ſordid Air, his Habits are Worſted, his Dyet very near the ſame with that of Dogs and Hogs. His Head looks always like that of a Priſoner, and his Face like that of a Man in deep Mourning. At every other Turn he is citing Sentences from our King, but is far from practiſing them in his Conduct. It is ordinary enough, that a Man, who againſt common Senſe, and the moſt reaſonable Inclinations of Nature, ſtrikes into Singularity and an equivocal Outſide Appearance, is at the Bottom a bad Man, and wants to diſguiſe himſelf. This is the Method which I ya ſhu tyau and Key fang took, for inſinuating themſelves at the Court of Fey, where they turned every thing upſide down. This too is the Path which this Perſon treads: Notwithſtanding of the good Intentions of an equitable Prince who is zealous for good Order, and notwithſtanding of the Capacity of a great and a wiſe Miniſter, I ſee him ready to ſtep into the higheſt Honours which he has always in his Eye. If this ſhall happen, (I dare to ſay this with a great deal more certainty, than what was formerly ſaid about Wang yen and Lû ki) it will be for the Curſe of the Empire. If he is ſtopp'd on his Road, and baniſhed, the Generality of Mankind who are not acquainted with him, will not fail to blame and to cry out againſt me. It is a Loſs, will they ſay, he was a Man of Merit: Sû ſyun has carried his Diſtruſt and Suſpicions too far. But if he continues to go on, and if he takes ſome Steps that ſtill remain for him to take; the Sufferings of the Empire will juſtify my Prediction. I ſhall then be looked upon as a Prophet: but how ſmall a Conſideration is this to a Man who has the Good of the Empire at Heart?

Wang ngan ſhé became Miniſter of State: In the Collection from which theſe Pieces are taken, there are a great many Remonſtrances againſt a Regulation invented by him, which tended to ruin the People: The Memory of this Regulation is curſed to this Day, ſo that the Prediction of Su ſyun was in ſome Meaſure juſtified.

Diſcourſe of Yu tſing againſt Auguries, and the Hiſtorians who relate them and cry them up.

HOW great Men were our ancient Kings! Their Words were as ſo many Maxims which might have ſerved for Laws to all the World: And their Actions as ſo many Patterns to all Ages: Yet notwithſtanding the vaſt Wiſdom and Virtues of theſe great Men, they ſtill diſtruſted themſelves. They were afraid of relaxing and forgeting themſelves. In order that they might be kept in Exerciſe, or corrected in Caſe of Need, they had always an Officer amongſt others of their Train, whoſe Buſineſs it was to remark their Words and Actions, to paſs an equitable Judgment upon them, and to tranſmit them to future Ages. Such was the principal Employment of Hiſtorians in their firſt Inſtitution. Their keeping the Regiſter of Months and Days, in order to give Notice of the Times appointed for Ceremonies, was only an Acceſſion to this Poſt. The ancient Books contained the Words of our ancient Emperors. The Book which is entituled Tau ki, and that which is called Chun tſyû, the one of which was written at Tſû, and the other at Lû, are Hiſtories in which their Actions and Diſcourſes, their Conventions and Treaties, their Good and their Evil, their Succeſs and their Miſcarriages, are all tranſmitted.

As for Auguries and Omens, theſe Books pay no Regard to them. When we come down to the Hiſtory of the Han, we find that they are collected and delivered with Care; ſometimes it was a kind of Chi, a ſingular Plant of a reddiſh Colour; ſometimes it was a wild Gooſe entirely White, here it was a Spring of ſweet Wine, and there a ſugar'd Dew. Under one Reign, ſome extraordinary Cloud was remarked. Under another, an antique precious Vaſe was found. All this was attributed as the Effect of the Virtue of the reigning Prince, or as a certain Preſage of his Succeſs. Never did wiſe wholeſome Antiquity look upon a Hiſtory as being defective, for not containing any thing of this Nature. And if the Author of a Hiſtory amuſes himſelf in collecting theſe kind of Affairs, he certainly deviates from the original Deſign of Hiſtory.

As for me, I ſay that the Happineſs or Unhappineſs of States depends on Virtue and Vice, and not on theſe pretended good or bad Auguries. That which rendered the Reign of Yau famous, was the Union which he eſtabliſhed among his Neighbours, and the good Intelligence he promoted among the different Kingdoms. Shun could diſtinguiſh from among his Officers, and baniſh from his Court, four bad Men; and could employ ſixteen others equally able and virtuous. By this he principally prov'd himſelf to be the worthy Succeſſor of Yau. Yu knew how to drain off the Waters, and to prepare the Grounds for Culture. This made him famous, and rendered him the Succeſſor of Shun. The Proſperity of Ching tang was owing to his uncommon Charity. The hereditary Virtue, which had for many Generations ſubſiſted in the Family of the Chew, directed him upon the Throne. Can it be denied, that theſe Emperors independent of good Omens, were very wiſe Princes, and reigned happily? On the other Hand, (*) Quey ruined himſelf by his intolerable Pride and ſtupid Expences. (†) Sin by his tyrannic Cruelty, (‡) Li vang by his Exactions, and (‡) Yew vang by his Luxuries, made themſelves odious and contemptible. Independently of all Prodigies or bad Omens, theſe Princes always were, and always juſtly will be reckoned reckoned Men without Capacity; and their Reigns, which were full of Trouble and Confuſion, will be always held in Deteſtation.

It is ſaid, that in the Times of the Shang under Kau tſong, Mulberry-Trees and Rice were ſeen to grow ſpontaneouſly in the Palace: That this Prodigy was interpreted, as being very unfavourable; and the People were frightned with it. And yet that Emperor retrieved this Dynaſty, which was going to decay. Under King kong the Prince of Song, Aſtrologers tells us, that two Conſtellations were ſeen to mingle. Notwithſtanding of the frightful Appearance of theſe Omens, it was to King kong, that the State of Song owed its Repoſe and Security. This is a Proof, that when a Prince has the Wiſdom and Virtue that is requiſite to the Rank he poſſeſſes, theſe monſtrous Events can never hurt him. Ngay kong the King of Lû caught a (*) Unicorn; and notwithſtanding of that good Omen, that Prince being expelled out of his State, was obliged to take Refuge in the Kingdom of (†) Wey. Under Ping ti it was ſaid, that the (‡) Fong whang were heard to ſing; and Wonders were expected from this; yet Vang pwen uſurp'd the Throne, and interrupted the Han Dynaſty. This proves, that if a Prince is without Underſtanding and Virtue, it is in vain for him to flatter himſelf with what is called happy Preſages.

It is true, that Confucius in the Chun tſyû, has pointed out the Eclipſes of the Sun, the Earthquakes, the ſinking in of Mountains, the falling of Stars, and the Birth and Changes of certain Inſects. But this did not proceed from his loving to collect extraordinary things, or to ſwell his Book: His Deſign was to induce the Princes, to enter into themſelves at the Sight of theſe Prodigies, and to excite them by Means of the Dread thereof, to correct their Vices, to cultivate Virtue, and to re-eſtabliſh good Order in the Empire. Beſides, that he might not be ſuſpected of ſuppoſing the Happineſs or Unhappineſs of States, and the good or bad Succeſs of Princes to depend on theſe Events, he expreſsly finiſhed his Book with the Diſaſter of Ngay kong, under whom an (§) Unicorn had appeared. Yu tſing then relates certain Paſſages of the Hiſtory of the Han, and deplores the Blindneſs of ſome Princes in this Point. In ſhort, one of the Emperors of the Dynaſty Han, declared againſt theſe Auguries, and publickly blamed the Officers of the Provinces, who prognoſticated happy Preſages. As this Talent became again in Uſe under the Dynaſty Song, Yu tſing exhorts the Prince to aboliſh them, and to found the Happineſs of his Reign upon Virtue, and the Love of his People.

The 7th of the Years named (A) Hi ning, Chin kyê having had a Commiſſion in the Provinces, and having been an Eye Witneſs of the People's Miſery, painted down what he had ſeen upon a Sheet of Paper in order to preſent it to the Emperor: Wang ngan ſhê who was then Prime Miniſter, knew very well, that this Miſery of the People was attributed to the new Regulation of which he was Author: On this Account, he did all he could to ſtop the Advices that were given at Court. Chin kyê uſed a Stratagem, and conveyed his Sheet to the Emperor with the following Diſcourſe.

SIR; I my ſelf have ſeen the Ruin which the Graſs-hoppers made laſt Summer. There have been great Droughts throughout all the Autumn and the Winter. The End of the Spring is now come, and yet the leaſt Rain has not fallen. The great Draughts has ruined the Corns. It has hindered the ſmaller Grains, even the Peaſe, to be ſown. The Price of Rice is exorbitant, and every Day encreaſes. All the World is melancholy and alarmed. Out of ten of your Subjects, there are nine who believe they have reaſon to fear, that they ſhall very ſoon die of Miſery. Thus, without any Regard to the prohibitory Edicts, their young Trees have been cut in the Spring. They have fiſhed in all the Rivers and in all the Lakes. Every one of your Subjects endeavour to find wherewithall, to pay your Officers who dun them, and how they ſhall buy a (||) Shin of Rice. Thus the Trees are ruined in the Country, and the fiſhing which is hindered from propagating, is deſtroyed in the Lakes and the Rivers. Beſides the Barbarians inſult China.

What is the Cauſe of theſe Diſorders? No other, except that your Officers at the Court and in the Provinces, do not follow Virtue and Reaſon as the Rules of their Conduct. Alas! Nothing is more eaſy and more common, then to open a Way to great Calamities. But nothing is more difficult or more rare, than to perceive their Approach at a Diſtance. They are like Storms that from almoſt inſenſible Cauſes, form and ſwell by degrees, but pour forth all of a ſudden with an uncontrolable Rapidity, and a reſtleſs Violence. When Blood runs in Rivlets over the Fields, then the moſt Stupid can cry out, All is loſt! Terrible Misfortune! Diſmal Diſaſter! Wiſdom conſiſts not, in deploring theſe Accidents when they happen, but in preventing their Cauſes by effectually foreſeeing them, and by averting the Evil whether it threatens, or if it actually has begun.

The Evils which I have laid before you are not paſt Remedy. I only beg your Majeſty not to loſe Time, but immediately to open your Treaſures and your Granaries, for the Relief of the Miſerable, and above all things, to annull theſe burdenſome Regulations which are the modern Inventions of your Miniſters, but far from being ſuggeſted by Wiſdom and Virtue. By theſe Means, you, anſwering the Intentions of Tyen, may hope to cauſe the Irregularities of the Seaſons to ceaſe, to draw down plentiful and propitious Showers, to reſtore Life to your expiring People, and for many Generations to ſecure the Happineſs and Glory of your Family.

It is commonly ſaid, that is is of Importance, that a Prince and the Officers who govern under him, ſhould muturally know one another to the Bottom of the Heart. How different is it now-a-days!

(*) The Chineſe call it Ki ling.
(†) The Name of a Kingdom.

a-days! Notwithſtanding of my weak Abilities, I ſee in your Majeſty, a Heart full of paternal Tenderneſs for your People. Ever ſince your Acceſſion to the Throne, you have given a thouſand ſhining Inſtances of this. Of the ſeveral Meaſures propoſed to you, you have many times embraced that which was moſt favourable for your People; and you have nothing ſo much at Heart, as the Lives and Properties of your Subjects. You deſire that they may live longer and happier, if it be poſſible, than the Subjects of Yau and Shun ever did: That is your Ambition; and not to ſtuff your Coffers, and to heap up more Wealth than there is in all the Empire beſides. Doubtleſs you are far from valuing yourſelf upon a thing ſo unworthy of a wiſe Man and a good Prince.

But your Officers, both at Court and in the Provinces, either have not penetrated, or would not enter into the retir'd Sentiments of your Heart: Among them there is nothing but Exactions, Puniſhments and Cruelties. Your People, who are ſubject to Tyen and to you, are reduced to the utmoſt Extremities. Your Officers who are the Cauſe, ſee all this coolly and calmly, without applying the leaſt Relief thereto. You being ſuch as I know you to be, and they being of the Character I have painted, what can we expect from ſuch an oppoſite Reſemblance?

I don't know what your Officers pretend. What I know is, that they are every Day falling upon new Expedients in the Art of Ways and Means of amaſing Riches, in which they follow no other Rules but their own Humour and Caprice. At this, I ſay within myſelf; Have there then been unhappy Ages and Reigns, without virtuous or able Perſons? Muſt this be attributed to the Prince's bad Choice of Miniſters, or to their own ill Government. In happy Antiquity, private Perſons of all Ranks, Men and Women, even to the Workmen in the Fields, and the Cutters of Wood, were Zealous for the State. Each endeavoured to aſſiſt his Prince in the beſt Manner he could. At preſent, Zeal is wanting even in the Body of the Cenſors. They are all Dumb: or if any of them ſpeak, it is with the View of providing for his own Safety, by excuſing himſelf from a Poſt which he has not the Courage to fulfill worthily; while your Miniſters with inſatible Avarice, purſue what is called Intereſt, in ſo baſe and unworthy a Manner, that there is not a Man of Wiſdom or Virtue in the Empire, who has the leaſt Correſpondence with them or will even ſpeak to them as they paſs by.

Is this to be attributed to the Times? Is this to be attributed to your Majeſty? When I would attribute it to the Times, my Memory immediately inſtructs me that Yau and Shun had a Whan Ki, and ſuch others: That Ching tang and Ven vang had an I and Lyu: That under the Dynaſty Han and Tang, all the good Princes had virtuous zealous Officers: That there were Men of the ſame Character ever ſince the Beginning of your Dynaſty, under your illuſtrious Anceſtors: That there had been ſeen in ſeveral Times, the ſame Correſpondence betwixt the Prince and his Miniſters, as there is betwixt the Heart and the Members in the Human Body. It was an admirable Concert regulated by the Voice of the Prince. All conſpired together for the Good of the State. And in all the State, ſuch a perfect Correſpondence was ſenſible. Under your Reign, Things are otherways; you are all Clemency and Gentleneſs, and your Miniſters the Reverſe.

If this cannot be attributed to the Difference of the Times, it muſt proceed from your Majeſty not following a good Method in the Choice of your Servants, and in the Manner of your Government; this requires your Attention: It concerns the Intereſt of your Houſe to make a better Choice, and to keep a ſtricter Hand over thoſe you chuſe. A Perſon who accidently and occaſionally receives a Meal from another, teſtifies his Gratitude, of which he is void for his Father who has maintained him for ſo many Years. This Abuſe is frequent enough among the meaneſt People. At preſent, it is ſeen to prevail among the Miniſters of the firſt Rank. It is a received Maxim, that Prince and People ought to look upon themſelves as Father and Son. With much more Reaſon ought theſe Miniſters and other great Officers, whom the Prince diſtinguiſhes by large Penſions, and by ſuperior Honours, to ſhow him the Gratitude and Zeal of dutiful Sons. But what do we ſee? On the one Hand, a Prince full of Goodneſs, and jealous of the Happineſs of his State: On the other, Officers, who being ſatisfied with living upon their Appointments, look upon their Prince not as their Father, but as a Stranger or a Paſſenger, and are equally indifferent with Regard to the Evils that afflict, or the Dangers that threaten, the State. Is any thing more deplorable than this? Some ſay, for the Excuſe: I confine my ſelf within my own Sphere; I acquit my ſelf of my own Office; I am not concern'd, and it is none of my Buſineſs to be troubled about any thing elſe. Wretched Excuſes! It is true, that there are different Ranks and Poſts about a Court; but each, in his reſpective Station, as a good Son owes his Prince, all the Zeal and Loyalty he can pay him, to be defective in any thing of this Kind, is worſe than one's diſobliging a ſuperior Officer by doing his Duty; and what are all the Advantages he can reap from his Favour with Men, when put in the Ballance with the Misfortune of offending (*) Whang tyen?

For my Share, I ſee well, that in certain Palaces almoſt as much reſpected, and more powerful than yours, the Advice I give you, would have been taken as an Inſult and Raſhneſs. I know to what I expoſe my ſelf: But ten thouſand Deaths, ſhall not daunt me: Behold, what encourages me. Tyen and his Orders, which are above all, claims my Reſpect; the Honour of my Prince and his Family, which is next to Tyen, my Zeal; and the People, who are next to the Prince, my Compaſſion: Were I to be cut in Pieces; What am I to be ſpar'd on ſuch an Ocraſion? An Inſect is cruſh'd; and who values it?

I am return'd from executing a Commiſſion, which oblig'd me to travel through a good Number of the Provinces, through which your Troops have march'd. A Man, in ſeeing the State in which the People are, would be apt to ſay, that there is not a Perſon in the Empire pire who is charg'd with the Care of them, nor any who is in the leaſt touch'd with theſe Calamities. Husbands hire out their Wives; Fathers ſell their Children; the neareſt Relations ſeparate and diſperſe abroad on all Quarters. Every thing in the Field is ruin'd: neither the Mulberry nor the Fruit-Trees are ſpar'd. The Havock is irreparable. Many pull down their Houſes, and ſell the Materials out in Parcels. One Man is harraſs'd for Money, another for Gain. But the moſt mercileſs Creditors are your Officers and their Commiſſaries. The poor People languiſh under their Oppreſſion. One cannot view ſo much Miſery without having his Heart rent. I don't ſpeak by Hearſay: I have ſeen all I lay before you: I put every thing down, on the very Day it happen'd, in my Journal; and from theſe Journals, when put together, I have drawn up a Sketch in which it is all repreſented. As I have put nothing in it but what I have ſeen, your Majeſty may judge that what my Draught contains, is not the Hundreth Part of what has paſt; tho' I doubt not but what it contains will be more than ſufficient to touch your Majeſty, to draw Sighs from your Breaſt, and Tears from your Eyes. But what would be your Grief if you ſaw what paſſes at a greater Diſtance, where, as I am informed, the Miſery is yet greater. I join this Supplication to my Sketch; I beg your Majeſty to examine both the one and the other; if, after mature Deliberation, you (*) execute what I propoſe, and if in the Space of ten Days it does not rain, order my Head to be cut off, as being a Man diſreſpectful to Tyen, and undutiful to his Prince: but if, in effect, you ſhall reap Advantage from my Advice, I ſhall be ſo far from expecting any Reward, that I ſhall always look upon my ſelf as culpable, for having preſum'd to act out of my Sphere.

Chin tſong having receiv'd this Draught and Supplication, examin'd them without ſhewing them to any Body, ſending up frequent and heavy Sighs; then putting theſe Writings in his Sleeve, he ſhut himſelf up in the innermoſt Part of his Palace, getting no Sleep for a whole Night. Next Morning he iſſued out his Orders conceived in eighteen Articles, which perfectly anſwer'd what Ching kyê had propoſed; and cauſed great Acclamations of Joy and Gratitude among the People. Chin tſong, when he iſſued out that Order, publiſhed a Declaration, wherein with a great deal of Modeſty he excus'd himſelf, and preſſed his People to adviſe him. On the third Day a very plentiful Shower fell, which reach'd a great Way round. The Miniſters entering in order to congratulate the Emperor, he ſhew'd them the Supplication, and the Sketch of Ching kyê: To this he added a Reprimand, for which they thank'd him upon their Knees. Wang ngan ſhê ſome Days after ſought Leave to be retire. People knew very well why, and who had been the Informer againſt him. Thus Ching kyê was expoſed to all the Creatures of Wang ngan ſhê. They diſcover'd that the Addreſs, with which he had convey'd his Advice to the Emperor, was, to ſend a Courier in the Manner of the (†) Yu tſê, who were inſtigated to demand Juſtice. Ching kyê loſt his Poſt, was ſent as Magiſtrate to Ing chew, and the Impoſts ſoon return'd.

In the Collection from which theſe Pices are drawn, after that which I have juſt now tranſlated, there follows one of Sû ſhê preſented to the ſame Emperor (‡) Chin tſong. Sû ſhê goes a good deal more roundly to work with him than Ching kyê did. This Diſcourſe is divided into three Points. In the firſt he proves, that the Prince can have no Strength, but in the Affections of his Subjects. He then exhorts him to do all that he could to gain them. All this Point turns on the ſame Matter upon which Ching kyê has touched, namely, the new Impoſts, and the new Regulations invented by Wang ngan ſhê. In the the ſecond Point, Sû ſhe exhorts Chin tſong to promote good Morals and Virtue in his Empire. He ſays, that upon this, more than upon all his Wealth, depends his Force and Continuance upon the Throne. He proves this by Hiſtory. One of the Means above others he propoſes is, to remove from Poſts all Men, who tho' they had Capacity, wanted Virtue. This is always levelled at Wang ngan ſhe, and to ſuch others. The third Point is upon the Maintenance of the Laws: He makes this principally reſt upon the Uſefulneſs of Remonſtrances. On this Head he bewails, that the Tribunals eſtabliſhed throughout all Ages are now become mute: He then acquaints the Prince that a formidable Authority intimidates them: This is ſpoke againſt the Miniſters, and and particularly againſt Wang ngan ſhê. He exhorts the Prince to ſupport the Authority and Liberty of theſe Tribunals, to fill them with Men of Weight and Authority, whoſe Underſtanding may be uſeful to him, and whoſe unſhaken Firmneſs may keep the Miniſters in Awe. As we have ſeen theſe Affairs treated of in ſeveral Diſcourſes, and as this of Sû ſhê is long, I only given the Contents of it, without tranſlating it.

Some Advantages which the Emperor Chin tſong had gain'd over a neighbouring Nation had put him into the Humour of making War. Chang fang ping, who was in Poſt, reſolv'd to diſſwade him from it by a Remonſtrance. As he did not write well himſelf, he apply'd to Sû ſhê, who drew up for him the following Piece.

SIR, The Love of War and of Women are two Paſſions which appear very different from one another: They however have been compar'd, and at leaſt reſemble each other, in ſo far as, that the Latter in many Reſpects hurts the Health, and cuts ſhort the Life of a Prince who is (*) Firſt, to open his Granaries and Treaſures for the Relief of the Miſerable. Secondly, to aboliſh the new Impoſts, and the new Regulations which were burdenſome to the People.

(†) In order to make his Papers come to the Emperor's Hand, he had uſed the Way which is reſerv'd only to the Yu ſſê.

(‡) He was the Son of Sû ſun, Author of the Portrait of Wang ngan ſhê, which is tranſlated above.

is tainted with it; in like manner, the former many Ways injures the State, which muſt infallibly periſh when its Prince abandons himſelf to this Paſſion. Our antient and wiſe Kings never made War but when they were indiſpenſably oblig'd to do it. If they gain'd an Advantage over their Enemies, the Fruits of their Victory were a long and a happy Peace. And if they came by the worſt, their Loſſes were not of ſuch Conſequence as to reduce them to Extremities. Different Meaſures were purſued in Times more modern. Our Princes then wantonly made War, only becauſe ſuch was their Will. Thus whether Succeſs or Diſaſters attend it, War is always a very pernicious Thing. Are they victorious? The bad Conſequences of War don't fail to break out, tho' perhaps later, yet not leſs fatally. Are they vanquiſh'd? Their Defeat always has very terrible Effects, but nevertheleſs not ſo (‖) dangerous as thoſe that commonly attend a Courſe of Victories.

A wiſe Prince who has gone to the Bottom of this Truth does not ſuffer himſelf to be hurried away with the Ardor of ſignalizing himſelf by his Exploits, nor even to tempt his Fortune by the Hopes of a Victory, tho' almoſt certain. He attentively weighs the Evils of War, and never reſolves upon it but as the laſt Tentative. Is a hundred thouſand Men brought into the Field? Every thing is in Motion. Large Sums are every Day expended, Millions of Families harraſſed, the Coffers and Granaries of the Prince drain'd, the People impoveriſh'd, and Cold and Hunger prevail. People aſſemble, they ſteal, they pillage, and ſpread Alarms and Confuſion throughout all the Empire. The Dying, the Wounded, the Sufferers, break out in Murmurs againſt the Prince, and bring upon him, as a Chaſtiſement, Inundations, Droughts, and ſuch like Plagues. Sometimes theſe are occaſioned by a General, who being at the Head of an Army, who he knows is devoted to him, puts what Value he has a mind upon his Services. Sometimes by the Subalterns and Soldiers, who being check'd, diſband or rebel. In ſhort, War draws along with it a thouſand and a thouſand Inconveniences: and the Curſes of ſo many innocent People who ſuffer by it, cannot fail to affect the Prince who loves it, and thoſe who adviſe him to it. How many Princes either paſſionately fond of War, or too eaſy in engaging in it, have proved this by their Misfortunes.

Do not let us, in God's Name, ſpeak of thoſe who have periſh'd by ſhameful Defeats, conſider only to what they, whom Victory ſeems to have followed, have been reduc'd by their Succeſs. Shi whang becoming Emperor by the Deſtruction of ſix Kingdoms, into which China was at that Time divided, wanted to puſh his Conqueſts further. He attack'd (*) Hû and Ywê: What the Empire ſuffer'd in ſupporting theſe Wars is inexpreſſible. Shi whang was obſtinate, and extended the Bounds of his Empire, a good deal beyond what our three famous Dynaſties poſſeſs'd. But when he died he left Things in ſuch a Situation, that the Mold about his Tomb was ſcarce dry when Eul ſhi, his Son and Succeſſor, loſt his Empire and Life at once.

Under the Han Dynaſty, Vû ti being willing to make his beſt of what Ven ti and King ti his Predeceſſors had ſaved, and of the Plenty which their Reign had introduced throughout all the Empire, undertook great Wars. After having ſubjected and ſubdued the (‡) Hyong nû in the North, he attack'd and ſubdued a great many other Kingdoms towards the Weſt. Every Year brought about ſome new Enterprize, and almoſt always a new Succeſs. At laſt, in the Year named Kyen ywe, the fatal Conſequences of theſe Wars broke out: More than one Chi heou (§) began to ſtir in the Empire. Theſe Troubles laſted for thirty long Years, and cut off great Numbers of People. There happen'd on Account of ſome Sorceries, a remarkable Miſunderſtanding between the Emperor and his Son; a Miſunderſtanding which made Seas of Blood ſtream through the Capital of the Empire, ruined the young Prince, and deeply affected his Father. Vû ti indeed bethought himſelf, and grew more moderate and repented. But it was too late, for he had ſpent too many Years in War and Confuſion.

Ven ti, the Founder of the Dynaſty Swi, was no ſooner Maſter of what lyes toward the South of (†) Kyang, than he undertook ſeveral Expeditions againſt the Barbarians. Yeng ti, his Son and Succeſſor, vigorouſly purſued them: He reduced powerful Kingdoms, and render'd himſelf very formidable abroad; but the People at home being overburdened deteſted and curſed him: He gave Occaſion to Rebellions on all Sides; and theſe Troubles ſoon put an End to this Dynaſty.

(*) Tay tſong having, with a ſurprizing Rapidity, ſubdued Tû que, Kau chang, Tu yu, and other Countries, wanted to ſignalize himſelf by ſome Exploit ſtill more remarkable: He then, without any Neceſſity, undertook the War againſt Lyau tong; he marched in Perſon into the Korea, where he was unſucceſsful, and from whence he return'd with Shame. Theſe Wars which he had begun, were ſtill more unſeaſonably purſued under the Empreſs U, whoſe bad Conduct had well nigh ruin'd the Tang Dynaſty. Tay tſong was a Prince whom all the World allows to have had eminent Qualifications: To himſelf he was ſevere; to others, gentle, kind, liberal, and indulgent; and yet he was very near falling into the Hands of his Enemies. His Poſterity, immediately after him, was in great Danger of being ruin'd: Let it not be ſaid, that their being ſav'd was owing as a Reward to his Virtues: We ought to ſay, that their Dan-

Dangers were to be attributed as a Puniſhment of his wantonly making War. Let us return to the Point.

Vû ti and Tay tſong loved War: As theſe Princes, in other Reſpects had many great and amiable Qualifications, their military Expeditions did not entirely ruin them. Shi whang and Yen ti, likewiſe undertook great Wars: As in other Reſpects, they were cruel and deteſtable, the ſudden Extinction of their Race was the Fruit of their Victories and Conqueſts. Always when I fall upon theſe Paſſages of our Hiſtory, I ſhut the Book, and diſſolve in Tears: So much am I touched to ſee that Princes, who had ſo many great Qualifications, ſhould be ſo groſsly miſtaken. O how much had it been to be wiſhed, on their own Accounts, that theſe four Princes had firſt met with ſome remarkable Check; that thereby being diſguſted at War, they might have been afraid to be again engag'd in it! Such a Check in this reſpect, would have been highly for their Advantage. Unhappily for them, they ſucceeded in their Enterprizes. This Succeſs warm'd them with an Ardour after Fame and Conqueſt, but blinded them with Regard to all the Conſequences: And this makes me ſay, that if our Princes are victorious, the fatal Conſequences of War are a little flower in their Advances; yet they are not leſs pernicious in their Effects: But when they are conquered, the melancholy Effects of their Defeats are commonly leſs dangerous. I beg that you would weigh this well.

Sin tſong, a good natur'd peaceable Prince, who loved his People very much, reigned for a long Time, without ever once thinking of War. Under his Reign, Arms were encruſted with Ruſt. This long Peace rendered the Generals and other Officers of War, idle and negligent. Ywen hau wanted to take Advantage of this Negligence. He invaded Yen ngan, King ywen, Ling ſû, and other Countries with a great Army. The Troops that oppos'd that Rebel, were defeated three or four times. Notwithſtanding of theſe Loſſes and the great Levies which they were oblig'd to make, not the leaſt Murmur was heard all over the Empire. The War was happily finiſhed, and without any bad Conſequences,; how happened this? Becauſe they knew their Prince, and that he loved Peace. It was becauſe Tyen ti and Quey ſhin ſaw much clearer than the People, that this was no War ſet on Foot by Avarice, Ambition, or Caprice, but pure Neceſſity.

Tyen has given you a great deal of Courage, and a lage extent of Genius. You have it in View to increaſe the Wealth and Strength of the Empire. Scarce was you ſeated on the Throne, when you was ſeen to be curious about fine Arms, and anxious to be well ſtor'd with them. The neighbouring States, and your Subjects being heeedful of your Actions and Words, concluded, that your Inclinations were for War. Your Miniſters then thought this as well as the others. But whether that they were more ignorant or leſs zealous, they took no Care wiſely to oppoſe theſe growing Inclinations: Far leſs did the (*) Kyu mi. The Cenſors themſelves were ſilent, and did not give you the leaſt Advice on this Head. Thus your warlike Inclinations gather'd Strength without any Oppoſition. Sve kyang and Whan kyang, Men naturally reſtleſs, next came in Play: Theſe propos'd to you ſeveral Expeditions, as being advantagious and worthy of yourſelf; ſome others of their Creatures approved of theſe Deſigns. War was made, your Country exhauſted by ſupporting it, and you were frequently defeated. In ſhort, the Wars in the Years Kang ting and King li, which have always been deplored, were not near ſo deplorable as theſe. Tyen was irritated, the People exaſperated, the Soldiers in the Frontiers diſcontented, the Court tumultuous and alarm'd, and your Majeſty was reduced for whole Months, to make only one Meal a-Day, and that too, pretty late. Behold in what theſe Expeditions, from which you promiſed yourſelf ſo much Advantage and Glory, ended. Whence proceeded this? It was becauſe you yourſelf ſought for War, without being oblig'd to make it; and your Troops were leſs animated againſt the Enemy than againſt you.

Afflicting as theſe Loſſes were, on the one Hand, it was on the other, a ſingular Favour which Whang tyen did you in conſideration of your Anceſtors, by making you reenter into yourſelf. Alas! The Favour was uſeleſs to you, You got about you ſome Men of triffling Capacities, unable to go to the Bottom of Matters. Their flattering Diſcourſes and Inclinations, allowed you to ſee nothing in theſe Defeats, but the Shame attending them. You was poſitive to wipe all that away by ſome Victory. Thence proceeded the Expeditions of Hi ho, Mey ſhan, and Yu lû. They indeed ſucceeded better than the Former; but can theſe Wars be deemed ſucceſsful, which occaſioned the Death of ſo many Perſons of all Ages, drain'd your State, exhauſted your tributary Princes, and whoſe whole Fruit conſiſts in the Poſſeſſion of certain uſeleſs Lands, and the empty Name of Conqueror.

Dazled by the falſe Luſtre of this Reputation, without reflecting upon the real Evils which theſe Wars had occaſioned, you undertook a new War againſt (†) Ngan vû. The Expence for the Convoys was extravagant. A prodigious Number of Men died in the Averages. Your Army of 100,000 Men, while you were heaping up Amunition and Proviſions, was ruined by Sickneſs before they came in Sight of the Enemy. This unexpected Misfortune ſeemed to have cooled you warlike Ardor. But that Paſſion ſoon revived. Behold another Army in the Field: Your Troops under the Conduct of Li-hyen, had ſome Advantages; and your Majeſty was in Raptures at it. You ordered them to advance, and it appeared, that that at the Bottom of your Heart, you looked upon theſe neighbouring States as a ſure and an eaſy Conqueſt.

The Deſigns of Tyen are difficult to fathom. As for me, I reſpect and dread them. When in a whole Campaign your Army fights one pitch'd Battle, and comes off victorious, Couriers immediately mediately fly about, and you ſend Advices of your Victory over all. The great Officers of your Court crowd to give you Joy of your Victory in Writing, as uſual. They ſtrive who ſhall magnify the Succeſs moſt, and who ſhall beſt turn a Complement to pleaſe you.

In the mean time, a great Number of your Subjects, whoſe Lives the Sword has cut off, lye dead on the Field of Battle. The Ways are full of People who faint under the Fatigues of the Convoys. Your People in a great many Places, being overburthen'd with their Subſidies and the Cruelty of the Collectors, abandon their Dwellings, and wander up and down. Huſbands ſell their Wives, and nothing is ſeen over all the Country, but People who are all pale, emaciated, and ready to hang themſelves in Diſpair. Here a poor old Man weeps over a Son, who was the ſole Support of his gray Hairs. There, a Son bewails the Loſs of a Father, to whom the War had hindered him from paying the moſt eſſential Duties. On one Hand is an Orphan, and on the other a Widow, who ſends up the moſt wofull Cries. Your Majeſty neither hears nor ſees any thing of this Kind.

It is almoſt like your Meals, in which you are ſometimes ſerved with Beef, Mutton, or other well dreſt Meats, and you eat heartily: But if before your Meal, you were to ſee thoſe Animals under the Hands of the Butcher, firſt to bellow and defend themſelves, then to yeild to Force, be knock'd on the Head, and have their Throats cut; then ſtretch'd on the Table, mangled, and hack'd in Pieces: Notwithſtanding of all the dreſſing that could be given them, when they are ſerved up to your Table, the Knife and Fork would drop out of your Hands, and you would not have the Heart to eat them. How would your Majeſty behave, could you with your own Eyes, behold the frightful Sight of ſo many dying Men, and hear with your Ears, the diſmal Groans of ſo many others, who think themſelves wretched in living? How can you reliſh the News of Victory, and the Congratulations attending it? Believe me, tho' you had as able Generals, as well choſen Men, as ſtrong Armies, and as large Proviſions of Money and Proviſions, as the four Princes whom I have mentioned; yet being inſtructed by their Example in the fatal Effects, which even the moſt happy Wars in Appearance produce, you ought wiſely to dread to engage in them without Neceſſity. How much better Reaſon have you to fear this in the preſent Situation of Things. Your Officers are not to be compared to theirs. The public Treaſures and Granaries are already exhauſted. You have ſcarce wherewithall to pay to the Officers of the Empire, their ordinary appointments, and the Largeſſes made at (*) Nán kyau, which are of ſo ancient Uſage, have been for a long time retrenched.

However great your Capacity may be, it appears to me, that to ſtir in ſuch Circumſtances, is a very dangerous thing. Sickneſſes follow, and encreaſe, Famine. The Robbers from the Eaſt and the North, ſeeing you employed elſewhere, renew their Robberies. If, while you are engag'd in a War of your own making, the People being overwhelmed with always ſupplying new Subſidies, at length loſe Patience, join with, or imitate the Robbers: You will be then reduced to that melancholy State in which the Empire was; when after the Conqueſts of Shi whang, a Robber, who was a mere Scoundrel, by turning Rebel, threw every thing into diſorder, and ruined the Dynaſty of the Tſin.

I am old, and have had the Honour to ſerve your Majeſty for a long time; my Zeal which was alwas ſincere, and increaſes every Day, makes me paſs whole Nights without ſleeping, and makes me frequently, even during my Meals, break out into Sighs, and diſſolve in Tears. It is a true Maxim, that before we are engaged in any important Affair, we ought to examine if what we deſign, is agreeable to the Intentions of Tyen (Heaven.) If it is agreeable, it will ſucceed; if it is not agreeable, it will not ſucceed. The common Signs by which a Prince can judge whether or not Tyen is favourable to the Deſigns which he forms, are, on the one Side, regular Seaſons, Plenty, Abundance, and other Events of that Nature. Or on the other, a Reverſe of all theſe, Scarcity, Famine, and ſuch like Calamities. But during all theſe late Years, there has been nothing ſeen but what is frightful: Eclipſes of the Sun, extraordinary Phenomena in the Stars, Earthquakes, Droughts, Inundations, and epidemical Diſeaſes. All theſe ſucceed without any Interruption; and I believe that very near the Half of your Subjects are dead. You may, I think by all this, judge if the Heart of Tyen is favourable to your Enterprize, and conclude that it is not.

In the mean time your Majeſty, inſtead of giving up your Deſign, engages farther and farther in it. I own that this equally aſtoniſhes and afflicts me. Does a Son who has offended his Father and Mother, think to appeaſe them? Being more ſedate, more aſſiduous, more docile, and more reſpectful than he was before his Fault, he makes them ſenſible that he acknowledges it, and repents. If he does this, they pardon him. But if this Son, inſtead of thinking upon re-entering into their Favour, ſhall again break looſe in order to trouble the whole Houſe, or to bully and beat the Servants in Preſence of his Father and Mother, will ſuch a Conduct be proper for appeaſing them? Or will ſuch a Son deſerve Pardon?

I therefore beg you to recall the paſt Time, examine what has made the preceeding Dynaſties to flouriſh, or to fall; and above all things, give a particular Attention to the Will of Tyen, and to the Signs which he gives. Give up your warlike Proſpects. Apply yourſelf to cultivate a good Correſpondence with the neighbouring States; to promote good Order and Plenty in your Court and throughout all your Empire; to render your Subjects happy, and thereby confirm your Family mily upon the Throne. Could I ſee ſuch a Change, I would cloſe my Eyes without regret; tho' I ſhould die on a Dunghill, I ſhall die ſatisfied.

Kau tſû, the Founder of the Han Dynaſty, purchaſed the Honour of a Throne, by the Defeat of ſeveral brave and powerful Rivals. Quang vû ti, the Reſtorer of the ſame Dynaſty, in order to eſtabliſh it, gave many Battles, and gain'd as many Victories. And yet Kau tſû was very forward to make Peace with the northern Nations. Quang vû ti received, with Pleaſure and Thanks, the Propoſals that were made him by his Neighbours in the Weſt. Was this becauſe theſe two Emperors wanted Courage or Skill in the Art of War? Doubtleſs not: But their long Experience made them to forſee at a Diſtance, and wiſely to prevent, all troubleſome Reverſes. Your Majeſty on the contrary, being at eaſe in the innermoſt Part of your Palace, make no Scruple to pronounce; Let thoſe be attacked, and let theſe be extirpated. Perhaps I am too fearful: I own that this Confidence of yours, to me appears extravagant. But alas what can I do! When a Man deſigns to diſſuade his Prince from any thing, he muſt watch his Time, and wait till the Prince is half diſguſted at it himſelf: Then he may eaſily ſucceed. But to undertake to check the Paſſion of a Prince when it is in its greateſt Force, is attempting a very difficult thing. This is ſtill more true of what is called Ambition, a Paſſion for Conqueſt, and a Thirſt after Glory. Theſe Paſſions have a prodigious Sway over the Heart. Whoever poſſeſſes theſe, is hardly diverted from purſuing them, were he one of the petty Literati cloathed in coarſe Stuff, if his Spirit is once warm'd with their Force. Yes! while the Paſſion is ſtrong, to hear the Perſon who oppoſes you, to yeild up your own Views to the Advice of another, to diſtinguiſh what is uſeful and what is juſt, in ſhort, to ſacrifice your moſt darling Paſſions, requires a great Soul, a Penetration, a Moderation, and a Wiſdom far above the Level of Mankind.

Your Majeſty, who was always paſſionately fond of War, is more enamour'd with it now than ever. I ſee this, and yet I venture to diſſuade you from it by this Diſcourſe. I do it, firſt, becauſe having the Honour to know you, I ſuppoſe that what is called Greatneſs of Soul and Moderation, is the ſame in you, as in other Princes. In the ſecond Place; becauſe I don't at all doubt, but that your Majeſty will in the End, heartily repent of having indulg'd this Paſſion, and that you will then look with an evil Eye upon thoſe, who having the Honour to approach you, did not make to you the leaſt Remonſtrance upon this Head. Laſtly, becauſe being old and ready to join your Father (‡) in another World, I want to prevent the Reproaches he will make me ſhould I, like others, hold my Peace. Think of this, Great Sir, and pardon my Raſhneſs.

MEMORIAL of SÛ SHE upon GOVERNMENT.

THE Memorial being long, I ſhall tranſlate ſome Articles entirely, and give an Abridgement of others.

It is a common Saying and a true; "Other Meaſures are to be taken in order to govern aright when Times are confus'd, than thoſe which are purſued when all is calm:" And yet there are certain very well known Rules laid down for all theſe Times. Whence it happens, that a wiſe Prince or an able Miniſter, who ſees any Perplexity ariſing, may be ſorry, but he never is diſconcerted, becauſe he knows what is proper to be done upon theſe Emergencies. If the People are reduced to Poverty by an Inundation or a Drought, ſo as to be obliged to diſperſe themſelves, and then to reunite, in order to plunder and to pillage on all Hands: It is well known, that what is then requiſite, is to ſupply the People with Neceſſaries; and this is the Means of re-eſtabliſhing Peace. If the Commotion proceeds from a rebellious Subject, who wants to ſhare in Sovereignty, and is at the Head of a powerful Army; it is well known what is then to be done; he muſt be oppoſed as ſoon as poſſible with good Troops. If it is occaſioned by an ungrateful Favorite, who abuſing his Princes Favour, uſurps his Authority, and without the Concurrence of his Sovereign, makes himſelf Maſter of Titles and Fortunes: It is well known, that he muſt be tried and puniſhed as he deſerves, as ſoon as poſſible. If the neighbouring Barbarians make Incurſions upon our Territories: It is plain that we ought to provide for the Security of our Frontiers. Theſe different Kinds of Troubles, draw after them a great many Evils. But thoſe Evils are felt, they are ſeen, and their Cauſe is ſeen: Thereby a Prince is in a Condition to apply a proper Remedy.

What is troubleſom and perplexing is, that when in a State without any of theſe Cauſes appearing, all the Effects are felt which they commonly produce: One does not then know where he ſhall turn his Eyes, and waits as it were with folded Arms till ſome great Revolution happens; this appears to me the preſent Situation of Affairs.

For near theſe (*) hundred Years, the Empire properly ſpeaking, has had no War; and Miracles are talked of this pacific Government. Yet at the Bottom, this is only a fine Name. For in reality the Body of the State cannot be very ſound and wholeſome, when Agitations and Diſquiets affect, and even endanger it, while the Cauſes are not ſeen. There are neither Inundations nor Droughts, and yet the People complain and mourn as in Times of the greateſt Barrenneſs. No Rebel has attacked the Empire, or divided its Revenues: Yet theſe Revenues are not ſufficient for their Uſes. There is no Favorite at Court, who being too powerful, abuſes his Authority. And yet there does not at preſent appear to be, betwixt the Prince and his firſt Officers, that fine Harmony that is ſo eſſential to Government: And conſequently throughout all the Empire the People

(*) This Memorial is of a prior Date to the foregoing Piece. I have already taken Notice, that in the Book from which theſe Pieces are taken, the Order of Time in which they were compoſed, is not well obſerved.

People do not love their Magiſtrates. Our neighbouring Barbarians have not for a long time, made the leaſt Incurſion upon our Territories. And yet we find, that ſeveral Places of our Provinces are frequently alarmed. Yes! I repeat it; this is our preſent Situation; than which, in my Opinion, nothing can be more perplexing or more dangerous.

A Phyſician viſits ordinary Patients: He feels their Pulſe, he examines their Looks, their Geſtures and their Voices. According to the Rules of his Art and Experience, he determines whether the Diſeaſe proceeds from Cold or Heat, or from a Conflict betwixt both. He proceeds by Rules, and nothing puzzles him. But a Patient of another Kind is preſented to him. It is a Man, who without any apparent Cauſe, is very ill. He eats, he drinks, and acts very near in his ordinary Manner; and when he is aſked where his Illneſs lies, he can't tell you: His Pulſe is not like that of a Man in Health, yet the Phyſician can't account for his Symptoms. If a Quack ſhall be called to this Patient, he will tell him, his Diſeaſe is all a Jeſt, and there is nothing in it. But if the Phyſician is a (‖) Pyen tſi, or a Tſong kong, he will be ſurpriz'd and alarm'd. He will perceive that an Evil of this Kind is deeply rooted, and by how much more difficult it is to be diſcovered; by ſo much the more will the Difficulty be to cure it. He will perceive, that ordinary Remedies will avail nothing, and he will ſeriouſly ſtudy in what Manner the Patient ought to be treated.

I ſee at preſent, Literati, who calling to Mind certain Paſſages of the Hiſtory of the Han and the Tang, and connecting them as well as they can with the Texts of our ancient Books, thereby carefully compoſe Memorials. They think that thus they can remedy the Evils of the Age. But in my Opinion, they are far out in their Reckoning. Our Misfortunes are of ſuch a Nature, that I can ſee no Remedy for them; except the Prince who is the Head of the State rouſing himſelf, and as it were awaking from his Lethargy, inſpires new Spirit into all the Members of this great Body; that all of them may be ſenſible that he animates them, and that they may know how to behave under him as they ought.

When I look into the Hiſtory of the Ruin of the weſtern Han, I find that neither Tyranny nor Diſſoluteneſs had any Share in it. The Princes under whom it happened, had none of theſe Views: But they were extremely lazy and indolent. They loved their Quiet ſo much, that in order to ſave the Fatigues of ſome Months or Years, they expoſed their Crown and their Families to the Misfortunes of many Ages. The Sovereign is the ſame thing in a State, as what Heaven is in the Univerſe. (*) Chong chi commenting upon the Book I king, and ſpeaking of the Properties of the Heaven, takes particular Notice of its conſtant Activity and uninterrupted Motion. In effect, it is this conſtant regular Action that preſerves this World. The Sun and the Moon which give Light, the other Stars which are its Ornaments, the Thunders which are its Voice, the Rains and Dues which are its Benefits, are all the Effects of its Action and Motion. And if the Heaven were without Action and without Motion, I believe that this unmoveable Maſs corrupting of itſelf, and could not long ſubſiſt; far leſs could it influence all the reſt of the Syſtem.

If our Prince, taking a happy Byaſs upon this Model, ſhould one of theſe Days diſplay himſelf, ſhining with a new Luſtre, and armed with a noble and formidable Reſolution, ſhould he make all his Subjects ſenſible that he will not bear the Title of Sovereign in vain, and that he is reſolved to animate and be animated for the Good of the Empire which is under him. Then all the Men of Underſtanding would immediately crowd to aſſiſt him with their Advices; and all the Men of Courage would preſent themſelves, and offer to ſerve him at the Expence of their Lives; they would ſtrive with one another, which of them ſhould beſt ſecond the Activity of their Sovereign, and then nothing would be impracticable. But while the Prince, either indolent or irreſolute, won't diſcover what his Intentions are, or leaves People to think that he intends nothing at all: Tho his Officers were equal to the Lyu, the Tſi or the Ki, what can they do? For which Reaſon, I begin this Memorial by requiring in a Sovereign, Activity, and a determined Reſolution effectually to reign and to govern his Empire. I ſhall lay down in the following Articles, what I think is moſt eſſential for doing this with Succeſs.

Sù ſhé, after blaming his Prince for too lightly changing the eſtabliſhed Laws and Regulations on account of ſome Inconveniencies, proceeds thus.

They who give theſe Advices, are Literati of a pedantic Knowledge, who found their Opinion upon ſome particular Inſtance of Antiquity. As for me, tho' I own, I think there is ſomewhat defective in our Laws as we now have them; yet the bad Succeſs of the Government is not owing to that Defect, but to the wrong Choice of Men who are put in Poſts. The Laws and Regulations of a State reſembles the five Sounds of Muſic; in the Combination of the five Sounds with the ſix Lyu, ſome can't fail being of a tender laſcivious Strain. In like manner, ſome Inconveniences will attend ſome Laws and Regulations that are made. Our ancient Sages ſaw this well; therefore their Laws and Regulations were very few. The reſt they truſted to the Virtue and Diſcretion of the Perſons whom they put in Poſt. The Prince ought to apply all his Cares to the right Choice of a firſt Miniſter: But he ought after that, to put a real Confidence in him, and to be thorougly convinced that he deſerves it. If the Miniſter perceives that the Prince renders himſelf dark with Regard to him, he, on his Part, will be fearful and reſerved: He will then only half profit by his Talents, and nothing that is great can be done.

This Confidence is the more requiſite at preſent, in that, if a Miniſter would put Things upon a good Footing, he will find great Obſtacles in the abandoned Indolence that has crept into all the Members

(‖) Two celebrate Phyſicians of Antiquity.

Members of the State, which is the Reaſon why People only think of the preſent, and never diſturb themſelves about what is to come. A Miniſter in ſuch Circumſtances, muſt have the Courage to raiſe himſelf above the common Ideas, and a great many unwarrantable Cuſtoms. This cannot be done without his opening a great Field for Envy, Detraction, and Calumny. If he does not ſee to the Bottom of his Prince's Heart, will he dare to oppoſe him?

In another Article Sû ſhê ſays: When the Empire is diſquieted and in Motion, every one endeavours to make the beſt of his Talents that he can. Whence it frequently happens, that they who have Courage, having different Intereſts, endeavour to ruin one another; while they who have only Cunning, ſupplant and deſtroy one another with leſs Noiſe. Theſe Parties by little and little gain Strength, and put the finiſhing Hand to the Diſorders and Confuſion of the Empire. When Peace is re-eſtabliſhed, the new Emperor being informed that the former Troubles were occaſioned by the Ambition of certain Perſons of a greater Merit than ordinary, in order to ſhun the like Misfortunes, employs only Perſons who are naturally gentle, fearful, unambitious, and without any great Capacity. What is the Conſequence of this? At the End of a few Years, if the leaſt Difficulty occurs, the Prince has not one Man from whom he can hope Aſſiſtance. And if Aſſiſtance does not ſpeedily interpoſe, every thing at leaſt inſenſibly languiſhes, and the worſt is to be dreaded for the State.

The Sages of a firſt Rate obſerve a different Method. In the longeſt and moſt profound Peace, they know how to keep the Minds of Men in Exerciſe, and to animate the Subjects to do all the Good of which they are capable. For this End, they open different Ways agreeable to the different Inclinations of Men; every one enters with Pleaſure into ſome one of theſe Ways, every one moves, acts, labours; one is animated by this Motive, another by that: In the mean time, all this tends to promote the Intereſt of the Prince and the State. Thus, to open different Ways, and to put your Subjects in Action, calls for your immediate Application, and you cannot begin too ſoon. All the Objection that lies to this Advice can eaſily be refuted.

Sû ſhê in the reſt of this Article, refutes a Maxim which is ſtretched too far concerning the Gentleneſs and Indulgence that is proper for the Sovereign, and the Miſapplication of the Doctrine of (*) Chong yong by ſome Pedants.

In another Article Sû ſhê ſays;

Sir, behold what is ſaid in general of an Emperor; being placed as it were by way of Loan above the reſt of Mankind, charged with extending his Cares to an almoſt endleſs Space, that every thing may be kept in order; (†) Does he proſper? Nothing is more high or more firm. Does there happen a troubleſome Reverſe? Nothing is more abject, nothing more frail. And the Tranſition from the one State to the other, depends very often upon a mere Trifle. Therefore a Prince who is truly wiſe and provident, does not lay near ſo great a Streſs upon the Means of making himſelf feared, as of the Meaſures he takes to make himſelf beloved. Whatever Care he takes to maintain his Authority, and however well eſtabliſhed it appears, yet it is not chiefly upon this that he founds his Confidence; but upon his knowing that he is too well beloved for any Subject to fail in his Obedience and Reſpect. He immediately, and in his own Perſon, aſſures himſelf of the Hearts of thoſe he employs: And they, by a wiſe and loyal Conduct, ſecure the Hearts of the People. This is his moſt effectual Security in his high and elevated Situation. He who founds this Security upon his Name of Emperor, or upon his Sovereign Power, or upon the happy Situation in which he has put Things, may indeed maintain his Authority for ſome time, if no Difficulty occurs; But does a perplexing Juncture happen all of a Sudden? He finds no Zeal in his Servants: They are all with Regard to him, as to one they had met by Accident upon a Road. Does two Roads meet in one? They ſalute one another in Form, they coldly take their Leave, and each goes his own Way.

Behold what happens to Princes who are too haughty, and who have only the Art to render themſelves formidable. Are they in any Difficulty? In vain do they look out for ſome one to aſſiſt them, for no body appears, and this for two Reaſons; Firſt. becauſe the Prince is not beloved. Secondly, becauſe his Haughtineſs and Fierceneſs having driven from his Court the Men of the greateſt Merit, and kept all others in Fear and upon the Reſerve, no body has been accuſtomed to manage that precious Veſſel; and in Times of Trouble and Confuſion, every one declines to take the Trouble of it. From all this Sû ſhê concludes, that the Prince, far from keeping this Veſſel always ſhut up, ought to act ſo, as that a good many People may be accuſtomed to manage it: That is to ſay, that he ought to invite into the Government, all the Men of Abilities that he can, and give each of them an Opportunity of exerciſing his Talents. He then complains, that Emperors frequently render themſelves too inacceſſible, both by the Fierceneſs and Haughtineſs with which they treat their Miniſters and great Officers, and by a hundred perplexing Ceremonies that are too mortifying and too troubleſome. He then ſhews, that the greateſt Emperors both of ancient and modern Times have acted otherways. It is true, ſays he, that Antiquity recommends to Sovereigns a Gravity worthy of themſelves, and a continual watching over their Words and Actions. But it is likewiſe true, that certain injudicious Literati by abuſing many Texts, cheriſh the Pride of Princes.....That which ſeems, continues he, to preſs moſt in the State of Indulgence and Lazineſs, that has gained upon all the Members of the Empire; is, that his Majesty who is the Head, rousing himself and gathering new Strength, would put all the rest in Motion; for this End he lays down five Articles in the following Terms.

1. It is certain, that next to the Sovereign, upon the Ministers and great Officers of War, depends the Happiness or Unhappiness of States. It seems to me, that your Majesty ought to call them frequently into your Presence, and to reason with them upon Affairs. The frequent Councils you hold with them, will produce good Views; at least your Majesty will reap this Advantage, that you will thoroughly be acquainted with your Servants.

2. (*) The Tay chew tse, are they to whom you entrust the Care of your People in the Provinces. It would be proper, when they are changed, either when they are going elsewhere, or when they retire from Business, for them to be obliged to repair to Court; and that your Majesty should set a-part a Time for admitting them, and enquiring at them about the Customs and Manners of the Place they have just left, about the most perplexing Affairs that have occured therein, and upon the Expedients that contributed most to disengage them. Besides that these Informations may be very useful to you, you will thereby discover the true Talents of Magistrates.

3. In all Times, our Emperors had certain Officers appointed, whose Employment is to entertain them with useful Discourse, and to read and explain to them our King. For a long Time this has been so easily dispensed with, or so superficially perform'd, that it is done with no Advantage: and yet nothing was more wisely establish'd, or more useful, if it is conscientiously discharged. I wish therefore that your Majesty, instead of naming the Officers as you do without much Care, and merely for Form-sake, would chuse Persons proper for this Office: And that they on their Part, without confining themselves to a cold tiresome Lesson upon the King, were capable, upon these Texts, to entertain your Majesty with whatever is most useful and curious in the History of all Ages.

4. If, among the Advices or Memorials that come to your Hands from the Provinces, there are any that either for their fine Dress or Solidity, are above ordinary, it would be proper for your Majesty to call the Author to Court; to interrogate him, to shew him some Marks of Goodness and to commend him, were it no more than to encourage and inspire him with more Liberty to give you useful Advices upon Occasion.

5. Tho' the meanest Officers do not commonly converse with the Prince himself, yet in my Opinion, your Majesty being acquainted by sure Methods, that any one amongst them has done his Duty, should, all of a sudden, and without telling him for what, call him to Court, and acquaint him that you know and approve of his Conduct, and let him taste of your Bounty. This will not only be attended with no Inconveniency, but it will be a good way of inculcating the Sentiments of Honour and Virtue upon others of his Rank. They are very numerous, and considering their small Appointments and the vast Distance that they believe is betwixt them and the Sovereign, they may grow negligent. Both they and all the Empire will thereby perceive the vast Tenderness your Majesty has for your People; your Care to contribute all you can to promote their Happiness, and your Value for Merit in all Ranks of Life; and this, in my Opinion, will be a new Mean, besides those pointed out by the Laws, to encrease the Number of good, and diminish the Number of bad, Officers.

In another Article the same Sû shê says, When no Petition is sent to Court, and when in effect no Person in the Empire has Reason to complain; when no Suppliant appears, and when throughout the Empire every body has either what he wishes, or what he in reason ought to wish for; it is the Effect of the most fine perfect Government in the World, and the brightest Proof of the superior Wisdom, and the perfect Disinterestedness of those who govern. Such were the happy Reigns of the great Princes Yau and Shun. But if it be impossible to put an end to all Supplications and Accusations, it ought to be so ordered, that these Law-suits and Petitions be dispatch'd quickly and without Delay, that the Officers of the Provinces may not affect so prodigious a Distance from these of the Court, and that the most common People may find an easy Access to the Officers of the Provinces.

Man, for instance, has a Heart and two Hands; does he feel a Trouble in any Part about him, were it but an Itching, tho' the Uneasiness in the Main is inconsiderable, and incapable to alarm him, yet he can't keep his Fingers from handling the Part affected, and that too very frequently. Every Time they approach it, is it by an express formal Order of the Heart? No, there is no Occasion for such a precise premeditated Order. For as the Heart naturally and habitually acts for the whole Body, the Hands are likewise naturally habituated to follow the Propensity of the Heart. In this Manner, Things are managed in a State which is governed by Sages of the first Rate. A tender and sincere Love unites the Head with the Members, and the Members with the Head, which is the Emperor, in such a Manner, that their Evils and Dangers, great and small, are in common, and the reciprocal Assistance they give one another is very ready. We don't see this Now-a-days.

Does any one, who is oppress'd or in pinching Necessities, carry his Complaints, or displays his Rights at Court? It is as if he address'd Tyen or Quey shin, for he receives no Answer. The Ministers and other great Officers never by themselves examine Things to the Bottom, but rely upon their inferior Officers. It is thus commonly with mean interested Souls who do nothing but for Money. But when once they receive that, the Affair is dispatch'd in less than a Day. But, do the Petitioners come to them empty handed? they let them dance Attendance dance for a whole Year. Do you aſk of them the moſt juſt Thing in the World, and Things that cannot be refus'd you? They find Means to put you off a long Time that they may force you to purchaſe them. In ſhort, you muſt either ſtay for the meereſt Trifles, or go without your Buſineſs.

(*) The same that is now Chi fû, or the first Civil Officers of a City of the first Rank. There are in this Province always several Cities of the second or third Order; sometimes more, sometimes fewer, whose Officers are subordinate to him.

Under ſome preceeding Dynaſties there were Junctures, in which the Laws being ill-digeſted or deſtitute of Vigour, gave Riſe to Cheats and Injuſtice. At preſent when that Door is ſhut, another is opened. Law itſelf is made a Trade of: Is a Man to be wrong'd? They ſeek in our Laws ſome Quirk, to which, under ſome ſpecious Pretext, his Affair may be reduc'd, and by which he may be caſt. Is another, who pays well, to be favour'd? However unjuſt his Plea may be, it is put in ſuch a Light, that under Favour of ſome Article of our Laws which relate to his Caſe, he gains his Suit. At preſent, they complain much of the Multiplicity of their Buſineſs. But this is not in reality, becauſe they have more Buſineſs now, than they uſed to have at many other Times; but becauſe the Officers are neither induſtrious nor expeditious, becauſe they devolve every Thing upon their Underlings who prolong them, in order to extort what they want: thereby their Buſineſs grows from Day to Day, from Month to Month, and from Year to Year, till they can ſcarce ſee the End of it. Make your Officers laborious and expeditious, otherwiſe there is no Remedy.

One of the Things which our antient Kings fear'd moſt, was, leaſt ſome one of their Subjects loſing Courage, and deſpairing of Succeſs, ſhould entirely abandon the Care of his Honour and Fortune. Theſe wiſe Princes knew well that when it comes to that Paſs they never ſtop half way in Wickedneſs, but hold on till they commonly became incorrigible. For which Reaſon, one of their greateſt Cares was to act in ſuch a Manner as that their Subjects, being always animated by Fear and Hope, ſhould never be weary of doing Good. With this View, having eſtabliſh'd different Degrees of Diſtinction, and different Poſts, to which conſiderable Appointments were annexed, they never beſtow'd them but upon deſerving Perſons; but they never laid any Man under an Incapacity of enjoying them, and thereby they animated every one to aſpire to them. The Road to theſe Poſts and Honours was open to all their Subjects; and they who did not arrive at them, could not juſtly impute it to any Thing but to their own Diſorders and Weakneſs. Thus there was ſeen through all the Orders of the State not only a great Ardour for well-doing, but likewiſe an admirable Conſtancy not to relax nor prevaricate.

But ſtill what Secret had our ancient Princes to arrive at this? It was as follows: Being perſwaded that the Son of a Man of Quality, when he degenerates, has nothing that can in Reaſon ſet him above the Level of the moſt common People; they had Regard to nothing but to Merit and Capacity; they were ſo determined in this, that be his Birth what it would, without theſe two Qualifications, he never could propoſe to be advanced: Thereby, Men of a high Birth had a Check put upon that Licentiouſneſs, which is ſo natural to them, and they endeavoured to ſupport their Ranks; thereby, the meaneſt who were conſcious of Virtue had a Spur to excite them; thereby, throughout all the Empire a generous Emulation, which produced admirable Effects, encreaſed every Day. O! what juſt Notions had theſe antient Princes! In Progreſs of Time this Method was left. Certain Employments were annexed to Perſons of a certain Rank; while others, on the contrary, however great their Merit is, can never arrive at the ſame Employments. Yet now, as formerly, ſome Promotions are always made with an Eye to Merit and Virtue; at leaſt this is pretended: but I find wrong Meaſures are taken for this. For Inſtance, it is now regulated, that when a Man has got his Degree of (*) Tſèng tſe, he is ſure of a Poſt, which renders him equally noble and rich. Is not this Promotion a little too ſwift? He has ſucceeded very well in his Exerciſes on the Day of Examination. But muſt we conclude from this that he has Capacity and Genius for his Affairs? What I think ſtill worſe is, that thoſe of a certain Condition are either entirely precluded, or ſome Bounds are aſſign'd them, beyond which they cannot paſs. The Officers of the (†) Chew and the (‡) Hyen, when they are once diveſted of their Poſts, can never recover them. Theſe then become People, who being reduced to Deſpair, and who having nothing further to hope for or to fear, grow capable of any thing, and do great Miſchief among the People. Such a one amongſt them, at the Bottom, is an honeſt Man; he has Merit and Capacity: An unlucky Accident happens to him, for which he is broken. Thenceforward no more Employments to him, he is put under an everlaſting Incapacity, and is a Man who, contrary to the Maxims of our Antients, is render'd deſperate, and who conſequently is expoſed to the Temptation of being very wicked.

I think that theſe Officers, when they are caſhier'd, which in my Opinion never ought to be done but for ſome grievous Faults and ſuch as ſhew the Offender to be a bad Man, ſhould have Opportunities and Means of repairing their Faults; at leaſt, they ſhould be left in a Condition to hope to recover their former Character. As the lower Officers of theſe great Tribunals of the Court are People that cannot be wanted, it has been thought expedient, in order that the Vacancies in their Poſts may be ſupplied, to make a Regulation, that after ſo many Years of Service they ſhould have Poſts given them in the Provinces. There was good reaſon for this Regulation; but becauſe theſe Officers for the moſt part are but poor, it was thought proper to determine that they ſhould be laid under an Incapacity of riſing above a certain Rank: ſo that tho' amongſt them there might be found a Man of the firſt Merit, he could never arrive at great Poſts or Dignities, tho' he had lived veſted with an Office ever ſo long: I think Inconveniencies attend this: for, in ſhort, he who enters into Poſts, at leaſt in ſome ſome meaſure, has an Eye to Honour and Diſtinction: If he is excluded from this, he has no other View from his Services and Labours but to amaſs Riches. Then it is natural for him to be in good Earneſt about this, and it is to be fear'd that this, becoming the ruling Paſſion both of his Head and his Heart, will tranſport him to unwarrantable Exceſſes.

I ſay almoſt the ſame Thing of thoſe People who, by advancing a certain Sum to the Royal Treaſury, obtain ſuch and ſuch a Poſt, but always with this Proviſo, that they can not riſe higher. It is natural to think, that they will make as much of their Poſts as they can: And then it is to be fear'd, that they ſell Juſtice and make the People ſuffer. I wiſh that no Man were made Uſe of whom we are, if we may ſo ſpeak, obliged to abandon, and who is thereby expoſed to the Temptation of abandoning himſelf. It would therefore be proper that when a Man is put in inferior Poſts, an open Way were left him for attaining to the higheſt, by his Capacity, Merit, and Services.

A Prince who has juſt Notions of Things, never believes himſelf fixed upon his Throne, but in the ſame Degree in which he ſees his Subjects fix'd in the Love of Virtue, and a hearty Averſion to whatever is unjuſt and unreaſonable. Theſe People, who under our three famous Dynaſties, never deviated from their Obedience and Duty, however great the Danger, or however ſtrong the Temptation was, Were theſe People, I ſay, ever animated by the Hopes of Reward, or check'd by the Fear of Puniſhment? No. But their Heart being fixed in Virtue and the Love of Juſtice, they could never reſolve upon any Thing glaringly inconſiſtent with theſe. Cold, Hunger, Ignominy, Death, in ſhort, nothing could make them forget what they ow'd to their Prince. Behold the Reaſon why each of our three famous Dynaſties ſubſiſted ſo long! Under the following Dynaſties Things were alter'd. The Subjects were then ſeen frequently to neglect their Duty for private Intereſt, to forget the Orders of their Sovereign upon the leaſt Danger which they run: they made Uſe of Artifice and Deceit almoſt in every Thing; and thus they eluded the moſt rigorous Laws: In ſhort, having a hearty Averſion for their Governors, they rejoiced in their Misfortunes. Then did Inundations or any other Calamity ſucceed? Did any Rebellion riſe? The whole State was turned upſide down, and the Emperor found himſelf without Subjects. All your Literati of different Ages inform us of the ſame Thing. Under our three famous Dynaſties, ſay they, great Care was taken of what concerned the Inſtruction of the People. Publick Schools and frequent Exerciſes were inſtituted; and for this, the Rites were rigorouſly inforced. The proper Uſages in aſſuming the Cap for the firſt Time, in Marriages and the Times both before and after Burials were obſerved. This was afterwards neglected, and for this Reaſon, the People at laſt bluſh'd at nothing. Such is the common Language of our Literati. For my Share, I remark, that at different Times, ſince thoſe of our famous Dynaſties, Men of Merit and Virtue being ſupported by the Authority of the Princes, have reviv'd theſe publick Schools, re-eſtabliſhed theſe Exerciſes, and reinforced the Obſervance of theſe Rites. If therefore this is ſufficient for the Converſion of the People, we ought to endeavour to revive the Manners of Antiquity. But we have ſeen, on the contrary, that the People, by becoming more poliſh'd, become likewiſe frequently more wicked, more cunning, more deceitful, more jealous, and more proud.

This makes me ſay, notwithſtanding my too great want of Capacity, that ſuch of our Literati, who talk thus, love Antiquity without thoroughly underſtanding it, and that they have not rightly dived into the great Secret; they knew in general, that Antiquity had a right Method for rendering the People virtuous by inſtructing them, but not diſtinguiſhing what was effectual for this Purpoſe, and upon what it was founded, they took up with fine Names, or at leaſt, with fine Appearances. Theſe Appearances are indeed uſeful; and without them, the Virtues, which is the ſolid Part, can ſcarce ſubſiſt long. But if the Prince and the Governors confine themſelves to ſimple Appearances; their Flatterers and ſome ſuperficial Literati will tell them, that Antiquity is reviving, when in reality there is no Change wrought upon the Morals, and the fine Name of the Reſtorer of Antiquity cannot be ſupported.

Vû vang no ſooner became Emperor than he gave to the People great Largeſſes of Corn and Money, thereby making all his Empire ſenſible that he was quite free from Avarice. He treated Men of Virtue and Merit with a great deal of Honour; thereby giving them to underſtand that he was neither proud nor paſſionate. He veſted the Deſcendants of our ancient Princes with Principalities; and in this his Goodneſs was diſplay'd. He cauſed Fey lyen and Ngo lay to be put to Death; by this his Juſtice appeared. In this Manner a Prince ought to act: In this Manner he ought to begin, if he wants to labour with Succeſs, either in forming or reforming the Manners of the People. Every Body was the more charm'd with this Conduct in Vû vang, becauſe his Predeceſſor Chew obſerved a Conduct quite contrary to this. Vû vang thereby gain'd all their Hearts. He revived Fidelity, Zeal, Diſintereſtedneſs, Modeſty, and the Shame of bad Actions. After which, in order to enrich and adorn ſo beautiful a Foundation, ſucceeded the Regulation and Obſervance of the Rites, Muſic, Public Leſſons and Schools, the Exerciſes of the Bow, ſolemn Feaſts at appointed Times, the Ceremonies of Cap, Marriages, the Times before and after Burials. Theſe outward Appearances ſtruck the Eyes, and revived and cheriſh'd in the Heart the Sentiments of Virtue: and nothing was more charming than to ſee how each took a Pleaſure in doing his Duty.

Ever ſince the Days of the Tſin and the Han, all the Streſs has been commonly laid upon the Fear of the Laws, and the Rigour of the Officers. This has been made the Support of Government, without Princes troubling themſelves much about inculcating the Love of Duty and and Virtue. Thus, for upwards of a thouſand Years, Craft, Intereſt, and Avarice have been gaining Ground in the Hearts of the People; till they have loſt the Senſe of Shame. When our Literati want to revive what they call Antiquity, by eſtabliſhing certain Decorums of Ceremonies and Muſic, all they gain by this is, that the People ſeeing their Evolutions and Grimace, put their Hands upon their Mouths, and privately ſtifle their Laugh: or elſe they will look with Aſtoniſhment upon one another, and diſcover by their Looks that they are by no Means pleaſed with ſuch Muſic. This being the Caſe can it be hoped they ſhould by theſe Means be reclaimed to a Love for Virtue, and a Hatred of Vice? For my Share, I am of Opinion, that another Method ſhould be followed. In order to inculcate upon them the Virtues, which are the eſſential Part, you muſt ſet them an Example as Vû vang did, and begin by thoſe which it moſt concerns the People that the Prince ſhould poſſeſs, and which it moſt concerns the Prince that his Subjects ſhould have. For inſtance, if the People knows not what Fidelity and Honour ſignifies, how can Peace and good Order long ſubſiſt? If the People are quite ignorant of every thing that can be called Generoſity, Equity, and Conſtancy, how can they become united in Dangers? In ſhort, if in the moſt peaceable Times the Subjects only endeavour how to deceive the Vigilance of their Governors: If in the firſt Difficulty in which they ſee their Prince engaged, they are ready to abandon him; how can we flatter our ſelves with having the Secret of Antiquity for the Amendment of the People? ſince it is quite otherwiſe. We may ſay, on the contrary, that in this Situation of Affairs, if great Revolutions have not happened, it is by mere Chance and good Luck. But, would we inſpire the People with Sincerity, Fidelity and Loyalty? the Secret for obtaining this is as follows: The Prince and Governor themſelves muſt be exact in keeping their Word to the People. Would they inſpire them with a noble Diſintereſtedneſs, and generous Equity? The beſt Way is for the Prince and the Government to diſcover no Avarice nor Rapaciouſneſs.

Some Time ago, when there was an Intention to raiſe towards the Weſt of the Yellow River, the Troops that were neceſſary on that Quarter, whole Families, and almoſt all the Perſons capable to bear Arms were enliſted. In order to engage them to enliſt, they were aſſur'd by public Manifeſtoes diſpatch'd from Court, that Recourſe was only had to them for that Time, and on a preſſing Exigency, which could not otherwiſe be ſupplied ſo readily, that they ſhould not be oblig'd to ſerve long, and that they ſhould afterwards have full Liberty to return to their reſpective Employments. But inſtead of this, ſoon after, they were rigorouſly detained in the Service, and not a ſingle Man of them diſmiſſed.

In the Years named Pau ywen there were different Motions and Marches made by all the Troops. Occaſion was taken from this to increaſe the Taxes a great deal. This, it was ſaid, was only upon an Emergency, but a good many Years have ſince intervened, and theſe Taxes ſtill ſubſiſt. When the People are treated thus, how can Honour and the Hatred of Deceit be inculcated on them? To exact from them much leſs than what you rigorouſly may, and to keep your Word with them even when it is difficult ſo to do, are eſſential Maxims to Governors; if it is ſaid that theſe Things are impracticable in a State where Finances are eſtabliſhed; my Anſwer is, that if any other Courſe is held, you will loſe Ground inſtead of gaining.

Diſcourſe of Sû ſhê Brother to the Sû ſhê, proving that a Prince ought to be acquainted with the different Characters of Men.

I HAVE elſewhere declared my Sentiments upon the Art of Governing; and ſhall not repeat what I have there mentioned. I ſhall only add, that a Prince who wants to ſucceed therein ought to apply himſelf to know the different Capacities and Characters of thoſe he employs: Becauſe, without this, all the reſt will be uſeleſs. And, in order to render ſo neceſſary a Piece of Knowledge eaſy, I have here collected ſome Pourtraits different from one another.

Let us ſuppoſe, that at preſent, our Emperor has no body about his Perſon or in Employments, but Officers of acknowledged Wiſdom, approved Probity, and ſuch as are incapable of giving the Prince the leaſt Uneaſineſs, by deviating from their Duty. It is however uſeful for him to know, and may be dangerous for him not to know, that there might be found others, and they too amongſt Men of Merit, of a quite oppoſite Character. Some there are, whoſe ruling Paſſion is the Love of Glory. Theſe aim only at Renown. Riches has no Charms for them; they may poſſeſs them, but their Relations uſe them. Does a Poſt preſent that they can eaſily procure? They are ſo far from endeavouring to obtain it, that they take a Pride in yeilding it to another who is their Inferior. Not that they are averſe from entering into Poſts. For if their Prince places them in one, and treats them with Reſpect, according to the Rites, they are quite raviſhed. But if he treats them with leſs Diſtinction, being intirely inſenſible of the Motives of Intereſt and all that, they retire from Buſineſs. Is one of theſe kind of People in Poſt? Nothing is ſo temperate, nothing ſo diſintereſted; and all this in order to diſtinguiſh himſelf from, and raiſe himſelf above, the reſt of Mankind. If the Prince, out of Eſteem to him, ſhall endeavour to engage him with conſiderable Advantages, he is as it were aſhamed and diſſatisfied at his Heart.

Others graſp after Riches: Poſts, with large Penſions annext, are their Delight. They carefully lay hold on all Occaſions of enriching themſelves, that they and their Families may live at Eaſe. If ſuch enjoy Lands and Houſes, they will perform great Services. But if a Prince, from a falſe Notion of their Character, ſhall pretend to engage them by the Diſtinctions of meer Honour, theſe Sort of People will never repay him, and they will be always diſcontented.

To be always in a Humour of over-bearing, is a conſiderable Failing. And yet there are People of that Character, who otherways have Merit and Capacity, whom if the Prince deſigns to employ, he ought to manage and to take the proper Meaſures for that Effect. Otherways they will be continually jangling and contending with others.

There are others who have a mutual Hatred for one another. A Prince ought to take care not to employ both theſe at once. One Man will ſacrifice to his Vengeance, the Succeſs of the moſt advantagious Enterprize. Another is inflexibly reſolute and ſtiff; a Man of theſe Characters on ſome Occaſions is neceſſary, and therefore a Prince ought to employ him: But do not pretend to make ſuch Men bend, for they will firſt break, and that loſes them. An other Man, on the contrary, is fearful: Do not offer Violence to his fear, for your Affairs will thereby ſuffer. He may be very ſerviceable to you when no Danger attends the Service. Thus it is, that a Prince ought to ſtudy the Characters of his Servants, in order to keep them attach'd to his Perſon, and to make Advantage of their Capacities.

But there is need of a ſtill more particular Care, in diſcovering and preventing the bad Deſigns that may be a forming. They who think to make themſelves the Head of a Party, are commonly Maſters of the deepeſt Diſſimulation: Their Motions are ſo ſubtle, that it is not eaſy to diſcern them. When they are really acting on the one Side, they appear intent upon the other: There is nothing with them, but falſe Attacks and Counter-marches. Men of this Character have been ſeen in Times paſt, whoſe real Views were, uſurping the Authority of the Prince, and yet far from contradicting him in any thing, they ſerved him with all the Complaiſance and Aſſiduity imaginable, ſtudying his Inclinations, and carefully procuring all the Occaſions of gratifying them. Their Aim was, that the Prince being abandoned to his Pleaſures, might abandon the Government to them. They then took that Opportunity, and unleſs the Prince had been much upon his Guard, they artfully ſeized the Authority which he had as it were depoſited in their Hands. Such formerly was the Conduct of Li lin fû.

Beſides, when theſe Sort of People are once poſſeſſed of Authority, all their Care is to contrive the Means of keeping themſelves in it, leaſt any one more able than themſelves ſhould ſupplant them, which they are in continual dread of. One of the Methods they commonly employ for this Effect, is to form and to foment different Parties in the State. Thereby they render themſelves as as it were neceſſary; while they who can hurt them, being employed in ſupporting themſelves on other Quarters, theſe other in the mean time enjoy the Fruits of their Artifice. Li lin fû was a Man of this Character likewiſe.

It is not vicious and diſorderly Princes alone, who have reaſon to be afraid of being thus ſurprized. Does a Prince love Men of Worth? Has he an Inclination and Eſteem for Virtue? Mean Souls are not wanting who make a traffic of this. By what Means? By Vice in diſguiſe, if they are not much on their Guard, appearing like Virtue, and Virtue when diſfigured, having a Reſemblance of Vice. A deſigning Man therefore, knowing that his Prince has a Value for Virtue, immediately makes open Profeſſion of it. But if he practiſes it for ſome time, he is ſoon ſeen to prevaricate. When Occaſion favours him, he paſſes into Villany; this was the Manner in which he celebrated Villain Shê hyen, behaved in his Time. When theſe Kind of Men have firmly united their Party, and when they are thoroughly acquainted with the weak Side of their Prince, they take all Advantages of it. They place him betwixt two Extreams, the one of which leads to their own Views, the other they well know is diſagreable to their Prince, and thus they as it were drive him in Spite of himſelf, into their own Deſigns. This was the Practice of Numbers of Villains in the former Ages, and in particular, of the ambitious and crafty Li ki, when, that ſhe might ruin the Hereditary Prince of Tſin, ſhe ſought Permiſſion from Hyen kong to retire.

An underſtanding Prince, who is thoroughly acquainted with theſe Characters, knows the Views which each propoſes, by the firſt Steps they take, and reſting well aſſur'd, that the more Pains they take to conceal them, the leſs juſtifiable they are, he is never more upon his Guard, than when he is in the dark as to the Motives both of their Words and Actions. Under the Government of our ancient Kings, none were ſeen in Poſts but Men of the moſt approved Virtue, the others remained in Obſcurity. Was this becauſe amongſt theſe laſt, not a Man ſought to be advanced? Doubtleſs ſeveral did; but they no ſooner appeared than they were ſeen through; ſo that being covered with Shame and Confuſion, they condemned themſelves to Obſcurity. Happy I, if what I have ſeen laid down can in the leaſt aid my Prince, in rightly diſtinguiſhing Men poſſeſt of Virtue and Capacity, from thoſe who have neither the one nor the other.

Another DISCOURSE of the ſame Sû chê.

AS a Man in Credit and Authority, has in ſome Meaſure a certain Reſemblance of an ambitious Favorite, the Vulgar confounds theſe two Characters together; and the juſt Hatred of the one extends to the other. This is becauſe the unthinking Many take up with exteriour Appearences, and never examine Things to the Bottom. Both the one and the other aim bold Strokes, which encroach, or ſeem to encroach, upon the Sovereign Authority. And this is the Reaſon why the Vulgar, being ſurprized by Appearnaces, ſtupidly confound them. As for me, I put a wide Difference betwixt theſe two Sorts of Men; and tho' I agree with every body, in thinking the Second the Peſt of a State, yet I believe it, it is always good for a State never to be without a Perſon of the firſt Character. An honeſt Man, when in truſt, if there is Occaſion, more ſincerely, and more freely than any one elſe, blames the Extravagance of an ambitious Favorite. And the Steps

he ſometimes takes, are never ſuch as thoſe, by which an ambitious and ungrateful Minion authoriſes his Conduct. The Favorite who abuſes his Credit, wants to uſurp the Sovereign Authority, and to leave his Maſter nothing but the Name; how does he behave? When within Doors with his Prince, nothing, in Appearance, is more gentle, nothing more ſubmiſſive. Whatever the Prince propoſes is agreed to by the Minion, who is ſo far from oppoſing it, that he never is at a Loſs for Reaſons to ſupport it. The Prince, deluded by his Cunning, grows fonder and fonder of him. Worthleſs as he is, he greedily liſtens to what he ſays: At laſt, he lets him engroſs his whole Confidence, and being contented with the Shadow, he abandons to this Favorite all the Subſtance of his Authority. Then it is, that the ingrateful Minion makes all the Empire ſenſible of the Degree of Favour to which he is raiſed. He boldly takes the Ballance in his Hand, and freely decides upon the Lives and Fortunes of his fellow Subjects. Rewards and Puniſhments come all from his Hands, as if there were no longer any Emperor. He humbles one, and raiſes another; none but his Creatures are in Poſts, all the Officers great and ſmall, are devoted to him, and proud to become his Confidents. Behold the Favorite now as the Maſter; and the Empire is ſure to ſuffer; but the Evil is, as it were, paſt Remedy.

Let us now caſt our Eyes upon the Conduct of one whom I call a Man of Credit and Authority. What a vaſt Difference is there betwixt this Character and the one I have juſt now deſcribed! If the Prince, as is ſometimes the Caſe, from a Sally of Paſſion, ſhall unſeaſonably deſign to engage in ſome fooliſh Undertaking, he honeſtly oppoſes it; and in reſpectful, but ſtrong Terms, lays before him his Reaſons for diſſwading him. If it happens that the Prince, without removing or regarding them, ſhall obſtinately purſue the Dictates of his Paſſion, tho' evidently againſt his own Honour and the Good of the State; in that Caſe, he lets his Prince ſay on, and without minding the Orders which proceed from the Suggeſtions of his Paſſion, he follows the wiſeſt Courſe, both for the Good of the State and the Honour of his Prince, who recovering from the Tranſport which dimm'd his Reaſon, is very well pleaſed that Things have been managed in that Manner. It is plain, that the Emperor ought to be the firſt mover of every thing, both at Court and over all the Empire. But the Good of the State likewiſe requires, that there ſhould be at Court a Number of creditable Officers, who make it their Duty and Employment, inceſſantly to watch over the Public Good; and who having the Honour to approach the Prince, are incapable of a wretched abject Fawning which makes them truckle to his Paſſions; who being cloathed with a Poſt, whoſe very Badges have ſomewhat formidable in them, inſtead of making a vain ſtrong Parade, acquit themſelves in ſuch a Manner, that a reſpectful Dread reſtrains within the Bounds of their Duty, all their Inferiors; while at the ſame time, the Prince, Sovereign and Maſter as he is, perceives that he can't do every thing.

Thus behaves a Man, whom I call a Man in Authority; as his Conduct is plainly different from that of an ambitious Favorite, ſo are his Views. The one ſeeks to raiſe and to enrich himſelf: The other to advance the Good of the State and the Honour of the Prince. All the Empire ſurely cannot be miſtaken in this. I then ſay, that as an ambitious Favorite is a Peſt, ſo it greatly concerns a State, that it never ſhould be without Men of Credit and Authority. We ſhall ſuppoſe, that there are in it no ſuch Men: Behold, then the Prince abandoned to himſelf in his moſt violent Tranſports, and the moſt tickliſh Juncture. How then can the State fail to ſuffer?

We ſhall ſuppoſe a Prince eaſy enough in hearing Remonſtrances? What ſhall become of him, if he has not about him a Man of Weight, Credit and Authority, who will dare to expoſe himſelf to ruin, by oppoſing his Prince, or by making himſelf anſwerable for the Event of an important Affair? He will always find People, who, in order to give themſelves Airs of Importance, will preſent to him frequent Remonſtrances upon mere Trifles, the good or bad Succeſs of which is of no Conſequence. Does an Affair happen that concerns the Welfare, and even the very Being of a State. All theſe Gentlemen are dumb: Every one of them fearing, leaſt he ſhould ruin himſelf. How diſaſterous is this for a State, and for a Prince who is at once its Maſter and Father.

Formerly, the Hereditary Prince of Wey aſſembled Soldiers, that he might take and diſpatch out of the Way certain Kyang chong. King Vû ti in great Wrath, brought Troops into the Field againſt his Son. The two Armies met and fought, but very coldly; and the Hereditary Prince retir'd to a neighbouring Country. The King being ſtill enraged, encreaſed his Armies, and endeavoured to deſtroy the States that had ſheltered the Prince. Had there been then at Court a Man of Credit and Authority, ſuch as I have deſcribed; and had this Man boldly raiſed himſelf, oppoſed the King's Fury, had made the Son ſenſible of the Fault he had committed, and at the ſame time ſhewed the Father how much he had been to blame, the King would have found time to cool, and the Prince to have appeaſed his Anger, and then Matters would have been ſoon made up. But alas! Tho' every one ſees what ought to be ſpoken and acted, no body dares to ſpeak and act; then it is, that there is not a Man of Authority in the Kingdom.

From all this in my humble Opinion, I think, that we may conclude, that whoever has the Intereſt of the State really at Heart, ought to look upon it as a real Good, that there is in it ſome Man of ſuch a Character, who by his great Authority and uncommon Credit, ſhould keep all the Officers of the State in their Duty, and who in perilous Times, may for the Good of the State and the Prince, zealouſly undertake a bold Stroke, and ſupport it, without ruining himſelf. I own, that in ſuch Times as the preſent, in which all the Empire enjoys a profound Peace, ſuch a Perſon may be (*) diſpenſed with without any Inconveniency. But, beſides that it is prudent to guard at a Diſtance againſt all unforſeen Misfortunes, ſuch Perſons are always uſeful in a State.

(*) This Diſcourſe is an Apology for ſome Perſon againſt whoſe Credit and Authority Murmurs had ariſen.

Tyen

Tyen nan fong, after having made a very long Diſcourſe to the Emperor Shin tſong, in which he gave him ſeveral Advices concerning Government, concludes in theſe Terms.

THO' the Chew Family, after it came to the Poſſeſſion of the Empire, was always diſtinguiſhed by Virtue: Tho' Ven vang and Vû vang, by the ſame Method, laid the glorious Foundation of the Dynaſty of that Name; yet it was under their Succeſſor Ching vang, that theſe fine Odes are made, which are called (§) Ya and Song. It was under the happy and flouriſhing Reign of this Prince, that amongſt other Things theſe Odes declared. "Whang tyen, as a good "Father, loves whatever is ſolidly virtuous: Wiſdom and Virtue are his moſt acceptable Sacri- "fice:" The Deſign of the Poet is to inculcate upon Ching vang, by theſe emphatical Expreſſions, all neceſſary Care that he might not degenerate. In effect, nothing is more eſſential than this is for a Prince; the more flouriſhing his Reign is, the more ought he to be afraid of himſelf: And his Subjects cannot give him a ſtronger Teſtimony of their Zeal, than to inſpire him with this wiſe Dread. This was not practiſed under the Chew Dynaſty only; for during the famous Reigns of the great Yau and Shun, the Prince and his great Officers were always mutually ſaying to one another; 'Let us watch, apply ourſelves, and be attentive, a Day or two well or ill ſpent, may have great Conſequences.' Permit me, Great Sir, that forgetting my own Inſignificancy, ſpeaking with the ſame View that the ancient Book of Verſes did, and congratulating you upon a Reign more glorious than any that was ſeen under the Song Dynaſty, I may congratulate you yet more upon having underſtood this Truth: "That Whang tyen, like a good Father, loves what- "ever is ſolidly virtuous, and that Wiſdom and Virtue are to him the moſt acceptable Sacrifices." What Matter of Joy is it for us to ſee, that this Perſuaſion renders you careſull reſpectfully to follow the Views of Whang tyen, that it inſpires you with a ſecret Dread leaſt you ſhould deviate from them, that it makes you ſeek your own Perfection and your Peoples Happineſs in every Object, and every Day to labour with new Ardour therein, and to diſregard every thing that might put a Stop to it! It remains, that you ſhould never be inconſiſtent with yourſelf: My Zeal makes me wiſh for this, and with this View it inſpires me to call to your Remembrance this Paſſage in the Book of Verſes.

In the firſt of the Years named Ywen yew, the extraordinary Inundations occaſioned a great Barrenneſs over the Province of Che kyang and Kyang nan. Upon the Information given in by the Officers of theſe Provinces, the Emperor ordered a hundred (*) Wan of Rice to be furniſhed out of the Granaries, and twenty Wan of Derniers out of his Treaſury, for the Relief of the Poor. The Diſtribution and Management of this Bounty was, according to Cuſtom, entruſted with certain Officers. Theſe Orders were ſcarce iſſued out, when it was told to the Emperor, that the Officers of the Province had perhaps impoſed upon him, by repreſenting the Evil to be greater than it really was; beſides, that there was Reaſon to fear, that the Charity would be miſapplied; that it would be proper to depute ſome Commiſſaries from the Court, who might give Evidence how far the Calamities, occaſioned by the Inundations, reach'd, and proportion the Quotas of the Charity according to the different Exigencies of the Sufferers. In conſequence of this Advice, a Scheme was preſented to his Majeſty for that Effect. The Emperor remarking, that Fan tſû yu was not of the Number of thoſe who had made theſe Remonſtrances, tho' by his Employment he naturally ought to have been, put the Scheme into his Hands, and ordered him to give him his Advice thereupon. Fan tſû yu, having read it, ſealed it up, and ſent it back to the Emperor, with the following Diſcourſe.

GREAT Sir, I find, that under the Tang Dynaſty, in one of the Years named Ta li, the Inundations were ſo great in a certain Quarter, that all the Magiſtrates gave Accounts of them at the Court, except the Magiſtrate of Wey mû, who ſaid, that his Diſtrict had ſcarce ſuffered any thing. However it appeared from the Information of a (†) Yu tſë, who was deputed for that purpoſe, that in the Territory of Wey mû, the Waters had overflowed upwards of 3000 (‡) King of Arable Ground. Upon this, the then Emperor venting many heavy Sighs; ſaid, This is ſtrange: it is natural that a Magiſtrate, who is the Father of the People immediately committed to his Care, ſhould exagerate their Wants, that he may procure them Relief; but here is one who diſſembles them, ſurely he is void of all Compaſſion. He then immediately degraded him from the Poſt he then held, and gave him one more inconſiderable.

Under the Reign of Te tſong, the Rivers Kyang and Whay having overflowed, did ſome Damage. Lû ché, who then was Miniſter of State, begged of the Emperor, that he would give ſome ſupply to the Places that had ſuffered. The Emperor having read his Petition, appeared not very inclinable to grant it. If, ſaid he, on theſe Advices, I ſhould, upon every Damage a Country ſuffers, be ſo ſimple, as to order the Inhabitants Largeſſes, there is Reaſon to fear, that I may be impoſed upon, and frequently deceived by falſe Reports. Lû ché, not at all diſcouraged by this Anſwer, ſtill ſolicited the Prince, and amongſt other Things ſaid to him; Sir, Your Majeſty's Fears have very little Foundation, for Flattery is the Vice of the Time. Do the Officers of your Provinces touch in their Memorials on any Points, which they think will be agreeable to you, they exagerate them, and ſeem never to be weary of inſiſting upon them. Are they about to give any Advice that may trouble you? They do it in a very curſory Manner, and inſtead of aggravating the Evil, diminiſh it as much as they can: And it too often happens, that by theſe Advices artfully deli- vered, falſe Meaſures are taken. But what is all this clutter about? a moderate Expence which will win you the Hearts of your Subjects. Is it proper, by an exceſſive Precaution, to hazard the cooling of their Affection to you? Tſong then agreed to the Arguments.

In the ſeventh of the Years named Tſwen ho the Emperor Hyen tſong addreſſing himſelf to his Miniſters ſaid: 'You are always repreſenting to me that laſt Year the Countries of Ché and Whay 'have ſuffered a great deal, firſt, from the Overflowings of the Water, then by a long Drought; 'and yet a Yu tſé, who has come from thence, ſays, that the Damage is but inconſiderable. 'Which ſhall I then believe? and what Side ſhall I take?' Li kyang then taking the Diſcourſe in Hand, anſwered thus in the Name of the reſt.

'Sir, We have all the Informations of the Magiſtrates of theſe two Countries; when they 'are attentively read there is no Man but perceives, that he who gives them trembles for 'himſelf, leſt that the Court ſhould impute to him, the Sufferings of the People. What 'Appearance is there that Men, in theſe Diſpoſitions, would dare to incur your Diſpleaſure by 'falſe Advice? It is more natural to believe that this Yu tſé, whom your Majeſty mentions, has 'talked like a flattering Courtier, whatever he thought would pleaſe you. I want to know who 'this Yu tſé is, that he may be brought to Juſtice, and puniſhed according to our Laws. You 'are in the Right of it, replies the Emperor, Men are the Wealth of a State; and they ought 'to be relieved as ſoon as it is known that they ſuffer. Suſpicions are unſeaſonable on theſe Oc-'caſions. I was not aware of what I objected on this Head.' Orders were then iſſued out for relieving the Countries that had ſuffer'd.'

Yes, Great Sir, that which our ancient and wiſe Kings and Princes dreaded, was, leaſt ſome of their Officers ſhould prevent their being acquainted with the Miſeries of the People: That others, in order to ſave the Finances, ſhould only half relieve them, or for want of Capacity ſhould not do it effectually. This made theſe two excellent Miniſters Lû ché and Li kyang always to ſpeak out. At preſent, when the two great Provinces of your Empire, who furniſh more to the Expences of your Court, and Payment of your Troops than any other, are afflicted with an extream Famine, will you not fly to relieve them? Behold a great Number of your good Subjects, like ſo many Children without a Nurſe, reduced to Extremity, ſending up lamentable Cries, or elſe being too weak to ſend them up, wait with open Mouths for what may a little prolong their miſerable Life. You are their Father and Mother; and can you be inſenſible to their Miſeries? Will you, by a miſtaken Frugality, deny them Relief? My Colleagues ſay, that a hundred Wan of Rice, and twenty Wan of Derniers are a great deal, and that if the Magiſtrates ſhall, according to the Proportions laid out by the Commiſſaries, faithfully employ it in diſtributing (*) Rice Gruel among the Poor, the Famine, tho' it were as great as is repreſented, may be ſupplied by this Relief. For my Share I maintain, that of all the Methods of relieving the Neceſſities of the Poor, that of diſtributing Rice in this Manner, is the leaſt proper and effectual. Beſides other Inconveniences, the Poor muſt be aſſembled. From theſe Aſſemblies ariſe contagious Diſtempers, which increaſe the Calamity. No! when a Prince is really touch'd with the People's Sufferings, this Method is never taken, and he never relieves them by Halves.

My Colleagues ſay further, that it is the Cuſtom of the People to exaggerate their Loſſes and Misfortunes. I own, that in certain Years ſome Irregularities in the Seaſons may have given Riſe to Cheats; and diſingenuous People have taken that Occaſion to aggravate their pretended Loſſes. But this can never be preſumed in the preſent Caſe, which is not that of a Year indifferently good or bad, or a Barrenneſs that is doubtful. It is the greateſt that has ever been ſeen; the People being obliged to quit their Dwellings, wander from one Place to another, reduced to Beggary, and expecting Death alone: in Circumſtances ſuch as theſe, to ſuſpect that the Wretched are counterfeiting, and to doubt of their Miſery, is a Proof of great Hardheartedneſs.

Your Majeſty is petition'd to name Commiſſaries from Court, who ſhould repair to the Spot, and cauſe the Arable Ground to be meaſured: going thorough the Cities and Villages, and counting the dead Perſons, and the ruined Houſes: that from their Report you may judge of the Truth of the Information that has been given you, that the Magiſtrates who have impoſed upon you may be puniſhed, and that the Relief may be proportioned more juſtly, according to the Wants of every Country.

I can ſay from my own Knowledge, that it is a publick and a notorious Fact, that from the firſt Moon to the ſixth, there has been conſtant Rains in theſe Places; theſe exceſſive Rains have made the Lake Tay to overflow; the Overflowing of this Lake have laid San Yew and other Cities under Water; the Fields have in ſuch a Manner, and for ſo a long a Time been covered with the Water, that they have not been able for to ſow their Rice; the Houſes in the Villages have been ſeen either ſunk under, or floating above, the Water; the Huſbandmen have ſold their Cattle, and are diſperſed abroad a begging. I ſay, that theſe Calamities are notorious.

I muſt add that your Majeſty being informed of this ought, in order to alleviate it, to ſhew the ſame Zeal as you would do in extinguiſhing a burning, or in aſſiſting Perſons who are drowning. Judge if the Suggeſtions of my Colleagues agree to theſe Circumſtances. Their Methods are very difficult in the Practice, ſubject to many Inconveniencies, and at the Bottom proper to deſtroy innocent People. Beſides, as the Deſign of theſe Enquiries muſt be known, and that there are Commiſſaries appointed for that Effect, the Officers of the Provinces will take the Alarm; and every one of them fearing ſome troubleſome Accident to himſelf, will provide for his own Safety, take as ſmall Concern as he can in the publick Calamities, and leave the People to periſh.

After ſome Examples drawn from Hiſtory, Fan tſiu yu continues in theſe Terms:

SIR, Your Liberalities are divided; three Sorts of Officers being entruſted with them. It is going too far if your Majeſty, according to the Project laid before you, ſhould multiply your Precautions, and thereby ſeem to regret the Bounty you have ordered: This would look as if you undervalued the Lives of Men; and your Subjects will never again dare to have Recourſe to you. All that your Anceſtors feared on ſuch Occaſions was, leaſt the People ſhould not be relieved with ſufficient Speed and Liberality. And when they ſent Commiſſaries and Inſpectors, it was not to check and intimidate the ordinary Officers, but to embolden them. In effect, theſe Officers ſhew a good deal of Difficulty to part with the Corns and the Money for which they are accountable. For this, and for many other Reaſons they commonly, by their Repreſentations, rather diminiſh than encreaſe the common Calamities. But granting there had been ſome Miſrepreſentations, they muſt have been very few, and muſt have been ſome time or other diſcover'd. The People blab, the Officers are Spies upon one another, the Cenſors muſt be acquainted with it, and the Court will have its Information from the Cenſors. Thus your Majeſty will have Time enough to puniſh the Guilty. In the preſent Situation my Advice is, that without being very anxious about the little Faults that your Officers have committed, you ſhould apply your whole Care to the Relief of your ſuffering People. From theſe Conſiderations it is, that having examined the Project that has been ſuggeſted to you, I have ſent it back ſealed, begging that your Majeſty would ſuppreſs it.

Diſcourſe of Wan ling againſt the bad Senſe in which the Sectaries interpret the Expreſſion Ming.

IT is ſaid in the (†) Lun yu that Confuçius ſeldom made Uſe of the Expreſſion Ming. This is a judicious and true Remark: On the contrary, when the Weſtern Barbarians introduced the Sect of Fo into our China, the Expreſſions Sing and Ming were frequently and improperly uſed. It is true, that before the Entrance of that Sect, they had begun to reaſon upon what is called (‖) Sing, or the Nature of Man. Mong tſe having ſaid that it was good, Syan tſe affirmed the contrary: And this Oppoſition ſerved to clear up the Opinion of Mong tſe, which was agreed to. In latter Times, the Diſpute about what is called Tſing, or Nature, was revived. It continued long, and ſome deſigning Men, that they might amuſe themſelves, have embroil'd the Argument by ſubtlely introducing into their Diſcouſes, the Principles of the Sect of Fo. Whatever is ſolid in theſe Diſquiſitions comes to much the ſame Thing that was the Opinion of Mong tſe, which they embraced, and which is yet their Rule.

As for what regards the Expreſſion (*) Ming, the more tender our Philoſophers are in uſing it, the more bold the Sectaries have been in adapting and corrupting it. The Sect of Fo, whoſe Aim was to impoſe upon the World, hath made Life and Death to depend upon what they call Ming, without explaining the Word. The Sect of Aſtrologers improving upon the Sect of Fo, makes long or ſhort Life, Riches or Poverty, Honour or Diſgrace to depend on certain Combinations of five Elements, on certain Motions and certain Situations of the Stars, and out of theſe, they make what they call Ming or Deſtiny. The ignorant Vulgar have not Knowledge enough to confute them. Being paſſionately fond of the Riches and Honours of this World, they ſee that they do not always follow Merit and Virtue. In Hopes of attaining to them by another Way, they ſtupidly give into theſe Errors, which doubtleſs they would not do, if they knew how to confute the falſe Senſe that is given to the Expreſſion Ming.

Shun from a private Man became Emperor. Thus he roſe from the loweſt to the higheſt Degree of Honour. It ſeemed as if he had been tranſported thither all of a ſudden, and without making one Step towards it. Yet the Truth is, that he was raiſed to it by his Virtue. Let us go back to the Times of Yau. Let us ſuppoſe that Shun was without Wiſdom and without Virtue. Would this Ming, of which our Sectaries ſpeak, have been equally effectual in raiſing Shun to the Throne? Yau by naming Shun to ſucceed him, excluded his own Son Tan-chu. Why was Tan-chu excluded? Was it becauſe he wanted Virtue, or merely for want of what they call Ming? Shun was already known, valued, and half placed on the Throne, yet he ſought to retire. Will our Sectaries dare to ſay that he was leſs underſtanding than them in what they call Ming or Deſtiny? Sure they will not: On the other hand, if it is allowed that Shun, according to their Principles, foreſaw that his Deſtiny was to reign, it muſt thence follow that his ſeeking to retire was all a Sham and Hypocriſy. Who dare either think or ſay this? To calculate the Revolutions of the Stars is an Art which begun with our (§) I King, of which we own Fo hi to have been the Author. It is undeniable that amongſt all our ancient Princes Ven vang underſtood this Book beſt. I muſt aſk ck of our Aſtrologers whether or not Ven vang knew that which they pretend to find out in their Art, or if ever he was acquainted with what they call Deſtiny (Ming)? If they deny that he was; what an Inſolence is it in them to preſer themſelves to that wiſe Prince! If they ſay he was; why did Ven vang bewail his Fate and mourn in the Priſon in which the Tyrant Chew confined him? (‡) Since the times of Ven vang, who has dived farther into the I King than Confuçius? Will they pretend to underſtand it better than he did? And yet if Confuçius underſtood what they pretend to underſtand, why did he to an extreme old Age travel over the (*) Seventy-two Kingdoms? We therefore either muſt abſolutely neglect that which the Sectaries contend for, and their Abuſe of the Word Ming, or we muſt acknowledge Ven vang and Confuçius to be far inferior to them; and this would be a great (†) Abſurdity.

A ſecond Error in their Syſtem is; If a Man dies, it is his Ming or Deſtiny. His Death is therefore to be attributed to his Ming, and to no other Cauſe: By this way of Reaſoning we muſt conclude that it was not Kyé and Chew who put Long pong and Pi kau to a cruel and unjuſt Death. It was the Deſtiny of theſe two great Men. We may likewiſe conclude, that tho' the miſerable Tyrants Kyé and Chew had practiſed all the Virtues, yet they could not have fail'd to have periſh'd miſerably, and conſequently it would have been wrong to have exhorted them to Virtue in order to have preſerv'd their Crown and Life. It is lucky that all the World is not wedded to our Sectaries, even they who conſult or hear them have not much Truſt to repoſe in what they ſay. But if this Error ſhould unhappily prevail, and conſtantly paſs for Truth, behold what muſt be the abſurd Conſequences of it.

Has a Judge wittingly either acquitted a guilty, or condemn'd an innocent Perſon: If this Judge is proſecuted that he may be puniſhed according to Law, he has no more to do but to oppoſe to the Laws this Ming or Deſtiny theſe Sectaries talk of. Oppreſſion is to be no more deteſted in the Great: Merit, no more to be praiſed in Yau and Shun, and Tyranny no more to be blam'd in Kyé and Chew. Each has his reſpective Ming which directs him; alas, what can be more abſurd! I ask of our Aſtrologers, if Yau and Shun had been born at the time in which Kyé and Chew were born, would the two firſt have reſembled the two laſt in Wickedneſs and Cruelty? On the contrary, if Kyé and Chew had been born when Yau and Shun were born, would that have render'd them good and virtuous? Will they dare to advance ſuch an Abſurdity? And if they dare not, in what will they make this pretended Ming or Deſtiny, upon which depends the Life and Death of Men, the Proſperity and Ruin of States, to conſiſt?

Let us again ſuppoſe that all the World ſhould give full and entire Credit to the Diſcourſe of theſe Quacks, a Son without once moving, ſees his Father in the Hands of a Rebel who is ready to cut his Throat: 'The Ming or Deſtiny of my Father, ſays he, is either to die this Death, or not.' The Man who ſees his Prince ready to be ſlain may ſay the ſame thing. And if they act otherwiſe, it may be ſaid upon our Suppoſition that their conduct oppoſes a ſelf-evident Truth univerſally received, and conſequently they are to blame. What a deteſtable Conſequence is this?

As for me I diſtinguiſh two ſorts of Ming: that of the Sectaries, to which they are pleaſed to annex our Fate independently of ourſelves: This is neither a true one, nor is it poſſible to be known. The other Ming, which depends upon ourſelves, is that in which we ought to be inſtructed, and is uſeful and even neceſſary. For Inſtance, in a quiet well-governed Empire, I ſupport and advance myſelf by my good Conduct and my Virtue. My Ming then is to be in Honour and in Plenty, but this Ming is not quite independent of me. The State on the contrary is diſturbed and ill governed. I bravely ſupport oppreſs'd Virtue and Wiſdom. It coſt me my Fortune. I obſtinately live, and die in Poverty; then it is that my Ming depends upon me. Every Man who is born muſt die; Death comes ſooner or later: To live in Affluence or Honour, or to live in Poverty and Oblivion, is always Ming: Be it ſo; but Life or Death may be happy or unhappy. I wiſh neither to live nor to die unhappily: This is what I am chiefly careful of: It is my Duty, and it is the only Ming, about which I ought to be in Pain.

It is the ſame with regard to Riches, Honours, Poverty, and Obſcurity. Theſe may happen either by good or bad Means. To what are all my Cares directed? that theſe may never be the Fruits of a Crime, or of an abject Complaiſance. This is my Duty, and is the only Ming, on which I ſhall value myſelf on being acquainted with. A good Son preſerves his Life, that he may ſerve his Father; and this is both his Duty and his Ming. A loyal zealous Subject hazards his Life for his Prince: This is always his Ming and his Duty. If we extend this to different Accidents and Circumſtances, there is no Man alive but may know the Ming he ought to follow. This, according to our Sages, is rightly to underſtand the Ming: and it is in this Senſe, that Confuçius ſpeaks when he uſes this Expreſſion. Mi tſé twan one Day addreſſing himſelf to (‡) Tſe lû. If your Maſter, ſaid he to him, will be my Patron, the King of Wey will chuſe me for one of his Prime Miniſters. Tſe lû laying this Propoſition before Confuçius, all his Anſwer was I have a Ming, (meaning his Duty) and my Ming never will ſuffer me to be inſtrumental in promoting a Sycophant, who is without Merit or Virtue. It was almoſt in the ſame Senſe that Confuçius uſed the Expreſſion Ming at the Death of (||) Yen tſe and Pen yew. He bewail'd that by their being ſnatched away ſo young, they had no Opportunity of practiſing all the Virtues of which he knew they were capable. As for Mong tſe, he expreſſes his Opinion very diſtinctly as follows: 'A Man underſtands the Ming, ſays he, 'very ' very ill, if he deſignedly ſhall expoſe himſelf under a Wall that is ready to tumble; a Man ' who thoroughly knows this Matter, is never guilty of ſuch Imprudence. A Villain, ſays he, in ' another Paſſage, has deſerved by his Crimes to die in Irons, or under the Hands of the Exe- ' cutioner: Accordingly he does die: Was this his true Ming? By no Means". The Opinion of theſe great Men very rightly defines what is Ming.

The Empror Kang hi's Remark.] The Beauty of this Diſcourſe conſiſts in its being clear, eaſily underſtod, and proper both to inſtruct and reclaim ſuch Sectaries as had been ſeduced.

Your Majeſty, in Imitation of theſe Princes, has publiſhed an Ordinance full of Wiſdom and Goodneſs, which proves the Extent of your Vigilance and Care in fulfilling your Duties. You cannot act more conformably to the Deſigns of Tyen.

Li kang, in a Diſcourſe preſented to the Emperor, after ſome particular Advices, gives him two general Ones, in theſe Terms: ' Do every thing, ſays he, that Man can do, and inwardly preſerve a reſpectful Dread towards Tyen: When Man, on his Side, does all that he can, it is natural for (‡) Tyen li to anſwer his Cares.' Thus, the greateſt Princes, ſuch as thoſe who were either the Reſtorer or Founder of Dynaſties, have done all that was in their Power; and when they have ſucceeded, have attributed the Succeſs to Tyen. At preſent, the (||) Enemy ſcarce appears, when we ſhamefully leave them Maſters of the Field of Battle. To neglect thus all that depends on us, and to rely upon Tyen for our Succeſs, as if Tyen were obliged to favour us, is unreaſonable. I therefore beg that you would inſtantly give the proper Orders to your Miniſters and great Officers. Encourage them by your Words and Actions; act in Concert with them as far as you can. After which, you may humbly but bameleſly wait for the Determination of Tyen: and there is Room to hope that we can both repair the Affronts we have received, and the Damage we have ſuſtained.

But, as I ſaid before, we ought always to reſerve a reſpectful Dread towards Tyen. In Effect, Tyen is to Kings, as a Father equally tender and ſevere. His Affection for them is very great, but at the ſame time not greater than his Care in watching over their Conduct. Therefore every wiſe Prince is attentive to the Prohibitions of Tyen; at the leaſt Hint of an Advice that comes from him, he recollects, examines, and labours to correct himſelf, to become more perfect, and to cheriſh in his Heart that reſpectful filial Dread. For ſeveral Years, the Irregularity of the Seaſons has been great, and Earthquakes with other frightful Phænomena have been frequent. The Intention of Tyen in this, has been to rouſe you: Theſe are ſo many Marks of his loving you, and of his deſigning to aſſiſt you. It lies in your Majeſty's Power to anſwer him by pure and upright Intentions, and by a wiſe and reſolute Conduct. Then theſe diſmal Calamities, and theſe frightful Preſages will be changed unto you for Good.

A Diſcourſe of Fan ſun upon Repentance.

AN ancient Tradition ſays; To day repent of the Faults of Yeſterday, and towards the end of every Moon of thoſe committed ſince its Beginning. Oh! what a wiſe Saying was that, and what right Meaſures did our Ancients take to become wiſe and perfect? at leaſt in being a (‡)Yau or a Shun who could do every thing ſo perfectly, that they never committed any Fault, But if any one commits a Fault, if he effectually and ſincerely repents of it, that Fault is done away. Therefore among our ancient Sages, even thoſe of the firſt Order, there never was one but trod in theſe Paths.

Fan ſun proves this by Examples drawn from Antiquity, to which, as corroborative Proofs, he adds ſome Texts of the antient (†) King, and then concludes his Diſcourſe thus:

Repentance, ſays he, implies Tranſgreſſions; but by means of that Repentance thoſe Tranſgreſſions are every Day diminiſhed, and if there is a Method of arriving at an unerring State, it is this. Ought then this Exerciſe to be either neglected by, or to grow irkſome, to us? But I do not confine the Repentance I recommend to our retracting or correcting what we have ſaid or done amiſs. It ſhould extend to our moſt retired Thoughts and Affections, let an Affection, be it ever ſo little amiſs, ariſe. Repentance ought immediately to follow it, and this Repentance will prevent its ever proceeding to Words or Actions. To commit Faults, and not to acknowledge them is Blindneſs; to acknowledge them without correcting them is Folly; to deſign to correct them, and yet to have but half the Will to do it, that you may ſpare, or in a manner ſooth yourſelf, is Cowardice. Nothing is more contrary to true Repentance than theſe Vices.

(‡) Li ſignifies Reaſon.

(||) This is ſpoken of the Tartars, who at laſt extinguiſh'd the Song Dynaſty.

(*) In the Original this is expreſſed in ſix Letters.

(†) He ſeems to have excepted Yau and Shun; but the Application here is general; which proves, that inſtead of the Words, at leaſt in being a Yau and a Shun, we ought, if we would make juſt and conſiſtent Senſe of it, to read, Even tho' he were a Yau or a Shun, but I have put it as it is in the Text.

When

When the Sun or Moon is eclipſed, the Eclipſe, whether total or partial, is never of long Continuance, and the Moment it ends, theſe Stars immediately appear in their genuine Luſtre. Sins are the Eclipſes of Mans Life: And the Eclipſe is over the preciſe Moment in which he repents as he ought. He then recovers his Luſtre in the ſame Manner as theſe two Luminaries recover theirs. But there happens in Man the very Reverſe of what happens in the Heavens. His Eclipſe continues as long, as, by his Attachment to his Paſſions, he is deſtitute of effectual true Repentance. What then is more important than a right Repentance? And what ought to diſguſt or diſcourage us in ſo uſeful an Exerciſe?

In the 32 of the Years named Shau ſhing, (A) Hyau tſong mounting the Throne, ordered a Declaration to be publiſhed, recommending, that Advices and Memorials might be freely and inſtantly preſented to him. Chu hi, who then held a Poſt in the Provinces, addreſt a long Diſcourſe to the Emperor, and amongſt other Things told him as follows.

The Order of Tyen who loves and protects you, is juſt publiſh'd and put in Force (*); nothing yet can cool the Zeal and Attachment of your Subjects. To judge by the Encomiums beſtow'd on you, with which the High-ways reſound, ſomething extraordinary is expected from your Majeſty. Your Subjects look upon you not only as a good Maſter, but as a Prince, who will do Honour to your Dynaſty, recover the Lands uſurped by the Barbarians, cure the Miſeries of your Suffering People, and revenge the Inſults which your Anceſtors have received. In what a Manner ought not you to behave, ſucceſsfully to anſwer ſo high Expectations,? Upon this depends not only the Glory of your Reign, but the Peace of your State, the Honour of your Dynaſty, and the Safety of your Family.

As yet, we have not perceived in your Perſon and Government, the Faults and Defects of which thro' Modeſty, you accuſe yourſelf. But I dare to aſſure you, that in vain you hope to meet with Succeſs, without two eſſential Points, which I take the Liberty immediately to recommend to your Conſideration. The Firſt is, conſtantly to ſtudy, and to make the Maxims of our ancient Kings familiar to you. The Second is, inſtantly to renounce, in the moſt reſolute Manner, all Treaties with the Barbarians. Theſe two are important Points, and worthy of your Attention. Without the Firſt, a good many Faults will inſenſibly eſcape you. Without the Second, the Government, in the preſent Situation of Things, muſt be very defective; and neither of theſe Maxims can be neglected, without very dangerous Conſequences.

That I may more diſtinctly explain my Thoughts upon this Point, allow me to recall to your Mind, the Times of Yau, Shun and Yu. You well know, that theſe Emperors tranſmitted down to one another, both their Maxims and their Crown. The Maxim they moſt frequently repeated, was, 'Nothing is more dangerous than the (†) Heart of Man and its Paſſions;' Nothing is more delicate, (‡) than ſimple upright Reaſon. The conſtant Refinement of it, and giving it an abſolute Sway is, the only way to perſevere unvariably in the Juſt Mean. Theſe great Princes were naturally wiſe, and conſequently had leſs Occaſion for Study and Application. Yet the whole Topicks of their Diſcourſe, were the Refinement of their Reaſon, the giving it an abſolute Sway, and carefully treading in the Juſt Mean. So true it is, that even they who are undoubtedly born wiſe, have yet need of Study and Application.

Tho' the great Diſtance betwixt your Majeſty and me, deprives me of the Happineſs of ſeeing how nearly you reſemble theſe great Princes in the amiable great Qualifications which you poſſeſs, yet I have heard them very advantagiouſly ſpoken of. But the Voice of the Public likewiſe informs me, that in the firſt Years of your Reign, inſtead of applying yourſelf to Buſineſs, your whole Time was employed in hearing or repeating certain Verſes, and ſome ſmooth flowing Pieces of Flattery. 'Tis true, that for ſome Years paſt, you have given up theſe frivolous Amuſements, you have appeared to be in ſearch of ſomething more ſolid, and have expreſſed a Deſire of acquiring real Wiſdom: But it is ſaid, you have ſought for them in the Books of the Sectaries. This is the common Talk in the Country, tho' I know not what Truth is in it.

But permit me to tell you that, if this is true, you take very wrong Meaſures to anſwer rightly the Meaſures of Tyen, and to imitate Yau and Shun. No! As the Art of governing right is neither to be learned in Sonets and empty Diſcourſes, nor from Diſſertations upon (§) the Vacuum Inanity, Quieſence, and Reſt. Our ancient wiſe Princes who ſucceeded beſt in that noble Art, applied to acquire thorough juſt Notions of Things, to improve their Underſtandings, and to be in a Condition always to purſue the beſt Meaſures. A Prince, who is acquainted with this Method, frequently revolves, and attentively examines, the Scope and the Incidents of our ancient Hiſtory. That he may form a right Judgment of Things, the Principles of Reaſon and Equity are always before his Eyes. He commits no Miſtakes of this Kind. Thereby his Views are dilated, rectified and perfected: His Heart is preſerved in the juſt and upright Mean; and in ſhort, he finds himſelf capable to govern with the (‖) greateſt Eaſe.

On the contrary, if a Prince is without Application, or if, while he applys, he follows any other Method: Tho' otherways he had the moſt excellent Genius, or happy Diſpoſitions to Virtue, yet his Underſtanding will never clearly go to the Bottom of Things; nor will he ever know

(A) In P. Fouquet's Chronological Table theſe Years are called Chau hing (which I take to be the true Reading) and the whole 32 included in Kan tſong's Reign; that of Kyau tſong beginning with the firſt of the Years Long-hing.

(*) That is to ſay, You have juſt mounted the Throne.

(†) The Chineſe literally ſays Jin ſin, that is to ſay, The Heart of Man.

(‡) The Chineſe ſays Tau-ſin, the Heart of Tau. But Tau in this Paſſage and many others, ſignifies, Pure and juſt Reaſon: Jin ſin oppoſed to Ta ſin, denotes the Paſſions natural to the Heart of Man.

(§) He points at the Sects of Tau and Fo.

(‖) Literally it is as eaſily as to count one and two, or to diſtinguiſh White from Black.

how to diſtinguiſh betwixt what is really good, and what is good only in Appearance, or the Subſtance from the Shadow: In ſhort, he will be apt to commit a thouſand Blunders. Tho' perhaps he may not fall into thoſe of the moſt fatal Conſequences, yet he never can become a great Emperor. Is then the giving up of this glorious Character, and being contented with a poor Mediocrity in Reputation, ſo meer a Trifle? Doubtleſs not: And we may here apply that Paſſage of the I king, which ſays; That an Error which is but ſlight in Appearance, is attended with ſtrange Irregularities.

As to the ſecond Point I touched upon, it is certain, that no ſolid Peace is to be hoped for betwixt us and the Kin (B). Reaſon makes this Truth plain, it is ſelf evident, and univerſally known; and if there is any who argue for Peace with them, the Manner in which they reaſon, is doubtleſs this. Our Affairs are not at preſent in ſuch a flouriſhing Situation, as to undertake to recover by Force what the Kin have uſurped from us. We even hazard ſomething in continuing the War, by acting upon the Defenſive. It is therefore better for us to take Advantage of the Step which the Kin have made in coming to offer us Preſents, to encourage them on our Part, to ſend an Embaſſy to them, and civilly to demand a Reſtitution of our Lands according to the ancient Boundaries, for this Demonſtration of Weakneſs on our Part by flattering their Pride, and perhaps inſpiring them with Security, and conſequently with Negligence, they will be leſs eager in attacking us, and leſs vigilant in guarding themſelves. In the mean time, we will be taking Advantage of the Juncture, and will more eaſily diſpoſe ourſelves to puſh ſome great Enterprize.

Beſides, who knows, but that there is a Poſſibility that Tyen, by a happy Event in our Favour, may revive in theſe Barbarians ſome Sentiments of Equity, and induce them to reſtore to us our Lands, without our being at the Expence of one Man's Life; why then don't we try this Way? What Harm will there be in the Experiment? This is the Method in which they who are of Opinion that we ſhould enter into Treaty with the Barbarians, reaſon.

For my Share, I ſee neither Juſtice nor Reaſon in this Way of arguing. I don't perceive one Advantage from it, but many Inconveniencies. Our Affairs, ſay ſome, are not in a good Situation. That is true; but why? Becauſe we are always ſpeaking of Treaties of Peace; and till ſuch Time as we are in earneſt to talk no more, our Affairs will never be better. Succeſs in War depends on a determined Reſolution of conquering or dying. Is any other Expedient propos'd, or is a middle Way betwixt Conqueſt and Defeat diſcovered? It is purſued without any Difficulty. Reaſon may well oppoſe this, but the Attack becomes weaker, and the Defence leſs reſolute, for Nature, on theſe Occaſions, weakens Reaſon and Virtue. Yes! I ſay again, that while theſe wretched Pratlers for Peace continue, your Majeſty muſt be always uncertain and unſteady in your Councils; your Miniſters too being irreſolute, will do their Duty only for Form-ſake; and your Generals, with their Subalterns, will no longer be eager to ſignaliſe themſelves. It will the ſame in Proportion with the Magiſtrates all over the Empire. How then can our Affairs be re-eſtabliſhed, the Empire ſtrengthened, our Lands recovered, and our Frontiers ſecured? We impoſe upon ourſelves in even hoping for this.

We deceive ourſelves as much in pretending to amuſe the Kin by a vain Ceremony. They have neither Charity nor Juſtice with Regard to us: But they ſupply it with Craft and Malice. If they really have a Deſign to attack us, and if they perceive themſelves to be in a State to ſubdue us, they will not ſuffer themſelves to be blinded ſo far by empty Ceremony, as to give up their Project, and far leſs that which they now poſſeſs. But ſhould we make the Step which is propoſed, it would not have the pretended Effect by amuſing them; but it would ſhew our own Weakneſs: It would be to inſtruct them in our Situation; it would be to expoſe ourſelves to them, and to convince them that we have neither Skill nor Courage, and to render them more bold in undertaking any thing againſt us. If, after ſuch a Step, the Kin ſhall for ſome time be quiet, we will applaud ourſelves, and we will hug ourſelves in our Indolence: And as ten Years and more are already paſt, without our doing any thing for retrieving our Affairs, ten Years and more may paſs in the ſame Manner, if the Kin give us Leave. A Conduct like this, in my Opinion, inſtead of deceiving the Enemy, deceives ourſelves. It urges on our own Deſtruction; and I am aſtoniſhed that there ſhould be Perſons about your Court, capable to give you ſuch Advice.

By this Way of proceeding, we leave ourſelves as it were at the Diſcretion of the Kin. When they ſhall perceive themſelves weakened and in danger from us, they will have nothing to do but to talk of Peace: Thus, inſtead of taking Advantage of their Weakneſs to recover our Right, we muſt make the firſt Advances to them: And under the Pretence of Alliance, they will receive from us large Sums every Year. Do they find themſelves ſtrong? No Treaty will then bind them, and they will make Uſe of the firſt Opportunity of invading our Territories. They who give you theſe Advices, have nothing in View, but to ſhun an open Rupture with the Kin. They don't conſider that this damps the Zeal, and quells the Courage of your Subjects; that it encourages your Enemies, and in many Reſpects hurts the State.

For part thirty or forty Years, theſe Barbarians, in order to ruin us, have taken Advantage of the fooliſh Deſire that we always ſhewed to treat of Peace. Is not this plain enough to us? Is it not the greateſt Blindneſs to propoſe Meaſures that have been ſo fatal to our Empire? To deſire the Kin civilly to reſtore what they have taken, is a thing equally ridiculous and needleſs. The Lands which they have invaded, are our Right, why ſhould we refer it to the Diſcretion of the Barbarians to reſtore them or not? Let us meaſure our Forces, and try to retake them. In Caſe we ſhould ſucceed, they will no longer be our Maſters. But if we think that we are not yet able to to recover them, why ſhould we demand them of the Enemy without any Appearance of obtaining them, and thereby make an Acknowledgment of our own Weakneſs and their Superiority?

Let us in the mean time ſuppoſe, that the Kin ſhall be induced by the Propoſal we make them, to reſtore our Lands; but we muſt ſurely pay dear for the Terms on which we purchaſe ſuch a Favour. We may therefore judge by what (*) is paſt, that ſo far as depends upon them, the Peace will be of no long Duration. But when it ſhall abſolutely happen, that without exacting too much of us, the Kin ſhall determine to grant us the Favour abſolutely, and without repenting of it; or if we ſhall be in a Condition to render their Repentance uſeleſs, the Advantage that will then accrue, will not prevent the Shame that muſt be reflected upon the illuſtrious Dynaſty of the Song, in not being able, by themſelves, to recover the Dominion of their ancient Princes, in partly holding it from the Hands of its moſt inveterate Enemies, and in going, in a Manner, a begging from the Barbarians. For my Share, when Things turn out in that Shape, I can't hinder myſelf from bluſhing for your Majeſty.

Chu hi having been propoſed to fill a conſiderable Poſt in the Province Chê kyang, he was nominated to it by the Emperor, who called him to Court, and invited him to leave him ſome good Advices, before he departed; Whereupon Chu hi made ſeveral Diſcourſes, one of which is as follows.

SIR; the Government of States depends chiefly upon the Hearts of their Princes. But the Hearts of Princes may of themſelves be ſwayed, either by Reaſon or by Paſſion; and the Difference betwixt theſe two Rulers, forms the Difference betwixt Intereſt and Equity, betwixt Cunning and Honeſty, and betwixt Vice and Virtue. The Reaſon which a Man receives from Tyen, is the ſame with Regard to his Heart, as what Health is with Regard to his Body. Does Reaſon ſway the Heart? All is regular, all is Honeſty, Equity and Virtue. On the contrary, Paſſions are the Diſeaſes of the Heart; Do they predominate? All is Confuſion, all is Intereſt, Cunning and Vice. Where Virtue prevails, at the ſame time a Joy prevails equally gentle and pure, which renders the Poſſeſſor every Day more happy. Vice, on the contrary, is attended with remorſeleſs Pangs, which daily loads the wretched Sinner with freſh Miſery. The Regularity and Safety of Empires, their Decay and their Ruin, are all different Effects of theſe different Cauſes. But however different theſe Effects appear, they have one thing in common, which is; That a good or a bad Way of thinking, is the Principle of both. This is implied by Yau, Shun and Yu, in theſe Words, Nothing is more dangerous than the Paſſions, and nothing more delicate than Reaſon. It is, by preſerving this Reaſon, untainted; and by giving it an abſolute Sway, that the Juſt Mean is preſerved..... Chu hi then proceeds to ſay, that he is ſurprized to ſee the Reign of a Prince, who at the Age of Maturity mounted the Throne, and graced it with the moſt amiable Qualifications, ſo unſucceſsful; he ſays, that he has ſearched for the Cauſe of this, and that he believes he has found it. It is, ſays he roundly to his Prince, becauſe in the Choice of your Officers, you don't follow Reaſon and Equity. You are even afraid to put in Poſts Men of Honeſty and Reſolution. But why? Becauſe Men of that Character would vigorouſly oppoſe theſe domeſtic Favorites who embroil every thing, and to whom in your Youth, you were too much expoſed by your good Nature. Chu hi having through all his Diſcourſe, which is very long, ſpoken pretty much in the ſame Strain, ends it, by begging Pardon and apologizing for his Liberty in a few Words. Proteſting that his ſole Motive was his Zeal for the State, and for the Glory of his Prince.

A Gloſs ſays, that the Emperor received this Diſcourſe very well; but it does not informs us if he amended by it.

In the fifth of the Years named Chau hing, Chu hi was called to Court, where he had the honourable Employment of reading and explaining to the Emperor, the Books called King. He made his Compliments of Thanks in writing as uſual, wherein, after praiſing the Prince's Thirſt for Knowledge, and modeſtly owning his own Inſufficiency, he proceeds in the following Terms.

I THEREFORE was ſeized with Dread, when your Orders were ſignified to me, nor durſt I accept of the Honour you did me. I afterwards reflected on theſe well known Truths, that Man receives from Tyen, a Nature capable of all the Virtues: That he can, not only know and diſttinguiſh the different Duties of Prince and Subject, of Father and Son, &c. but he can even judge and determine, of what is proper or improper in different Affairs, and the different Situations of Life. But tho' he is capable of ſo many things, that he is at the ſame time ſubjected to be altered by the Impreſſions of Matter, and to be touched with the Objects of Senſe: That it is naturally to be feared, leaſt his Reaſon being neglected, it ſhould by degrees become ſo far dimmed, that he may fall into a fatal Blindneſs with Regard to his Duties, and continue therein all his Life: That conſequently, Study and Application are as neceſſary to the Great as to the Small: That in order to aſſiſt you in this Exerciſe, a great deal of Eloquence and Politeneſs is not neceſſary.

After having made theſe Reflections, it appear'd to me, that as I have beſtowed a great deal of Time in the Study of our King, I may be uſeful to you, were it only by putting you upon the Method which I have followed. It is in a few Words as follows. The main Point in this Affair, is, to penetrate into the Bottom and Reaſon of every thing. In this our Books are a great Aſſiſtance to us, and it is with this View that we ought to read them. But there is a Method of doing it with Advantage. When a Man underſtands a Paſſage he ought, before he proceed farther, thoroughly to comprehend and to diſcover, what is moſt pure and perfect therein, and to let nothing eſcape him that that he can extract from it. But we never can ſucceed in this, without preſerving ourſelves in a conſtant and a reſpectful Attention, which is not eaſy to do, and muſt be the Fruit of a determined Reſolution, &c.

(*) In the 9*th* of the Years named Chau hing, the Kin reſtored to the Chineſe three Provinces which they had ſubdued but a Year after they retook them. [It is Chau hing in the Original, where it ought to have been Tchao hing.]

Chu hi returns then to his firſt Propoſition, and extends it: But he lays the principal Streſs upon the Importance, and the Neceſſity of that reſpectful Attention which he expreſſes by the ſingle Word (*) King.

As for what I have already ſaid, namely, that upon the reading of each Paſſage, we ought to endeavour to attain to that which is moſt perfect; it is plain this depends upon (†) Sin. But what is this Sin of Man? It is a Being which is moſt (‡) Hin, moſt (§) Ling and moſt Shin; of an Excellence which we cannot intirely comprehend; which ought to predominate in each of us, as well in our perſonal Motions as in our civil Actions; and conſequently its Preſence with us, and our Attention to it, is every Moment neceſſary. In effect, if the Sin of a Man ſhall eſcape, and as it were, rove after the ſenſible Objects with which the Body is ſurrounded; his Perſon and Conduct is immediately ſenſible of the Abſence of that Maſter. In vain then will a Man have his Body bent, and his Eyes fixed upon a Book. As he is heedleſs of himſelf, how can he be in a Condition to meditate upon the Words of our ancient Sages, to examine the different Circumſtances in every Action and in every Affair, to draw from this, Directions for his Duties, and practical Concluſions for his Conduct? The wiſe Man, ſays Confuçius, will not be long wiſe, if he has not Attention and Application. The Study and Application which I recommend, ſays Mong tſe in what do they principally conſiſt? In a Man's rightly retaining and fixing his Sin. Does a Man in this Manner preſerve his Sin, without ſuffering himſelf to be diſtracted by ſenſible Objects, or troubled by the Paſſions which they excite? Then, whether he reads or meditates upon what he has read, few Things will eſcape him. And if he arrives ſo far as to preſerve this Diſpoſition in the Commerce of the World, it will be inviolated amidſt the Hurry of Buſineſs, and the Diverſity of Objects. He will know on all Occaſions how to purſue right Meaſures, and never to deviate from his Duty. This is my Meaning, when I ſay, that in order to read our King with all poſſible Advantage, a Man muſt poſſeſs a reſpectful Attention, and a moſt determined Reſolution.

Lyang ke kya having become Miniſter of State under the Emperor Hyau tſong, did all he could to engage Chu hi in the Miniſtry; Chu hi always excuſed himſelf. One Day as Lyang ke kya, by a Letter, preſt him more than ever, Chu hi returned the following Anſwer.

I HAVE reſpectfully read the Letter which (||) you have done me the Honour to write to me. A Virtue midling and weak like mine, ſeeks Protection in Retirement. It is a great Honour for me, that a Man of your Quality, eſpecially one whoſe Underſtanding and Honeſty are ſo eminent, ſhould deign to expreſs ſo much Concern in my Favours. Tho' you are always incapable to act from any other Principles but thoſe of the Public Good, yet there is not a Shadow of Suſpicion that you are influenced by any Motive of private Intereſt on this Occaſion, ſince you can reap none at my Hands. Therefore I have looked upon your Endeavours, purely as the Effects of a favourable Opinion you entertain for me, who has not deſerved it.

After ſo many Inſtances on your Part, and eſpecially after your laſt Letter, I doubtleſs ſhould be prevailed upon, to endeavour to ſerve the State according to the beſt of my Abilities, had I a Motive leſs weak than the one which detains me in my Retirement. You know it is, that I may thereby ſecure and preſerve entire, the Stock of Honeſty and Virtue I now poſſeſs. This is the Reaſon that will not permit me to enter into Poſts at preſent. I think it is better for me even not to ſay any thing as to the Points you have touched upon, which all relate to Government. Give me leave to confine myſelf to the putting you in Mind of a Saying of Vang tong: One thing, my Prince, I conjure you to obſerve, ſaid he, which is, to be very regular yourſelf, that you may regulate the State well. The Senſe of this Saying, ſimple and common as it is, is very extenſive. I preſume to entreat you to attend to it. The Obligations of a Miniſter, are to invite and to promote Men of Capacity and Merit, to pardon nothing in himſelf, and being charged with the whole Weight of Government, to acquit himſelf ſo well, that nothing he does can be amended, to make the Prince an accompliſhed Sovereign, and the People virtuous Subjects. Every thing is poſſible to one who is poſſeſſed of all theſe Perfections. But is a Miniſter deficient in any Point? And is that Defect but ſlight? It is always a Stain on his Character; it is a Breach which, widening by little and little, weakens his Virtue and expoſes his Reputation. Then ſenſible of the Occaſions he has of being corrected, and being employed in warding off the Reproaches (*) King: Reſpect, Reſpectful Attention, to be attentive with Reſpect, to reſpect, to honour, &c.

(†) Sin. Hitherto I have tranſlated this Character whenever I met with it, by the Word Heart, becauſe, in Effect, this Word in the Chineſe, as well as in our Language, ſignifies, according to the different Occaſions of employing it, either that Part of the Body by which the other Parts are put in Motion, or Affections of the Will. But here, as in other Places, it is plain, that this Character extends farther, and ſignifies the Soul, the Mind. I have, however, choſen, not to tranſlate this and ſome other Words in the Text: For inſtance, the Word Nin, which according to the Chineſe Definition of it, ſignifies what is excellent, but difficult to be fathom'd, and thoroughly comprehended: Miau eul pu ko tſe, and which is uſed in ſpeaking of the Spirits, of whom they relate Aparitions, &c. and which they honour, either religiouſly or civilly. Likewiſe of the Emperors, when they would praiſe his Penetration and ſublime Wiſdom.

(‡) Hin, ſignifies ſubtle, imperceptible, empty, and is uſed the laſt Senſe, both in Phyſics and Morality, eſpecially with the Character Sin: So that Hin Sin, in the common received Uſe, ſignifies, Without Prejudice, as for example, Hin Sin, is to hear it without any Prejudice either of the Heart or Mind.

(§) Ling, both by the Dictionaries and Uſe, ſignifies Intelligence, Providence, an occult Power, of aſſiſting and acting.

(||) The Chineſe Expreſſion is literally: The Inſtructions which you have had the Goodneſs to give me.

proaches he is conſcious he deſerves, is there any Room to hope that he can ever ſucceed in rendering his Prince an accompliſhed Sovereign, and the Empire a happy State? The Heart of Tyen is not yet appeaſed, and the People are exhauſted. China is not yet reſtored to that flouriſhing Condition that can make her reſpected; and ſhe has more Reaſon than ever, to dread the Ambition of the Barbarians. Think I beſeech you of this; endeavour effectually to provide againſt it, and ceaſe to think of me. The Favour with which I beg you would crown your former Favours beſtowed on me, is, that you would excuſe the Liberty which, without being in Poſt myſelf, I have uſed in ſpeaking to a Man of your Rank.

Yu yun wen, Miniſter of State under the Emperor Hyau tſong, being about to make War, that he might recover the Loſſes he had ſuſtained, wanted the Advice of Chang ſhê, and ſent him ſeveral obliging Meſſages by different People. All the Anſwer Chang ſhê returned was, to go to the Emperor in Perſon, and preſent the following Diſcourſe.

SIR; What do you think was the Reaſon, why our ancient Emperors reigned ſo gloriouſly? Why did every thing ſucceed to their Wiſh? Becauſe by their ſolid and perfect Virtue, they touched the Hearts both of Men and Tyen, and were always conſiſtent with themſelves. At preſent, notwithſtanding the Pains your Majeſty and your Miniſters are at, no body ſucceſsfully executes the Projects which you form. Be adviſed by me, reenter into yourſelf, and carefully examine all your Words, your Actions, and above all, your Thoughts. Examine if there is not ſome crooked Intention, ſome private Intereſt, or ſome lurking Paſſion which ſpoils all. If you diſcover any ſuch thing, inſtantly correct it, in order that this Obſtacle being removed, and your Heart being returned to the (A) juſt and true Mean, in which Virtue conſiſts, you may eaſily diſtinguiſh, and conſtantly purſue the moſt real Good and the moſt perfect Bliſs. If you act thus, both Tyen and Men will anſwer you on their Parts, and will even anticipate your Wiſhes. That which at Preſent employs you, is the Deſire of recovering certain Lands belonging to China. You muſt firſt gain the Hearts of your People; but yon can't do this by loading them with Services, and over-burthening them with Taxes. If you are tender of their Perſons, and ſpare their Purſes, you may ſucceed. In the preſent Situation of Affairs, you cannot ſucceed otherways, than by repreſſing all your Paſſions, and giving to your Subjects unſuſpected Proofs and evident Examples of the moſt perfect Equity. What preſſes moſt, is, how you are to begin, and what Times and Moments muſt be choſen; but as this is a Matter upon which I dare not preſume to enter, I commit the Conſideration of it to your Majeſty.

Tſay ſhin, otherways called Tſay kyew fong, from the Place to which he retired to ſtudy, was the Diſciple of Shu hi, with whom he lived a long Time. Chu hi, towards the End of his Days, having ſome Thoughts of making a Commentary upon the Shu king, which ſhould be an Abridgment of ſeveral others he had already compoſed, and not being able to undertake it himſelf, he entruſted it to Tay ſhin, who undertook it and finiſhed it ten Years after the Death of Chu hi. When it was printing, he put a Preface before it, which was thought worthy to be inſerted into the Imperial Collection, from which I have extracted theſe Pieces. I ſhall now tranſlate it, were it only to ſhew that the Chineſe Notions in this Point, is not very different from our own, at leaſt, when the Author of the Preface is at the ſame time the Author of the Book.

IN the Winter of one of theſe Years named King ywen, deſigned by Iwi upon the Sexagi-nary Cycle, my Maſter, (†) Wen kong, ordered me to compoſe a Commentary upon the Shu king. Next Year he died. I laboured at that Book for ten Years; and altho' it was not very large, I could not finiſh it ſooner. Thus it muſt be owned, that a Commentary upon the Shu king is no eaſy Task. The Government of our two Ti and our three Vang, was properly the Subject of this Book; it contains an Abridgment of their Maxims and their Conduct. It is ſufficient to ſay this. We can eaſily comprehend, that to penetrate into the Bottom of this Treaſure, and to exhauſt its Riches, is a long and a tedious Work, and one cannot ſucceed even indifferently in it, without a vaſt deal of Labour and Application. From theſe ancient Times to ours, a good many Ages have paſſed; and altho' I had been obliged by this Work, only to have diſplayed an Antiquity ſo remote, it is eaſy to conceive the Difficulty of my Task.

One Reflection has encouraged me, notwithſtanding this Difficulty, and made me hope for Succeſs in my Undertaking. That fine Government of our two Ti and our three Vang, ſay I to myſelf, upon what was it founded? Upon right and pure Reaſon. Where did they get this Reaſon? They found it in their own (‡) Hearts; and every one may find the ſame there. Hence I conclude, that in order to ſpeak with any Juſtneſs upon that beautiful Government, to diſcover its true Principles, and faithfully to explain the Sentiments and Maxims of theſe great Princes, it is ſufficient for me to know the Heart of Man. With this Help, applying myſelf to the Work, I have found, that under Yau, Shun and Yu, the fundamental Maxim of Government was reduced to theſe four Words, (§) Tſing, I, che, chong. Under other Reigns, the great Leſſons

(A) Eſt Modus in Rebus, ſunt certi denique Fines, Queis ultra citraque nequit conſiſtere Virtus. Horat:

(†) A Title of Honour given to Chu hi after his Death.

(‡) The Chineſe Expreſſion is Sin, and has here the ſame Signification which we have remarked above, in a Piece of Chu hi.

(§) Tſing, pure, excellent, to purify, to perfect; I, ſignifies one, the only, pure, ſimple; Che, to take, and keep firm. Chong, the upright juſt Mean. We have here an abridged Citation of a Text which is before tranſlated; if we have a Mind, we may tranſlate theſe four Chineſe Words, by our four Engliſh Words, viz. Purely, Simply, Keep, the Mean.

moſt frequently inculcated, was conceived in theſe Terms, (*) Kyen chong, Kyen (†) ki, that is to ſay, eſtabliſh yourſelf in the True Mean, train yourſelf up to what is moſt perfect.

I have remarked, that the Obſervation of theſe fundamental Maxims, and others thereon depending, is ſometimes called (‡) Te, ſometimes (§) Iin, in ſome Paſſages (‖) King, and in others, (⊥) Ching. But I can eaſily perceive that the ſame thing was underſtood under theſe different Terms, and that all theſe Expreſſions in different Views, repreſented the Excellence of the Heart of Man, when inhabited by Reaſon. It is in order to expreſs from whence this Heart proceeds, to inſpire it with Reſpect by its Approach to its Original, that the ſame Book ſo frequently uſes the Expreſſion Tyen. It likewiſe very often makes Mention of the People; this is in order to make the Prince's Heart ſenſible, that he owes them his Cares and Tenderneſs. Is the Prince's Heart upright? Then its firſt Cares, and as it were its firſt Fruits, are the Rites, Muſic, and whatever can contribute to the Inſtruction of the People. From the ſame Soil, proceed the Laws, Arts, and Politeneſs, which give a new Luſtre to the others. Then ſoon follows good Order in Families, a beautiful Government in every State, and a profound Tranquillity over all the Empire. Every thing is poſſible to a Heart, where pure genuine Reaſon has the abſolute Sway: Such always were the Hearts of our two Ti and our three Vang, and ſuch, after ſtrong Efforts, became the Heart of Tay kya and of Ching vang. The Heart of Kyé and Chew was quite different, becauſe they neglected and abandoned it. Thence proceeded the Difference which we perceive in the Shu king, betwixt their two Reigns. If therefore a Prince in this Age, would aſpire to revive the fine Government of our two Ti and our three Vang, he muſt follow their Method and like them, take for his Guide the moſt refined Reaſon; like them too, finding it in his own Heart, he ought to give it abſolute Power there. In which the following Book can greatly aſſiſt him.

After having by myſelf, for a long Time meditated on the Text, I never have determined any Senſe of a diſputed Paſſage, without attentively and critically reading all that was ſaid on the Subject, and diſgeſting it with Deliberation, I then commonly determine it, ſo as to endeavour to agree with moſt of the Interpretations. In the Paſſages where the Senſe is more concealed, and the Expreſſion more obſcure, I have almoſt always adher'd to the general Opinion, tho' I have endeavoured to expreſs it in other Terms. I only own, that having undertaken this Commentary purely in Obedience to the Commands of my Maſter, who formed the Plan of it himſelf, I have always preferred his Opinion, when he has delivered it on any Paſſage. He reviſed my Commentary on the (*) two Tyen and the (‡) Yu mo and I ſtill preſerve his Manuſcript Corrections. Alas! Why was he not in a Condition, in the ſame Manner, to have reviſed the whole Work! I have divided all the Shu king and my own Commentary, into ſix Volumes. The Text of that Book, according to the Difference of the Dynaſties, is of a different Stile one Place from another, but thorough all Dynaſties, the Government of good Princes is ſtill the ſame. Their Hearts is ſeen in this Book, in the ſame Manner as the Skill and Stile of a Painter is ſeen in his Piece. But a Man muſt, in order to judge juſtly both of the one and the other in their Kinds, peruſe them with a critical and a careful Eye. I am not ſo vain, as to think that I have explained all the Beauties of theſe Images, which the Shu king gives us in Miniature. I however hope, that my Explanation, which diſcovers the principal Beauties of it, will not be uſeleſs.

In the third of the Years named (A) Kya ting, Ching te ſyew preſented the following Remonſtrance to Ning tſong, who was then on the Throne.

IT is a common and a true Saying, that there is in the Univerſe a Particle of unextinguiſhed Reaſon rooted in the Heart of Man, which being at all times the ſame, is the Cauſe of certain things being univerſally condemned at leaſt inwardly, and of others being univerſally approved. Ever ſince the World has exiſted, there has been in it a good deal of Diſorder. It has encreaſed to ſuch a Height in ſome Reigns, that the Laws have been without Force, and the Wicked have without Dread or Shame ventured on every thing. Thus, Corruption has been the Cauſe why, in Reality, private Paſſions at laſt became the Springs of Government. But this Corruption never extinguiſhes, at leaſt in a great many, the Light of Reaſon which condemns this Diſorder. "These Sentiments, which are as it were common and univerſal to all Mankind, are, ſays Lew "ngan ſhi very well, the Rays of that Light and natural Reaſon, which is communicated to us "from Tyen:" It is never extinguiſhed, and whoever opens his Eyes muſt perceive it. This Reaſon always ſubſiſts, and we have no more to do but to hear her when ſhe ſpeaks, eſpecially when it is through the Voice of all, or almoſt all, Mankind.

In the Years named Hi ning, Wang ngan ſhé, becoming Miniſter of State, made a certain new Regulation, and as it was a very injurious one, all the World cried out againſt it. Wang ngan ſhé, whoſe Regulation was accommodated to the Princes Avarice, had Credit enough with him, to cauſe ſeveral of them, who had made Remonſtrances to them, to be broken; but he could neither ſtop the Mouths of them nor of others, his Conduct being conſtantly diſapproved of.

In the Years named Shau hing, there was a Talk of a Peace and Alliance with the Kin. Experience of paſt Times taught us, that there was no depending upon theſe Treaties, and that they were pernicious in many Reſpects. The greateſt Part of thoſe who compoſed the Council, were (*) Kyen; To raiſe, to eſtabliſh, to fix. Chong, the Juſt Mean; the ſecond Kyen is the ſame with the firſt.

(†) Ki, the higheſt Degree in every Kind; Literally, raiſe the Middle, raiſe the moſt Perfect.

(‡) Te, Virtuous in general.

(§) Jin, Goodneſs, Charity; ſometimes Virtue in general.

(‖) King, Reſpect, Reſpectful, Attention.

(⊥) Ching, Sincerity, Uprightneſs, Solidity, Perfection.

(*) This is what the Shu king contains, about the Reigns of Yao and Shun, who are the two Ti.

(‡) The Title of a Chapter in the Shu king.

(A) Theſe Years are called Kay ting in P. Fouquet's Table; the third of which fall, in the 16*th* Year of the Reign of Ning tſong, called Hing tſong in the French.

were againſt this Peace: Tſin wey, the Author of the Advice that was rejected, had Intereſt enough ſo far to abuſe the Authority of his Prince, whom for a long time he had abſolutely managed, as to cauſe ſome in the Oppoſition to be put to Death: But he could not prevent all the Empire from equally diſapproving of his Project and his Vengeance. It was to no Purpoſe to proteſt againſt the Regulation of Wan ngan ſhé, for the Avarice of the Prince authorized it: This Prince therefore compleated the Ruin of his People. In vain were Repreſentations made againſt the pretended Peace with the Kin, for Tſin wey carried it againſt ſo many Opinions: All the Advantage that accrued by it was, to render theſe Barbarians more fierce and more bold in injuring us afterwards; ſo true it is, that Reaſon commonly ſpeaks by the Voice of the People, and it is of the greateſt Importance to regard it.

Do not let us ſeek for Examples in Times paſt, to prove this. In our Days, we have ſeen in Poſt, a Han chi chew, of a mean Soul and a narrow Genius: Who being intoxicated by the Intereſt which he had found Means to gain with his Prince, decided every thing as he had a Mind; therefore all the World was in the Oppoſition. For ſome time, he had Power enough to give the Preference of Evil to Good, and to make his own Ideas or Intereſt prevail over Men of Senſe and Integrity; but at length he died under the Puniſhments which he deſerved in more Reſpects than one, and by his fatal End, the great Men, whoſe wiſe Advices he deſpiſed, were glorioufly revenged. In effect, the Voice of the People is commonly the Voice of Reaſon, and Reaſon is the Voice of Tyen. Therefore as Chi chew deſpiſed Tyen, could this be done unpuniſhed? Good Princes and good Miniſters obſerve a different Conduct. The Reſpect which they have for Tyen, makes them regard the public Voice, and the general Sentiments; thereby they gain the Hearts of the People, and draw down the Aſſiſtance of Tyen. What have they then to fear? By the juſt Puniſhment of a worthleſs Favorite, you have taken a wide ſtep towards the right Way: But I am afraid that Diſeaſe that has continued ſo long a time, is not yet thoroughly cured. You cannot guard yourſelf too much againſt a Relapſe. Let me ſpeak plain; you are now ſenſible how dangerous it is for a Prince to abandon himſelf too much to a Subject, either out of Favour or out of any other Motive, and to give an Ear to him alone. Perſevere in your happy Recovery, found your Government not upon the Suggeſtions of one Man, who frequently is directed by a Cabal, or animated by Intereſt, but upon the Sentiments of the Public, or the Advice of the Majority. In the Reſolutions which you are to take, ſincerely and in good earneſt, as being in the Preſence of Shang ti, endeavour to follow the moſt equitable Meaſures. Tyen and Men will then rejoyce at this, and all the Empire will feel it. Maturely weigh what I have taken the Liberty to lay before you.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Diſcourſe is full of lively Expreſſions and ſhining Turns. Every thing in it does Honour to the wiſeſt Antiquity.

Extract of another Diſcourſe of the ſame Ching te ſyew, to the Emperor Li tſong.

SIR, what is moſt important for a Prince, who like you, endeavours to govern well, is to gain the Heart of Tyen and the Heart of Man, and it is by gaining the Hearts of his Subjects, that a Sovereign gains that of Tyen. In the I king, in one of the Paſſages upon the Symbol named Ta yew, we read the following Words. While Tyen protects him, he is happy, and every thing turns out to his Advantage. Confuçius, commenting upon this Text, ſays; Who is it that Tyen protects, if it is not he who draws down his Protection by Reſpect and Submiſſion? Who is it that Men aid, if it is not he who endears himſelf to them by his Uprightneſs and Equity? In the firſt of the Years named Ywen yew, while the Emperor Ché tſong and the Empreſs Dowager were reigning, the neighbouring Nations crowded from all Quarters, to put themſelves under their Protection, becauſe all the World, at that Time, were perſwaded, that they who then ruled, propoſed nothing but to fulfill the Deſigns of Tyen. Sû ſhe, ſpeaking of the ſucceſs of theſe Times, and laying open its Cauſes, borrows the Expreſſion of Confuçius, and ſays of that Prince and Princeſs; "They preſerved Uprightneſs and pure Equity towards Men, and the moſt reſpectful Submiſſion towards Tyen." But at what Price do you think can theſe Encomiums be purchaſed? You muſt, in all Affairs and upon all Occaſions, endeavour worthily to fulfill the Deſigns of Tyen, and ſincerely to ſeek the Welfare of the People. In your Perſon we have a Prince, naturally full of Goodneſs, and in other Reſpects, both very carefull and very laborious. It would ſeem, as if under your Reign, we were again to ſee the glorious Years Ywen yew to revive. Yet we ſee nothing but Irregularities in the Seaſons, and frightful Appearances in the Heavens. At Court, and in your Armies, your moſt Loyal Officers are alarmed. In the Provinces, in the Cities, and in the Fields, all the People ſuffer and lament. This I own to you makes me afraid, leaſt you inwardly uſe ſome Reſerve, and that you have not exerted yourſelf as you ought to have done, in gaining the Hearts of Men, and thereby that of Tyen, &c.

In the reſt of the Diſcourſe, which is very long, he points out ſeveral Faults in the Government: Towards the End of it, he again quotes the Text of the I king, and aſſures his Prince, that if he does his beſt to cure theſe Evils, Tyen and Men will aid him, and that his Reign will not yeild to the glorious Years Ywen yew: He concludes by theſe Words. My Zeal is pure and ſincere, but it has made my Expreſſions too bold; I am ſenſible of this, I acknowledge it, and I ſubmiſſively wait for my Puniſhment.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Author of this Diſcourſe, exhorts his Prince to touch Tyen, by gaining the Hearts of Men. He reduces the Practice of all, to a perfect Equity and an inviolable Uprightneſs. This may be called, taking proper Meaſures for forming a Sovereign.

FROM A

Compilation made under the Ming Dynasty, by one of the celebrated Literati, called Tang king chwen.

An Author ſpeaking of the Game of the Cheſs, which is the Modiſh Diverſion in China, ſays as follows.

SOME People have ſaid, that the Play of Cheſs was invented by the Emperor Yau, in order to inſtruct his Son in the Arts of Government and War: But nothing is more unlikely than this. The great Art of Yau conſiſted in the continual Practice of the five principal Virtues, the Uſe of which was as familiar to him, as the Uſe of Hands and Feet is to Mankind. It was Virtue, and not Arms, that he employed in reducing the moſt barbarous People.

The Art of War, of which the Cheſs is a Kind of a Repreſentation, is the Art of hurting one another. Yau was far from giving his Son any ſuch Leſſon. The Play of the Cheſs doubtleſs did not begin, but ſince theſe unhappy Times, wherein all the Empire was deſolated by Wars; it is an Invention very unworthy of the great Yau.

From another Author, who declaims againſt a Fondneſs for that Play.

A MAN who has a well diſpoſed Heart ought to be aſhamed, at a certain Age of having neither Reputation nor Merit. That he may ſhun this Confuſion, he applies himſelf in his Youth, and makes continual Efforts. Does he ſucceed, and obtain the Degrees which he propoſes as the End of his Labours? He is ſo far from relaxing, that the Fear of not holding on as he ſet out, makes him redouble his Application. This is the Conduct that ſo many great Men of paſt Ages have obſerved; they perſevered with an invincible Conſtancy in the Study of our King, even to an advanced Age. Thus ſome of them have always lived in Honour, and others, after many laborious Years, have at laſt reaped the Fruits of them, and attained to the higheſt Poſts.

In our Age, Alas! How many leaving the Study of the King, make the Cheſs their whole Buſineſs, and abandon themſelves to it with ſo much Eagerneſs, that they neglect every thing elſe, even to eat and drink. Does Day-light fail them? They light up Candles, and play on; ſometimes even at Day break, the Game is not ended. This Amuſement exhauſts both the Body and the Mind, and they think of nothing elſe. Does Buſineſs interpoſe, it is neglected, and the Cheſs is minded; doe Gueſts come? They are ſlighted. Nor can you prevail upon one of theſe Gameſters, to interrupt their trifling Combats, for the greateſt ceremonial Banquet, or the moſt ſolemn and delectable Muſic. In ſhort, at this Game as at all others, a Man may loſe even his Cloaths; at leaſt, he is in a continual Vexation, Trouble, and Fretting: And why? That he may remain Maſter of the Field of a Battle, which is no better than a Board, and to gain a kind of Victory, by which, the Conqueror obtains neither Titles, Appointments, nor Lands.

I ſhall readily grant, that Skill is required in this; but it is a Skill equally uſeleſs to public Welfare and to private Families. It is a Road that leads to nothing. If I examine this Play to the Bottom, with Regard to the Art of War, I find nothing in it that is conformable to the Leſſons left us by the moſt famous Maſters. If I examine it with Regard to civil Government, I ſtill find in it fewer of the Maxims of our Sages. The Skill required in that Play, is to ſurprize ones Adverſary, to ſpread Snares for him, and to take Advantage of the Blunders he commits. Can Honour and Uprightneſs be inſpired by theſe Means? To take, to deſtroy, and other ſuch Terms, are the Language of theſe Gameſters. Is this the Way to inculcate Gentleneſs and Clemency? In ſhort, it may be ſaid of this Play as of others, that it is a trifling Amuſement, and diverts uſeful Buſineſs. It is as if you ſhould raiſe a Piece of Wood, or Stone, and amuſe yourſelf by beating upon it, or fighting with it: I know no Difference betwixt them.

Every wiſe Man, if he is a private Man, minds his domeſtic Affairs, and to provide for the Neceſſities of his Family: If he is at Court, and in the Service of his Prince, then his Endeavours ought to be turned to the giving Proofs of his Zeal. He ought even for this, to neglect his private Concerns. How far ſhould ſuch a Man be from amuſing himſelf with the Cheſs? Theſe Maxims which are ſtanding Rules, were never more ſeaſonable then at preſent, when a new Dynaſty is beginning. The Empire ſtill feels her paſt Calamities. The principal Buſineſs of our Emperor, is, to ſeek out for brave Captains, and worthy Miniſters. If he finds a Man who has the leaſt Capacity, he gives him a Poſt, and puts him in a Condition to arrive to the higheſt Fortune. This ought to animate any Man who has a Grain of Spirit: Inſtead of murdering his Strength and his Time in vain Amuſements, he ſhould endeavour to ſerve the State, and thereby to merit a Place in Hiſtory. This ought to be a Spur to a well diſpoſed Heart.

A uſe-

A uſeleſs Skill gains you the Game, and you give your Antagoniſt a total Defeat. What Compariſon is there betwixt this Childiſh Advantage and the Titles, Lands and Penſions, with which the Emperor, if you had a Mind, would reward your Services? Which Part think you is to be preferred; to conduct upon a Cheſs-board a parcel of wretched Pieces of Wood, or to march at the Head of as many thouſand Men? What can you gain in Compariſon of the Profit and Honour you may reap by a great Poſt? If ſuch a Man had beſtowed the Time he had ſpent in this Game upon the Study of our King, he might at this Day have been another (*) Yen tſe. If ſuch another, who is equally intoxicated with that trifling Amuſement, inſtead of waſting his Time upon it, had entered upon Government, we ſhould have had in him a (†) Lyang ping; in ſhort, had ſuch another been as much fatigued in the Toils of Commerce as in thoſe of the Cheſs, his Riches might have equalled thoſe of (‡) Inu. At leaſt, had he exchanged this Amuſement for a continual Exerciſe of Arms, he might thereby have rendered himſelf uſeful to the State. How far are theſe Gameſters from being what they might have been?

Of SOVEREIGN PRINCES.

IWE IWEN relates, that Pin kong, King of Tſin, one Day aſked at Se quang; What Qualifications a Sovereign ought to poſſeſs? And that Se quang anſwered. Qualifications neceſſary in a Prince.

A Sovereign ought to be pure and calm, both within himſelf, and in the Eye of the World. He ought to have for his People the Love of a Father; to uſe his utmoſt Endeavour, that underſtanding virtuous Perſons may be put in Poſts, and to give a continual Attention to what is paſſing in the (§) Univerſe. He ſhould ſhun giving too much Scope to the Abuſes of the Age in which he lives, and rendering himſelf too dependant on his Miniſters and Favorites. He compoſes an Order by himſelf which he ought to maintain, and from that high Station, to extend his Views as far as he can. Above all, to examine carefully and equitably to weigh, the Services done him, that each may have his due Reward. Such is the Idea I have formed of a Prince.

Swen wang, King of Tſi, one Day aſked of Yun wen; What was the Rule of the greateſt Importance for a Sovereign. Yun wen's Anſwer was, The Principal one, in my Opinion, is to act little, and always without hurry. A Sovereign, who does not give out too many Orders, is obeyed in what he does order. When there are few Laws, they are better obſerved, and this prevents a great many Crimes. To leave the World to judge a little for themſelves, and to compaſſionate the Weakneſs of thoſe who are governed, are Maxims of true Wiſdom and eminent Virtue. A perfect Prince ſcarce acts at all; yet his State is in Order. This is the Idea which is given us by the Shi king and the Shu king. Eſſential Rule

The Emperor Ching vang, in giving the Principality of Lû to Pe kyu, cauſed him to come into his own Preſence, and gave him the following Inſtruction. You are now, ſaid he to him, a Prince, but do you know what are the Duties of a Prince? One of the utmoſt Importance is: On the one Hand, Majeſty is requiſite, in order to command Reſpect from all thoſe above whom your Rank has raiſed you. On the other Hand, the People ought to be left at Liberty, to give their Prince proper Advices, for this may prevent his commiting many Miſtakes. That you may reconcile theſe two Points, admit Remonſtrances without any Difficulty, hear them, and read them at Leiſure. Neither brow-beat nor threaten thoſe who make them: But don't give into them too eaſily. Weigh their Contents maturely, that you may extract from them all that is of Uſe; let all be done with Gravity, that you may not forfeit the Reſpect you have a Right to, but at the ſame time, with Gentleneſs, that you may thereby gain the Hearts of your Officers. This I call, knowing how to reign. and Inſtructions for them.

Of the Miniſters of State, and Generals of Armies.

THERE has always been, ſays Li te in (‖), a great Difference betwixt a Prince and his Miniſters. Theſe laſt have been always much inferior to the other. But antiently, there was no ſuch prodigious Difference betwixt them, as is obſerved now. If we go ſo far back as the three famous Dynaſties, we find Miniſters to whom the Prince never ſent Orders to wait upon him. Ching tang ſhewed this Piece of Reſpect for I in; Kau tſong, for Fû ywê; and Vû vang, for Chau kong. Theſe Princes treated thoſe wiſe Men, at firſt, as Sages, and then as Miniſters. Deference which Sovereigns formerly paid to their Miniſters.

In leſs remote Antiquity, Things were altered, but not in an extreme Degree: The Princes continued to treat their Miniſters with Civility, and certain Ceremonies were regulated and obſerved on this Head. What we read of Kyen chin and Pi kong, in the Shu king; and what the Shi king relates of Shin pê, Chong ſhan ſû, and ſome others, proves to us, that in theſe Times, Miniſters were ſtill on a good Footing. During the Times of Antiquity, the Prince and his Miniſters were as the Head and Arms of the ſame Body, or as Father and Son, or Brothers of the ſame Family. All their Cares and Secrets were in common. They were equally affected with the Happineſs or Misfortunes of the State; and indeed, if there is a ſure and certain Way for a Sovereign to ſucceed in the greateſt Enterprizes, and to diſtinguiſh himſelf from the Generality of Princes, it is to treat the Miniſter he makes Choice of, in this Manner. Altered.

This uſeful laudable Cuſtom was in effect, loſt under Tſin ſhi whang, who wanted to engroſs all the Reſpect to himſelf; and far from thus reſpecting his Prime Miniſters, he made it a Maxim to treat them with Haughtineſs. He went ſo far as to make them to be tryed as Malefactors, and to die under the Hands of Executioners: A Thing unheard of before that Prince. Under him, the Miniſters were confounded with the meaneſt Officers, and he always treated them proudly. But if the civil obliging Behaviour, which our ancient Kings, from their Eſteem for Wiſdom and Virtue, uſed towards their Miniſters, was no longer ſeen under that Prince, neither did the ſame Loyalty and Zeal any longer ſubſiſt among the Miniſters.

In this, almoſt infinite, Diſtance, at which the Haughtineſs of the Prince kept them, they always looked upon him as a formidable Maſter, whom they durſt not preſume to love; They ſtill bore the Name of Miniſters; but the continual Dread in which they lived, and their Care of providing for their own Safety, no longer left them at the Liberty neceſſary for fulfilling the Duties of their Functions. Li ſê, in the Morning, was made Miniſter, and that ſame Night he loſt his Life by the Hands of an Executioner. Who would not tremble after ſuch an Example? Therefore they who were in Poſt, touched their Penſions, took care not to diſpleaſe the Prince (that is to ſay, they took care to bubble him) and never minded any thing elſe.

Inſtances of Miniſters be-puniſhed.

Under the Han Dynaſty, in the Time of Kau tſû, a Prince who otherways had great Merit, Syau ho, a Miniſter of State, was clapt into Irons. Under Ven ti, a Prince who was Goodneſs itſelf, Chew pû, a Miniſter of State, was cited before the Tribunals, and confronted with a Miniſter of the loweſt Rank. King ti put his firſt Miniſter Chew yu, to Death. Vû ti capitally puniſhed ſeveral of his, and the ſame thing happened in late Reigns more than once. Melancholy Events; and to be looked upon as ſo many Conſequences of the wicked Example of Tſin ſhi whang!

'Tis true, that ſince theſe Times, there have been ſome Princes who have behaved otherwiſe to their Miniſters: But there has always ſubſiſted ſo extravagant a Diſtance betwixt the one and the other, that the Acceſs to the Prince was rendered too difficult; and this is ſtill to be attributed to the unhappy Change begun under Shi whang. As it was not to be expected that the Prince would put Things upon their former Footing, a great many Perſons of Merit, who might have been capable of the firſt Employments, and even they who had been ſome time in Poſt, inſtead of appearing, retired, or ſought to retire. Thereby, the Way was left open to People, whoſe Merit entirely conſiſted in Flattery; which pleaſed the Generality of Princes. How can theſe happy Reigns, which the Wiſdom and Virtue of our Anceſtors rendered famous and flouriſhing, be revived?

After the Death of Vû vang, the firſt Emperor of the Chew Dynaſty, Ching vang, his Son being too young, Chew kong, the younger Brother of Vû vang, was Regent. Hong yu, a famous learned Man, under the Tang Dynaſty, propoſes Chew kong as a Pattern for the Princes of that Age.

Maxims of Chew kong.

It is ſaid of Chew kong, that being at Table, it was very common for him three Times to interrupt his Repaſt, to do honour to a wiſe Man, and to ſerve him with Victuals. While he was in the Bath, if he ſaw any wiſe Men enter it, he did not finiſh his bathing, but immediately left it, that he might adjuſt their Hair to do them honour, and help them himſelf. It is ſaid, that he has been ſeen to do this thirteen times in one Day. One thing is certain, that while he governed, his principal Care and his greateſt Anxiety, was to do honour to wiſe Men; and there was then none in Poſts but Men of Virtue and Capacity. Craft and Flattery, and much leſs Vice and Villany, had then no Footing. Therefore the Empire was quiet, and there was not the leaſt Diſturbance. The moſt barbarous of our Neighbours voluntarily ſubmitted, the Strangers punctually paid their Taxes, and all that is called, the Rites, Muſic, Juriſprudence, and Government, theſe great Springs, upon which depend the Regulation and Happineſs of States, were in their utmoſt Perfection; and Innocence and Integrity prevailed over all. There then appeared no diſorders of the Seaſons, nor Monſters of Nature; the Winds and Rains were regular, Animals and Vegitables throve, and all the Fields were fertile.

In this high Degree of Glory and Happineſs, wherein Chew kong maintained the Empire, that great Man never relaxed in his Care to enquire after Sages. Was this becauſe theſe Sages whom he ſought after, ſurpaſſed him in Wiſdom? Doubtleſs not. Was it becauſe they were rare and hard to come at? Great Numbers of them were in Poſts. What could ſome People have done more? Or why were they ſtill ſought after? Becauſe he feared, leaſt ſomewhat ſhould eſcape his Care. He was, in Place of his Nephew, charged with rendering the Empire happy; and he wanted that he ſhould not have the leaſt thing wherewith he could reproach himſelf.

Hong yu then draws a Contraſt betwixt his own Times and thoſe of Chew kong. I ſhall not tranſlate it, becauſe it would be repeating the ſame Terms, always tacking them with a Negative. Theſe Repetitions are graceful in the Chineſe Language, but they won't do in ours. He concludes that there was then more Occaſion for ſeeking out and promoting wiſe Men, than was in the Days of Chew kong; and exhorts the Governors in his Time, herein to imitate the Care of Chew kong.

That Miniſters and Officers of War, in the Concerns of the State, ought to forget all Injuries and private Animoſities.

Concerning Officers of War.

SYAU HO and Tſau tſan, both of them Men of diſtinguiſhed Merit, grew jealous of one another, and lived together in very bad Underſtanding: Syau ho had got the better, he was Prime Miniſter, and Tſau tſan lived retired. Syau ho fell dangerouſly ill, and the Emperor aſked him, who he thought was the moſt proper Perſon for ſucceeding him, in Caſe he ſhould die?

Syau

Syau ho readily anſwered; Tſau tſan is without controverſy, the moſt capable of that Employment, nor ought you to think of any other. Tſau tſan was ſo well acquainted with the Character of Syau ho, that upon the News of his Sickneſs, he had taken Leave of his Family, and put every thing in Order, that he might repair to Court; ſo firmly was he perſwaded that Syau ho would name him, notwithſtanding the bad Terms they lived in. Syau ho actually died; and was ſucceeded by Tſau tſan, who followed his Plans and Views, and kept Things on a right Footing. This Conduct was remarked and praiſed by all the World; and the People even made Songs upon it.

Quo tſey and Li quang pi, two Officers of War, both naturally fierce, were in bad Underſtanding with one another, and might have paſſed for Enemies. When the Rebellion of Ngan lû ſhan happened; Tſey, notwithſtanding his natural Haughtineſs and his Averſion for Quang pi, ſought him out, and with Tears in his Eyes, begged of him to aſſiſt him in ſaving the State, gave him a Detachment of his Army, wrote to Court that he might be promoted, and that he ſhould be given to him as a Second againſt the Rebels. The Court conſented, and the Rebels were defeated. Quo tſey died a little after; Li quang pi ſucceeded him in his Command of the Northern Forces, and did not alter the leaſt Point of what had been eſtabliſhed by Quo tſey.

In every State, Men of very great Capacities are but rare; but nothing is more uncommon than a good General. Not that People are wanting who have Genius for War, but they are only known upon Occaſions. The Rebellion of Ngan lû ſhan, gave Quo tſey and Li quang pi Opportunities of making themſelves known by ſaving the State. It was in the War of Lyau tong, that Chin cho was known for what he was, namely an excellent General.

Good Generals why Rare.

Tho' in (*) latter Times, Occaſions have not been wanting, yet ſeveral Reigns have paſſed without one General of any Reputation appearing. Formerly, private Soldiers, and even Slaves, became excellent Captains; but at preſent, the Court and the whole Empire does not furniſh a ſingle one. Whence proceeds this? Is it not becauſe Military Officers are too much pinched, and their Allowances too ſmall? Is it not likewiſe becauſe they are too much circumſcribed? The King of Chau made Li mû General upon the Frontiers; but he gave him no limits as to his Expences, ſo that he not only had wherewithall to pay his Troops, but even to beſtow upon them Gratuities and Rewards; for this Reaſon, Li mû did wonders. For my Share, I believe, that if Expences were leſs ſpared, and if the Officers had nothing to anſwer for, but the Succeſs of what they are charged with; we ſhould then ſoon have good Generals.

Manner of treating brave Men.

There are certain great Men, ſays Li te yu, of whom a Prince may reap great Advantages; but they are not to be governed as other Men. If a Prince would employ them, he ought chiefly to obſerve two Things; the firſt is, to deal pretty roundly with them; the other, to engage them by Favours. If he ſhews too much Reſpect for them, they become haughty, and put too great a Value on themſelves. It is then dangerous to employ them. If, inſtead of real Favours, they receive from their Prince only Honours of Ceremony, they are ſeldom ſatisfied, they grow negligent, and never perform great Services.

Kau tſû his Method with them.

Kau tsû, the firſt of the Han Dynaſty, of all our Emperors, beſt practiſed what I have adviſed. When the famous King pû wanted to ſalute him, and to offer him his Services and Allegiance; Kau tsû was careleſly ſitting on his Bed, affected to waſh his Face, and received King pû without much Form or Ceremony. King pû inwardly boiled with Rage, and repenting of the Step he had taken, was about to have killed himſelf. However, he went out without ſaying any thing; but as he was going away, he was by the Prince's Orders conveyed to a large handſome Houſe, where he was every Day ſplendidly regal'd amidſt a Crowd of People who were ordered to ſerve him, and attended with Officers of all Ranks, who were commanded to do him Honour. King pû was then ſatisfied, and the more ready to ſerve Kau tsû, in that the latter diſcovered very little Concern about him, when he received him.

Difficulty in the Choice of Military Officers.

Nothing is more important, ſays Sau ſven, than a right Choice of Miniſters and Generals. Nothing is likewiſe more difficult for a Prince, than to fill theſe Poſts worthily, and to reap from the Capacities of thoſe that are put in Poſts, the Advantages which he had a Right to expect from them. The Difficulty after all, is far the greateſt with Regard to Military Officers. And it is ſtill twice as great, if they who are in Poſts are Men who have nothing but Bravery, without Wiſdom and Virtue. With Reſpect to Prime Miniſters, it is a ſure Rule for a Prince to treat them very civilly, and according to the Rites. As for Military General Officers, there is no certain Rule: With Regard to ſuch of them as are known to be equally wiſe and brave, virtuous and able, the beſt Way is to truſt them, and to make them ſenſible that they are truſted. As for theſe who have only Bravery and Capacity for War, it is an Art to know how to gain them; and this Art requires a great deal of Prudence and Care.

Neceſſity of having brave Men.

The ſix Kinds of Animals who are called Domeſtic, were formerly as wild as any other. As the Tyger and the Leopard tear and bite, ſo the Horſe and the Bull ſtrike; the one with the Hoof, and the other with the Horn. If our firſt Kings had ordered, that Endeavours ſhould be uſed to deſtroy all theſe Kinds without Diſtinction, we ſhould have now had neither Horſes nor Cows. But their Wiſdom made them diſtinguiſh, among theſe Savage Animals, ſuch of them as might be ſerviceable, and they took proper Methods for ſubduing and taming them. If Beaſts are treated in this Manner, there is much better Reaſon to obſerve the ſame Conduct towards Men. If Princes ſee any Capacity in one of their Subjects, provided he is not more incorrigibly fierce than a Tyger, they uſe all the poſſible Means to bring his Talent to Perfection, and to render it uſefull.

(*) The Author lived under the Song Dynaſty.

A Prince

A Prince ought not to give up the Care of providing good Generals whatever Difficulty attends it.

Different kinds of Military Officers.

As I have ſaid before, Military Officers may be divided into two Sorts; one that has an equal Share of Virtue and Wiſdom, as of Bravery and Skill. Such were Wey ho and Chau chong quê under the (*) Han: Li tſing and Li tſe under the Tang. There are others, whoſe Merits entirely conſiſt in their Valour and Skill of the Trade of War. Such were Han ſing, King pû and Pong ywê, in the Times of the Han: Su ve, Wan che, Hew king tſi and Shing yen tſe in the Time of the Tang. As there is no great Plenty of Men of the firſt Characters, when they are wanting, thoſe of the Second muſt be employed; and tho' it may be troubleſome for a Prince, yet he may do it with Succeſs, if he takes proper Meaſures. Theſe Sort of People muſt be gained by Liberality, and when they are conſulted, they muſt be talked to in the Openneſs of Heart, without any Ceremony. On the one Hand, their Lands and Poſſeſſions muſt be encreaſed, nor muſt they want either for Entertainments or Concerts; or for any thing that pleaſes their Pallate. But on the other Hand, they muſt be kept within the Bounds of Reſpect with a Majeſtic Gravity. Our ancient Princes treated them thus, and they ſucceeded.

The Motives upon which they Act.

A Modern Politician perhaps may ſay, that it is Hope alone that animates Officers, that quickens their Invention, and renders them indefatigable and intrepid in Dangers: And that therefore it is a Point of Wiſdom, not to treat them too well beforehand, but to let them wait for their Reward, that they may be animated to deſerve it by their Services. To this I anſwer, that it is not true in Fact, That Hope is the only thing that animates Officers. They who have a Capacity only for War, may be divided into two Sorts: The firſt are they who diſtinguſh themſelves but indifferently, and whoſe Capacity is but midling. The ſecond Kind riſe much higher, and have extraordinary Capacities and admirable Abilities. Both the one and the other commonly have Views proportioned to their Capacities. It is according to this, and not according to a Maxim that frequently is miſtaken, that a Prince ought to act, and to treat them differently according to their different Diſpoſitions. A Man has an excellent Horſe of extraordinary Mettle and Swiftneſs. He is carefully tended, and every thing he eats is nicely choſen; his Stable is kept very clean, and even the Water in which he baths muſt come from a limpid Fountain. Does any Emergency happen? This Horſe can make 100 Leagues at a Stretch. He perceives that this is required of him, and he performs it without once ſtumbling: It is not Hope that animates him, for it is impoſſible to treat him better after his Journey is ended, than before.

A Bird of Prey is bred up in another Manner. If he takes a Pheaſant, a Sparow is given to him as a Reward; does he take a Hare, he gets a Rat. The Bird thereby knowing that he receives but in Proportion as he hunts well, on that Account does his beſt, and catches more Game than he would do, had he nothing to hope for. Men of extraordinary Capacity, and who have great Views and extenſive Projects anſwerable to their Capacity, I compare to an excellent Race-horſe. Not to give them a large Reward beforehand, is, as if by making this Race-horſe faſt for a long time, you ſhould require him to make 100 Leagues upon a Stretch, with a View of giving him a hearty belly-full afterwards. I compare the others whoſe Capacity is but midling, and conſequently whoſe Hearts have a different Turn, to a Bird of Prey: When he is crammed he does no more Service. It is a Prince's Part exactly to ſtudy the Diſpoſitions and Talents of his Servants, and thereby to take his Meaſures.

Manner in which Kau ti treated them.

Han ſing no ſooner came over to (†) Kau ti, than this laſt made him Captain General of his Armies. The firſt time King pû had kiſſed that Prince's Hands, was honoured, as he left the Audience, with the Title of Vang, and treated as ſuch. Pong ywê was at once raiſed by the ſame Prince, to the Poſt of Miniſter of State. Yet theſe three Men had not then followed his Party; tho' they did him great Services afterwards, and puſh'd his Enemies very bravely. But while the contrary Party ſtill ſubſiſted, they were rich and bountiful by the Liberalities of Kau ti; and they even died before the Han were abſolutely Maſters of the Empire. Why did Kau ti behave thus towards them? Becauſe he knew their Capacity and their Genius. He knew well that they were not Men who would engage themſelves for a Trifle, or ſlacken their Endeavours when their Fortune was made. He acted quite otherways towards Fan whey, Tun kong and Quan ing: Did they take a City from the Enemy, or gain a ſlight Advantage? They were raiſed but a few Degrees, and their Pay was encreaſed in Proportion to their Services. If they did nothing, their Situation was never altered. So that when Kau ti, by the Death of his Enemy, found himſelf abſolute Maſter of the Empire, each of theſe two Men counted ſome Hundreds of Victories. Kau ti then made them (‡) Hew. Why did this Prince for ſo long time, beſtow ſo moderate Rewards upon them, yet afterwards, on another Occaſion, with ſo much Eaſe, grant them a Territory of 100 Leagues? Becauſe he treated them according to their Views, which, like their Capacity, were but midling: He knew them to be People who would go thro' every thing in hopes of being advanced, and that they might be ſpoiled by anticipating their Rewards.

Maxims of War.

When an Army is raiſed, the ſafeſt Courſe is to give the Command of it to one General, who is to act as he ſee proper, and is to be entruſted with the Succeſs. The beſt Courſer in the World, if his Legs are entangled, will be beat by a Dray-Horſe. Tho' a Man were a Mong pwen, yet if his Arms and Legs are tied, he may be inſulted by a Woman. In the ſame Manner to pinch a General, is putting an Obſtacle to his Succeſs, and taking away from him the Right of judging,

o that he can be capable of nothing that is great. A General is pinched three Ways. The firſt is, by tying him up to the Orders of the Court. The ſecond is, by dividing his Army, and naming two Generals of equal Authority. The third is, by giving him Perſons who have no Authority in the Army, as his Inſpectors and Councellors, and yet pinning the General down to follow their Advice and Direction. In the firſt Caſe, the General, properly ſpeaking, is no longer General, being but a Spring who is acted by a diſtant Power: Whence it happens, that acting too ſlowly, he is almoſt always without Succeſs. In the ſecond and third Caſes, all commonly ends in his returning without doing any thing. For beſides Suſpicions and Diſtruſts ariſing, the very Difference of Notions and Opinions, keeps all in Suſpence, till both Time and Opportunity is loſt.

Character of a General ought to have.

However, it is acknowledged on all Hands, that two things principally tend to render a General formidable to the Enemy. Great Activity, and a Character of having Reſolution: By his Activity, he is always in a Condition to act either upon the Offenſive or Defenſive. And by his determined Reſolution, he knows how to take his Meaſures when Occaſion offers. Is it not therefore beſt to leave a General at Liberty, rather than to confine him in that Manner. The Proverb ſays very well, Too many Shepherds to one Flock, ſerve only to diſturb it: But if one Shepherd keeps it, it marches along with ſtraying. Anciently, when a Prince named a General, he ſaid to him, touching his Chariot with his Hand, "Go along, you are now entruſted with my Troops diſtant from the Court, and it is your Buſineſs to command them abſolutely." Swen vang having made Sun tſe General of his Troops, cauſed Ki to be put to Death, tho' he tenderly loved him, for having ſhewn an Inclination to diſturb Sun tſe in the Exerciſe of his Commiſſion. The King of Wey, that he might ſupport Yang tſin who had the Command of his Forces, ſacrifiſed the greateſt Favorite he had. What Authority did not Kau tſû give to Whay in and his other Generals? If he had thought fit to have circumſcribed them, he never had deſtroyed the oppoſite Party, nor been the peaceable Poſſeſſor of the Empire.

The Kings of Yen and Chau acted otherways; the one pinched Lo i by means of Ki kyé; the other neglected the Advice of Li mû for that of Chau ko. Theſe two Princes, paid dear for their Conduct. The beſt Way therefore, in my Opinion, is for a Prince who wants to be ſucceſsful, to leave his General at full Liberty, and to reſerve to himſelf only the Right of judging of the Merit of his Services. That all the Subaltern Officers may be ſenſible, that they have above them a ſole General whom they ought to follow, and that that General may know that he is to be accountable to the Prince. To circumſcribe him in one Reſpect or another, is to hinder him from ſucceeding; and if he ſhould ſucceed, it is depriving him of Part of his Glory; but if he does not ſucceed, all the Blame falls upon him. Who can be ſatisfied with ſuch a Condition of Life? Great Valour and great Capacity are required in a General; theſe rendering him both eſteemed and reſpected, procure him the entire Submiſſion both of the Officers and Subalterns. But in order to do this effectually, he muſt know how to gain their Hearts by his Goodneſs. When a General is thus qualified, an Army is then a Body, whoſe Members naturally all do their utmoſt Endeavours to ſerve the Head; or it is a Family of which the General is the Father, and the Officers are ſo many Brothers actuated by one common Inclination. Then he can be ſtopped by no Danger, and barred by no Difficulty: And he is ſure of Succeſs in whatever he undertakes. But at the ſame time, it muſt be owned, that it is not the Work of one Day for a General to attain to this, and there are few ſuch Generals. But ſuch, however, were ſeveral great Men of Antiquity. Such, for inſtance, was Yang tſin, General of the Army of Tſi.. General as he was, yet was Lodging to be provided for his Men, Water to be procured, or Proviſions to be got? He frequently put the firſt Hand to the Work: Sometimes in digging a Well, ſometimes in rearing an Oven, and ſometimes in erecting Baracks. Did any one ſtand in Need of Medicines? He adminiſtred them himſelf. In ſhort, he lived like the common Soldiers, and therefore required that they ſhould be expeditious and brave. If he ſaw any among them that were either cowardly or lazy, he gave them but three Days as a Tryal; and if in that Time they did not amend, he broke them abſolutely. The Effects of this was, that his Soldiers, even the Sick, were not only always ready, but always eager, for the Fight. The confederate Troops of Yen and Tſin, who had attacked Tſi, ſoon retired and left Tſi in Peace.

An Inſtance of a great General.

Such likewiſe was the famous U ki in the Kingdom of Whey: After he was made General, he eat, without any Ceremony, with the loweſt Officers, and even with the private Men. When he went to ſleep, he would not allow ſo much as a Cloth to be ſpread for himſelf. He lived like the private Soldiers; and whatever he had more than them, he divided with the firſt Comers. Therefore his Men, tho' they had been weakened with (*) Diſtempers, took a Pleaſure in marching to Battle; and Tſing, who then carried all before him, never durſt attack U ki. Beſides, what do you think were the Motives that induced Yang tſin and U ki to behave thus? It was becauſe they were perſwaded, that in order to draw from the Officers and Soldiers all they could perform, they muſt attach them to themſelves; and that the moſt infallible way for that, was to treat them with Goodneſs and Benevolence. If a General has only Troops that have been levied betwixt Morning and Night, by whom he is neither known nor loved, it commonly happens, that when they muſt come to Blows, theſe Troops no ſooner ſee the Standards diſplay'd and hear the Drums beat, than they go to Confuſion and are routed.

Extraordinary Conduct of Hang ſing.

Hang ſing at the Head of ſuch an Army gained a Victory, but he took care to chuſe his Ground, ſo as that he had a large deep River in his Rear. Some Officers, when the Battle was over, over, discoursing with the General, said to him: Till now, it has been always laid down to us as a Rule in Encampments, to have some Mountains or Rising Grounds, in our Rear and on our Right. On our Left and Front, a Water. You acted quite contrary to this, yet we have got the better. Is the Rule therefore good for nothing? It is very good, answers Han sing, and it generally should be followed, but it does not destroy another which you may likewise find in your Books. Sometimes the best way of saving ourselves, is to be exposed to the greatest Danger of perishing. My Troops are not composed of Veteran Soldiers, whom I have picked, and who are devoted to my Person; they are but patched up. The Necessity wherein they found themselves of either conquering or dying, made every Man fight for his Life. They probably had quitted their Ground, had I posted them otherways.

Han sing, notwithstanding his extraordinary Abilities, had no Hopes to obtain any thing of an Army which he had not time to attach to himself, but from Necessity. And indeed, who could have hoped it otherways? Mong shu, Whey shang, and many others, were of the same way of thinking. Tho' they were generally esteemed by the Officers and Soldiers for their Capacity and Courage, they yet thought it necessary to engage them by their good Offices. By these they succeeded. At (*) present, an Upstart General is not only put at the Head of raw Troops whom he is entirely unacquainted with, and they with him; but should this General, according to the Maxims of the great Men of Antiquity, apply himself to gain over his Men, instead of being commended for it, he is rendered suspected to his Prince: while this is the Method, how can great Generals be had, or how can they perform important Services?

Of POLITICS.

The just distinction of Politics.

POLITICS, says Lyew (†) hyang, ought to be distinguished into two Sorts: The one sort every way honest and upright; the other, mean and blameful. The principal Design of the first, is, the Good of the People; and the Authors of the second, seek only to procure some private Advantage, or to gratify some Passion. The first always acts uprightly and sincerely; the other very often uses Deceit and Dissimulation. Upon this Rule it was, that the wise Emperor Yau examining his thirteen Officers, kept nine whom he employed, and rejected four whom he caused to be put to Death. The common Fate of the Villain is to ruin himself at last, and to die without Posterity; but the honest upright Man, leaves the Example and Memory of his Virtues as a Legacy to a numerous Issue. The first Principle therefore in Point of Politics, is to propose the Good of the State, and to seek it by all honest Means: This is a Principle from which we are never allowed to deviate, tho' the Empire itself, or a large Accession of Power to its Master, were the Prize.

Besides this first Maxim, which is the most important, there are likewise others that ought not to be neglected by a good Politic Prince. In the Height of Prosperity, to be modest, to know how to yeild when it is proper, to think of the Misfortunes that may happen, to apply a speedy Remedy to the least Disorder that appears, incessantly to watch, least he should not fulfill all his Duties.

Apply'd to Examples.

While When kong was reigning in the States of Tsi, there were two other little States betwixt the Rivers Hyang and Whay, of which the one was called Kyang, the other Whang. The King of Tsû, who was their most powerful Neghbour, wanted to attack them, which they knowing very well, they entertained an extreme Aversion for that Prince. It happened that When kong, King of Tsi, in order to support the Chew Family which was then almost gone to Ruin, formed an Alliance with several other Princes, which Alliance was proposed at Yang ko, and concluded at Quan tse, where it was agreed upon to attack Tsû. The Petty States of Kyang and Whang, whether from their Esteem for When kong, or their Aversion for Tsû, sent their Deputies, and demanded to be admitted as Contracting Parties in that League. When this Affair came to be deliberated upon, Whan chong the Minister of When kong maintained, that they ought not to be admitted. These two Kingdoms, said he, are distant from Tsi, but they border upon Tsû, and are entirely at his Mercy, since he may attack them so suddenly, that it is impossible for you to save them. This would by no Means be for your Honour; and besides, Tsû will thereby become more powerful and formidable. When kong, notwithstanding his Minister's Opposition, admitted Kyang and Whang into the League: While Whan chong lived, no bad Consequences happened upon this Step; for his Wisdom provided against every thing. But as soon as he was dead, Tsû invaded Kyang and Whang. When kong was unable to save them; he passed, tho' groundlessly, for having no good Will to do it, and that he had broken his Faith with them. This Consideration greatly diminished his reputation in Honesty and Politics. The confederated Princes grew cold; he thereby was more weakened, and in a short time Tsi was not in a Condition to support itself. The first Step to its Decay, was the admitting the two little States, Kyang and Whang, into the League: Whan chong, like a good Polititian, foresaw, and When kong ought to have foreseen, the bad Consequences of this.

In the Time of the Emperor Yang vang, Tay shû his younger Brother rebelled. After he had given the Emperor great Disturbance, he retired to the States of Chin. The Emperor wanted to penetrate into them that he might there surprize him, but his Army was too weak, and he was not in a condition of succeeding by himself. Tsing and Tsin had Armies at that time in the Field; so the Emperor applied to these two Powers for Assistance. The Prince of Tsing, who, beyond Comparison, was the most powerful of the two, instead of assisting the Emperor, sought to to profit by his Difficulties. When the Spring came, he encamped on the Banks of the Yellow River, and ſtreightned the Emperor ſo, that he had almoſt taken him. Then the Petty Prince of Tſin not knowing what to do, conſulted with Kû yen his Miniſter. " Sir, ſaid Kû yen to him, " It is much better to ſupport your Emperor, than to abandon him to a Prince who is his Tri- " butary as well as yourſelf. Join your Emperor; not only Juſtice and Honour, but even your " Intereſt, requires this. The Emperors treat thoſe who are ſubmiſſive to them, with Gentleneſs: " Tho' this Rule in not always infallible, yet on this Occaſion it appears to me to be certain."

The Prince, who till then, had been in very good Terms with Tſing, and who was afraid to break with him, had ſome Difficulty to follow this Advice: He deſired his Miniſter to examine it by the Qua and the Herb Shi. Kû yen did ſo, and finding them both favourable, Tſin ordered his left Wing to advance to join the Emperor's Army; and with his Right, he beſieged Wen, where the Fugitive Tay ſhû was: All this was done ſo ſuddenly, that Tſing could not prevent it. In the fourth Moon, Tay ſhû was puniſhed for his Rebellion, and the Prince of Tſin came to Court to ſalute the Emperor, who cauſed him to eat at his own Table, and beſtow'd on him the Territories of Yan fû, Wen ywen and San mau, which encreaſed his State more than a half. This gave that Prince ſo much Credit, that within three Years he engaged a good many other Princes to come to Court with him, and pay the Emperor their Homages. The Emperor then made him a Preſent of a Bow and a Quiver full of Arrows, and honoured him with the Title of Pe. When the Prince of Tſing was informed that Tſin aſſiſted the Emperor, and that Wen was beſieged, Behold, ſaid he, the Maſterly Politics of Ku yen. In Effect, it was owing to the Councils of that Miniſter, that Tſin, from an inconſiderable, became a great, State.

Yu and Hû were two petty States in a pretty large Kingdom: Yet petty as they were, they preſerved themſelves, becauſe in a Place where their Frontiers touch'd one another, there was a narrow Paſs betwixt them and Tſin, which it was not eaſy to gain. Hyen kong, Prince of Tſin, who paſſionately wiſhed to ſwallow up theſe two States, reaſoned about it with Syun ſi his Miniſter, and aſked him by what Means it might beſt be done. " Sir, anſwers Syun ſi, I ſee only " one Way, and I believe, if you follow it, you may ſucceed. That impregnable Paſs which " covers both States, is entirely upon the Territories of Yu. When you have declared War " againſt Hû, ſend an Embaſſador to Yu to demand a Paſſage for your Troops. But it is re- " quiſite, 1. That the Ambaſſador be a well choſen Perſon, and of a moſt engaging Deportment. " 2. That he go with a modeſt humble Equipage. 3. That he carry along with him a fine Pre- " ſent, and eſpecially, that precious Stone of ſo extraordinary Bigneſs, which you ſo much value.

" That Stone, anſwered Hyen kong, is of a very great Value, and the fineſt and the moſt pre- " cious Jewel I have. If I were ſure of attaining to my Ends by means of it, it were well. " But what if the Prince of Yu, after receiving my Preſent, ſhall laugh at me, and refuſe my " Requeſt. There is no fear of that, replied Syun ſi: Your Requeſt will either be granted, or " your Preſent will be refuſed: Yu dares not do otherways: If he grants you a Paſſage, he will " receive it. But in that Caſe, your Preſent will be well beſtow'd. Beſides, to ſend your fine " Jewel to Yu is, properly ſpeaking, no other than to take it out of your own Cabinet, and to " place it for ſome time in an outer Gallery.

" But then, replies Hyen kong, this Step will be quite needleſs. The Prince of Yu has with " him Kong chi ki; he will underſtand our Drift, and perſwade his Prince to refuſe my Preſent. " Kong chi ki is a clear ſighted Man. He is ſo, anſwered Syun ſi, but as he is but like other " Men, he may ſuffer himſelf to be wrought upon at leaſt for once; and as he is as complaiſant " and not ſo old as his Prince, it is to be ſuppoſed he is leſs reſolute. His Complaiſance may " induce him to ſay nothing, or very little, on this Occaſion; or at leaſt, it is to be hoped, " that he will not have the Reſolution to make a very vigorous Oppoſition. Laſtly, tho' he " ſhould do ſo, yet the Prince, as being older than him, and tempted by your Preſent, may per- " haps receive it, contrary to the Advice of his Miniſter. It does not indeed require much Pe- " netration to ſee into our Deſigns, but I know that the Prince of Yu has a very ſhallow Com- " prehenſion."

Hyen kong, according to the Advice of Syun ſi, ſent off the Ambaſſador and the Preſent. The Prince of Yu was perfectly well pleaſed with ſuch an Embaſſy; and being ſtill more charmed with the Preſent, had already reſolv'd within himſelf upon the Part he was to act; but did not fail to conſult with Kong chi ki, at leaſt, for Forms-ſake. " Sir, ſaid Kong chi ki, I own that nothing can " be more obliging, than what the Ambaſſador of Tſin has told you; beſides, his Preſent is very " rich; but at the Bottom all this is very dangerous for your State. The Proverb ſays very well, " that when the Lips are chopt, (*) the Teeth muſt infallibly ſuffer Cold. Yu and Hû are two little " States, who mutually ſupporting one another, are hardly to be ſubdued; but if they abandon " and betray one another, how can they ſubſiſt? Hû muſt periſh firſt, but Yu will ſoon meet " with the ſame Fate."

The Prince let his Miniſter talk on; received the Preſent of Tſin, and granted the Paſſage. Hû was firſt invaded, and four Years after Hyen kong fell upon Yu. Syun ſi went in Perſon to the Expedition againſt Yu, ſeized the Treaſures of that Prince, recovered the precious Jewel, came back full Speed, and preſenting it to Hyen kong. " Sir, ſaid he to him, do you remember this Jewel? " Have I been deceived in my Conjectures? No, you have not, anſwered the Prince; behold my " Jewel recovered, and my Horſe well fatned." The Advice of Syun ſi was followed, and gained two two Kingdoms to the Prince. The Advice of Kong ſhi ki was neglected, and thereby became uſeleſs. Notwithſtanding this different Succeſs, my Opinion, both as to the one and the other, is this. They were both underſtanding Men. Kong chi ki was a Miniſter void of Blame, and Syun ſi, in more happy Times, would have been the ſame. It was a Loſs, that he lived at a Time, when Wrong, by being common, was no longer hateful.

(*) The Chineſe Expreſſion is, The Teeth of the Jaws are very long. In France to have long Teeth, in a Burleſque Senſe, ſignifies to have Faſted, quite contrary to the Meaning in Chineſe; which implies, I have acquired much.

(*) Tſing and Chau being at Variance, and each having aſſembled his Army, they came to Blows. Chau loſt the Battle, and Tſing being victorious, beſieged Kan tû; but his Troops being weakened with Fatigue, in a ſhort time, he raiſed the Siege. The King of Chau having returned to his Capital, was inclined to ſend to his Enemy to treat with him; and to offer ſix Cities to make Peace. He took this Reſolution by the Advice of Chau ho: And Chau ho himſelf was to manage the Affair. Yu king being informed of this, waited upon the King in order to diſſuade him from it. " Permit me, Sir, ſaid he to him, to aſk for what Reaſon Tſing has raiſed the Siege " of Kan tû, and has retired? Is it becauſe he has all of a ſudden entertained an other Opinion " with Regard to you, and not being able to dethrone you, he has ſpared you out of Friendſhip? " Or is it not rather becauſe his Troops, tho' victorious, have ſuffered a great deal? Their Vic- " tory has coſt them dear; and I doubt not but that the State, in which they found themſelves, " was the Cauſe of their Retreat. Tſing beſieges one of your Cities, but not being able to take " it, he retires: And you, working for him againſt yourſelf, want to give him ſix. He has no " more to do but to attack you every Year for ſome Years to come, and you may continue to treat " him in the ſame Manner, till you ſhall ſoon be without any Cities at all." The King having told this to Chau; he anſwered with an Air of Raillery, " Has Yu king numbered the Forces of " Tſing? How does he know that he has gone away meerly from Fatigue? But granting he has, " if by refuſing him a trifling Peice of Ground you make him return next Year, it will be a " quite different Affair, for then you will not come off ſo cheap. He may, perhaps, even pene- " trate into the very Heart of your Kingdom. I conſent, ſays the King, that you give up this " Piece of Ground; but if I do this, will you anſwer for it, that Tſing will not afterwards at- " tack me? I anſwer for it! Said Chau ho, no! I cannot, and I dare do it ſo much the leſs, becauſe " the other Neighbouring States, for inſtance, Hû and Whey, have taken Care to gain Tſing by " conſiderable Ceſſions. But I think it of great Importance for us to gain ſome Reſpite, and to " open a Way for Negotiations. This is what I offer to bring about. Beſides, as a Treaty has " for ſome time ſubſiſted betwixt theſe two Nations and Tſing, and the ſix Cities which " you propoſe to offer him, is a Trifle in Compariſon of what theſe States have granted; is it " to be believed that he will ſpare them more than you? So that I will engage for nothing for " the Future.

Yu king being informed of all this by the King: " Was not I in the Right, Sir? ſaid he to " him, Ho himſelf acknowledges, that if Tſing ſhall return, he perhaps may ſubdue even to the " very Heart of your Kingdom. He acknowledges at the ſame time, that tho' theſe ſix Cities " are given up, yet we cannot be abſolutely ſure that Tſing will leave us in quiet. To what " purpoſe then ſhould we give them up, if next Year he ſhall return, and we, to buy a little Reſ- " pite, ſhall give him as many? Your State then muſt be reduced to nothing. Truſt me, Sir; " you ſhould have nothing to do with Peace on ſuch Terms. However briſkly Tſing ſhall at- " tack us, and however feebly we defend ourſelves, his Conqueſts and our Loſſes can never " amount in one Year to ſix Cities. Why give them up without ſtriking one Blow? This is " ſtrengthning our Foes by weakning ourſelves. Let me add, that this would be to encreaſe his " unſatiable Avarice, and to invite him to return. When he returns, you will either give him " up the Territory, or not: If you do the firſt, I have already ſaid, that you will ſoon be a King " without a Kingdom. If you refuſe to grant him what he demands, far from thinking him- " ſelf obliged to you for what you now would offer him, he will take great Offence, and if he " can, will make you feel his Reſentment."

The King being uncertain and fluctuating betwixt the Advices of Yu king and that of Chau ko, Lew wan, who was executing a Commiſſion towards Tſing, returned to Court. The King laid before him the whole Affair, and aſked his Opinion. Lew wan having been corrupted by Tſing, ſaid, that the beſt way was to give up theſe ſix Cities to Tſing. " Believe me, Sir, adds " he, Yu king, who maintains the contrary, takes a partial View of the Affair: Tſing you " know is victorious: All are dazled with his Succeſs and court his Friendſhip; ſhould you exaſ- " perate him, the Neighbouring States will take Advantage of his Reſentment againſt you, were " it only that they make their Court to him at your Expences: And they will attack you on " one Side, while he attacks you on the other. How can you then hold out? On the contrary, " if you give up theſe ſix Cities to Tſing, every one will conclude, that you are upon good " Terms together, and no one will move. It is therefore undoubtedly your wiſeſt Courſe to yeild " them up."

Yu king was informed of all; ſo he immediately demanded an Audience. " Beware Sir, ſaid " he, Lew wan is certainly bribed by Tſing. To yeild up ſix Cities, ſays he, will ſoften Tſing, " and we will thereby prudently impoſe upon the other Princes. For my Share, I ſay that it " is gratifying the Ambition of Tſing, and publiſhing your Weakneſs to all the Empire. But " tho' I oppoſe this Ceſſion ſo ſtrongly, it is not but that I know that it is ſometimes the wiſeſt " Courſe to yeild up a Part of a Prince's Dominions, that the reſt may be preſerved. But that is nor

" not the preſent Caſe. I maintain, that to give up theſe ſix Cities to Tſing, is againſt your real " Intereſt. Why don't you rather give them up to his Mortal Enemy Tſi? You will thereby " put Tſi in a Condition to attack Tſing toward the Weſt, with almoſt equal Forces. Tſi will " readily accept this Propoſal, and then you may be both of you revenged of Tſing; and all the " World will own your Abilities. When Hû and Whey ſhall ſee, that inſtead of cowardly ſur- " rendering, like them, your Territories to Tſing, you put yourſelf in a Condition not to fear him, " they will look upon you as an able Prince, and one who may prove uſeful to them; nay, they " will privately aſſiſt you, that they may be in a Condition, if they can, to ſhake off from them- " ſelves the Yoke of Tſing. Thus, by one Stroke, you may engage to yourſelf, at leaſt, three " Kingdoms. Tſing will then talk in another Strain." The King reliſhed this laſt Advice, and ſent Yu king himſelf, to negotiate the Treaty at the Court of Tſi. The Negotiation proved ſucceſsful, and the Deſigns of Tſing upon Chau went to Smoak; of ſuch vaſt Importance is it for a Prince to have a Perſon who is at once an honeſt Man and a good Politician, to adviſe with.

Of HEREDITARY PRINCES.

CHANG TSE FANG ſeeing the Han Dynaſty well eſtabliſhed, and the Empire in Peace, notwithſtanding his being a (*) Hew, retired, ſhut the Door againſt all the World, and ſcarce ever ſtirred abroad. The Emperor was then about to degrade the Hereditary Prince, that he might ſubſtitute in his Place another of his Sons, whom he had by one of his ſecond Wives, named Tſi. He had many Obſtacles to ſurmount, and Meaſures to keep, in this. So that the thing not being finally reſolved upon, the Empreſs ſought for ſome one, who might by his Councils, or otherways, aſſiſt her in preſerving the Succeſſion to her Son. Chang tſe fang was mentioned to her as a Man of great Underſtanding and Intereſt. So the Queen inſtantly ſent to him, Lyu tſe hew and Kyen ching, to inform him of what was tranſacting, and to aſk his Advice on an Affair of ſo much Importance to the Welfare of the Empire.

In the Condition in which you repreſent things, ſaid Chang tſe fang, to go and make a Harrangue to the Emperor, perhaps that might haſten him to put the finiſhing Hand to what he now intends, or at beſt it would be quite needleſs. But an Expedient has come into my Head, which may be tried and may be ſucceſsful: For I know Kau ti, and that he would be far from diſturbing the Empire. I know four Men who have nothing to fear; (here he named them) and they are four venerable old Men, who ſeeing how much Men of Learning are undervalued, have retired to the Country, and never would accept of Poſts. His Majeſty, is acquainted with their Reputation, values their Integrity and Uprightneſs, and knows that no Treaſures can corrupt them. The Hereditary Prince muſt write to them in a humble modeſt Manner; he muſt diſpatch Chariots for them, and ſend to them ſome underſtanding Perſon to engage them to come to him. When they arrive, the Hereditary Prince muſt treat them as his Gueſts, and carefully keep them about his Perſon, ſo as that the Emperor may take Notice of it, and think that they and all others of their Character are devoted to the Prince.

The Empreſs took care punctually to execute every thing; the arrival of theſe four old Men brought others; and every Day there were ſeen with the Hereditary Prince, a great Number of grave Perſons venerable by their Grey Hairs. The Emperor, who perceived this, and particularly remarked four whom the others reſpected, one Day took Occaſion to aſk of theſe four, who they were? Each of them telling his Name; What, is it you! ſaid the Emperor, " I have often heard " your Merit talked of, and have been often willing to give you Employments: But you have been " obſtinate to keep out of the Way; and now, when you have not been ſought after, I ſee you " attending my Son; what has brought this Change about? We will freely tell you, Sir, anſwered " they, for why ſhould we diſſemble? We have kept ourſelves retired, that we might not expoſe " ourſelves to the Contempt that is ſhown to Men of Learning; but underſtanding that your " Heir was a Prince of a truely filial Piety, an univerſal Benevolence, a remarkable Affection for " Men of Letters, and in ſhort, a Prince for whom every Man of Virtue and Merit would wil- " lingly ſacrifiſe his Life; we have left our Retirement, that we may come and ſpend the Remain- " der of our Days near him. That is well, replied the Emperor, continue to take care to inſtruct my " Heir a-right": Upon this, the four old Men, after they had performed the ordinary Ceremonies, roſe and went away. The Emperor following them with his Eyes, cauſed his Concubine Tſi to come to him; and pointing at the old Men; " You know, ſaid he, what I intended to do for your Son, and it was all very right. But the Hereditary Prince, having theſe wiſe old Men in his Party, you muſt think no more about it." Such was the Succeſs of the Advice which Chang tſe fang gave the Empreſs in Favour of the Prince.

Whay, the Son, and deſigned Succeſſor of the Emperor Whey ti, loſt his Mother when he was young. When he was of Age to enter upon the Management of Affairs, Kya myé gave the reigning Empreſs a very diſadvantagious Impreſſion of that young Prince. The Empreſs, who by no means loved the Hereditary Prince, eaſily believed every thing that was told her. But as ſhe had not Grounds enough for procuring him to be degraded, ſhe pretended to be ſuſpicious that the Reports were falſe. She kept Kya myé a long time to examine him; and partly by Artifice, partly by Force, ſhe fudled him, and made him put in Writing, with a very malicious Turn which ſhe likewiſe ſuggeſted, the Report he had made to her; then ſhe carried that Writing to the Emperor. This Trick was at the Bottom too groſs and palpable; for what Man would be ſo mad as freely to give a Writing under his Hand upon ſuch an Occaſion? Beſides that, ſuppoſing Kya myé had not been forced to give this Writing, it ought to have been examined into, whether the Contents were really founded upon any Behaviour of the Hereditary Prince, or merely an idle Surmiſe.

The Emperor being a weak Prince, never reflected; and moſt of thoſe who were then in Poſts, were not more clear ſighted in the Affair than himſelf. Fey kû was the only Man who thoroughly comprehended the Affair; but either from Fear or Intereſt, neglected to paint it in its proper Colours. Whey ti did not open his Eyes, ſo that the Hereditary Prince was degraded, and died without an Opportunity of vindicating himſelf. Could any thing be more deplorable than this? It being a Proof that tho' in civil Tranſactions there are no better Evidences than Writings and Subſcriptions, yet after all, they are not entirely infallible. Hiſtory gives us more Examples of this.

Ing tſong had ſcarce mounted the Throne, when a great Officer, who was in his Favour, wanting to ruin Tſay yang, whom he hated, informed the new Emperor, that Tſay yang had done all he could to diſſuade Jin tſong from chuſing him for his Succeſſor. Ing tſong being enraged againſt Tſay yang, was about to have ruined him; but Ngew yang, who was then in Poſt, prevented him by the following ſeaſonable Remonſtrance.

" How do you know, Sir, ſaid he to him, that Tſay yang has oppoſed you? Do you know it " only by hearſay? Or have you any Writing under his Hand that confirms you in your Be- " lief? Even tho' you had Proofs ſigned under his Hand, yet I would adviſe your Majeſty not " eaſily to give it entire Credit: The Hiſtories of preceeding Ages teach us, that favorite Eu- " nuchs have more than once abuſed the Credulity of Princes, in order to deſtroy Men of " Worth by forged Writings. How much leſs ought ſimple Surmiſes and Hearſays to be relied " upon?" Ing tſong, upon this Remonſtrance, was appeaſed, and neglected the Accuſation.

Under another Reign, Ywen fû, the Enemy of Tſew hau, with a Deſign to deſtroy him more ſurely, compoſed an inſolent Remonſtance in the Name of Tſew hau, proper for exaſperating the Emperor, to whom he conveyed it. Even under our own (*) Dynaſty, She kyay having compoſed Verſes in Praiſe of Fû pi, wherein he had dropt ſome Raillery which fell upon a certain Hyau tſû; the latter, in order to be revenged of him, engaged a young Slave to counterfeit the Writing of She kyay. When this Slave was able to counterfeit it exactly, Hya tſû made her write certain Letters in the Name of She kyay; hinting, as if Tu pi and She kyay were in a Conſpiracy to raiſe a general Rebellion at the Court and in the Provinces. Under any Prince, leſs Underſtanding than Ing tſong was, theſe two great Men had died the moſt infamous Deaths. Alas! The older we grow, the more corrupted grows the World: And this deteſtable Villany of counterfeiting Writings, become likewiſe more common; it is pretty frequently practiſed at preſent, even in the moſt ordinary Affairs, and where the Intereſt is not great. How much more is it to be feared, leaſt Ambition, Envy and Revenge ſhould have Recourſe to this Practice, in order to deſtroy the Innocent? I am glad to have an Opportunity of repeating theſe Facts, on Occaſion of the Degradation of Whay, that I may inculcate all poſſible Precaution in ſo delicate a Point.

Hyen kong, the King of Tſin, had a Concubine, whoſe Name was Li ki, whom he paſſionately loved, and by whom he had a Son named I yew. Li ki formed a Deſign to make her Son ſucceed to the Throne; and for that End, to ruin the Queen's Son, whoſe Name was Shin ſeng, who was of a ripe Age, and had been the declared Heir of the Crown for many Years. As Hyen kong tenderly loved Shin ſeng, who on his Part acquitted himſelf in all the Duties of a good Son, Li ki thought, that while he was about the Court with the King his Father, ſhe could never ſucceed in her Deſign. She therefore thought upon the Means of ſeparating them; whereupon ſhe opened herſelf to Eul û, whom ſhe had taken care beforehand to engage in her Party. Li ki and Eul û knew Hyen kong to be a Prince greedy of Glory, ambitious and enterprizing, ſo they reſolved to propoſe to him the making of Conqueſts, which ſhould ſerve for Proviſions to his younger Children. Eul û took it upon him to propoſe this to the King; and before he had finally determined himſelf, the Mother of Eul û took care to make ſome Sonnets to be diſperſed about, in which theſe Projects were applauded, by celebrating beforehand the Conqueſts of the young Prince.

Hyen kong whoſe Paſſion was flattered, gave into the Snare. He drew Troops into the Field, and ſent the Hereditary Prince, as it were to take Poſſeſſion of theſe Lands, which he look'd upon as already conquered. From that Time Li ki never doubted of the Succeſs of her Project; and ſhe diſcourſed with Yew ſhi, who was her Creature, about the Means of ruining Shin ſeng. If you pleaſe, ſaid Yew ſhi, Calumny muſt do the Buſineſs; the handſomeſt neateſt Things are the moſt eaſily ſpoilt, and the moſt innocent Perſons are the leaſt ſkilful in juſtifying themſelves. Shin ſeng, whoſe Reputation has been hitherto ſo unblemiſhed, will never be able to bear a Calumny, and he will certainly kill himſelf. Li ki reliſhed this Advice very well; but being afraid, leaſt Hyen kong might be leſs apt to take Fire at a flying Report, which was only talked of without Doors; ſhe thought the beſt Way was to calumniate Shin ſeng directly to his Father. Li ki therefore one Night came all in Tears, and told Hyen kong with a great Air of Concern, that ſhe had received certain Information that Shin ſeng was plotting a Rebellion; and that his Majeſty's Favours beſtowed on her, were the Pretences he uſed for animating his Party. That therefore ſhe begged Leave to die, or at leaſt to retire, that ſhe might remove every Pretext of that Rebellion. Hyen kong, haughty by Nature, and blinded by Love, far from giving way to this, reſolved to ruin his Son Shin ſeng immediately, and aſſured Li ki of it, to comfort her.

(*) This Author lived under Song Dynaſty.

As in reality Shin ſeng gave him no handle, Hyen kong, in order to ruin him, abandoned his other Projects, declared War againſt Yo, and made Shin ſeng his General. The Expedition, ſaid Hyen kong to Li ki, is very dangerous; in all Probability he will fall in it, and then we ſhall get rid of him without any Noiſe. If he ſhall happen to come off victorious, it will be ſtill time enough to puniſh him for rebelling againſt his King and Father; which I know well how to manage. Li ki, raviſhed with the promiſing Aſpect of her Artifice, imparted her hopes to her Confidents, telling them withall that ſhe had two Things ſtill to fear; The firſt, leaſt the King ſhould take the Affair to ſecond Thoughts: The ſecond was, leaſt that when Shin ſeng died, the great Men ſhould cauſe ſome other than her Son I yû to be declared the Succeſſor. In order to guard againſt this ſecond Inconveniency, it was thought proper, that ſome great Officer of War ſhould be gained over to her Side. Li kê, who was a Man as wicked as he was bold, was thought of for this Purpoſe. Yew ſhi, who was charged with the Care of ſounding him, gave him to underſtand, that he was certainly informed that Shin ſeng was ruined in the King's Affections, and that he muſt infallibly periſh one way or other; that the Queſtion in that Event lay, whom they ought to think of for Hereditary Prince; that conſidering the King's Paſſion for Li ki, there was no room to doubt, but that if it was left to his free Determination, he would nominate I yû: That if he [Li kê] would ſupport this Nomination againſt all Oppoſition, the King would doubtleſs be grateful; and that Li ki on her Part, aſſured him, that if the thing ſucceeded, he ſhould be a great Man about her Son. Li kê gave him his Word, that if Shin ſheng ſhould periſh, of which he ſaw but little Probability, he would be for I yû, and that he was able to ſupport him; that there was nothing now to do but to haſten the Fate of Shin ſeng, that Hyen kong might not have time to repent, or to diſcover their Plots. Immediately, a Report of a Rebellion formed by Shin ſeng was ſpread abroad; but that it was happily diſcovered. They likewiſe diſperſed Songs, ſuppoſing the ſame thing, which made it to be believed by all the People, and confirmed the King himſelf in his Miſtake. Shin ſeng could not bear with the Calumny; and killed himſelf. Chong eul, the uterine Brother of Shin ſeng, fearing a like Fate, left the Kingdom, and retired to the States of Tſi. In the mean time, Hyen kong died without naming any Succeſſor, and Ki tſi, the Son of Shin ſeng, who was yet an Infant, was declared King by the great Men of the Kingdom; but Li kê and his Party diſpatch'd him, together with his Brother Cho tſe; whereupon I yû the Son of Li ki mounted the Throne, but he never reigned in Peace. The Kingdom of Tſin was always in diſorder, till at laſt Chong eul, the Brother of Shin ſeng, after an Abſence of twenty Years mounted the Throne, and was acknowledged lawful Sovereign. We may conclude, that nothing is more dangerous in a State, than a Woman with whom the Prince is too much in Love.

Of REMONSTRANCES.

ALMOST all the Faults of a Sovereign, ſays Lyew hyang, are of Conſequence; they being alſo many Steps that lead him to his Ruin. When a Man is in Poſt, if he ſees theſe Faults and yet is ſilent; he has very little concern for the Safety of his Prince, and he is not a zealous loyal Subject. But this Zeal muſt likewiſe be bounded: The common Rule on this Head is, that when a Man has three Times made Remonſtrances on the ſame Point to no Purpoſe; his beſt Courſe is to lay down his Poſt and to retire: Otherwiſe, he expoſes his own Life, which a reaſonable Self-love ought to prevent. To be ſilent when a Prince commits Faults, is hazarding both the Prince and his State; and to ſpeak boldly, frequently expoſes ones ſelf to Ruin. But true Zeal ought to induce us to expoſe our own Lives, rather than to leave both Prince and State in Danger for want of a wholeſome Advice; tho' a Man does enough if he ſpeaks frequently and to no Purpoſe (§). The Art of it lies in knowing the Prince perfectly well, in maturely weighing the Junctures that are more or leſs preſſing, in taking advantage of all, in ſheltering your ſelf, if it is poſſible, whithout failing in your Duty to your Prince and your Country.

The ſame Lyew hyang relates the following Hiſtory. Ling kong reigning in the State of Wey, very much employ'd one Mi tſe twan a Man void of all Merit and Virtue, and entruſted no part of the Government with the Wiſe and Virtuous Kyu pe yû. Su tſyû who was in Poſt, during all his Life, did his utmoſt to have the firſt baniſhed, and the other promoted, but always to no Purpoſe. Finding his Death approaching, he called his Son, and ſpoke to him as follows. "I "order you after my Death, not to perform the Ceremonies of Mourning in the ordinary Place; "for I am not worthy of that Honour. I have not had the Skill to do my Prince the important "Service of perſwading him to baniſh Mi tſe twan, and to promote Kyu pe yû. Take "the Northern-Hall for the Place of the Ceremonies; that is enough for me." Su tſyû being dead, the Prince came to his (†) Tyau, and finding that they had choſen the Hall of the North, for the Place of the Ceremony, aſked the Reaſon of it. The Son of Su tſyû, told him ingenuouſly what his Father had ſaid to him upon his Deathbed. Ling kong ſtriking the Ground with his Foot, changing his Countenance, and waking as it were from a profound Sleep, ſaid with a Sigh: "My (‡) Maſter endeavour'd all his Life, but to no purpoſe, to give me a good Miniſ-"ter, and to engage me to baniſh a bad One. He has never deſiſted, and after his Death has "found Means to repeat the Remonſtrances, which he in vain made me during his Life. Be-"hold a conſtant Zeal"! Immediately, Ling kong ordered the Hall of Mourning to be changed according to the Rites, ſent away Mi tſe twan, and took home Kyu pe yû: All the Kingdom applauded applauded and were glad of this Change, Su tſyû had the Lordſhip of Tſiû yu, and it was upon him, that this Exclamation of Confuçius in the Book (*) Yu fell; " Oh! What an admirable upright Man was Tſe yu."

Kin kong King of Tſi, had a fine Horſe which he loved, and this Horſe died by the fault of the Groom. The Prince being in great Rage, ſnatched a Lance and was going to run him through. But Yen tſe who was preſent, turn'd aſide the Blow, and inſtantly addreſſing himſelf to the Prince. " Sir, ſaid he, that Man was very near being dead, before he knew the " Heinouſneſs of his Crime. I conſent, anſwered Kin kong, that you make him ſenſible of it. " Then Yen tſe taking the Lance and aiming it at the Criminal: Wretch, ſaid he to him Attentively hear your Crimes, which are as follows. Firſt, you have been the Cauſe of the " Death of a Horſe; which your Prince committed to your ſpecial Care: Thereby, you deſerve Death. In the ſecond Place, you have been the Cauſe why my Prince, becauſe you " have loſt his Horſe, has fallen into ſuch a Paſſion, that he would kill you with his own Hand. " Behold a ſecond capital Crime more grievous than the Firſt. Laſtly, All the Princes, and all " the Neighbouring States will thereby know, that my Prince wants to take away a Man's " Life to revenge the Death of a Horſe; and thus his Reputation is ruined: And you Wretch " have been the Occaſion of all theſe Conſequences. Do you rightly conceive your Fault. Let " him go, let him go, cry'd the Prince, dont let me break in upon my Goodneſs, I pardon " him."

The ſame Prince having one day drunk pretty freely, laid aſide his Cap and Girdle, put himſelf into a negligent Dreſs, took a Muſical Inſtrument into his Hand, and aſked of thoſe who were preſent, if it was allowable in a Virtuous Man to divert himſelf in that Manner. Every one anſwered; doubtleſs it was; why was it not? If it is ſo, ſaid Kin kong, let the Horſes be put to the Chariot, and Yen tſe invited hither. Yen tſe came upon the firſt Notice that was given him, but in his Habit of Ceremony as uſual. Kin kong ſeeing Yen tſe enter; " We are here, " ſaid he, quite free, diverting ourſelves, and I have ſent for you to ſhare in our Diverſions. Yen " tſe immediatly reply'd; Your Pardon, Sir, I cannot do that, if I did, I muſt violate the Rites " and I am prodigiouſly afraid of infringing them. It is look'd upon as a certain Maxim, that " an Emperor who forgets himſelf ſo far as to offend in this Point; cannot long preſerve the Empire. The ſame Thing in ſome meaſure may be ſaid of all Kings and Princes, great Officers and " Fathers of Families; the Shi king mentions even Man in general, to whom it is more advan- " tageous to die young, than to live in a Forgetfulneſs of the Rites. Kin kong bluſh'd and roſe " at theſe Words, and thanked Yen tſe; I own, ſaid he, that I am a Man without Virtue; but I " have none but a parcel of Scoundrels for my Attendants. All theſe People whom you ſee, have " a great ſhare in my Fault, and I deſign to cauſe them to be put to Death as an Atonement for it. " Sir, anſwered Yen tſe, the part they have in your Crime, in my Opinion is very inconſiderable. " When a Prince is attached to the Rites, none but they who have the ſame Attachment with " him, approach him, the others ſoon retire. The Reverſe of this naturally happens when the " Sovereign forgets himſelf: Don't therefore take up with them": You are in the Right, ſaid Kin kong; ſo he immediately put on a becoming Habit, drank three Cups to Yen tſe, and conducted him back.

The King of U, being reſolved to attack the States of King, publickly declared his Intention, adding withall, that he was ſo determined in it, that whoever ſhould preſume to remonſtrate againſt it ſhould be immediately put to Death. An Officer of his Houſhold named Shau i tſe, being perſwaded of the Danger of that Expedition, ſought for the Means to make the Prince ſenſible of it likewiſe. But as it was as much as his Life was worth to do it openly, he took another Method. In the Morning he went with his Bow into a Park, where he ſuffered all the Inconveniecies of the falling Dew; and at the ordinary Hour, he preſented himſelf with others before the Prince. On the third Day the Prince obſerv'd it, and aſked how he came to be ſo wet. " Sir, anſwer'd he, I have been in the Park, where there was a Graſhopper, perch'd " aloft upon a Tree, and being well fill'd with Dew, was ſinging very pleaſantly. A (†) Tang " lang was behind her, whom ſhe did not obſerve, for if ſhe had, ſhe would have ſoon chang'd " her Note. I obſerv'd this Tang lang which privately glided down, and drawing near the Graſhopper, already reckon'd her as his Prey, but ſhe did not ſee him. Pretty near him upon the ſame " Tree, there was a (§) Yellow Bird ready to dart upon the Tang lang. I obſerv'd this Bird likewiſe, " who being quite intent upon his Prey, was lengthning his Neck to ſeize it, without perceiving " that I was below, and that I was looking at him. While I was beholding all this, I ſaid to my " ſelf; Poor Creatures, you are employ'd in the hopes of Prey, which preſents to you, and you " think yourſelf ſure of it; but a Danger is ſtill more near, and you don't perceive it. If you " ſaw your own Situation, the Prey would be inſipid to you, you would ſoon fly away, happy in " ſaving yourſelf without it. I underſtand you, ſaid the King, no more of the King, let us think " of ourſelves."

Chwang vang, King of Tſû, undertook to make a vaſt Terraſs ſeveral ſtories high. This uſeleſs Work required a great Expence, and both Officers and People were harraſſed with it: The great Officers of the Kingdom, made ſtrong Repreſentations to the Prince upon this Point, but they forfeited their Heads for their Zeal, the Prince having put ſeventy two of them to Death one after another. Chu yu ki an able Man, who had retired to the Country, having underſtood what paſt; while he was labouring his Ground, he entered into a Converſation with his Plough and ſaid: "I deſign to go and ſee the King. What are you weary of Life? anſwered "he, perſonating the Plough, a great many Men of Merit and Figure, who have already pre- "ſumed to adviſe the King have gained nothing by it but a ſpeedy Death: And what can you, "who are a poor Huſbandman pretend to: He then anſwered in this Manner; Had the Gen- "tlemen in the Court apply'd themſeves to Agriculture; they perhaps would have done better "than my ſelf: And if I ſhall adviſe the King, perhaps I may do better than them. He then "left his Plough, and went to preſent himſelf before the King."

Chwang vang ſeeing him enter, addreſſing himſelf to him, ſaid; "Doubtleſs Chu yu ki is "come to make a Remonſtrance to me likewiſe. Who I, Sir, ſaid he, not at all, I will take care "of that: It is true I am not Ignorant of what is ſaid; that Sovereigns ought to be juſt and "merciful. It is likewiſe true, that it is commonly ſaid, that as good Ground profitably re- "ceives the Streams which water it: And as no Wood but that which is well plan'd, can ſuffer "to be examined by the Compaſs and Rule; in the ſame Manner, wiſe and virtuous Princes "profit by Remonſtrances; it is likewiſe true, that all the World ſays, that you have under- "taken a Work, which oppreſſes great Numbers of your People. But what am I, that I "ſhould preſume to make Remonſtrances to you upon that Head? No I will take care of that: Immediately turning himſelf to the Officers that were preſent, and continuing to ſpeak: "Not- "withſtanding my Ignorance, ſaid he, I have heard it ſaid, that the King of Yu forfeited his "State for not regarding the Councils of Kong chi ki. Chun fell a Sacrifice to Tſû in the ſame "Manner. Song never could have ſubdued Tſau, if he had given any Credit to Hi ſû, Tſi "made himſelf Maſter of the States of Lyu, becauſe that Lyu neglected the wholeſome Ad- "vices of Tſe mong: U would have mantain'd himſelf againſt Swê, if that Prince had believed "Tſe ſi. To what can the Ruin of Tſing be attributed, but to his undervaluing the good Ad- "vice of Kyen ſhû; Laſtly, let us go farther back, Kyê put Quang whang pong to Death, for "making Remonſtrances to him. Kyê ſoon after periſhed himſelf, and Tang ſtepp'd into his "Place. Wang tſe, for the ſame Reaſon, met with the ſame Fate under Chew, which Chew af- "terwards loſt both the Empire and his Life, and was ſucceeded by Vû vang. Under one of the "Deſcendants of Vû vang, Tu pê a zealous Miniſter was rewarded for his Zeal by a cruel Death; "from that time forward, that Illuſtrious Dynaſty went to Decay; behold therefore three Em- "perors, and ſix other Princes, who, becauſe they undervalued Virtue, and did not profit by Re- "monſtrances, loſt all, and ruined themſelves.

When Chu yu ki had finiſhed theſe Words, he went abruptly out, that he might thereby ſhun the Princes Anger. But Chwang vang cauſed one to run after him, and when he ſaw him return, "Draw near without Dread, ſaid he to him, your Advices have made an Impreſſion upon my Mind. "All they who have hitherto ventured to make Remonſtrances to me, have endeavoured only to "exaſperate me, without ſaying any thing to me that was moving; therefore it coſt them their "Lives. On the contrary, you, without ſaying any thing that is rude, have laid before me Exam- "ples which are as ſenſible as they are affecting; for which Reaſon I agree to them." Orders were then given, that the Terraſs ſhould remain in the ſame Situation it was then in. Beſides, Chwang vang cauſed it to be publiſhed, that he would thenceforth look upon them who gave him uſeful Advices, as Brothers. This Converſion brought about by a Huſbandman, was very much celebrated, and the People of Tſû made Songs upon it.

The Reaſon why Princes commonly don't love Remonſtrances, is, a Love for their own Reputation, or ſome Paſſion which is too dear to them to quit; or perhaps, both theſe Cauſes united. No Prince is ſo wicked as entirely to renounce the Care of his Reputation. Even they who abandon themſelves to the greateſt Irregularities, would be very well pleaſed to have them concealed. Remonſtrances make them ſenſible that their real Character is known, and therefore they hate them. This was formerly the Caſe of Kyê and Chew; and ſince their Time has been the Caſe of others. Sometimes a Prince has a Paſſion which he perceives himſelf not at all diſpoſed to curb; tho' he is ſenſible that it is known, and tho' he is acquainted with People's Thoughts about it, yet he does not care that he ſhould be told of it. This is an important Truth. Such was Hyen kong, Prince of Tſin, who could not live without his ſecond Wife Li ki. Such likewiſe was When kong Prince of Tſi, who reliſhed no Meats that did not come to him from I in. As for Remonſtrance-Makers, there are two Sorts of them. The one Sort propoſes to correct the Prince, ſo as to take care at the ſame time not to trouble the State, nor ruin themſelves. With this View they carefully watch their Times, take their Meaſures, and uſe Terms that have nothing in them too ſtrong. Kau ſhû behaved thus, that he might reconcile (*) Chwang kong with the Queen his Mother. Chang tang, that he might inſpire (†) Wen ſhew with an (*) Chwang kong for ſome great Diſſatisfaction had baniſhed his Mother. That Prince who loved and eſteemed Kau ſhû, cauſed him one Day to eat at his Table; and from the Honour and Friendſhip he had for him, preſented him with ſome nice Bit. "Sir, anſwered Kau ſhû thanking him, I have an excel- "lent Mother at home, allow me to keep it, that I may carry "it to her. She never yet eat any thing that came from your "Table." Chwang kong ſaw the Drift of Kau ſhû, and found himſelf affected; ſo he recalled the Queen-Mother from Baniſhment, and ever after lived with her in a good Underſtanding.

(†) Wen ſhew was a Prince who loved no body, not even his neareſt Relations. Chang tang wanting to make the Prince ſenſible of this Fault, in the moſt proper Manner to reclaim him, preſented him with a very fine Dog, and a yet finer Gooſe. That kind of Wild Gooſe, which in Chineſe is called Yen, is the Symbol of Alliance and Affection, and anciently was one of the Nuptial Preſents. Wen ſhew received theſe two Animals, and ſhewed a great liking for them. Chang tang then took Occaſion to make a Remonſtrance to that Prince, which was well received, and had its due Effect.

Affection for his Relations. Chang tſe fang, that he might ſupport the Hereditary Prince againſt the Intrigues of the Concubine (*) Tſi, and to rid (†) Kau ti of two other Faults.

Other Remonſtrators, without conſidering Conſequences, either with Regard to the State or their own Perſons, think only how to gain a Name to themſelves, and keep no Meaſures; they ſtudy Tropes and Figures, in order always to chuſe the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſtricking. Such in their Time were (‡) Li hyen yun, and the great Cenſor Lyew. Whoever follows the Example of thoſe, may indeed be very ſure of gaining a Name in Hiſtory, but he can never expect any Fruit from his Remonſtrances, but to draw down upon himſelf the Wrath and Indignation of his Prince.

Of GOVERNMENT.

TSE TSAN, Prime Miniſter of Chin, on his Death-Bed ſaid to Tay ſhû. You will infallibly ſucceed me: And I deſire, before I die, to give you an Advice. Gentleneſs and Indulgence may ſometimes ſucceed, but it is only when it is ſupported by an eminent and approved Virtue; without this, the ſureſt Way is to uſe ſome Severity. Fire is an active and violent Element, feared by every body; and for that very Reaſon occaſions the Death of very few. But vaſt Numbers periſh in the Water, which appears to yeild eaſily, and has nothing in it that is formidable. Take Care; for it is a very difficult Taſk to govern by Gentleneſs alone.

Some Months after Tſe tſan being dead, Tay ſhû ſucceeded him; and at firſt had not Courage enough to conquer his natural Temper ſo far, as to uſe Severity. But he ſoon ſaw that Gentleneſs alone ſpoilt all. Then calling to his Mind the Advice of Tſe tſan, and acknowledging his Fault, O my Maſter! cried he, had I at firſt profited by your Councils, Things could never have come to this paſs. But he then applied the Remedy, by altering his Conduct; and this Change ſucceeded with him.

In effect, ſays Confucius upon this Point, a Government of Gentleneſs alone, frequently renders the People inſolent. They require Rigour to curb them; but Severity by itſelf oppreſſes and exaſperates them. Gentleneſs ought likewiſe to be under proper Regulations. A juſt Mixture of both makes a State happy and peaceable. The two main Springs of Government, are Virtue and Reſolution. Princes of the firſt Rate employ only the former; and are very ſparing in the Uſe of the other. Others who are leſs perfect uſe them both, almoſt promiſcuouſly. Laſtly, there are Princes who lay great Streſs upon Severity, and little upon Virtue.

Whatever Difference there is among theſe three Kinds of Government, we may ſay of them in general, that neither of them can ſucceed without theſe two Springs. The firſt encourages the People in the Practice of Good. The other puniſhes their Faults and prevents their relapſing. Princes, that they may animate their Subjects to Virtue, beſides the Pattern which they themſelves ſet, have ſeveral Ways to make their People ſenſible how much they value it. Thence proceed Rewards, of which there are ſeveral Kinds. They likewiſe have different Ways of teſtifying their Horror for Vice. Thence proceed Puniſhments. Nothing is of greater Conſequence to a State, than this wiſe Mixture of Rewards and Puniſhments. The Faults of Princes in this Point, commonly have fatal Conſequences. The Shu king ſays, I have often heard it repeated, that theſe two important Points ought entirely to employ a Sovereign.

Have you ſeen the (||) Nu king touched? You may then obſerve, that if too great a Motion is given to the large Strings, the little ones are uſeleſs, and the Harmony is incompleat: Thus it happens in the Government of a State.

A Reputation which is too quickly gained, and is too glaring in Point of Government, is neither very extenſive, nor very laſting. Such a Man for a long time has conſtantly had a good Character in the Empire, but it has made no great Noiſe; and he has acquired it by little and little. This is likewiſe the Meaning of the Proverb; A Horſe that is ready to gallop when he leaves the Stable, is not one of thoſe who can make 100 Leagues on a Stretch. To have more Reputation than Merit, to obtain of the Prince Rewards of much greater Value than one's Services, are two things, which in my Opinion, are more to be feared than wiſhed.

When kong King of Tſi, having taken Quan chong for his Miniſter, one Day ſaid to him: " My Ambition is to ſee my Government eſtabliſhed in ſuch a Manner, as that every one, " even (†) The Dynaſty of Tſin being extinct, Lyew pang, who was afterwards Emperor, and ſurnamed Kau ti, diſputing the Crown with ſome others, being defeated in an Engagement, found himſelf in ſuch a Situation, that his Perſon might have fallen into the Hands of the Enemies if they had had a Mind. Yong chi, an Officer of the victorious Army, was of Opinion, that Lyew pang ſhould be diſpatched out of the Way. But Ting kong, another Officer of the ſame Army, ſecretly gave Lyew pang an Opportunity to eſcape, telling him withall, 'I let you eſcape, but if you come to be Emperor, as probably you will, I deſire that you would make me a Heou.' When Lyew pang became Maſter of the Empire, he wanted to have puniſhed Yong chi, and to have rewarded Ting kong. " You don't conſider, Sir, ſaid Chang tſe " fang to him: Give me leave to tell you, that Yong chi has " ſhewed his Zeal and Loyalty for the Maſter he ſerved, and " you for that Reaſon would put him to Death; you ought to " promote him: As for Ting kong, he has from intereſted Views " betrayed his Party, and if you promote him, it will be an " Invitation to your Subjects to imitate him on the like Occaſion. Were my Advice taken, Tong kong ſhould have his " Head cut off." Kau ti comprehended the Importance of this Advice, and followed it contrary to his Inclination.

(‡) Under the Tang Dynaſty, an Emperor fell in Love with a Slave in the Palace, who afterwards became Empreſs. She laid hold of ſo many Opportunities of eſtabliſhing her own Authority by his Favour, that after the Death of the Emperor ſhe ſeized the Government, which ſhe kept in Prejudice of the late Emperor's Son the Hereditary Prince, who was baniſhed far from the Court, and made the petty Prince of Lû lin. Li hyen and the Cenſor Lyew, preſented her from time to time, the moſt bitter Remonſtrances on this and other Points of her Conduct. The Cenſor Lyew went ſo far as to tell her flatly, that ſhe having been once a mean Slave, it leſs became her to act in that Manner. She cauſed them both to be put to Death. But afterwards, more moderate and more ſeaſonable Remonſtrances made her recall the Prince and eſtabliſh him a-new, but without diveſting herſelf of the Government. This Point of Hiſtory has been touched upon elſewhere.

(||) An Inſtrument of Muſic.

" even of the loweſt People, ſhould be ſatisfied, and ſay, that every thing goes well. Do you be" lieve that this can be attained to? Yes, anſwered Quan chong, I believe it may; but not in a Go" vernment which follows the Rules of true Wiſdom: Why not? replied the King. For the " ſame Reaſon, anſwered Quan chong, why a ſhort bit of Rope is not ſufficient to draw Water " out of a deep Well. Even among underſtanding Men, there are different Orders, of which " ſome are a great deal above others. By a much ſtronger Reaſon, the Multitude cannot reach " the ſublime Views of the truely Wiſe. Therefore it is not neceſſary that they ſhould aim at " that Pitch of Perfection. It is ſufficient, and even convenient, that they be ſenſible that their " Governors have Views infinitely ſuperior to theirs. They are then more tractable and more
" ſubmiſſive." To endeavour to lead the People by the Hand, and as it were to put the Morſel into their Mouths, is ſpoiling them. They muſt only be kept in order. Their Safety muſt be watched over, and they muſt be fed as a Shepherd feeds his Flock. People muſt be treated neither with Tyranny nor Severity. But then, Governors muſt not be afraid of conducting and regulating their Actions. It would be a dangerous Method, before an Ordinance is publiſhed, to run from Door to Door begging for Approbation. Governors examine what is convenient, and the Ordinance is iſſued for every one's Obedience in general. The Wiſe then approve of it, and the others obey it. This is ſufficient, and it is certainly the beſt Method.

The ſame When kong being one Day a hunting, and chaſing a Deer which he had wounded, met with a good old Man in an agreeable Valley. He aſked the old Man how that Place was called? " It is called, anſwered the other with a Smile, the Valley of the ſimple old Man. Whence " did it get that Name, replied the King? From my ſelf, anſwered the old Man. How! ſays " the King? You have a promiſing Aſpect, and ſeem to be far from being ſimple. The Hiſto-" ry, anſwers the old Man, ſince you want to know it, is as follows. My Cow brought forth a " Calf, which being grown up, I ſold, and bought a Foal. Upon which ſome of the Neigh-" bours came and jeered me; What, ſaid they, has your Cow brought forth a Foal? never was " ſuch a thing before; the Monſter muſt be deſtroyed. Whereupon they ſeized and carried the " Foal away; and I ſuffered them to do it. When this Story was heard, every body in the Vil-" lage cryed out, O the Simpleton! And for that Reaſon, this Place is called the Valley of the ſim-" ple old Man. Why ſo you was, anſwered the King; why did you give up your Foal ſo?"

Next Morning when When kong returned, and Quan chong came to an Audience, the King told him this Adventure to divert him. But Quan chong with a ſerious and even a melancholy Air, took the Thing in another Senſe. " Sir, ſaid he to the Prince, This is no laughing Matter; " the Country Man's Tale was a Leſſon to you and to me. Were Yau reigning here, Reaſon " and Juſtice would reign likewiſe. Nor would it be treated as a Trifle for a Man's Goods to be " taken from him in ſuch a Manner. If this old Man was patient, and ſuffered himſelf to be " robbed of his Foal without complaining, it was not from Stupidity. He knew that he could " obtain Juſtice only from the Tribunals: Let us retire, Sir, for ſome time, and ſeriouſly examine " where the Source of this Evil is, that we may effectually cure it." Confuçius thought this Saying of Quan chong ſo beautiful, that he recommended it to his Diſciples not to forget it.

Kang tſe reigning in the Principality of Lû; a Father and a Son mutually accuſed each other before a Judge. The Affair coming before the Prince, he pronounced that the Son muſt die. Confuçius oppoſed this Sentence, ſaying, " That it was not then a Time to puniſh Crimes with " the utmoſt Severity. Theſe poor People, added he, have been long without Inſtruction, and " conſequently they underſtand very little about their Duties. The Son, doubtleſs has not com-" prehended the heinouſneſs of the Crime of accuſing his Father. This ought to be imputed to " the Prince and the other Governors. If they did their Duties right, and eſpecially if they " were all virtuous, the People would never fall into ſuch Faults. Kang tſe being willing to de-" fend his Judgment, replied; Filial Piety being univerſally acknowledged the fundamental " Point of Government, to ſtop by the Death of one Man, the Diſorders that violate this Duty, " is not only allowable, but neceſſary. I ſay, Sir, anſwered Confuçius, in the preſent Situation, it " would be Cruelty. Procure to your People the Inſtruction that is needful; and to that add a " good Example. Then you may puniſh with Rigour; and they that you puniſh will be ſenſi-" ble that they deſerve their Puniſhment. This Wall is but a (*) Jin in Height: Yet there is " not one Man in your whole Kingdom, who can all at once, without a Ladder, get to the Top " of it. On the contrary, there is ſcarce any body, who by degrees, cannot get to the Top of " that Mountain, which is 100 times higher than the Wall. In the State in which your People " are at preſent, Charity and Juſtice, theſe two capital Virtues, and conſequently all the others, are " to them like a ſteep Wall. Is this a Time for imputing it as a Crime to any one, becauſe he " cannot get to the Top of that Wall? Give Time to the People, ſays the Shi king, and procure " them the Means of being made ſenſible of their Blindneſs and their bad Habits."

The King of Shang converſing with Confuçius ſaid to him; My Deſires are to be at the Head of a good many Princes; to have my Court in good Order, and furniſh'd with good Officers; to keep my People always ſatisfied and quiet; to ſee Men of Learning apply themſelves to be uſeful to the State, and to have the Seaſons well regulated. If you believe that all theſe Things are really poſſible, what do you think muſt I do to attain to them? Confuçius anſwer'd, I have been in Company with ſeveral Princes who have aſked Queſtions of me, but none of them ever aſked me ſo many as you do. However, my Anſwer to you is, that I believe that all this is poſſible enough, in the following Manner; As for your firſt Article, it is ſuffi-

(*) The Name of a Meaſure, cient, in the Situation in which I ſee Things, to enter into an Alliance with your Neighbours heartily and ſincerely. As for the ſecond, you muſt be gentle and liberal, with regard to thoſe who come near your Perſon. To obtain the third, you ought never to treat the Innocent ill, and you muſt puniſh the Guilty without Pardon. That you may bring the fourth about, you are to advance Men of Learning when they deſerve it, and to let few of them be without Poſts. To obtain the fifth, you muſt honour Tyen and the Spirits. You are in the right of it, ſaid the King: there is nothing in all this but what is probable.

Tong ngan yu being nominated to be Intendant of the Territory of Tſing yang, begg'd of Kyen lau that he would give him in a few Words ſome important Leſſon upon Government. Kyen lau anſwer'd him in three Words, Zeal, Honour and Courage. Tong ngan yu begg'd that he would be a little more explicit upon theſe Words. Kyen lau reply'd, Zeal and Loyalty for the Prince your Maſter; Honour and Honeſty to maintain the Orders, you ſhall give, and the Perſons you employ, and Courage and Reſolution againſt the Wicked, of all Degrees and Ranks. Tis all right, ſaid Tong ngan yu, and I am convinced of the Importance of what you have told me.

Mi tſe hyen intendant of the Territory of Tan fû, ſpent ſome part of his Life in practiſing upon his (*) Kin, and to all Appearance gave himſelf no Trouble. In the mean time, every Thing was in Order, and Affairs never went better. U ma ki ſucceeded him. He preſerv'd Order pretty well for ſome, but it was by being at a great deal of pains Night and Day. Afterwards, they both met together, and U maki ſaid to Mi tſe hyen; when you was at Tau fu, you diverted youſelf almoſt the whole Day, and you made you Poſt an Amuſement; yet when you went away I found every Thing in very good order. As for me, I have been at a great deal of Pains, but all I can gain is to do no Harm. Whence, I beg of you, does this difference proceed? Becauſe, anſwerd Mi tſe hyen ſmiling, I uſed my own Powers very ſparingly, and made the Powers of others act; but you act all by your own. In effect, the Country People comparing the one with the other, ſaid, that Mi tſe hyen was an able Man, but that U ma ki did not come near him.

Tſe kong being nominated the Magiſtrate of Sin yang, before he ſet out for his Government, came to take Leave of his Maſter Confuçius, who told him with a pretty grave Air: Take care while you are in Poſt, that you be guilty neither of Violence, Oppreſſion, Cruelty nor Theft. Who I? Said Tſe kong in a Surprize; I, who have from my Childhood had you for my Maſter; can I be capable of ſuch Enormities? Is it then poſſible that you can have ſo poor an Opinion of me? You don't comprehend my Meaning, anſwered Confuçius with a franker Air. There are ſeveral Kinds of Violence and Oppreſſion, Cruelty and Theft. Give the Poſts that depend upon you, to Perſons of Abilities and Virtues; But to ſet them aſide by placing, or even permitting the Wicked and the Weak to fill them, is Violence. To ſuffer Men who have ſome Abilities, or even Virtues, if they get the upperhand, to oppreſs thoſe who want them, or to act in that Manner yourſelf, is Oppreſſion. Not to be exact and careful in inſtructing and directing your Inferiors, and yet to be ſubject to Paſſion and prompt to puniſh, is Cruelty. To aſcribe the Good another does to yourſelf, and to deprive him of the Glory he has by it, is Theft. And this is a Theft, not ſo very rare among many who paſs for Men of Honour. Do you believe that to be guilty of Theft, you muſt ſteal your Neighbour's Cloaths or Money? Think rightly upon what is ſaid; " A good Magiſtrate reſpects the Laws, and ought to be the Guardian of them for the Peoples " Advantage; but a bad one make them ſerve to oppreſs that very People." Nothing is more true. Thence proceeds Murmurs and Imprecations. Equity and Diſintereſtedneſs are two eſſential Points, and they are both the Duty and Saftey of a Magiſtrate. To ſtifle the Good another does, or to conceal it, is wrong. But to diſcover or blaze abroad their Failings, is worſe. Never did one loſe, and he commonly gains, by enhancing the Value of the Good another does. On the contrary, nothing is gained; and generally every thing is loſt, by publiſhing the Faults of another. Therefore the wiſe Man never ſpeaks but with a great deal of Caution. Remark this, and be convinced, that a Man never gains any thing for himſelf by hurting his Neighbour.

Yang chu being one Day with the King of Lyang, was expatiating upon the Government of States, which he advanced and maintained to be a very eaſy Matter. Maſter, ſaid the King to him, you have only a Wife and a Concubine, and I know you can't govern them. Yet, if we may believe you, the Government of a State would be a meer Trifle to you. Sir, anſwered Yang chu, that is all true, and is no way inconſiſtent. A ſingle Shepherd with his Crook in his Hand guides 100 Sheep with Succeſs: But if two (||) Shepherds ſhould undertake to manage one, they would find Difficulty in it. But don't you know the common Proverb; Great Inſtruments of Muſic are of no Value to Strollers: Great fiſhes are produced in great Waters. A Man who fails of Succeſs in ſmall Affairs, may ſucceed in great ones.

When kong one Day aſked his Miniſter Quan chong, what was moſt to be feared in a State? Quan chong anſwered: Sir, in my Opinion, nothing is to be more feared than what is called a Rat in a Statue. When kong not underſtanding the Allegory, Quan chong explained it to him. You know that in a good many Places, they erect Statues to the Genius of the Place. Theſe Statues are of Wood; hollow within and coloured over without. If a Rat gets into one of theſe, it is driven out of it with great Difficulty. They dare not uſe Fire for fear of conſuming the Wood, and Water would waſh off the Colours. Thus the Reſpect they have for the Statue, protects the Rat. Men without Merit and Virtue, who have the Princes Favour, are very much like like this Rat. They ſpoil every thing. People ſee and bewail it, but no body knows how to help it.

Ki tſe, in one of his Travels, paſſed thro' the Kingdom of Tſin, and had ſcarce put his Foot aſhore, when he cryed out with a Sigh; How great is the Oppreſſion of this Kingdom! When he entered into its Capital, he cried out in the ſame Tone; How much is this Kingdom drained! Then ſeeing the King and his Court, he ſaid; Alas! Rebellion and Trouble are not far from this Kingdom: His Attendants hearing theſe Exclamations, ſaid to him; You are but juſt come into the Kingdom of Tſin, how then can you pronounce upon all this in ſo deciſive a Manner? I will tell you how, anſwered Ki tſe. When I entered the Kingdom, I ſaw a great deal of Ground lying idle, and the reſt of it very ill cultivated; and at the ſame time I obſerved, that the Inhabitants, in many Places, were employ'd in very uſeleſs Works. Thence I concluded that the People were oppreſt with Averages. When I entered the Capital, I remarked that all the new Buildings were tottering, but the old ones were very firm. On this Account, I ſaid, that the Kingdom was drained. When I came to Court, I obſerved that the Prince ſeemed to have got Eyes only to ſtare about him on all Sides; nor did he ever open his Mouth to aſk the leaſt Queſtion. At the ſame time, I obſerved a great deal of Haughtineſs and Pride among his great Officers, while they were dumb with Regard to every thing that concerned the common Good; and not one of them attempted to give the King any Advice. This makes me conclude, that Rebellion and Trouble is not far off.

In this Compilation of Tang king chwen, after the Head of Government, there is a Title upon Queens; under which Denomination are comprehended the Wives and Concubines of Emperors and Kings. While he is running over their Hiſtory, he attempts to prove that the Women have had a great Share in the Ruin of all the Dynaſties. Tang king chwen employs full thirty Pages upon this Article. But the Paſſages of Hiſtory are only cited, for which Reaſon they are not tranſlated.

Towards the End, he ſays, that Tay tſong, the ſecond Emperor of the Tang Dynaſty, partly to ſave Expences, partly from Compaſſion, after having made Choice of ſome Women in his Palace, diſmiſſed the others, and ſuffered them to marry. He proportionally diminiſhed the Number of the Eunuchs of the Palace, ſo that at one time, upwards of 3000 Perſons left the Palace.

Tang king chwen cites Chang pong ki, who having enquired at what Time little Shoes and ſmall Feet, ſuch as the Chineſe Women have, began, pretends that this Uſage is not of the firſt Antiquity. He draws his chief Proof from the Silence of ſome Verſes and Songs made in the Times of the firſt ſix Dynaſties, about Womens little Feet, and little turn'd up Shoes; tho' in that Detail, we find an Account of all that is thought to make the Fair more graceful.

Of the Daughters of Emperors.

TAY TSONG, the ſecond Emperor of the Tang Dynaſty, beſtowed one of his Daughters in Marriage upon Wang quey, who was then Preſident of the Court of Rites. When Wang quey received that Princeſs at his Houſe, he ſaid to her; The Rites preſcribe to a Daughter in Law, the Manner in which ſhe is to preſent herſelf, before her Father and Mother in Law. 'Tis true, that in later Times wherein moſt of the beſt Uſages have inſenſibly decayed, Princeſſes when they have been married, have not been obliged to obſerve this Uſage; but we have now a very underſtanding Emperor, who knows of what Importance it is that the Rites ſhould be obſerved, and whoſe Pleaſure it is that they be not neglected. Therefore, Madam, I hope you will not take it amiſs if we receive you as a Daughter in Law ought to be received, it not being out of any Pride or private Vanity that we receive you in this Manner, but from our Zeal for the Obſervance of the Rites, upon which depends the Good of Families and States. He and his Wife then immediately took the upper Part of the Hall, and when they were both ſeated, the Royal Daughter in Law, with a Napkin over her Arm, firſt ſerved them with Water wherein they might waſh, then with Victuals to eat, and then they retired. This being told to Tay tſong, he very much approved of it, and ordered that for the future, all Princeſſes, when they were married, ſhould do the ſame.

Hyau vû, an Emperor of the Song Dynaſty, knowing that Princeſſes rendered themſelves inſupportable in the Families into which they married, ſought the Means of curing this, and fell amongſt others, upon one pretty extraordinary Method. Being reſolved that one of his Daughters ſhould marry Kyang min, the Son of Kyong ſhin, whoſe Virtues and Services had raiſed him to the higheſt Dignities, he ſecretly ordered a ſtrong Repreſentation to be drawn up in the Name of Kyang min, containing a full and particular Account of the Conduct of theſe Princeſſes; and in the Concluſion, he begged Leave to be excuſed from taking a Woman, ſuch as he had drawn the Picture of, for his Wife. The Writing being actually drawn up, was preſented to the Emperor, and is as follows, according to the Account we have of it from Tang king chwen.

Sir; your Majeſty has been ſo good as to (*) appoint the Princes Ling hay to be my Wife. This is an extraordinary Favour which I had little Reaſon to hope for. Yet I cannot but own, that I received that Order with as much Trouble and Uneaſineſs, as Reſpect and Gratitude. My own Unworthineſs, and yet more, the Meanneſs of my Birth, remov'd me far from ſo high an Alliance. An ordinary Woman, and not a Princeſs, is a proper match for me. Men like me, tho' we are not very rich, ſcarce aſſumed the Bonnet when we are married, we come off with ſome trifling Preſents; and there are none ſo poor as to have any Difficulty in engaging in an honeſt ſuitable Match, with whom they can live happy and contented. On the contrary, I reflect that they who marry Princeſſes, live, for the moſt Part, in Uneaſineſs and Vexation. For which Reaſon, tho' I have a due Senſe of the Honour your Majeſty deſigns to do me, I am ſo far from being ſatisfied with it, that if I can't avoid it, I believe the Thoughts of it will be my Death. Pardon, Great Sir, my Openneſs and Simplicity. I am authoriſed in thinking and talking in this Manner, by many Examples which Hiſtory furniſhes. Under the Tſin, Wang tun, When wen and Chin chang, each eſpouſed a Princeſs, and they were all of them Men deſcended of very ancient Families, equally noble and powerful; and beſides that, they were Men of very fine Parts and approved Merit. But what were the Effects of their Alliances? Wang tun and When wen, who before were the braveſt and the moſt eſteemed young Men about the Court, degenerated under the Shade of that Favour which this Marriage procured them, living in an Indolence miſ-becoming their Quality, and dying deſpiſed. As for Ching chang, the Yoke appeared ſo weighty to him, that he counterfeited Madneſs, in order to be delivered from it. Since that Time, Tſe king was ſeen to burn his Feet, that he might ſhun ſuch a Match. Wang yen, notwithſtanding his Delicacy, threw himſelf a-croſs the Snow, that he might ſhun the Woman with whom he was coupled. Ho li, who was equal to Long kong in Beauty, threw himſelf in Deſpair into a Well. Lye chwang anointed his Eyes deſignedly, till he almoſt became blind. In chong expoſed himſelf to, and with Difficulty eſcaped, the ſevereſt Puniſhments. Not that they wanted Senſe and Reſolution: But they were oppreſſed by the Quality and Authority of their Princeſſes: They could not carry their Complaints before the Emperor; the Door being there ſhut againſt them: They then were left to feed upon the moſt cruel Vexation; and their Condition was a great deal worſe than that of the meaneſt Slave.

A lively Picture of a fine Lady.

Coming and going, the paying and receiving Viſits to and from Friends, are Liberties common to every honeſt Man. But does he marry a Princeſs? Madam comes and goes as ſhe pleaſes, and there is no Time appointed for her Return: Nor any Regularity in the Family. The Huſband muſt give up all Acquaintance with his Friends, and almoſt all Correſpondence with his Relations. Sometimes a Princeſs a little better natured, ſhall take it in her Head not to treat him quite ſo ill: Then, firſt an old Nurſe knits her Brows, and then a Bonzeſs; and both repreſent to Madam, that ſhe does not know how to keep her Rank, and that ſhe will ſpoil all: Beſides, ſhe has a Parcel of vile Eunuchs for her Attendants, who have neither Wit, Dexterity, nor Politeneſs; who do every thing at Random, who blunder backwards and forwards without minding what they ſay. Such is the Lady's Privy Counſel. The Nurſe pretends that her Age gives her a Right, mortally to hate every one that encroaches upon the Credit ſhe has. The Bonzeſs acts the wiſe Woman, and tells ſo many future Events, that it is impoſſible but ſome of them ſhould happen by Chance. To theſe two conſtant Companions, there is commonly added ſome old Female Fortune-teller, eſpecially towards the End of a Meal, who rivets all that the others have ſaid. The poor Huſband muſt all this Time have Patience, and think himſelf happy if he does not ſuffer worſe.

One of his great Difficulties is, how to contrive, ſo as to ſee Madam either frequently or ſeldom. He does not know how to behave, ſo as to ſatisfy the Whims of his Princeſs. Does he frequently come to her? He is refuſed Admittance: Is he admitted? He cannot leave her when he pleaſes. Does he leave Madam without her Leave? She believes herſelf deſpiſed, and ſhe becomes furious. Does he take Leave of her after he has ſeen her? He is gone, ſays ſhe, to ſee ſome other Woman. As for Madam, ſhe goes and comes when ſhe pleaſes; ſometimes early in the Night; ſometimes at Day-break; ſometimes ſhe ſpends the Night in playing upon Inſtruments; ſometimes ſhe ſits the whole Day with her Arms a-croſs, poring upon a Book: Her Life, properly ſpeaking, is but one continued Chain of Whims. Our Rites do not forbid us to have ſome Concubines; and this is not conſtructed to be any Injury to the Wife. But if this Wife be a Princeſs, we muſt not think of ſuch a thing; for then ſhe will believe herſelf to be injured, and will not be able to bear it. At the leaſt Rumour, at the leaſt Appearance, at the leaſt Suſpicion, ſome brazen-faced Slave comes out of Madam's Apartment, to be a Spy upon her Huſband. If he receives a Viſit, or if the Converſation continues for a little time, ſome old Eves-drop carry all to Madam. Theſe are ſtrange Suſpicions.

Laſtly, that which renders theſe Princeſſes who are married more unſupportable is, that they pay a great many Viſits. The Converſation in theſe Viſits always falls upon the Huſbands. His Extraction, his Manners, his Conduct, and every thing is brought above-board there. They then read Lectures of Haughtineſs and Jealouſy to one another: And tho' ſome of them at firſt, may have better Senſe and more good Nature than others, yet ſhe ſoon becomes as bad as the reſt. Therefore, they who hitherto have eſpouſed Princeſſes, are very fond of geting rid of them. And they who could not ſhun it, always have been very unfortunate. The poor Wang tſau was a melancholy Inſtance of this. Tho' this great Man was equally learned and brave, yet he was baſely given up to the Tribunals, and ſuffered a ſhameful Death for a Trifle. Ton nwan died in the Flower of his Age of meer Vexation; and ſo many others have met with the ſame Fate, that it would be endleſs to recount them.

Beſides, when we take a Wife, our principal Deſign is to have Children. Nothing is more obſtructive to this End, than an outrageous Jealouſy: And it has been ſeen by Experience, that he who marries a Princeſs, beſides a great deal of other Vexation, commonly has the additional one of dying without Poſterity. And what am I, that I ſhould flatter myſelf with ſhunning theſe Misfortunes? I will therefore take care not to expoſe my Perſon and my Family; for almoſt all who have ſuffered this Yoke, have ſunk under it. If ſome of them have ſilently ſubmitted to it, and patiently ſuffered it, it was becauſe by Reaſon of the Diſpoſitions of the Court, they neither could, nor durſt, excuſe themſelves at firſt, nor complain afterwards. As for me, I have the Happineſs to live under an underſtanding, juſt, and gentle Prince, who has no other Rule for his Actions than pure upright Reaſon, and who is poſſeſſed by no Prejudices, therefore I unload my Breaſt to him.

By your Majeſty's Favours, my Family is ſufficiently raiſed; therefore my principal Care ought to be to preſerve it in that Situation, and to prevent its Ruin. This is what I preſume to hope I ſhall be able to do in ſo auſpicious a Reign. But, if following the Stream of Cuſtom, I aſpire to greater Poſts, and higher Dignities, I ſhall attempt to attain to them only by my Diſintereſtedneſs, my Capacity, my Application, and my Services: I own to you freely, Great Sir, that it would be by noMeans to myTaſte, to owe them to the Alliance with which you deſign to honour me. Beſides, my View, in laying before you my Perplexity, was, not only to diſcover to you my real Sentiments, and to provide for my own Safety, but likewiſe to let you the better underſtand the Misfortunes which ſuch Alliances occaſion in other Families: I beg of your Majeſty to examine my Reaſons, but above all things, to excuſe me. Leave, I beſeech you, leave the ſmaller Birds gaily to flutter about with their Equals. Leave the Worms peaceably to multiply their Species; and honourable as this Alliance is for me, be pleaſed to deign to revoke it. But if your Majeſty refuſes to hear my humble Requeſt, I will rather cut of my Hairs; I will rather mangle myſelf, and then fly beyond Seas.

The Emperor having read this Writing which was drawn up to him by his own Order, publickly made Uſe of it to reprimand the Princeſſes, and privately to divert himſelf.

Of Eunuchs and others, who abuſe the Authority which the Favour of the Prince gives them.

IN all Ages, Eunuchs who have had Power, have been look'd upon as the Peſts of a State. They are ſtill more to be feared than Women; and that is ſaying a great deal. They are inſinuating, artful, and patient; they know how to give certain Proofs of their Virtue very dexterouſly in Matters that don't coſt them much, that they may court the Eſteem of the Prince. They make Advantage of certain ſeaſonable Occaſions, which of themſelves are of no Conſequence, to make a ſhew to their Maſter of their Attachment and Loyalty, that they may gain his Confidence. Do they gain it? They take care to pay themſelves for their Trouble: They manage the Prince as they pleaſe, either by raiſing up empty Phantoms to fright him, or by ſuggeſting deluſive Hopes to ſooth him. The Prince may well have at his Court Men of Capacity, Virtue and Zeal, but he looks upon them as Strangers in Compariſon of the Eunuchs, who are always near his Perſon in the Heart of the Palace; he places his whole Confidence in them, and they well know how to uſe it, ſo as to encreaſe their own Power: The Officers without Doors are of no greater Value, than the Eunuchs have a Mind to put upon them. Then Men of Merit either retire or grow cold, and the poor Prince remains alone in the Hands of his Eunuchs, to whom he has abandoned himſelf. Theſe Wretches frighten him every Moment, and rendering themſelves neceſſary, they more and more ſtrengthen their Authority, or rather, their Tyranny. Character of Eunuchs.

But if the Prince at laſt opens his Eyes, and ſeeks the Support of his Officers without Doors, theſe laſt know not how then to behave. To temporize and to uſe Precautions, is letting the Evil encreaſe. To ſhow a Spirit, to apply a ſpeedy and a vigorous Cure, is hazarding, or rather ruining, all, the Prince himſelf being no better than a Hoſtage. When Things come to this paſs, the moſt clear ſighted cannot ſee very far: NoView preſents to them, but what appears dangerous, and as it were impracticable: If, at all Hazards, they attempt ſome Enterprize, they commonly miſcarry, and ruin the Prince, the State, and themſelves. The leaſt Evil that happens, is, that they themſelves periſh, and by their Death, give occaſion to ſome ambitious Perſon to take Advantage of that Juncture, for laying the Foundations of his own Power, involving the Sovereign in the Cauſe of the Eunuchs, gaining the Hearts of the People, and extirpating theſe Scoundrels: A Prince's Paſſion for Women is very dangerous for a State, which muſt infallibly be deſtroyed if the Paſſion is not cured. But if the Prince repents of it, the Evil is not without Remedy. On the contrary, if by an extraordinary Confidence he imprudently abandons himſelf to his Eunuchs, in vain would he retract, for he no longer can do that without periſhing. The Hiſtory of the Tang proves this effectually. For which Reaſon, I ſaid at firſt, that powerful Eunuchs are yet more to be feared than Women. Can a Prince be too much upon his Guard?

Tang king chwen afterwards mentions five or ſix other Diſcourſes upon this Subject: But they repeat almoſt the ſame thing. The Concluſion of one of theſe Diſcourſes, is, that the Eunuchs are neceſſary in a Palace; that they have had a Place there in the earlieſt Times, and that they cannot be diſpenſed with: But that they ought to be kept ſhort by the Head, their Faults punctually puniſhed, and the Government of them entruſted to ſome Officer of Weight; that a Prince above all, ought to take care to give them no Share in the Government of the State, far leſs to put them in Poſts; and this Piece of Conduct the reigning Emperor exactly obſerves.

are

Of wicked Favorites and Miniſters.

TO know to ſet a Prince right without diſturbing the Peace of the State, is the Maſter-Piece of a Loyal wiſe Man; there have been unhappy Times, wherein a weak Prince has taken up with worthleſs Favorites, and made them the Truſtees of all his Authority. Then all the Officers of Virtue and Loyalty in the State, ſeeing that every thing was diſordered by theſe Villains, from a Zeal to their Prince and their Country, wanted to rid themſelves as ſoon as they could of theſe Peſts. But they, whoſe Deſtruction they wiſhed for, were careful to take proper Precautions againſt them: The Prince was on their Side, and they were ſafe by the Danger of attacking them. They who are bold enough to do this, either miſcarry, or are infallibly ruined: Or elſe they ſucceed, and by their Succeſs diſpleaſe their Sovereign, and throw the State into Troubles, which are frequently the Preludes of its Deſtruction. Therefore in the Chun tſyu ſuch Perſons are treated as Rebels, who, without the Knowledge of the Prince, cauſed Men, tho' otherways deſerving Death, to be put to Death.

In effect, a wiſe Man, however great his Grief may be to ſee the Authority of the Prince uſurped by worthleſs wicked Subjects who have ſurprized him, and however warm his Zeal may be to remedy the Evil which draws along with it ſo many others, ought to reſtrain himſelf: And before he undertakes any thing, to lay down his Meaſures ſo well, that both his Prince and Country may thank them: What Succeſs can attend, or how can I promiſe myſelf any, by rooting out thoſe whom the Prince loves, and whom he thinks are ſo far from being guilty, that he owes them a great deal? Is not this veſting myſelf with the Prerogative of my Sovereign? Muſt I not be odious to him? Can I appear before him? Will he receive my Homages? Will he hear my Excuſes? That indeed would be a Prodigy without an Example.

Theſe worthleſs Favorites are in an Empire almoſt the ſame, as what certain noxious Tumours are in Human Bodies, which reach as far ſometimes as the Throat. Theſe Tumours, tho' very troubleſome, are too near the Windpipe to admit of being cut off. And if any, thro' Impatience, ſhall cauſe them to be cut off, Death unavoidably follows. An Impatience ſuch as this, occaſioned the Ruin of the Han and the Tang. From the Time of the Emperor When ling to that of the Emperor Hyen ti, the Empire was governed, or rather miſ-governed by the Eunuchs. None filled the Poſts in the State but mean Souls, or their Creatures. Men of Merit and Virtue were happy, if, by retiring, they could be ſheltered from the Storms of Perſecution which then poured upon them from all Quarters. All the Empire groaned with Grief, and trembled with Indignation. At laſt, ſome Perſons deliberating upon the Means of remedying theſe Evils, concluded, that the Eunuchs being the Authors of them, there was a Neceſſity of deſtroying them, and that then all would be well. Tew vû and Ho tſin undertook to do this, but without Succeſs; and they loſt their Lives. Ywen chau next attempted it, and ſucceeded. But this threw the Empire into Convulſions, and occaſioned it to change its Maſter; and thereby ended the Han Dynaſty.

The ſame thing happened under the Tang. The laſt Emperors of that Dynaſty gave themſelves up to the Eunuchs, who turned the State upſide down; and every Man who had the leaſt Spark of Loyalty, was ſenſibly affected with this. But Li ſhun, Ching chin, and ſome others, had the greateſt Share of Impatience and Boldneſs. They entered into a Conſpiracy to extirpate the Eunuchs, in which they failed and periſhed. At another Juncture, Tſwi cheng laid his Meaſures better down, and ſucceeded: But his Succeſs ruined the Tang, and was fatal to the State. Theſe were malignant Swellings in a Part which had too near a Connexion with the Vitals, to be cut off without Danger. However they were cut off, and Death enſued: or to ſpeak without a Figure, the Sovereign Authority was violated by extirpating theſe Favorites againſt the Prince's Will; and all that the Conquerors gained, was to periſh with that State which they hoped to have ſaved. Subjects, who are really zealous and loyal, ought never to carry Things this Length. Tew vû and Ho tſin, having miſcarried and loſt their Lives, their Misfortunes was bewailed. For my Share, I judge otherways; they were happy in not ſucceeding; for if they had ſucceeded, their Fate had been as certain, and the Empire muſt have ſuffered a great deal more. Have I not then Reaſon to ſay, that to know how to correct a Prince without endangering the Peace of a State, is the Maſter-piece of a loyal wiſe Man.

Another (A) Diſcourſe of the ſame Author

ACCORDING to what I have already laid down, when bad Men are poſſeſſed of the Prince's Favour, and ſhare in his Authority, he who undertakes to deſtroy them, is ſure to periſh, if his Deſign ſhall miſ-give; or if he ſucceeds, he thereby occaſions the Ruin of the Prince, and the Confuſion of the State. At this Rate, ſome People may ſay, the Confuſion however great, is abſolutely incurable. Muſt we for that Reaſon, ſuffer theſe Villains peaceably to enjoy the the Fruits of their Wickedneſs, never think of baniſhing or deſtroying them, and coldly ſee the Deſtruction of the Prince and State approaching, for fear of diſobliging the one, or diſturbing the other. But this is not my Meaning, therefore I muſt explain it. It is commonly ſaid that a Man when hard beſet, is a quite different Man from what he was formerly. It is a Maxim of War, that an Army ought not to be cooped up in ſuch a Manner as to have no Means of eſcaping, and that regular Troops have no occaſion to put themſelves in Danger by running after Robbers. This is founded upon a reaſonable Fear, leaſt Men in Deſpair ſhould make their utmoſt Effort, and thereby either gain their Point, or make their Loſs equal. (*) U and Yué, when in a Bark together and expoſed to be Ship-wreck'd, will mutually help one another to ride out the Tempeſt, as if they were good Friends. Theſe worthleſs and wicked Subjects who abuſe their Credit and Favour, know very well that they are hated and deteſted. They likewiſe know, that if the Prince could be informed of the Abuſe they make of the Authority with which he entruſts them, he would never be prevailed upon to pardon them. This renders them inceſſantly careful to prevent a Blow that would be ſo fatal to their Intereſt. On the other Hand, Men of Merit mortally hating theſe worthleſs Favorites, under whom they are however obliged to ſubmit, form a Conſpiracy, and ſecretly animate and encourage one another, till it is upon the Point of breaking out. So that we may truly ſay, that, as many Troubles in a State proceed originally from the former, ſo the latter, by the Meaſures they take, are the moſt immediate Cauſes of them. Theſe are within Doors and about the Prince's Perſon; thoſe are without, and never come near him. They may therefore be compared, the one to a Landlord, the other to a Stranger. The Stranger ought to follow, and not to anticipate the Steps of the Perſon with whom he lodges. But this is the Failing of zealous Perſons. The former have this Advantage, that acting in the Prince's Name, when they ordain any thing, they ſpeak in clear and conſiſtent Terms, and the People naturally reſpect the Will of the Prince. On the contrary, the Zeal of the latter has a certain Air of Rebellion, and it is not eaſy for them to gain Obedience. For which Reaſon, we have ſeen at different Times, many, who having unſeaſonably declared themſelves, were immediately deſerted by their Party, and miſerably periſhed.

They who have an equal Share of Wiſdom and Zeal, follow a better Method. If their Merit and Rank give them the leaſt Acceſs to their Prince's Perſon, they dexterouſly take Advantage of it to inſinuate themſelves into his Favour, but without Noiſe or Buſtle. At the ſame time, that they court the Prince's good Graces, they take great care to do nothing that may give Umbrage to his Favorites. They wink at their Faults, they occaſionally expreſs Complaiſance for them, and approve of the Deſigns which they know will be agreeable to them, and which are indifferent in themſelves. In ſhort, they manage ſo, as never to be ſuſpected by them, and ſhun being the Objects of their Artifices and Reſentment. They continue upon this Footing, till theſe Wretches, being blinded by their Fortune, or intoxicated by ſome Paſſion, reel to the very Brink of the Precipice, into which the leaſt Puſh infallibly plunges them: Wiſe Men are then as watchful in improving, as they were patient in waiting for this Opportunity. They ſeize it without the leaſt Diſaſter happening; and they owe their happy Succeſs to the Moderation of their Zeal, in knowing how to reſerve themſelves for a favourable Juncture.

It is uſually ſaid, that the calm diſpaſſionate wiſe Man, knows how to execute what he undertakes for the Good of his Country; and in effect, it is thus he ought to behave. For when the Wicked are attacked and but ſlightly puſhed, they unite for their mutual Self-defence; but if they are let alone, they diſunite. Each of them acts for himſelf, and either betray themſelves mutually, or claſh with one another. Then it is eaſy to lend the Prince a helping Hand to extricate himſelf; to purſue other Meaſures is quite miſtaking the Point.

Parallel between the two ſhort Dynaſties of Tſin and Swi.

THE illuſtrious Dynaſty of the Chew having fallen into Decay, theſe unhappy and curſed Times, that are called the Times of War, ſucceeded. They ended only with Tſin ſhi whang, who having ſubdued the other Princes, aſſumed the Title of Emperor, and founded the Tſin Dynaſty. In the ſame Manner, tho' the Tſin Dynaſty was extinguiſhed a long time after, yet it contained as it were two Empires; the one towards the South, the other towards the North: And theſe remained till the Times of Swi ven ti, who reunited them both, and then begun the Swi Dynaſty. Tſin ſhi whang and Swi ven ti were Princes, who had more than ordinary Abilities, Bravery, Capacity and Spirit. Their firſt ſetting out, has ſomewhat in it more dazling than any that have been ſince ſeen. If one reads their military Expeditions, he will ſee with what Care they fix'd their Court in an advantagious Place, and erected ſtrong Fortifications for their Defence. He will likewiſe ſee, that after they became Maſters of the Empire, they took not the leaſt care to perpetuate the Government in their Families, who loſt it in the ſecond Generation. Whence proceeded this? Becauſe they deviated from all the Rules of Antiquity. Firſt, inſtead of confining themſelves to a general Inſpection, which alone is worthy of a Sovereign, they wanted to govern every thing immediately by themſelves. In the ſecond Place, they founded their Government upon Severity and Puniſhments, and not upon the Laws and Virtue. In the third Place, they deprived themſelves of what might have been their moſt firm Support. Laſtly, they entruſted the Education of their Heir to Men very unfit for that Office, and without any Attachment either to their Perſons or their Families: It is but too ordinary for (*) Sovereigns to devolve upon another, all the thorny Part of Government, to want Application, and to abandon themſelves to their Pleaſures. When the Prince at the Head of a State is of this Character, the whole Body feels it: And it is thereby that great Empires are commonly ruined.

(*) Two People always at Variance. The Senſe of the Proverb is, that in Times of common Danger, even Enemies aid one another.

The two Princes of whom I ſpeak here, are an Exception in this Kind, for they begun their own Ruin in a quite different Manner. Being always afraid leaſt ſome body after their Example, ſhould make themſelves Maſter; in order to avoid this Misfortune, they wanted to regulate every thing, even the meaneſt Trifle, by themſelves. Their Miniſters and their other Officers had no part in the Government: They made out ſome Diſpatches, and that was all their Employment. Being always treated haughtily, if they happened to diſpleaſe their Prince, they were immediately puniſhed in a ſevere and ſhameful Manner. For this Reaſon, they were at very little Pains about any thing, beſides their own Safety. They touched their Penſions, and managed in the beſt Manner they could, that they might avoid diſobliging the Prince, and thereby keep him in Ignorance of the moſt important Affairs.

Our ancient Way of Governing was founded on Virtue; even ſuch among them as opened their Way to the Throne by their Swords, when they were ſeated there, governed according to the Laws and Juſtice, with Gentleneſs and Moderation. This charming Way of Governing, ſo much gained them the Hearts of the People, that they were always found tractable, and ſuſceptible of Inſtruction. Thence proceed Peace, Unanimity, Loyalty, and Reformation of Manners. It was this Manner of Governing, which preſerved the Empire ſo long in our three firſt Dynaſties.

The two Princes, of whom I ſpeak, left this Path: Being always reſtleſs, from an extravagant Fear of loſing that which coſt them ſo dear, they altered the Law according to their own Notions: There was nothing then but Suſpicions, Searches and Rigors. Shi whang, eſpecially, was ſo cruel, that he rendered himſelf deteſtable; ſo that at the firſt Signal given by certain Chin, the Rebellion grew general, and an End was ſoon put to the Tſin Dynaſty.

Swi ven ti, tho' he was not ſo cruel, yet he trod in the Steps of Shi whang, and forfeited all in the ſame Manner. Had theſe Princes, when they became Sovereigns, each in his reſpective time, governed with Juſtice and Gentleneſs, according to the ancient Methods, they had endeared their Subjects to them; ſo that if their Deſcendants had met with ſome ſmall Oppoſition, yet they would have been ſupported with greater Numbers, and could not have been ſo ſuddenly ruined. We find in Antiquity, that the Head of a Family, as ſoon as he is ſeated in the Throne, divides, as it were, the Empire with his Relations. He aſſigns them Territories, of which he makes them (†) the Vang or the Hew. And theſe ſerve as ſo many Ramparts to fortify the reigning Family. This was the Reaſon why the Shang and the Chew Dynaſties continued ſo long upon the Throne. Shi whang obſerved a quite different Method. The Chew Dynaſty being upon its Decline, and the fine Government of the firſt Emperors being no longer in Force, the Tributary Princes, without Regard to the Emperor, were naturally often at War with one another, and this gave the finiſhing Stroke to the Ruin of that Dynaſty. Shi whang becoming abſolute Maſter, minded nothing but their Diviſions; and for fear of falling into the like Inconveniency, made neither a Vang nor a Hew; his neareſt Relations remaining private Men: So that when Rebellions happened, he found none whoſe Intereſt it was to ſupport him. For which Reaſon, this Dynaſty, which began with ſo much Luſtre, was ruined in a very few Years. Swi ven ti acted in his Time, in the ſame Manner as Shi whang did, and therefore his Houſe met with the ſame Fate.

Laſtly, as it is a main Point, that there ſhould be a right Choice of thoſe to whom the Heir of the Crown is entruſted, there cannot too great Care be taken in making Choice of worthy Perſons for that Office. Vû vang choſe Chew kong for his Son Ching vang. Vû ti choſe Ho quang for Chau ti; this Choice was wiſe and ſucceſsful. But it happened otherways with Shi whang. His eldeſt Son Fû ſû, having one Day taken the Liberty to make a Remonſtrance to him, tho' it was in very reſpectful juſt Terms, yet it put Shi whang into ſuch a Paſſion, that he baniſhed the Prince a great way to the North. Shi whang being ſoon after attacked on all Hands, he recalled his Son, when he was almoſt over-powered; but he did ill in entruſting him to Chau kau. This faithleſs Subject had no View but private Intereſt, and plotted with Li ſe. Fû ſû did not ſucceed his Father, the Crown going to Eul ſhi who compleated the Ruin of all. Yong, the eldeſt Son of Swi ven ti met with the ſame Fate. His Father, upon ſome Reports that were made to him, kept him a long time in Priſon. When he was dying he ſet him free, and truſted to the Traytor Quang, who kept, to outward Appearances, better Meaſures with Yong than he had done with Fû ſû; but in the main likewiſe betrayed him to the oppoſite Party. There were upwards of 1000 Years betwixt the Tſin and the Swi, but making Allowance for the Diſtance of Time, they were alike in every thing elſe. The Han Dynaſty ſucceeded that of the Tſin, and had more than twenty Emperors, who, in all, reigned upwards of 400 Years. The Dynaſty of the Tang followed that of the Swi, and counted twenty Emperors of its own, who reigned upwards of two hundred and eighty nine Years. So that we may in ſome meaſure, ſay with Juſtice, that the Tſin and the Swi were the Forerunners of the Han and the Tang; theſe laſt having continued ſo long, and the firſt periſhed ſo ſoon.

(*) He reſumes theſe four Points, and enlarges a little upon them. (†) Names of Dignities.

Preſent

Preſent Proſperity or Adverſity, have their Cauſes in preceeding Times. When I read the Hiſtory of Tſi, and ſee the flouriſhing Condition of that State, while Quan chong was Miniſter under When tſong, I am far from attributing all the Glory to Quan chong; for I aſcribe it in a good Meaſure to (*) Pau ſhû who had been for ſome time dead. When ſoon after, I find the ſame State ruined by Sha tau, I yu and Kay fang, I attribute the Misfortune not ſo much to theſe three Miniſters, as to their Predeceſſor Quan chong. How happened this? In the following Manner. When Shun managed the Empire under Yau, he cauſed the four bad Men who wanted to make a Figure, to be baniſhed. Confuçius, when he was Miniſter in the Kingdom of Lû, gave the Kingdom a ſpeedy Riddance of Chau ching a very dangerous Man. If Quan chong, had herein imitated (†) Shun and Confuçius, When kong would never have employed theſe three Men, and they never then would have been capable to have done any Harm. Behold one Reaſon for attributing in a great Meaſure the Diſorders, which they occaſioned, to Quan chong. But there are ſtill other Reaſons; for I find in Hiſtory, that when Quan chong was ſick, his Prince aſked him whom he thought was moſt proper to ſucceed him in Caſe he died? When I firſt read that Paſſage of Hiſtory, I expected that Quan chong would have pointed out the Man of the greateſt Capacity and Virtue in the Kingdom, but he did no ſuch thing. Quan chong indeed told the Prince, that Kay fang, I yu and Shi tau, were Men very incapable of ſuch an Employment, and even unworthy to approach his Perſon. But alas! Ought not Quan chong, who had lived ſo many Years with When kong, to have thoroughly known him? Did not he know his Propenſity to Pleaſures? Did not he know that theſe three Men were he Miniſters of his Debauches? Did he not know that they would long before that Time have been in the higheſt Poſts, had not he himſelf for a long time, been reſolute in keeping them out? Ought he not to have forſeen what was to happen after his Death, if greater Obſtacles were not thrown in the Way? Yes, I am not afraid to ſay, that Quan chong ruined Tſi; and if it was not from his failing to imitate Confuçius and Shun during his Life, it was at leaſt for having failed to name a faithful Miniſter to ſucceed him after his Death.

In effect, the greateſt Misfortune of Tſi, was not its having theſe very three wicked Men, but its no longer having a Quan chong. While he lived, they had no Authority, notwithſtanding the Favour they poſſeſt. Quan chong, when he was dying, told his Prince, that he ought never to put them in Poſts; but this was not the main Point. For we ſhall ſuppoſe, that When kong, out of the Regard he had to this Advice, had actually left them without any Poſts; were they the only bad Men in the World? Could not When kong have made another bad Choice? The important Matter was, that Quan chong ought to have laid hold on the Occaſion which the Prince furniſhed him, to promote ſome able Man: If he had left another like himſelf, to the State, he had acted to Purpoſe: And in that Caſe he might very well have been ſilent, as to what he ſaid in vain about theſe three Men.

Of five (‡) Pa famous in Hiſtory, the two moſt powerful without Contradiction, were When kong Prince of Tſi, and Wen kong Prince of Tſin. This laſt had nothing ſuperior to the firſt; and the Miniſters he choſe undoubtedly were inferior to Quan chong. Tſi, tis true, had the Misfortune to have Ling kong, a cruel Prince. But Wen kong was ſucceeded by Hyau kong a Prince exceſſively good, and whoſe extreme Indulgence was at leaſt as fatal as the Cruelty of Lin kong. And yet, after the Death of Wen kong, none of the Tributary Princes durſt ſtir. Tſin kept them within the Bounds of Reſpect and Submiſſion for near 100 Years longer. Tſi, on the contrary, was ruined immediately after the Death of When kong. What occaſioned the Difference? Becauſe Tſin, after the Death of When kong, had ſtill wiſe Miniſters; who, notwithſtanding the Degeneracy of the Princes, kept Things on a good Footing: Tſi, on the contrary, had not one. Was this then, becauſe after the Death of Quan chong, there was not a Man in the Empire capable to govern. Who can believe that? The Reaſon was, that ſuch a Man was not obliged to appear. Se tſyû, not being able during his Life, to get Mi tſe twan baniſhed, nor Kyu pê yû promoted; when dying, found Means that it ſhould be brought about after his Death. Syau ho, when upon his Death-bed, recommended Tſau tſû to be his Succeſſor, tho' they were Enemies. Theſe may well be called, faithful, zealous Miniſters. They knew that the Happineſs or Unhappineſs of a State, depends upon the Man who is at the Head of it. They would have been unwilling to have died, if the State was thereby to ſuffer. Their Care, at their lateſt Breath, was to provide in it a good Miniſter. Did Quan chong die thus?

DISCOURSE of Sû chê

WHEN a Perſon is either to beſtow, or to receive a Favour, the wiſe Man has more Conſiderations than one. In the firſt Caſe, he does not ſatisfy himſelf with ſaying, I can do ſuch a Man a Piece of Service, therefore I will do it. He examines if the thing befits the Perſon who is to receive it, and if it does not, he goes no further, notwithſtanding all the Honour he might reap from it. I can procure ſuch an Employment for ſuch a Perſon, ſays a wiſe Man, and he is a very capable Perſon, therefore let me do it. I can do ſuch and ſuch a thing for ſuch a Man, but that Man would do wrong to accept of it, therefore I will think no more of it. If the wiſe Man is to receive a Favour, he reaſons in the ſame Manner. Such an Advantage, ſays Conſiderations of a wiſe and a good Man, in beſtowing, and receiving a Favour.

(*) He had made Quan chong to appear, and to be put into Poſt.

(†) That is to ſay, Had he engaged the Prince to have rid himſelf of theſe three bad Men.

(‡) This Title has been given to certain Princes, who without being Emperors, cauſed certain Forms of Reſpect and Submiſſion to be paid them, by their Power, not by their Virtue.

ſays he, will accrue from it, and I do not think myſelf entirely unworthy; for my Share, I ſee nothing that ſhould hinder me from accepting of it: But I ſee otherways clearly, that he who procures it to me, is in the Wrong in procuring it, therefore I refuſe to accept of it. To act in another Manner, is in ſome Meaſure to co-opporate with another Man's Faults: At leaſt, it is very little minding the Ill which others do: To aim, if I may ſo ſpeak, to be the only wiſe Man in the World, is, in effect, ceaſing to be wiſe at all. It is eaſy upon theſe Maxims, to decide which of the two are in the Right of it, and whither Lyew ki or Ting hong were the wiſeſt. At the Time that the Emperors of the Han Dynaſty kept their Court in the Eaſt, Lyew ki, the Tributary Prince, gave up his Eſtate to his younger Brother Lyew king. The Ceſſion was publiſhed, accepted, and ratified; Lyew ki always perſiſting in his Deſign, notwithſtanding all the Repreſentations that were made him upon the Weakneſs of his Brother Lyew king.

Ting hong, another Prince of the ſame Rank, formed likewiſe a Deſign of making ſuch an Abdication; and that he might meet with no Obſtacle, he feigned himſelf to be an Ideot. But Pau tſing, one of his intimate Friends, ſoon perceived his Madneſs not to be real. Upon this, he made ſuch reaſonable Remonſtrances to his Friend, that Ting kong, who at firſt thought he had been doing a fine Action, eaſily ſaw that he was doing a very bad one. Upon this he appeared the ſame Man that he had always been, and talked no more of abdicating. His Readineſs and his Courage to retract, are very laudable, and beſides that, are a Proof, that Vanity, was no Motive of what he intended to do: But that he really thought that he was doing right. Thus it was that Fan, one of the famous Literati reaſoned, when he concluded in Favour of Ting, and preferred him to Lyew ki.

Tay pê and Pê i are Objections under the Dynaſty Chew. They yeilded their Eſtates to their younger Brothers, and by that Abdication they rendered themſelves famous. He anſwers, that Tay pê and Pê i being the firſt who ſet that fine Example, it is no Wonder that they, in their Age, ſtruck the World very much: That Tay pê and Pê i being otherways very well known, the Ceſſion which they made, could be attributed only to their Virtue: But we have ſince ſeen Men without Virtue, who with a ſtupid Ambition have become famous like theſe two great Men, by blundering fooliſhly into this Road. Such was Lyew ki, adds Fan: He got himſelf a Name in his own Time by his Renunciation, but it was at the Expence of the State and his Brother, who could not govern without Confuſion. The Motive of Ting hong, on the contrary, when he wanted to abdicate the Crown, ſays the ſame Fan, was not the meer Ambition of acquiring a Name, for he thought that he was doing a glorious Action, and at the ſame time, promoting the Happineſs of his Brother and his State. It was proved to him, that his Renunciation was inconſiſtent with the Good of both; and immediately he retracted and fell back into the beaten Path. Ting hong doubtleſs is to be preferred; and it is unjuſt to compare him with Lyew ki. Such is the Deciſion of Fan; and in my Opinion, it is a right one: But as he might have a little illuſtrated the Equity of it, it will not be amiſs if I do it for him.

Miſtaken Selfdenial.

Our ancient Kings, by eſtabliſhing the Cuſtom and making it a Law, that their eldeſt Son ſhould ſucceed them, did not act at Random, or from meer Inclination: Their Deſign was, that the Stock of their Family ſhould be always well diſtinguiſhed, that thereby they might prevent Troubles. Every Emperor, every Tributary Prince, acknowledged a firſt Prince of his Race, from whom he held the Crown. The Emperor durſt not, as he had a Mind, give to this or t'other Man, the Empire he held of his Anceſtors. This is a received Maxim. Doubtleſs Lyew ki and Ting kong did not make themſelves Princes: They were born in that high Rank, and received from their Anceſtors the Empire which they wanted to abdicate. But to give a State which a Prince has from his Fathers, to thoſe who have no Right to it, is wrong. Tay pê and Pê i, tis true, did it; but as they did it in very extraordinary Circumſtances, theirs is not an Example to be followed; and Lyew ki was wrong in ſeveral Reſpects. He put too little a Value upon a State he had received from his Anceſtors; and that was the Cauſe of his Brothers ſuffering a great deal. In ſhort, he violated the Laws that were received, and wiſely eſtabliſhed, for the Quiet of States.

Therefore to judge rightly, and according to the Rites, the Fault of Lyew ki was great. What might mitigate it a little, is, that under the Han Dynaſty, when he lived, a good many People took that Method to gain themſelves a Name. The Infection began under the Weſtern Han, by Wey hven chin, who being made Hew, yeilded the Honour to one of his Brothers. The then reigning Emperor looked upon this Action as a Point of eminent Virtue; and all the Empire, in Imitation of the Prince, applauded him. This Notion prevailed ſo much, that no Man, tho' otherways wiſe and virtuous, was eſteemed, if he did not perform ſome Action or other of that Kind. But if this Notion, by being common, a little alleviates the Fault of Lyew ki, we ought by ſo much the more to eſteem Ting hong, who, without ſuffering himſelf to be carried away by the Torrent, knew how to perſevere in the right Path. For my Share, the more I conſider, the more I admire him.

Whence it a Roſe.

There was, in the Kingdom of Tſû, a Man of great Merit, whoſe Name was Shin min: That he might acquit himſelf of the Duties of a good Son, he lived ſingle, and was very diligent about his Father. This made him to be ſtill more eſteemed; and the Prince received ſo favourable a Notion of him, that he wanted to make him one of his Miniſters; but Shin min declined it, and his Father aſked him why he did ſo. Becauſe, anſwered he, I am afraid I ſhall then ceaſe to be a dutiful Son. But, ſays the Father, do you conſider that when you touch the Sallary of a Miniſter, I ſhall be in better Circumſtances than ever; and you, by fulfilling the Duties of your Poſt, will reflect an honour upon me likewiſe; ſo that it is our mutual Advantage that you ſhould accept of the Poſt, and I deſire that you would. Shin min obeyed, and behold him a Miniſter. Within three Years Pe kong rebelled, and Se ma tſe, who was ſent to oppoſe him, was defeated and killed. Shin min run to ſtop the Progreſs of the Enemy; but his Father, to keep him at home, ſaid to him, Why ſhould you thus leave me, to meet with a certain Death? A Man in my Station, anſwers Shin min, owes himſelf to his Prince, and owes only his Sallary to his Father and Mother. It was your Pleaſure that I ſhould ſerve the Prince; and I ſacrifiſe my Life for him. After this, he marched at the Head of a Body of Troops, and hemmed in the Enemy. Pe kong who knew Shin min, ſaid then to one of his Officers named Shé ki; We are now in a very bad Situation: Shin min is able and brave, and keeps us fairly blocked up here. How ſhall we behave? Behold an Expedient, ſaid Shé ki; Shin min, you know, is famous for his filial Piety, we muſt make ſure of his Father's Perſon. The Son then to relieve his Father, will give an Ear to the advantageous Propoſals you make him. Pe kong immediately ſent off People, who very dexterouſly ſeized the Father, and then ſent this Meſſage to Shin min; We will divide Tſi'i betwixt us, if you are ſatisfied, it is well; if not, I have your Father in my Hands, and he ſhall be put to Death. Shin min anſwered, diſſolving in Tears; At firſt I was a dutiful Son, but now I am a faithful Miniſter: Since at this Juncture, I cannot at once diſcharge two Duties, let me ſerve my Prince; my Loyalty requires that I ſhould do for him all that I can. He then attacked the Rebels, defeated them, killed Pe kong, but loſt his Father. The Prince wanted to reward his Miniſter with a Preſent of 100 Pounds of Gold; but Shin min refuſed it, ſaying, Not to hazard all in the Service of one's Prince, is failing in the Duty of a good Subject, and much more in that of a faithful Miniſter. But to occaſion the Death of one's Father by ſerving the Prince and the State, is failing in the Duty of a good Son. Since therefore I could not reconcile theſe two Duties together, with what Face can I appear amongſt Men? When he had finiſhed theſe Words, he killed himſelf.

Tang king chwen relates other Hiſtories of theſe Kinds of Heroes, who in this Manner put themſelves to Death, that they might not ſurvive a pretended Diſhonour: And he is ſatisfied with ſaying once for all: In my Opinion, a Man is not to put himſelf to Death if he has nothing to reproach himſelf with. There have been found in all Times, ſays Song ki, People who have thought fit to retire. But they may be divided into very different Kinds. I reduce them all to four, namely, three good, and one bad.

The firſt are they who have always lived retired, and poſſeſt a Virtue ſo extraordinary, that nothing can conceal them. Yes! There have been ſeen ſome Men, who tho' buried amidſt Mountains and Deſarts, yet were generally known and reſpected by all the World on account of their Virtue. The Honours which they fly from, purſue them; and the moſt powerful Princes of their Time, endeavour, if we may ſo ſpeak, to give them Marks of their Eſteem.

The ſecond are they, who after having appeared in the World, and even filled Poſts, perceiving the Difficulty of ſupporting or promoting themſelves without palliating and a little favouring the Errors and Corruptions of the Age, have diveſted themſelves of their Poſts, and retired from the View of their Prince; but leaving him and all the World in ſo good an Opinion of their Merit and Virtue, that they have been always regretted.

The third Kind are they, who being naturally fearful, and not believing that they have the Capacity requiſite for ſucceeding in Poſts, live retired in their own Country; but behave in ſuch a Manner there, that far from making themſelves deſpiſed by their Retirement, it is look'd on as the Effect of their Wiſdom and Virtue. The firſt of theſe three Orders is much preferable to the other two: And it is upon that alone which Confuçius beſtows Encomiums.

Beſides theſe three Orders, of which each has its own Merit, there is a fourth Kind of People, who being equally crafty and intereſted, want to paſs for Men of Virtue by affecting Retirement; tho' they would be very angry, were they indulged in what they affect. Their View is to draw the Eyes of all the World upon the real Capacity they poſſeſs; to make themſelves as it were ſought after, and thereby to ſhorten their Way to Employments. But does their Cunning ſucceed, and are they in Poſt? They ſoon drop the ſpecious Maſk of Diſintereſtedneſs. I have expoſed theſe different Characters that no-body may miſtake them, or value any thing of that kind, but that which is valuable.

A ſhort (*) Diſcourſe upon Silence, compoſed by Wang yong ming, who relates it, together with the Occaſion of his delivering it, to Lyang chong yong.

LYANG CHONG YONG was a Perſon, who joined to an uncommon Capacity noble and generous Inclinations: Scarce was he made (†) Tſeng tſe, when he found himſelf ſtimulated by a laudable Ardor of ſignalizing himſelf in ſome important Poſt. One Day, as he was revolving theſe Thoughts in his own Breaſt, reflecting with himſelf all of a ſudden: I am in the Wrong, ſaid he; it is too ſoon for me to pretend to govern others. How can I ſucceed in that, having not yet learned how to govern myſelf? After this Reflection, he ſtudied more than ever to know himſelf. He applied himſelf to find out, as much as he could, if he had any vicious

(†) A Degree of Literature.

Byaſs, and he then begun to correct a Fault which he found in himſelf; namely, that of ſpeaking too much. We meet with a Bonzary of theſe Days; called, The Bonzary of Silence.

Chong yong took occaſion to aſk me for ſome Inſtructions as to the Manner of being ſeaſonably ſilent. I anſwered, I myſelf have the Failing of being too great a Talker. I therefore am well enough qualified to give Lectures of Silence to others. I have remarked that this Fault proceeds either from Vanity, Heedleſneſs, or Lightneſs. I here call Vanity, the Paſſion of making a ſhining Figure. I call Heedleſneſs and Lightneſs, too great an Eaſineſs in ſuffering ones Heart to rove from that Juſt Mean which it ought to preſerve in every thing. Behold what I have remarked by my own proper Experience. But beſides that, our Ancients have left us fine Maxims upon this Head, which are found diffuſed thorough their Books.

An Abridgment of theſe Principles is as follows.

They begin with finding Fault with four Kinds of Silence, or Taciturnity. To be ſilent, when there are any Doubts of Conſequence, or not to join in the clearing them up; or what is worſe, voluntarily to continue in groſs Ignorance, rather than to inſtruct ones ſelf by Speech, is called Brutallity, and Stupidity. To be ſilent from a wretched Complaiſance, or merely to gain the Favour of the Great, is Intereſt and Flattery. To be ſilent, in order to conceal ones Faults, under the Maſk of being reſerved, is Pride. In ſhort, under a modeſt Silence and a ſimple Air, to conceal a bad Deſign, is Hypocriſy. All this is not Silence, or it is a criminal Silence: But there is likewiſe a laudable Silence, which may proceed from good Motives, and has good Effects.

The wiſe Man, ſays Confuçius, always ſpeaks with Baſhfulneſs and Modeſty, as if he were conſcious of ſome Defect in his Words and Actions. In the moſt remote Antiquity, a Man who had no Reſerve in his Words, paſt for one who had but little in his Actions, and incapable to fill great Poſts. Therefore Baſhfulneſs, Modeſty, and Reſerve, are, as it were, the firſt Leſſons of that which we call Silence, or the Art of holding one's Tongue. The wiſe Man, ſays Confuçius again, loves to be ſilent: At leaſt, he does not love to ſpeak a great deal, becauſe he is employed in the Care of doing well; and the Love which he has for Silence, is continually, and as it were naturally, begotten by his conſtant Application to watch over his Actions. If therefore, virtuous Men commonly ſpeak little, it is not that they make their Virtue to conſiſt in the Fewneſs of their Words, nor that they are ſilent merely for the ſake of Silence: They have a much more ſublime End: They look upon Silence as an excellent Way of acquiring and preſerving Virtue. To meditate ſeriouſly, ſays Confuçius, upon ſome important Truth, is the Way to acquire Knowledge. The leaſt Advantage we reap by it, is, that we ſhun the groſs Faults, into which the Generality of Mankind fall at every ſtep they make. In order to ſucceed in any Enterprize, quietly to think a long time upon it, is juſtly termed Wiſdom and Prudence. But above all, in order to diſcover our vicious Inclinations, and the Artifices of Self-love, there is no better Secret, than to examine ourſelves in Secrecy and Retirement. Yen tſe made ſuch a Progreſs in this Method, that tho' he ſcarce ſpoke to any body, yet he attracted the Eſteem and Confidence of all the World by his Virtue. Behold therefore to what a Pitch a Man may attain by practiſing this Virtue, of which we have a Pattern in Tyen. Tyen never ſpeaks a Word, nor has he occaſion to ſpeak. The four Seaſons regularly ſucceed one another; the Vegitables grow at their ſtated Seaſons, wherefore then ſhould he ſpeak? His Silence is Eloquence itſelf, therefore among Men, the Sages of the firſt rate alone, are able to imitate this beautiful Pattern.

Lyang chong yong very well underſtood and profited by this Diſcourſe.

Another Diſcourſe of the ſame Author, upon the Death of Whang hyang fu, Father of one of his Diſciples.

IN the Territory of (*) Chau, there lived one of the Literati, an honeſt Man; the Name of his Family was Whang, his own Name Ong pau; and he lived in the Lordſhip of Hyen ſi. He had a Son named Mong ſing. This Son came ſeveral hundred Leagues, that he might become my Diſciple. At the End of ſome Months, in which he had ſtudied very hard, he took Leave of me for a little time, that he might go and ſee his Father; and after two or three Months Abſence, I ſaw him return full of new Ardour. When ſome other Months were over, he wanted to go and ſee his Father again; and he did ſo, and returned ſeveral times in the Space of a few Years.

Mong ſing was a young Man who had very good Qualifications. To a Heart full of Uprightneſs and Probity, he joined the moſt engaging and polite Manners. Above all, he was a dutiful Son; but he was of a very delicate Complexion, and incapable to ſupport great Fatigues. For which Reaſon, the leſs he feared theſe Comings and Goings, the more I was afraid for him.

I therefore one Day took him aſide, and ſaid to him, My dear Scholar, you ſurely are very ſenſible, that it is too fatiguing for you to make ſuch frequent and long Journeys. You may ſpare yourſelf the Trouble; for the Duty you owe to your Father, is a lawful Reaſon why you ſhould continue at Home: Take my Advice, and remain here; and as Occaſion preſents, put in Practice what you learn at my School.

Mong ſing immediately falling upon his Knees, anſwered me in theſe Terms. Maſter, ſaid he, you know not my Father; tho' he was educated upon the Sea-coaſt, in a pretty Savage Country, yet, yet, from his Childhood, he has had a great Eſteem for the Doctrine of our ancient Sages. He has for ſome time, diligently ſought one who might be a Guide to him in this Study, but he never could have the Happineſs to meet with what he ſought after. Sometime ago, by Means of Syu, Yong, and ſome others, who had been your Diſciples, my Father was made acquainted with, and received ſome Tincture of, your Doctrine. I cannot expreſs to you the Eſteem he had of it; but you may in ſome meaſure judge of it, by what I am going to tell you.

(*) In the Works of Wang yong ming, this Diſcourſe is found under the Title Hyo wen, or a Compoſition for the Ceremony Tſi. This is a kind of a Funeral Sermon.

My Father no ſooner knew of your Doctrine, than exhorting me to purſue it, My Son, ſays he, you ſee I am old: I do not recommend to you the acquiring of Riches, or thruſting yourſelf into Poſts; what I exhort you to, is to advance in Virtue, and to profit under ſo good a Maſter, like theſe Sages who have already left his School. I don't pretend to be an Obſtacle to your Advancement: Nor, that on account of my old Age, you ſhould give up ſo great an Advantage. Tho' your Abſence ſhould reduce me to eat only Rice-gruel, and to drink Water; tho' it ſhould even expoſe me to lie unburied when I am dead, yet ſhould I be ſatisfied to live and to die in this Manner, that I may procure to you the Means of acquiring true Wiſdom. It was in Purſuance of theſe Inſtructions of my Father, that I firſt came to be of the Number of your Diſciples; and for that Effect, I travelled ſome hundred Leagues. Always when I returned to ſee my Father, in vain did I entreat him to ſuffer me to continue with him at leaſt three Months; for he would never agree to that. He would not even ſuffer me to continue for one Month; he always took care at the End of ſome Days, to have every thing ready for my Journey, preſſing his Domeſtics for that purpoſe, and exhorting myſelf to ſet out: When filial Affection drew Tears into my Eyes, and when in this Condition I preſented myſelf before him, to conjure him to ſuffer me to ſerve him ſome time longer: He anſwered, my Tears, by beginning his Exhortations anew, and ſometimes reproaching me that I had the Heart of a Girl. Yet I ſee, added he, beginning himſelf to be affected, that your Intention is good, and that you want to prove to me that you are a good Son, but you go the wrong Way to work. Do that which I would have you do, notwithſtanding my Tenderneſs; and do not aggravate my Grief. This, in Truth, is the Way in which my Father treated me: And I own frankly to you, that notwithſtanding my Deſire to profit by your Inſtructions, it was not my Fault, but that I had ſtayed longer with him: And if every Time I returned ſo ſoon, it was in Obedience to my Father's Commands: For how could I diſobey him?

At this Diſcourſe I could not hinder myſelf from crying out, How wiſe is Whang hyen fû! He indeed is a good Father: How affectionate, and how obedient is Mong ſing! He verily is a good Son: Take Courage then, cried I, my dear Diſciple, and endeavour perfectly to anſwer the Zeal of ſo wiſe a Father. Alas! Towards the Beginning of the fourth Moon of this Year, an Expreſs has brought us the melancholy News of the Death of Whang hyen fû. How great is this Loſs! True Wiſdom has been long neglected. Nothing is more rare, than Men who truely eſteem or ſeriouſly practiſe it: They who make the Study of Wiſdom all their Buſineſs, are ſo ſeldom found, that among the Generality of Mankind, they are look'd upon as ſo many Prodigies. The Name of a wiſe Man is yet in Vogue, and the World is full of Perſons who affect it: But the Name is all they deſire: Their Ambition, their Cares, their Actions, and even their Inſtructions to their Children, proceed all from Vanity and Intereſt: And if they talk of Wiſdom, it is not becauſe they aſpire to it, but from mere Show and Oſtentation. Among ten who talk of it; nine let it go no farther than their Lips. Above all, at preſent, it is a very rare thing to find Fathers ſo wiſe, as to prefer the Care of their Children's advancing in the Way of true Wiſdom, to all the Motives of Intereſt and natural Affection. Whang hyen fû, whoſe Death I have heard of, knew how to do this, notwithſtanding the Torrent. Alas! What a Loſs is he to the World: Since the Diſtance of Place hinders me from weeping over his Bier, and teſtifying how much his Death afflicts me, I deſire in ſome meaſure to make up for that by this Writing. Moreover, by publiſhing the Zeal of Whang hyen fû for the Advancement of his Son in the Paths of Wiſdom; my View is, not only to teſtify to the World the Eſteem which his Zeal has given me for his Perſon, and the Grief I have for his Death, but likewiſe to propoſe him to all the Empire as a beautiful Pattern of a truely paternal Love, and to animate his Son, my Diſciple, worthily to anſwer the Intentions of ſo wiſe a Father.

The ſame Author anſwers a Queſtion made him by his Friend Wang yong ming, who wrote to him once in theſe Terms. I ſee People who reaſon a great deal upon what Confuçius and Yen tſe underſtood by the Expreſſion (*) Lo: May I preſume to beg that you would write me your Thoughts upon this Head? Is this Pleaſure, this Joy, mentioned by Confuçius and Yen tſe, the ſame thing with that Emotion of Heart, which is look'd upon as one of the ſeven Affections, of which it is capable, and which commonly is called Joy: If Confuçius meant nothing but that, it would ſeem to me, that this Joy is not peculiar to the wiſe Man alone, ſince the moſt ordinary People are equally ſuſceptible of it. If he means a quite different Joy, much more pure and ſolid, and ſuch as the wiſe Man is ſaid to preſerve amidſt the moſt melancholy and terrible Events, another Difficulty ſtarts; for Confuçius, and many others after him, ſays likewiſe, that the wiſe Man ought to be inceſſantly upon his Guard, and under a continual Dread and Concern: And it would ſeem to me, as if this were much fitter to occaſion Sadneſs than Pleaſure.

The Anſwer of Wang yong ming, was as follows:

The Joy, of which Confuçius ſpeaks, is the Senſation of the Heart, in enjoying the Pleaſure of poſſeſſing itſelf. Therefore tho' the Pleaſure, mentioned by Confuçius, is likewiſe comprehended hended under that kind of Joy, which is reckoned to be one of the Seven Affections, yet it ought not to be confounded with any other Species of Pleaſure, ranged under the ſame Denomination. This Anſwer likewiſe obviates your ſecond Difficulty; for tho' in ſome Senſe it is true, that this Joy, in a certain Meaſure, is common to all Mankind, yet we may properly ſay, that it is more peculiar to the Wiſe.

'Tis true, all Men have a Heart. But the Wiſe alone are Maſters of that Heart. This Pleaſure of a Heart, of which one is Maſter, is known to them alone: The reſt are all capable of this Knowledge, but they neither poſſeſs nor taſte it: They run eagerly after what is inconſiſtent with it; being blind, and involving themſelves more and more in their Difficulties. Not, but that all Mankind may aſpire to this Joy. But they muſt ſhut their Eyes to every thing elſe: They muſt turn them inwards: They muſt take care to recall their own Hearts to its natural Uprightneſs, and then will they ſhare in that ſolid pure Joy. This is all the Anſwer which at preſent I have to give you; but give me leave to tell you, that I am a little ſurprized that you ſhould aſk further Queſtions of me upon this Head, ſince, during the Converſations which we have had together, you might long ſince have had all the neceſſary Information: To amuſe yourſelf ſtill in making Enquiries about this, is juſt like the Man, who when riding upon an (*) Aſs, was ſearching for him on all Sides.

Kau ſhen ſû having come from Whang chew, a City of (†) Hû quang, to make himſelf a Diſciple of Wang yong ming; as he was about to return at the End of a Year, he took Wang yong ming aſide, and ſaid to him; Maſter, I have had the good Fortune to hear your important Doctrine, upon what is called Firm Reſolution. I believe, that I thoroughly underſtand it, and am able to direct my Conduct accordingly. But as I am now ready to go far from you, I beg that you would give me a Word of Inſtruction, of which I may preſerve the Remembrance Day and Night. Wang yong ming made him this Anſwer.

In the Study of Wiſdom, the Practice of the Huſbandmen muſt be imitated. They indeed begin by carefully chuſing the Seed, and committing it to the Ground in due Seaſon; but they do not end here; They then carefully labour the Ground; they kill the Inſects; they pluck up the noxious Herbs; they water it where it has need; they labour all Day in the Cultivation of their Field; and frequently in the Night-time, their Mind is employed in theſe Thoughts. Not, that by their Cares and Fatigues, they hope that their little Crop, tho' the Seed was well choſen and ſeaſonably ſown, ſhould be of any great Conſequence in the Autumn. You ought now to underſtand my Meaning; but if you want that I ſhould make it plainer, I muſt tell you that this firm Reſolution of which you ſo much ſpeak, and which you flatter yourſelf with poſſeſſing, is as the Seed of the Huſbandman. Study, Thinking, Reaſoning, and putting all in Practice, are Things as neceſſary in Point of Philoſophy, as plowing, dunging, and harrowing are in the Affair of Agriculture. A Heart in whom this Reſolution is wanting, is a Field in which nothing good is ſown, and in which, conſequently nothing but Weeds can grow. A Heart who has this Reſolution, and who ſtops there, is a well ſown Field, the Culture of which is afterwards neglected: The good Seed that has been there ſown, has been choak'd by the Weeds. I cannot ſo far diſſemble with you, as not to tell you, you are in a Situation ſomething like this.

QUEN KI is a Man of a great deal of Knowledge, in whom I always have found a great Thirſt for true Wiſdom. I am charmed to underſtand that you frequently converſe with him; this muſt turn out to your Advantage. My Anſwer to what you propoſe to me, with Regard to him, is as follows. Doubtleſs, a Man may ſeek ſome Poſt or Penſion, eſpecially when otherways he has no Eſtate; and if without them he cannot provide for his aged Parents, conſequently, it is lawful for a Man to take his Degrees, to appear in the World, and to make his Capacity known. For it is abſurd, for a Man who aſpires to Poſts, to depend entirely upon Tyen, without his uſing any of the human obvious Meaſures for attaining to it. But he muſt take care; firſt, never to deviate from the high Road of Reaſon, neither in the Deſigns he has in View, or in the Method of purſuing theſe Deſigns. In the ſecond Place, a Man muſt never ſuffer himſelf to be affected with good, or diſconcerted with bad Fortune. He who is ſteady in theſe two Points, may conſiſtently, with the Character of a wiſe Man, procure and fill Poſts. But if he wants theſe, eſpecially the former, in vain does he renounce Degrees, Poſts, and all that: In vain, does he talk of Virtue from Sun to Sun; all is Vanity. Therefore our Ancients have made it paſs into a Proverb: It is not a great Evil to quit the Trade of Philoſophy: The Point is, not to quit the Love of true Wiſdom, and the Reſolution of ſtill preſſing towards it: Upon which we muſt remark, that by its being ſaid, that we never ought to quit this Reſolution, it is ſuppoſed that we already poſſeſs it. Upon this Head it is, that every Man ought to examine himſelf. The more I perceive the good Qualities which you have, the more I perceive myſelf inclinable to preſs you not to render them uſeleſs.

My dear Diſciple, you are to remember, that by how much the more rare it is to have ſo happy natural Diſpoſitions as you enjoy, the more eaſy it is for you to corrupt and abuſe them. It is no ſmall Advantage to find a ſound Director in the Paths of Wiſdom; but know that by how much much the more Difficulty it is to meet with a Man who can inſtruct us in them, ſo much the more eaſy and common it is for us to ſtray from them, even after they are known to us: Every Man who has a Mind, cannot arrive at that ripe and vigorous Age in which at preſent you are: But as this does not depend on Man, know likewiſe, that it is no more in his Power to hinder theſe fine Years from paſſing rapidly away. In ſhort, it is as eaſy for one to ſuffer himſelf to be carried away by the Torrent of the Age, as it is difficult to reſiſt it. Weigh all this, my dear Diſciples, and let theſe Conſiderations animate you to make new Efforts.

(*) The Chineſe ſays in four ſhort Words, Ki lyu mi lin, that is to ſay; To ride an Aſs, to ſeek an Aſs. This is literally the French Proverb, which, notwithſtanding its Meanneſs, forms the Concluſion of a very refined Character of Morality.

The ſame Author exhorts his Diſciples, to hold frequent Conferences in his Abſence.

THE Plants that are moſt eaſy to rear, do not fail to die if they have ten Days of nipping Cold, for one of a mild Sun. When I come hither, you endeavour as much as you can to aſſemble yourſelves; not one of you fails to be preſent at the Conferences that are held; and at theſe Conferences each of you ſhews the keeneſt Deſire for Improvement. This gives me a real Pleaſure. But I now come hither but very ſeldom; when I come, I ſtay but a few Days; and all that I can do is to aſſemble you three or four times. As ſoon as I leave you, the Conferences are broken up. Each of you then keeps at home, and the Interval paſſes without your ſeeing one another; this is upwards of ten Days of Cold for one of Warmth: How then can Wiſdom, which is a Plant ſo difficult to rear, flouriſh among you?

I therefore exhort you not to confine your Aſſemblies thus, to the Time in which I am amongſt you. Every five Days, if it is poſſible, at leaſt every eight Days, you ought, ſetting aſide all other Buſineſs, to aſſemble yourſelves once to diſcourſe upon Virtue, and to animate yourſelves to the Practice of it. This is an excellent Method for entirely diſengaging yourſelves from all the Enticements of the Age, and for making a great Progreſs in a ſhort time, in the true Doctrine, which, at the Bottom, is nothing elſe but Charity and Juſtice.

It is a common and a true Saying, that if a Man would make a cheap and a ready Bargain, he muſt go to Market. Is he to rear a large Building or ſome other conſiderable Work? his beſt Way for ſucceeding, is to hold a general Conſultation beforehand. Aſſemble yourſelves therefore frequently, but carry into theſe Aſſemblies neither Paſſion nor Prejudice. Shew a Friendſhip and Reſpect for one another, and know that, in a Commerce ſuch as yours is, he who yeilds moſt to others, gains moſt for himſelf. If it ſometimes happens that you diſagree upon any Point, it is then, that without any Heat, or without giving Way to that unhappy Deſire which each has of over-bearing his Neighbour, you ought to recollect yourſelves more carefully, and to ſeek out the ſimple Truth. But if any one, either from Vanity or Jealouſy, ſhall be obſtinate in having the upperhand; theſe frequent Conferences, which of themſelves are ſo advantagious, thereby become quite uſeleſs. Reflect ſeriouſly on this.

One Day as Wang yong ming (*) was paſſing through the Piazzas with ſome of his Diſciples, two Porters, for ſome Reaſon I am ignorant of, fell a quarrelling. You have neither Reaſon nor Conſcience, ſaid the one. Nay, you have neither of them, anſwers the other. You are a Rogue, ſaid the firſt: Your Heart is full of Craft, replies the ſecond. You, ſays the other, have baniſhed from yours, all manner of Honeſty and Probity. Wang yong ming then addreſſing himſelf to his Diſciples, Do you hear theſe Porters, ſaid he; they are talking Philoſophy? What Philoſophy, anſwered one of his Diſciples? I hear them only ſcolding and bawling. What, don't you underſtand, ſaid Wang yong ming, that what they are every Moment repeating, are the Words, Reaſon, Conſcience, Heart, Uprightneſs? If this is not Philoſophy, what then is Philoſophy? Then let it be Philoſophy, ſaid the Diſciple; but while they are philoſophizing, why ſhould they bawl and ſcold one another ſo? Do you aſk why, anſwers Wang yong ming? It is becauſe each of theſe two Men ſees the Defects of his Neighbour, but never reflects upon his own. How many People are like them?

The great Diſeaſe of Mankind, ſays Wang yong ming, is Pride. Is a Son proud? He fails in his Reſpect to his Parents. Is a Subject proud? He is no longer Loyal to his Prince. Has a Father this Failing? He forgets the Paternal Affections. Is a Friend tainted with this Vice? His Friendſhip is no longer faithful and conſtant. The principal Failing of Syang the Brother of Shun, and of Tan chu the Son of Yau, whom Hiſtory repreſents as being ſo vicious, was Pride. The other Failings which they had, were the Fruits of that evil Tree. Ye who would aſpire to be wiſe, if ye want to be really ſo, muſt never depart one Moment from that Celeſtial Reaſon which is natural to, and forms, as it were, the Eſſence of, your Soul. This Reaſon is moſt pure and moſt refined in itſelf. Ye muſt ſuffer nothing to alter its Purity. But what muſt be done for this Effect? No Self, and that is all. I ſay none, even in the moſt retired Corner of the Heart, for if it ſhall lurk there, it will again quicken, and ſhoot forth into Pride. How did our wiſe Ancients recommend themſelves ſo much by their Virtue? It was by deſtroying Self; for when Self is deſtroyed, humility becomes habitual. But Humility is the Foundation of all Virtues; as Pride, on the contrary, is the Root of all Vices.

In another Paſſage, the ſame Author treating of this Subject, and repeating the ſame Things with ſome Variation, ſays; The moſt univerſal and dangerous Evil at preſent, is Pride. This is as the poiſoned Source from which all Diſorders proceed. A Man is the Slave of Pride, and for that Reaſon, thinks himſelf the Lord of others. He approves of what he himſelf does, and will yeild to no body. If a Man is abandoned to that dangerous Vice, he can neither be a dutiful Son, an affectionate Brother, nor a loyal Subject. The inflexible Severity of Syang, towards his Brother Shun, and the incorrigible Licentiouſneſs of Tan chu the Son of Yau, were all ſo many Slips of this vicious Stock. If you would enter into the Ways of Wiſdom, begin by plucking up from your Heart the ſmalleſt Root of ſo dangerous a Vice. Otherways you can never make any Progreſs. Moreover, it is with Pride as with other Diſeaſes; it is never cured but by its Oppoſite, which is Humility: But don't deceive yourſelves, the Humility which I preſcribe againſt Pride, conſiſts not in merely aſſuming an Air, outwardly humble and reſerved; It ought to be in the Heart, and it conſiſts in being inwardly full of Attention, Moderation, Reſerve, and Reſignation to others: In putting no great Value upon one's own Capacity, but willingly making the beſt of anothers: In ſhort, in a Man's being diveſted of Self. Whoever is humble in this manner, cannot fail to be a good Son, Brother, and Subject. This Virtue made Yau and Shun ſo perfect; they poſſeſſing it in its utmoſt Purity and Extent. In all Encomiums upon theſe Princes, it is always this Virtue that is praiſed under different Denominations. Therefore ye who aſpire to be Sages, labour to acquire it. But do not deceive yourſelves, for it is no eaſy Matter. It will coſt you great Struggles; and above all things, you muſt have a ſtrict Watch over yourſelves.

Wang yong ming being at Long chang, a great Number of Literati became his Diſciples. That he might ſatisfy the Deſire which they had to profit under his Direction, he gave them the four following Leſſons. Each of you, ſaid he, ought to have, firſt, a ſincere Reſolution to aſpire to true Wiſdom: Secondly, a continual Care, in Reality and in Practice, to take the true Means of acquiring it: Thirdly, an ardent and a courageous Zeal againſt your own Failings: Fourthly, a wiſe and moderate Zeal in favour of your Neighbours. I ſay, that above all things, a ſincere Reſolution is required: In effect, if, without ſuch a Reſolution, no Man can ſucceed in any thing, even the moſt mechanical Arts, can he ever hope to ſucceed in the Study of Wiſdom? Why are ſo many People ſeen, who, notwithſtanding their Profeſſion of aſpiring to true Wiſdom, ſpend whole Years, and almoſt all their Lives, without making any Progreſs in it? There can be no other Cauſe than this; That they never form a ſincere Reſolution on this Head. For it is a certain Truth, that he who has an earneſt Deſire to become wiſe, ſucceeds in it by little and little: And if a Man is firmly reſolved to labour conſtantly in it, he may attain even to the higheſt Degree of Perfection. On the contrary, as a Ship without a Rudder, toſſed by the Winds and carried by the Tide; as a high mettled Horſe left to himſelf, and galloping uncheck'd from Place to Place, ſuch is the Man who is void of the Reſolution I require. Some have ſaid very well: If the Purſuit of Virtue ſhould expoſe a Man to the Indignation of his Father and Mother, to the Reproaches of his Brethren and Relations, to the Hatred and Contempt of his Neighbours, then they who want Reſolution for this extremely difficult Attempt, might plead ſome Excuſe. But on the contrary, if, embracing what is right, is an infallible Way for deſerving and ſecuring the Tenderneſs of a Father and Mother, the Confidence of Relations, with the Eſteem and Good-will of Neighbours, what Excuſe can they have, who are afraid to venture no this Reſolution? If, by deſerting Virtue, and enliſting in the Cauſe of Vice, a Man ſhould become dear to his Father and Mother, agreeable to his Relations, and reſpected by his Neighbours, it would be more excuſable, ſhould he ſeem to incline to the Side of Vice. But if the contrary is true, as it certainly is, Why ſhould we buy the Unhappineſs of being wicked at ſuch a Price, and labour ſo earneſtly to prefer Vice to Virtue? Weigh what I have now told you, and you will not only comprehend, that when a Man aſpires to Wiſdom, he muſt above all things ſeek a ſincere Reſolution; but you will likewiſe ſee, that this Reſolution is not ſo difficult to take, as People imagine: And that nothing is more reaſonable.

In the Second Place, I demand a continual Attention in Point of Practice, becauſe, that in effect, without this, a Man muſt ſoon be inconſiſtent with himſelf: And the Reſolution he puts on, tho' perhaps it may be ſincere, yet never can be firm and conſtant. Therefore, in the Judgment which I form of my Followers, I do not give the Preference to thoſe who have the moſt Wit and Penetration, but to thoſe, whom a continual Watch over themſelves have rendered more reſerved and more humble. There are ſome, who being void of Wiſdom and Virtue, puff themſelves up, that they may appear to be filled with both: And who, not perceiving in themſelves a Reſolution ſufficient for being ſolidly virtuous, harbour a ſecret Envy againſt thoſe who really are ſo: Who are as full of Pride as they are deſtitute of Virtue: Who inwardly prefer themſelves to others, and who, by vain Diſcourſes, impoſe upon the World, and endeavour to procure Eſteem for themſelves. If any one amongſt you is found to be of this Character, tho', in other Reſpects he ſhould be Maſter of a very extraordinary Underſtanding, yet for all that, would he not be the Object of your Indignation and Contempt? On the contrary, there are ſome Perſons, who being full of Modeſty and a Praiſe-worthy Reſerve, for fear of acting inconſiſtently with themſelves, keep up to their firſt Reſolution, by a conſtant Practice of Virtue, by great Care, and an equal Application to be inſtructed: Who ſincerely acknowledge their own Faults, readily do Juſtice to their Neighbour's Virtues, and endeavour to correct themſelves by the good Patterns that are ſet before them: Inwardly, they are full of Regard and Submiſſion towards their Superiors, together with Benevolence and Uprightneſs towards their Equals: Outwardly, their Behaviour is eaſy, and at the ſame time, never deviates from a modeſt Gravity. If any one amongſt you poſſeſſes theſe Qualifications, tho' perhaps he has no great Share of natural Underſtanding, which of you can refuſe him your Eſteem and Friendſhip? Doubtleſs, each will more willingly prize him, the more ſincerely he is ſeen to humble himſelf. Weigh what I have now told you, and it will be ſufficient to let you underſtand the Neceſſity and Practice of that Attention which I require.

In

In the third Place, I ſay, that a Man muſt have an ardent and couragious Zeal againſt his own Failings. To be guilty of Faults both of Omiſſion and Commiſſion, is, what the wiſeſt are not exempted from. But as they know how to correct them, they, on that Account, don't forfeit the Character of being wiſe. Every Man ought to examine, if there is any thing in his Conductcontrary to Temperance or Modeſty. If he renders to his Superiors and his Equals all their Due: If, for inſtance, he fulfils all the Duties of a dutiful Son and a faithful Friend: If nothing eſcapes him that favours the Corruption of the Age, which, at preſent, promotes over all, univerſal Deceit and Unjuſtice: For altho' you are not Men who will plunge yourſelf with Pleaſure into theſe Diſorders, yet it may happen, that ſome of you being deſtitute of the Advantages reapt from the Converſation of a good Maſter, and a virtuous Friend, may heedleſsly fall into Faults of this Nature. Examine yourſelves upon this Point with the utmoſt Exactneſs, and revolving every one of you your own Actions, if you find any ſuch thing, you muſt ſpeedily retract it by a ſincere Repentance; but without, ſuffering yourſelves to be caſt down or to cool: Have you till this Period of Time been a wicked Man? Have you for a long time practiſed the ſhameful Trade of a Robber? Yet you may from this Day forward wipe out the old Stains, and become wiſe and virtuous. But if a Man, in whom ſuch a Change is wrought, ſhall make this Reflection; "Having lived as I hitherto have done, ſhould I henceforward live well, my Converſion will be look'd upon as a Trick, and my Virtue as Hypocriſy: The World, far from entertaining a better Opinion of me, will thereby harbour the ſtrongeſt Suſpicions againſt me, and I ſhall draw upon my ſelf freſh Reproach. If this Man, after ſuch a Reflection, ſhould bravely ſay to himſelf: "Let the World make what Judgment it pleaſes of my Change, it is ſincere, and it ſhall be conſtant: And I am ſincerely ſatisfied to live and to die in Humiliation. O how much would I eſteem ſuch a Courage!

I ſay, in the fourth Place, that a Man ought to have a wiſe and moderate Zeal with Regard to his Neighbour's Failings. By this I do not at all pretend to prevent you, from aſſiſting your Neighbour to become virtuous. Tho' we owe our firſt Cares to our own private Perfection, yet we cannot neglect taking ſome Concern in that of our Friends, without failing in one of the moſt eſſential Duties of true Friendſhip. But if we are to reprove others, there is a Way to do it with Advantage to them. The Advice you give, muſt not only always proceed from a ſincere Friendſhip, but it muſt be delivered in mild civil Terms, ſo as to ſweeten all the diſagreeable Part of the Rebuke. In this we muſt exert all the Tenderneſs with which Friendſhip can inſpire us, and ſeaſonably draw different Pictures of the Virtues, ſetting them in the moſt amiable Light: And painting Vice ſo, as that its Deformity may ſtrike with Horror; yet all this in ſuch a Manner, as to touch the Heart, without ruffling the Paſſions. If we act otherways, if we apply too rough a Hand to a ſenſible Part, without allowing a Man time to guard againſt the Confuſion ariſing from the Surprize, in vain ſhall we afterwards endeavour to recompoſe this exaſperated Mind, which ſtarts too far aſide at firſt, and is ever after in Danger of remaining incorrigible.

For which Reaſon, in my Opinion, when we go about to correct a Fault in any one, the moſt effectual and the ſureſt Way, is not that of Words: And tho' we may take that Method amongſt ourſelves, yet I would lay no great Streſs upon it with Regard to others. I look upon every Man who attacks my Failings, as my Maſter: With this View, I receive with Pleaſure and Thanks, the Advice that is given me. I am ſenſible how little Progreſs I have made in the Paths of true Wiſdom. Alas! I have already loſt a great many of my Teeth, and I am half deaf. That I may anſwer the Ardour which I ſee in you, I paſs whole Nights in meditating. Notwithſtanding my Age and Application, I am by no means exempt from Vice: Why ſhould I be ſurprized, if I am not found to be faultleſs? It is ſaid, that it is the Duty of a Scholar to conceal the Faults of his Maſter: But, if by this it is meant, that it is not lawful for a Diſciple to correct his Maſter, this Maxim is not true: Or at leaſt, all the Truth that is in it, is, that the Diſciple ought not, in correcting his Maſter, to uſe either too much Freedom, or too abject a Diſſimulation: Do you all aſſiſt me in bringing the Good I have about me to Perfection, and in entirely rooting out whatever is faulty, that thus we may mutually help one another in our Progreſs: Let us begin with exerciſing, with Regard to one another, the Zeal which we ought to have for the Perfection of our Neighbour.

Letter of Exhortation from the ſame Wang yong ming, to his Diſciples.

MY dear Diſciples, in all the Letters that I have received from you, which have been a good many, ye all expreſs a great deal of Repentance for what is paſt, and a great deal of Reſolution for what is to come. This gives me an unexpreſſible Joy and Comfort, but I would feel a great deal more, if I were ſure that theſe are not empty Diſcourſes, and that they are your real Sentiments. What I wiſh above all things, is, that each of you may ſee the moſt ſecret Intricacies of his own Heart, as plainly as he ſees the moſt ſenſible Objects at Noon-Day. This is of the utmoſt Importance. For how can a Man correct his own Faults and Failings, if he does not ſee them. On the contrary, a Man who is always watchful over his own Faults, that he may inſtantly correct them, ſoon becomes Maſter of his own Heart. Where is the Man who is blameleſs? I dare affirm, there is none. And he who knows how to correct his Faults aright, is the Man who is the moſt perfect. Kyu pe yû, in his Time, was lookt upon as a wiſe Man, and yet it happened that all his Application was directed to commit but a few Faults; nor could he ſucceed, even in this. Ching tang and Confuçius very juſtly were look'd upon as Sages of the firſt Order, yet their principal Maxim was, inceſſantly to labour to correct themſelves; and they judged this Care to be neceſſary to prevent their falling into conſiderable Faults. I hear it pretty frequently ſaid, How can one be faultleſs, unleſs he were a Yau or a Shun? But tho' this Saying is become proverbial, yet I do not think it is exactly true. Theſe Words do not give us an Idea of Yau and Shun, ſuch as indeed they were, and as they knew themſelves to be. If theſe two wiſe Kings had given themſelves out as Men exempted from every Failing, they thereby would have leſs deſerved the Epithet of Wiſe. But they were far from this Way of thinking. And this is eaſy to be proved from a Maxim of theirs, handed down to us in the Shu king. On the one Hand, the Heart of Man is full of Weakneſs and a Propenſity to Evil. On the other Hand, true Good, which forms as it were the Center of Reaſon, conſiſts in an almoſt indiviſable Point. A pure ſimple Intention is neceſſary to preſerve us always in the Juſt Mean.

We ſee, by this Paſſage of the Shu king, what Opinion theſe great Men entertained of themſelves. They doubtleſs looked upon themſelves to be Men; which made them pronounce in general, that the Heart of Man is full of Weakneſs: That it is difficult to keep it in the Juſt Mean: And that we muſt make ſtrong Endeavours to preſerve ourſelves in the requiſite Purity and Simplicity. In ſhort, we ſee that all the wiſe Men of Antiquity, far from thinking themſelves free from Faults, have look'd upon the Care of correcting themſelves as one of their principal Duties. If ſome by this way, have made ſuch Progreſs as to commit none, it was not becauſe their Hearts were formed in another Manner than thoſe of other Men, and not ſubject to the ſame Weakneſſes; but becauſe, by curbing themſelves, by watching with inceſſant Care over their moſt ſecret Motions, and eſpecially by looking upon themſelves as being full of Faults, they at laſt attained to be faultleſs. I ſee it clearly, my dear Diſciple, that this is the Path in which we ought to tread. But I ſee it too late, my ancient Habits have left the ſame Weakneſs in my Heart, as an inveterate Diſeaſe occaſions in the Human Body.

For this Reaſon, I earneſtly exhort you, inceſſantly to be upon your Guard, and not to expoſe yourſelves to the ſame Difficulties as I have done, by letting your Failings grow into Habits. If, while you are yet young, while your Spirits are active, and your Imagination warm; if before the Inconveniencies of Age, and the Cares of a Family have engroſſed your Heart; you labour earneſtly; your Progreſs will be great, and your Difficulties but ſmall: But if you ſhall delay it, beſides the daily Encreaſe of the Cares of this Life, old Age muſt damp your Underſtanding, and impair your Vigor. If there are Inſtances of ſome Perſons who have thus delayed it, and yet have afterwards attained to true Wiſdom, this could not have done without very extraordinary Efforts, eſpecially, if it happened after they were forty or fifty Years of Age. After this Period of Life, the Deſires of Reformation that we form, are commonly as unſucceſsful as thoſe of a Man who would ſtop the Sun upon our Horizon, when he ſees it ſetting, and conveying its Light from our Eyes. This therefore was underſtood by Confuçius, when he ſaid, that at forty or fifty Years of Age, a Man no longer keeps his Underſtanding. Theſe Words are remarkable, and ſeem to imply an Exaggeration, yet they contain a very ſenſible Truth, and a Truth which the ſame Confuçius elſewhere expreſſes in more ſimple Terms. It is not, ſays he, but after many Struggles that we arrive at true Wiſdom: If we do not labour early, how can we ſupport them in old Age, whoſe inſeperable Attendant is Weakneſs? Alas! I who tell you this, and who begun this Purſuit too late, have but too great Experience of the Truth of theſe Words. This induces me to preſs you to make the beſt of your Time, that you may not be expoſed to a uſeleſs Repentance.

The ſame Wang yong ming being at home in the Province of the Chê kyang, one Year in a very dry Summer, the (*) Chi fû of the Place wrote to him, to aſk him if there was any Secret to procure the Rain to fall, or if he knew any Man who had ſuch a Secret. Wang yong ming returned him a verbal Anſwer to his firſt Letter. Next Day, the Chi fû wrote another more preſſing.

To this ſecond Letter, Wang yong ming made the following Anſwer.

Yeſterday, two of your Officers, Yang and Li, preſented to me a (†) Letter, which you did me the Honour to write me. I found that it demanded of me a Secret for making the Rain to fall. Never was there a Man more ſurprized and confounded, than I was at this. My Surprize and Confuſion encreaſed a great deal, when this Morning I received by the Hands of Shin tſyé, your ſecond Letter, which is ſtill more preſſing than your firſt. The Ways of Tyen are dark; our Underſtanding traces them in vain; and who am I, that I ſhould value myſelf upon penetrating into them, and ſeeing them diſtinctly? Yet, you diſcover ſo much Compaſſion for the People, that I cannot reaſonably forbear telling you my Thoughts upon that Point. I have prayed for a long time, anſwered Confuçius, upon an Occaſion which you know of. In effect, the Prayer of a wiſe Man does not preciſely conſiſt in reciting ſome Forms of Prayer in Time of Need, but in a regular Conduct which he takes care to obſerve. It is ſome Years ſince you was born in the Country of (‡) Ywê: Have you not taken care before hand to pray, that as far as you can you may prevent or ſoften the Miſeries of the People, and render them happy and content? Have you delayed it till this time? Doubtleſs not. Yet the Rain does not fall according to your Wiſhes. that is true; but what better Way is there for obtaining it?

(*) Or, Governor.

(†) The Chineſe literally has it, Your honourable Inſtructions.

(‡) The ancient Name of a Country, now the Province of Chê kyang.

Anciently,

Anciently, in great Droughts, the Princes abridged their Tables and their Diverſions, (*) enlarged their Priſoners, diminiſhed their Impoſts, carefully regulated the Ceremonies a-new, and relieved by their Charity, thoſe whom Sickneſs and Poverty oppreſſed with Sorrow. Then they cauſed the Aſſiſtance of Shan, Chwen and (†) She tſi, to be implored by all; and they themſelves implored it in Favour of the People. I find recorded in the ancient Books, the Ceremony Tſi, in honour of Tyen, to beg for Rain. I find that the Princes making a ſevere Scrutiny into their own Conduct, attributed to themſelves all the public Calamities. I find that theſe very Princes in acknowledging their Faults, begged for time to correct them. The (‡) Li ki, the Chun tſyû, and the Annals named Se ki, have great Numbers of Examples in this kind. This is what I am taught by Antiquity. I do not find that it was then believed, that a few whimſical Characters, and ſome imprecating Ejaculations upon the Water, could obtain Rain. If in following Ages, there were found ſome (||) Tau tſë, who we are aſſured could create Rain whenever there was Occaſion: We are to believe that they were Men of a pure blameleſs Life, and a ſolid conſtant Virtue: That tho' they did not exactly conform to the true Practice of the Empire, yet for all that, they were very notable, and very extraordinary Men: And that thereby they might command Rain.

But where is the Evidence upon which the Credibility of Things of this kind reſts? Upon romantic Hiſtories and Tales. Our King and other Cannonical Books mention no ſuch thing; and all Men of Senſe, look upon what is ſaid on this head, as amuſing Stories. Far leſs ought we to attribute any ſuch Virtue to the preſent Tau tſë. They are a Parcel of vile Scoundrels, as deſpicable as the Mountebanks at Fairs, who diſperſe all kind of Impertinences from their Stages. Can People of this kind, have Thunder, Lightning, Winds, Rain, and other Changes of the Air, at their diſpoſal? How incredible is that?

My Advice to you is, that ſetting aſide all Affairs that may obſtruct it another time, you examine yourſelf a-part, deny yourſelf and every one about you, in all Expences and Luxuries; exactly repair the Wrongs that you may have done; and then with pure upright Intentions, with ſincere Sentiments of Penitence and Grief, invoke Shan, Chwen, She, in Name, and in Favours of the People of your eight (§) Hyen. As for the Prayers and pretended Secrets of the Tau tſë, if the People of their own accord employ them, be you ſatisfied with letting them alone, and not prohibiting them: But lay no Streſs on them yourſelf, and never diſcover any Value for them.

What you may depend upon is, that if in your ordinary Conduct, you have nothing wherewith you can accuſe yourſelf before (*) Shin ning; if on the preſent Occaſions, you redouble your Watch over yourſelf, and at the Head of your Colleagues and Subalterns, pray with an upright and a pure Intention; tho' the Drought were equally fatal to me, let Share of Virtue be ever ſo ſmall, I don't make any Difference betwixt my Intereſts, and thoſe of the People. If I really had any Secret for procuring the deſired Rain, could I be ſo hard-hearted as to ſee them afflicted without relieving them? Would I have put you to the Trouble of ſending two Meſſages to me on this Head? Had I done this, I muſt have been a Brute. Laſtly, I promiſe you, that in a Day or two, I will go to the Suburbs of the South, to ſecond, by my Prayers, your Compaſſion for the People. If you take my Advice, you will confine yourſelf to hearty ſincere Prayers, without giving into theſe Errors, and without having it in your View to gain a (†) Name to yourſelf. Tyen, raiſed as he is above us, is never inſenſible to a ſincere and perfect Virtue.

The Perſon who has printed this Book, adds by Way of Note. In public Calamities, in Inundations, or Droughts, this is the Way in which we are to act. We, in this Manner, are to do all that depends on us. To lay Streſs upon the pretended Secrets of the Tau tſe, or to diſcover any Value for them, is great Blindneſs.

(*) Song enlarged the Innocent, and thoſe who were leſs guilty.

(†) Literally it is; Mountains, Rivers, Territories, and Dominions of each Prince: That is to ſay, the Tutelary Spirits of the Country. This is an ordinary Figure among the Chineſe.

(‡) Theſe two Books mention the Ceremony Yu, in order to obtain Rain. The Li ki ſays, that it was addreſt to Ti. The ancient Books ſometimes mention Shang ti; ſometimes only Ti. As we indifferently ſay, Offer to the Lord, or Offer to the moſt high Lord.

(||) Miniſters of the Sect of Tau.

(§) The City of the firſt Order, of which this Mandarin was the firſt Officer, had in its Juriſdiction, eight Cities of the third Order.

(*) Shin ſignifies Spirit, ſpiritual, excellent, impenetrable: Ming; Intelligence, Knowledge, clear Penetration, &c. I leave the Reader to determine the Senſe of this Expreſſion, by what goes before, and what follows.

(†) That is to ſay, To gain the Reputation of being a compaſſionate Man, and tender of the People's Sufferings.

L Y E (*) N Y U, or, the Illuſtirous Women.

MONG KO being of an Age fit for Study, was ſent by his Mother to School. One Day, as he returned from it, ſhe aſked him, dividing her Thread, how far he had advanced in his Studies, and what he had learned? The Child ingenuouſly anſwering, that he had yet learned nothing, ſhe immediately took a Knife and cut a Piece of Work which ſhe had in the Loom. The Boy trembling, aſked why ſhe had done that. My Son, ſaid ſhe, you, by learning nothing, have done the ſame thing, and worſe. When a Man would become wiſe, and render himſelf illuſtrious, he muſt apply in good earneſt, and profit by what he hears. This is the only Means of living peaceably at home, and of entring into public Poſts, without hazarding any thing. If you neglect Study, as you do, you will be only a Wretch, expoſed to all the Miſeries of the meaneſt Conditions of Life. If you undervalue Wiſdom, and thus loſe the Time appointed for acquiring it, it were better for you to betake yourſelf to the Trade of a Porter, or any other Buſineſs that can make you live. If a Woman can do nothing, and a Man has learned in his Youth to do nothing, they muſt either ſteal, or become Slaves. This is commonly ſaid, and nothing is more true.

Mong ko was ſtruck with the Action and Words of his Mother. He took Tſe ſe for his Maſter, and improved ſo well under him, that he became a great Philoſopher, and the moſt eminent Man of his Age. One Day, entering into an inner Chamber wherein his Wife was, he found her not very decently dreſt. Upon this he was ſtartled, retired haſtily, and it was ſome time before he ſaw her. His Wife went to her Mother in Law, and as it were taking Leave of her; it is a common Saying, ſaid ſhe to her, that when a Wife is retired in her Chamber, the Huſband ſeldom or never intrudes thither, during the Day-time. When I laſt was in my Chamber, my Huſband ſurprized me a little negligently dreſt, and ſeemed to be much diſobliged at it. I ſee that he looks upon me as a Stranger. A Woman cannot decently live any time in a ſtrange Houſe. I am therefore come to bid you farewell, that I may return to my Mother's Houſe.

An example of Conjugal Chaſtity.

The Mother of Mong ko immediately called him, and ſaid to him: Son, when a Man enters into a Houſe, he ought to inform himſelf if any body is within, he ſhould give Notice of his being there, by a Servant, or leaſt he ſhould raiſe his Voice, that he may be heard before he enters. You know that this is uſual: And indeed it is the Way to find the Hall in Order after you enter it. As for all other Apartments, when the Door is opened to a Man, he ought to have his Eyes on the Ground. You have been deficient in this, my Son, and thereby diſcovered an Ignorance of the Rites. After this, how will it become you to be rigid towards others. (†) Mong ko received this Reprimand humbly and thankfully, and then was reconciled with his Wife.

A long time after, Mong tſe being at the Court of Tſi, he appeared a little melancholy. When his Mother aſked him the Reaſon, he declined giving her a poſitive Anſwer. Another Day as he was wrapt up in Thought, he handled his Staff, and fell a ſighing: His Mother perceived it, and ſaid to him: My Son, you lately appeared melancholy to me, and diſſembled the Cauſe. To Day you ſigh, when you are handling your Staff. What is the Matter? Mother, anſwered Mong tſe, I have heard that a wiſe Man ought not to aſpire to Poſts and Rewards, but by honeſt Means. And that when Princes will not hear us, we ought not to laviſh our Advices upon them: And that if they hear us without profiting by us, we ought not to frequent their Court. I ſee that the true Doctrine is neglected here. I want to retire, but I ſee you are now aged. This gives me a great deal of Trouble, and is the Subject of my Uneaſineſs and Grief.

The Duty of a Wife, anſwers the Mother, is to provide Victuals, to ſew, and to take care of the Inſide of the Houſe. The Outſide is not her Province. When we are Girls, we are ſubjected to a Father and Mother. When we are married, we depend upon our Huſbands, and we ought to follow them whither they pleaſe to carry us. Laſtly, when we are Widows, and when our Sons are advanced in Years, we ought to follow them as we once did our Huſbands. This is what the Rites preſcribe with Regard to our Sex. I am aged, it is true, but no matter for that. Do your Duty, my Son; I ſhall be no Obſtacle to you: I know how to do mine too.

King kyang a young Lady of Quality was married to Mû pê, who held the Rank of Ta fû at the Court of Lû: She had a Son whoſe Name was Wen pê. When Mû pê died, King kyang finding herſelf charged with the Education of her Son, took care to make him ſtudy a good deal; when his Studies were over, and he returned Home, ſhe had a watchful Eye over his Conduct, and obſerved more than once, that they who came to ſee Wen pê treated him with a great deal of Ceremony. From whence ſhe concluded that her Son keeping Company only with thoſe who were his Inferiors, both in Age and other Reſpects, he would look upon himſelf as ſtanding no longer in need of Inſtruction.

(*) Lyè, Illuſtrious; Nyu, Women. Perhaps it may be thought, that what is contained in this Collection, does not anſwer ſo pompous a Title. We are to conclude one of theſe two things; Either, that the Chineſe are not very ſcrupulous whether the Title of a Book is juſt or not, or that certain Things are a great deal more raiſed in their Ideas, than they are in ours; which is indeed true enough.

(*) Mong was the Name of the Family. Ko was his Surname, or, as the Chineſe calls it, his little Name. Tſe is an honourable Manner of naming any one.

One

One Day, when the Company was retired, ſhe called him to her, to give him a Reprimand. Formerly, ſaid ſhe to him, when (*) Vû vang was going out of the Hall of Audience, one of his Garters unlooſed, and his Stocking fell down. While he was looking about him, he could not ſee one Perſon whom he thought he had (†) a Right to deſire to tye his Stocking up. Upon which he ſtooped and did it himſelf. When kong always had three good Friends at his Side. He maintained five Officers for obſerving his Faults, and for reprehending him; and not a Day paſſed over his Head, without hearing thirty Perſons telling him of his Failings. Chew kong, at an Entertainment, three times preſented the moſt exquiſite Meats to the old Men. He dreſt their Hair himſelf; and when the Duties of his Function obliged him to make Viſits, he viſited upwards of ſeventy poor old Men, who lived in the moſt obſcure Streets. The three great Men I have mentioned were Princes, and yet you ſee how humble they were: But it was with Regard to People more aged than themſelves, for they commonly admitted no other into their Preſence. Thereby it was, in a Manner, more eaſy for them to forget the Pre-eminence which their Rank and Dignity gave them, and every Day to make a ſenſible Progreſs in Virtue. But you, my Son, take a quite contrary Way, you who are young, and without a Poſt. Yes, I ſee all your Acquaintances yeild to you in every thing, and look upon you as their Superior: They are doubtleſs young Perſons, and as backward in the World as you: What Advantage then can you reap from theſe Acquaintances?

Wen pê received this Reprimand with Thankfulneſs, owned himſelf to have been in the Wrong, and amended his conduct: He contracted an Intimacy with grave Perſons, whom he look'd upon as his Maſters. He was commonly ſeen in Company with venerable old Men; he ſerved them as their Guide and Support as they walked along, and even waited on them at Table. King kyang upon this felt a real Joy. Behold now, ſaid ſhe, my Son forms himſelf, and is become a Man.

When Wen pê began to enter into the Government, King kyang made him a ſhort Diſcourſe; in which by Similies, all drawn from the Art of making Stuffs, in which ſhe employed herſelf, ſhe laid before him the Qualifications of ſuch as ought to fill the principal Poſts in a Kingdom. Sometime after, When pê returning to the Palace, went to ſalute his Mother, and he found her parcelling out her Thread. Wen pê teſtified ſome Concern, leaſt that Trade ſhould do ſome Diſhonour to his Family, and it might be ſuſpected, as if he did not treat her very well. King kyang ſending forth a great Sigh, theſe, cried ſhe, are the falſe Notions, by which this, once ſo flouriſhing, Kingdom is now ruin'd. What! my Son, can you, who have ſtudied ſo much, and who are now cloathed with Authority, be ignorant? I have many things to acquaint you with; hear them attentively. The wiſe Kings of Antiquity, induſtriouſly ſought for the pooreſt Grounds, whereon they might ſettle their Subjects. One of their greateſt Secrets in the Art of Governing, was, to employ the People in laborious, and even fatiguing, Works; and they were certainly in the right. Fatigue and Labour renders a Man careful and virtuous, but Idleneſs and Luxury beget and cheriſh Vice. The Inhabitants of fat fertile Soils, are commonly very lazy and voluptuous; but they whoſe Ground are poor, are Men of Induſtry and Virtue.

Induſtry of the Antient Chineſe.

Beſides, you are not to imagine, that in wiſe Antiquity, Labour and Induſtry were appointed only for the People. How much did our Emperors themſelves work? They regulated their Finances, examined their Magiſtrates, and the Reports made to them by the ſeveral Magiſtrates. They had the Neceſſities of the People to watch over; and they provided for them as good Maſters and Paſtors. They regulated the Puniſhments, and the laſt appeal always lay to them, with Regard to the Chaſtiſements of Criminals. They had the public Ceremonies to perform at ſtated Times, and to prepare them for ſeveral Days beforehand. Even an Emperor was not ſuffered to repoſe or to divert himſelf, unleſs every thing was in order. The very ſame Rule was obſerved with Regard to the Tributary Princes. They paſſed the Morning in acquitting themſelves of the Duty and Service they owed to the Emperor, according to the Orders they had received. They employed the Middle of the Day, in what regarded the Government of their private State, and the Evening, in examining Criminal Affairs. In the Night-time, they regulated their Workmen and daily Labourers. The great Men of the Empire, then ſpent the Morning in the Affairs that belonged to their own Sphere. Towards Noon, they conſulted in common about what concerned the Government of the State. In the Evening, they drew up a Memorial of the Things which they were to regulate next Day. And the Night-time was employed in the Cares of their own private Affairs. It was the ſame in Proportion with all Conditions, above that of the meaneſt People.

Extended to all Ranks.

To go from Men to Women; Are you ignorant that the Queens wrought with their own Hands, theſe violet-coloured Ornaments which hung at our Emperor's Cap? That theſe red Borders, which diſtinguiſhed the Princes and the Dukes, were wrought by their Wives: That the large fine Belts worn by the great Men, and their Habits of Ceremony, were wrought by the Wives of the very Perſons who wore them? There was a much ſtronger Reaſon, why the Women of an inferior Condition wrought their own Huſbands Cloaths with their own Hands. Their Labour was not confined to this. Theſe Kinds of Stuffs and Works were offered to Princes, either out of Duty, when they who offered them were their Subjects; or in Preſents, when they were not. In ſhort, it was a Crime both for Women and Men to lead a lazy Life. Such were the Cuſtoms of our Anceſtors: and the Maxims of our ancient Kings, which have been tranſmitted to us, and according to which, great Men ought to labour, both with their Hands and

(*) He was Emperor.

(†) Becauſe he had no-body with him but Men, whom he reſpected for their great Age and Merit.

and their Head, were then inviolably practiſed. We are not to forget theſe wiſe Maxims and theſe laudable Cuſtoms.

Reflect, my Son, that I am a Widow, and that you are but lately put into Poſt. Are then Lazineſs and Pride becoming in you? For my Share, I endeavour to have nothing to reproach myſelf with on this Head; and you ſeem to take that amiſs. What can a Prince hope from a Man that has ſuch Diſpoſitions? I am much afraid, leaſt my Huſband has in you, left me a Son unworthy of ſuch a Father, and leaſt his Poſterity ſhould end in your Perſon. In effect, Wen pê, a little time after, died without Children. King kyang, during her time of Mourning, bewailed her Huſband in the Morning, and her Son at Night.

Ki kang, the Brother of Mu pê, an Uncle of Wen pê, was the Head of his Family, and therefore King kyang, according to the Cuſtom, was to go to his Houſe. He therefore went to invite her thither, and talked to her with a great deal of Reſpect. King kyang followed him with Silence. When ſhe came to the Houſe of Ki kang, without ſpeaking a Word, ſhe entered into the Apartment that was appointed for her. Afterwards, tho' Ki kang treated her always as a Mother, yet ſhe ſpoke very ſeldom to him, and always in her Apartment, and at a good Diſtance. Confuçius, to whom this Conduct was related, praiſed King kyang very much, for her exact Obſervance of the Rites.

Heroic Spirit in a Mother.

When Tſû and Tſin were at War with one another, the King of Tſû raiſed an Army, the Command of which he gave to Tſe fa. The General falling ſhort in Proviſions, diſpatched a Courier to inform the King of this. He at the ſame time took that Opportunity of being remembered to his Mother. The Courier repairing to her, How is all with the Army, ſaid ſhe; are the poor Soldiers well? Madam, anſwered the Meſſenger, Proviſions are fallen ſcarce among them. Every Soldier, it is true, has hitherto had his Proportion of Peaſe, but it has been Scanty, and by Tale. And how does your General live, replied ſhe? Madam, ſaid the Meſſenger, he feels the Famine likewiſe; every Morning and Night, he has only ſome Herbs and ſome very ſorry Food, together with a little black Rice. The Converſation went no further; but ſome time after, when Tſe fa returned victorious, his Mother ſhut the Gate of her Houſe againſt him.

Tſe fa being much ſurprized with this bad Reception, begged ſome Perſons of his Acquaintance, to aſk the Reaſon of it of his Mother. Is my Son, anſwered ſhe, ignorant of what the King of Ywê formerly did in a War againſt Û? Does he not know, that when that Prince on his March received a Preſent of Wine, he gave it to his Soldiers to drink? That he did the ſame with a Bag of dry roaſted Rice which he received on another Occaſion, and that he reſerved none either of the Wine or the Rice to himſelf. How could my Son be ſo hard hearted as to eat Morning and Night, what was dreſt for him, without ſharing it with the Soldiers, who were reduced to a few Peaſe a Day? Tſe fa, victorious as he is, is, in my Eyes, a deſpicable General; and I don't look upon him as my Son. All this was reported to Tſe fa, who acknowledged his Fault, aſked Pardon of his Mother, thanked her for her Inſtruction; and the Gate was then opened.

Scrupulous exactneſs in a Widow.

A Widow of the Kingdom of Lû, having prepared every thing at home for the Feaſt of the New Year, and the laſt Day of the Old, called her nine Sons to her, and ſpoke to them in this Manner. My Sons, I know that a Widow ought to keep within the Houſe of her deceaſed Huſband, according to the Rites. But when I reflect, that in my Father's Family there is no Perſon come to the Age of Diſcretion, doubtleſs at this ſolemn Time, the Ceremonies will be neglected, or but very ill performed; I hope you will not take it amiſs, if I go thither this Day. Whatever you pleaſe, Mother, ſaid the nine Sons upon their Knees. You ought to know, anſwered ſhe, that we Women are not Miſtreſſes of ourſelves. In our Youth, we are under the Authority of our Father and our Mother. In our riper Age, we are in the Power of our Huſbands, in our old Age and Widow-hood, we ought to follow our Children, and in many Reſpects, to be dependant upon them. My Sons are very well pleaſed, that this Day I ſhall repair to my Father's Houſe: This is a little Liberty which I take, and not ſtrictly agreeable to the Rigor of the Rites. But I do it to put Things in Order, in a Place, where probably there would be no Order otherways. This Day, redouble your Vigilance, keep the Door well ſhut, for I ſhall not return till it is dark.

Immediately ſhe ſet out, being accompanied with an old Domeſtic who had been ſent to invite her. When ſhe came thither, ſhe made all the haſte ſhe could to put every thing in good Order; and the Day beginning to lower, ſhe thought that it was late. Upon this, ſhe ſet out on her Return homewards: But before ſhe got thither, the Sky clearing up, ſhe found ſhe had been deceived by the Darkneſs of the Day, and that it was not ſo late as ſhe imagined. She therefore reſolved to wait in a retired Place near her Houſe, in to which ſhe entered when it was Night. A Noble-man, who had ſeen her from a Terraſs, found ſomething in this Way of doing, that was extraordinary: He had the Curioſity to cauſe her to be followed; and he found ſome Pretence to examine what had paſt in her Houſe. Thoſe to whom he had entruſted this Commiſſion, informed him that it was an honourable Family, and that every thing was in Order, and even according to the Obſervation of their Rites.

This Noble-man calling for the Widow, ſaid to her; Such a Day, coming from the Northwards, you ſtopt a conſiderable Time in ſuch a Place without the Walls, and did not enter into your Houſe till Night fell: I thought this a pretty extraordinary Thing, and am curious to know what could induce you to act in this Manner. Sir, anſwers the Widow, it is long ſince I loſt my Huſband, who left me with five Sons. Towards the End of the Year, having put every thing in Order

Order for the New Year, with the Conſent of my Sons, I paid a Viſit to my Father's Houſe. When I left them, I ſaid to my Sons and to my Daughters in Law, that I would not come back till Night fell. Partly from Miſtake, and partly leaſt I ſhould meet with ſome rude Companion, as you know there are many ſuch at a Time like this: I left my Father's Houſe too ſoon. I found this when I was upon the Road; and not being willing to arrive before the Time which I had fix'd for my Return, (*) I waited in that remote Place, till the Hour ſhould come in which I promiſed to return. This Noble-man praiſed her very much, and honoured her with the Title of (†) Mû.

Mang lû, a Subject of the Kingdom of Whey, married the Daughter of Mong yang his Country Man, in a ſecond Marriage. He had five Sons by his firſt Wife, and three by his ſecond. The five Sons of the firſt Marriage, could not endure their Step-mother. And tho' ſhe treated them very well, and ſhewed them all the Tenderneſs imaginable, yet ſhe could not win them over. Being afraid, leaſt it might be the Fault of her own Sons, ſhe ſeperated them entirely; ſo that they had nothing in common, either with Regard to their Lodging, their Cloaths, or their Victuals: Yet all was to no Purpoſe; the five Sons of the firſt Bed, continued to expreſs a great deal of Averſion for their Step-mother. It happened, that the third of theſe five Brothers was made Priſoner, for having neglected his Prince's Orders; and was capitally convicted. The Mother appeared inconſolable, and omitted nothing that could ſoften the Rigors of his Priſon; and beſides that, ſhe did every thing to prevent his being condemned. A great many People ſeemed ſurprized, that ſhe ſhould give herſelf ſo much Uneaſineſs about a young Man, who had expreſt ſo much Averſion for her. An Inſtance of Generoſity in a Step mother;

No Matter, ſaid ſhe to them, I look upon him as my own Son, and will do to the laſt, all for him that lies in my Power. Where is the Merit and Virtue of loving one's own Children? Or where is the Mother who does not love them? But I cannot confine myſelf to that. The Father of theſe young Men, ſeeing them deprived of their Mother, eſpouſed me, that I might ſupply her Place to them. Wherefore I ought to look upon myſelf as their Mother. And can one be a Mother without Affection? If the Affection I have for my own Children, ſhould make me neglect theſe, I ſhould be unjuſt. What has a Woman, void of Juſtice and Affection, to do with Life? Tho' he entertained the greateſt Averſion for me, yet his Hatred and diſobliging Manners, could not free me from the Duty I owe him. The Anſwers of this Woman became public, and the King being informed of them, pardoned her Son, from the Regard he had for ſuch a Mother. Ever after that time, not only this rebellious Son, but his Brothers were as full of Reſpect and Submiſſion for their Step-mother, as her own Sons were; and ſhe inſtructed them ſo well, that they honourably filled the firſt Poſts of the Kingdom.

Tyen tſi tſe, the Miniſter of the Kingdom of Tſi, raiſed a pretty moderate Sum from his Dependants, and came to put it in his Mother's Hands. Son, ſaid ſhe, you have been but three Years in Poſt, and I know how much both your Sallary, and the Expences you muſt lay out, amount to. How then have you raiſed the Sum which you have now brought to me? Mother, anſwered Tſi tſe, I own to you freely, that I have received it from the Subaltern Officers. Son, replies the Mother immediately, a good Miniſter ought to ſerve his Prince affectionately and diſintereſtedly; at leaſt, he ought to keep his Hands clean, and to uſe no dirty Ways of enriching himſelf. If any ſuch thing comes into his Head, he ought immediately to reject it. In ſhort, he ought to avoid even the Suſpicion of being eaſy in taking Money which does not come by honeſt Means: To be really as diſintereſted as he would wiſh to appear to be in the Eyes of the World, and thereby to give Authority to his Words. The Prince has done you the Honour to put you in Poſt; your Sallary is conſiderable, and you ought to anſwer his Favours by a blameleſs Conduct. Know, my Son, that the Duties of a Subject, and more eſpecially of a Prince's Miniſter, are not leſs inviolable than thoſe of a Son to a Father. He owes to the Prince his Maſter, a ſincere Affection, an ardent Zeal, and an unſhaken Loyalty. He ought to give Proofs of all theſe Virtues, even at the Hazard of his Life, if there is Occaſion. And as theſe dangerous Occaſions don't often preſent, he at leaſt ought to diſtinguiſh himſelf by a conſtant Uprightneſs and a perfect Diſintereſtedneſs. Beſides the other Advantages of this Conduct, it is the only Way to be ſheltered from the Storms of State. By taking another Road, you become a bad Miniſter, and how then can you be a dutiful Son. Hence, fly from my Preſence; I diſown you as a Son; you may do what you have a Mind with that Money, but what is ill purchaſed, ſhall never enter into my Houſe. Of ſtrict honeſty in a Mother;

Tyen tſi tſe retired full of Confuſion and Repentance. He returned the Money to thoſe from whom he had taken it; went and accuſed himſelf before the Throne of his Prince, begging for the Chaſtiſement he deſerved. Swen vang, who was then King of Tſi, was charmed with the Virtue of this Woman. He cauſed a large Sum to be given her out of his Treaſury, pardoned Tyen tſi tſe, and kept him in his Poſt.

Kyang, the Daughter of the King of Tſi, was married unto Swen vang, one of the Emperors of the Chew Dynaſty. This Princeſs was equally witty and virtuous; never was there found any thing blameable in her Words and Actions: But ſhe was grieved to ſee the Prince plunged in And of virtuous Prudence in a Wife.

(*) They might have ſuſpected, that ſhe deſigned to have impoſed upon them, and to have ſurprized them; and this might have diminiſhed their Confidence in, and Affection for her.

(†) Mû ſignifies Mother, and likewiſe Maſter or Miſtreſs, ſo that according to the Chineſe Idiom, it may ſignify Mother; Miſtreſs, or Miſtreſs of Mother. The firſt is the moſt natural.

in an Indolence and a Lazineſs, unworthy of himſelf. He went to Bed pretty early every Night, and ſlept very late next Morning. Behold the Expedient ſhe took to reclaim him.

One Day ſhe laid aſide her Earings, Bodkins, and other Ornaments of her Head; and placing herſelf a-part upon an Alcove in the Poſture of a Criminal, ſhe talked to the Prince in theſe Terms by the Mouth of a Servant; Sir, I had the Honour to be your Servant; and I have known for a long time, that I have no Merit in any Reſpect: But there is one thing that I have not remarked till now, and that is, that to all Appearance I am a Rake. It is doubtleſs on my Account, that contrary to the Rites, your Majeſty appears every Day ſo late, and that you are look'd upon as a Prince who prefers your Pleaſure to your Duty. This Character does you ſo much the more harm, as Pleaſure in all Ages, has been look'd upon as the Source of great Numbers of Diſorders. This Evil, whatever it is, doubtleſs proceeds from me. Put a Stop to it, I beg of you immediately, and vindicate your own Character, by puniſhing the Guilty.

Swen vang then reflecting with himſelf, Riſe, ſaid he to his Wife, reſume your Ornaments and your Dignity. It is true, that my Virtue comes far ſhort of my Character: But the Fault is entirely mine, and no way yours. From that time forward, Swen vang applied himſelf ſeriouſly to the Affairs of his State. He gave Audiences early in the Morning, even to the Evening, and gained the Character of being a great Prince.

An Example of Heroic Reſolution in a Lady.

Shin ſeng, the eldeſt Son of Hyen kong, the King of Tſin, was traduced to his Father by the Concubine Li ki; and not being able to bear ſo black a Calumny, he put himſelf to Death. Chong eul, the Brother of Shin ſeng, and like him, the Son of a King, was afraid of having the ſame Villany practiſed upon him: So he immediately left the Kingdom with a Band of well choſen Men, the Principal of whom was Kyew fan. They all retired to the Kingdom of Tſi, where When kong, who was Prince of that Country, received Chong eul very willingly: He gave him an Equipage of twenty Chariots, an honourable Treatment, and Tſi kyang, a Princeſs of the Blood, for his Wife. Chong eul being very well ſatisfied with his Fate, laid his Account with ſpending the Remainder of his Life in this Manner, and willingly renounced all his Pretenſions to the Crown of Tſin. Kyew fan could not reliſh this Indifference of his Prince, to a Kingdom to which he was the rightful Heir, and ſo much the leſs becauſe, ſince his Baniſhment, and the Death of his Father Hyen kong, which happened ſoon after, that Kingdom had changed ſeveral Maſters, and was then in Confuſion. One Day, as Kyew fan, and others of the Retinue of Chong eul, were diſcourſing a-part on this Head, they concluded, that the Prince muſt abſolutely quit his Retreat, and return to take Poſſeſſion of his Kingdom. A young Female Slave overheard the Converſation, and related it all to Tſi kyang, who immediately cauſed this Slave to be put to Death, and went to her Huſband Chong eul. Prince, ſays ſhe to him, all they who are of your Party take it much a miſs, that you ſhould confine yourſelf to live here. They are all of Opinion, that you ought to quit Tſi, that you may aſſert your undoubted Right to the Crown of Tſin. Yeſterday, as they were deliberating upon the Means of engaging you to take this generous Reſolution, a young Slave overheard them, and came and told me all. Being afraid, leaſt ſhe ſhould ſpeak of it to ſome body elſe, and thereby create an Obſtacle to the Deſign, I have taken care that ſhe ſhall live no longer. The Secret is now ſafe, and you may ſet out without any Noiſe. This is the Advice of your faithful Servants, follow it immediately; and return into Tſin, which ſince you left it, has never enjoyed a Moment of Peace. That Kingdom belongs to you; put yourſelf in a Way to recover it, and doubtleſs you will have the Aſſiſtance of (*) Shang ti.

No! anſwered the Prince, I will not leave this Place; I deſign to live and to die here. The Princeſs redoubled her Inſtances, and endeavoured by ſeveral Examples to inſpire her Huſband with a Paſſion for Rule, and the Hopes of recovering his Kingdom. But ſeeing all was in vain, ſhe talked over the Affair with Kyew fan; and they both agreed that they ſhould ſuddle the Prince, and that while he was drunk, his Attendants ſhould carry him away on the Road to Tſin. The thing was executed accordingly. Chong eul awaking from his Drunkenneſs, in the firſt Emotions of his Anger, ſnatched a Lance, with which he would have pierced Kyew fan, who put aſide the Blow. Then Chong eul ſeeing himſelf engaged, and beſides having a Kindneſs for Kyew fan, ſaid to him, If this Enterprize ſucceed, it is well, I will pardon you; but if it does not ſucceed, I will (†) hate you mortally. They ſet out, they advanced, and they arrived at Tſin. Mû kong furniſh'd the Prince Chong eul with Troops: He entered the Territories of Tſin; and as ſoon as his Arrival was heard of, they killed Whay kong, who had been made King, and beſtowed the Crown upon the Prince, who took the Name of When kong. Tſi kyang at the ſame time was declared Queen, and an Embaſſy was ſent for her to the States of Tſi, with all the Honours due to her Dignity.

Uncommon Virtue.

Ta tſe, the Miniſter of the Kingdom of Tau, was a great deal more anxious about his own, than about his Prince's Intereſt, or gaining a right Character. His Wife made many Remonſtrances to him upon this Head, but he laugh'd at them all. He continued in Poſt for five Years, at the End of which, being well fatned with the Blood of the People, he diveſted himſelf of his Poſt, that he might go and peaceably enjoy his Riches. They were ſo great when he went away, that he had in his Train 100 Chariots: While he was yet in Poſt, every one of his Family killed a prodigious Number of Oxen, that they might compliment him. His Wife, in the midſt of theſe Rejoycings, always wept, tenderly embracing her Son. The Mother of Ta tſe was enraged at her Daughter in Law's Way of acting: How ridiculous are you, ſaid ſhe; why will you diſturb the Feaſt thus? What an ill-omen'd Bird are you.

I

(*) Shang, ſignifies, Supream: Ti, Emperor, Emperor, Lord.

(†) Literally it is: I could have the Heart to eat your Fleſh.

I have Reaſon to weep, anſwered the Daughter in Law: So much Grandeur, ſo many Riches, without Merit and without Virtue, threaten this poor Infant with many great Misfortunes. Tſi wen, formerly Miniſter of the Kingdom of Tſû, enriched the State, and neglected to enrich himſelf. While alive, he was honoured by the Prince, and adored by the People: When dead, his Poſterity was loaded with Honours and Wealth, and his Reputation was always the ſame. Alas! How little does my Huſband reſemble him! The Luſtre of preſent Greatneſs, and the Paſſion of heaping up Riches, wholly employ him; nor does the Future in the leaſt trouble him. It is ſaid, that in the Mountains of the South there is a Leopard, who, notwithſtanding his Voraciouſneſs, in a rainy Seaſon, will live ſeven Days without any Food, rather than by going abroad ſpoil the Luſtre of his Skin. The more fat Dogs and Swine are, the nearer their Days are to an End. The Miſeries of the State are yet greater than my Huſband's Riches. He wanted the Art, while he was plundering the People, to win their Love. To me, he ſeems to be near great Misfortunes. Would to God, I and my dear Babe were well rid of them.

This Diſcourſe put the Mother of Ta tſé into ſuch a Paſſion, that ſhe drove away her Daughter in Law, who retired with her Child to her own Mother. That very Year in which Ta tſé had laid down his Poſt, he and his Servants were unhappily aſſaſſinated by a Company of Robbers, who carried away all his Riches. They killed every one about the Houſe, except the Mother of Ta tſé. Her Daughter in Law immediately returned to her, that ſhe might ſerve her in her old Age. Every one praiſed the Foreſight of the Daughter in Law, and the Wiſdom ſhe had diſcovered in preferring Virtue to Riches. People were raviſhed to ſee, that after ſhe had ſaved her own Life, and that of her Son, by her Reſolution and her Foreſight, that ſhe ſhould repair by her Aſſiduity in ſerving her Mother in Law, all that was blamable in her Manner of retiring.

Yen tſé, the firſt Miniſter of Tſi, was a Man of a very ſhort Stature, but he had amongſt his Domeſtics, a Giant eight Foot high. The Wife of this Domeſtic, who likewiſe ſerved Yen tſé, was curious to ſee the Equipage, one Day, as that Miniſter went abroad in Ceremony. She remarked, that her Huſband made his Horſe curvett, reared himſelf in the Stirrups; in ſhort, aſſumed great Airs, and ſeemed to be very proud of his vaſt Height. When the Cavalcade was returned, the Wife of this Giant taking him a-part, ſchool'd him in this Manner. You are, it is true, a poor Man, but you deſerve to be poor all your Life long. The Huſband being ſurprized at this unexpected Compliment, aſked her what ſhe meant. Behold, ſaid ſhe, your Maſter: He is ſcarce three Foot high, and yet he fills the higheſt Poſt in the Kingdom, and acquits himſelf of it in ſuch a Manner, as to procure his Prince a great deal of Glory, without adding one Inch to his own Stature: I looked at him this Morning with all his Retinue, I admired his humble, modeſt, thoughtful, and almoſt fearful Air. On the contrary, I obſerved that you, who tho' you are about eight Foot high, are at beſt, but a Slave, gave yourſelf Airs of Importance, and was quite full of yourſelf. I bluſh'd for you, and I immediately retired. This Man received her Reprimand very well, expreſt a Reſolution to amend, and aſked his Wife in what Manner he ſhould behave. Imitate, anſwered ſhe, imitate your Maſter Yen tſé: Happy, if you can contain as much Wiſdom and Virtue in your Stature of eight Foot, as he does in that little Body: Serve him as he ſerves his Prince: If you love to diſtinguiſh yourſelf, it ought to be in that Manner. It is a common and a true Saying, that Virtue can crown the meaneſt with Glory: And this Glory is a great deal more ſolid than that of thoſe, whom ſome accidental Advantages render haughty and proud.

The Huſband profited ſo well by this Lecture, that he was quite a new Man. No body could be more humble, more modeſt, more diligent in his Service, more zealous for his Maſter, or more exact in fulfilling his Duties, than he was. Yen tſé was ſtruck with this Change, and aſked how it came about. The Servant anſwered, that it was by means of his Wife, and told him the Method ſhe had taken. Yen tſé praiſed the Wiſdom of the Wife, and the Docility of the Huſband. He valued a Man who was capable of making a conſtant firm Reſolution ſo readily; and gave him a Poſt, of which he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that he was promoted, and at laſt became a great Officer.

Tſye yu was a Native of the Kingdom of Tſû, and lived by the Labour of his Hands, but under a mean Appearance, concealed a profound Wiſdom. The King, who valued Virtue, and knew how much this Subject poſſeſs'd, wanted to employ him; and ſent him two Meſſengers for that Purpoſe, together with two Chariots loaded with Preſents, and an Order to tell him, that the King deſired that he would accept of theſe Preſents; with the Government, and general Intendancy of that Part of his State that lies to the South of the River Whay. Tſye yu ſmiled at this Compliment, but without ſpeaking a Word, and the Meſſenger was obliged to return with the Preſents, not being able to get any other Anſwer. Example of a Wife's love of Retirement.

The Wife of Tſye yu was then from home, and when ſhe returned to her Houſe, ſhe obſerved the Tracts of Chariots, which could not be far from the Gate. How! my Huſband, ſays ſhe entering into the Houſe, have you forgot that Virtue and Diſintereſtedneſs, which hitherto was all your Pleaſure? Chariots have come to our Door, and they have paſs'd no further. Doubtleſs they were loaded, for the Tracts of them are very deep: How came all this, I pray you? The King, anſwered Tſye yu, not knowing my Character, and thinking that I was of ſome Value, wanted to give me the Government of a Part of his Kingdom. He ſent a Man on purpoſe with two Chariots loaded with Preſents, to invite me to accept of this Poſt. You ought to refuſe both the Preſents and the Poſt, anſwered the Wife.

Tſye yu wanting to know if his Wife ſpoke ſincerely, ſaid to her; We all act under the Influence of a natural Inclination for Honours and Riches. Why ſhould we not accept of them when they come in our Way? And why ſhould you blame me for not being inſenſible of the King's Favours? Alas! anſwered the Wife in Tears, Juſtice, Honeſty, Innocence, and to ſay all in one Word, Virtue is much ſafer in a retired Life and a decent Poverty, than amidſt the Hurry of Buſineſs and the Enticements of Riches. Was it wiſe in you to make ſo dangerous an Enchange? We have now long lived together; your Labour has furniſhed us with Food, and mine with Rayment; and thus we have ſuffered neither Hunger nor Cold. What can be more charming than a Life thus equally innocent and peaceful? Ought you not to have perſevered in it? Perhaps you have not conſidered the Dependance and Slavery that is inſeperable from theſe Preſents and Poſts: With Reſpect to Virtue, they deprive a Man of Part of his Liberty; in other Reſpects, they are often incompatible with perfect Honeſty and exact Equity.

Tſye yu then being ſatisfy'd with his Wife; You may be eaſy, reply'd he, I have neither accepted of Poſt nor Preſent; I congratulate you upon it, anſwer'd the Wife; but ſomewhat is ſtill left undone, for it is not quite right to be a Member of a State, and to refuſe to ſerve the Prince, when he deſires our Services: Let us retire and live elſewhere. They then pack'd up their little Furniture, chang'd their Names on the Road, that they might not be known, and removed into another Country. They who were afterwards acquainted with what Tſye yu did, praiſed his Diſintereſtedneſs: But above all, they beſtow'd vaſt Encomiums on his Wife; who without yeilding to her Huſband in any thing, diſcover'd a greater Foreſight, and more elevated Sentiments.

Another. Lay tſe, having early retired from all the Trouble of the World, led a peaceable Life with his Wife, in a ſolitary Retreat. The Walls of his Houſe were compoſed of Reeds, and the Roof of Thatch; a Bed of plain Boards, and a Matt of Straw, were all the Furniture of his Chamber; and a coarſe Stuff ſerved to cloath both his Wife and him. Their ordinary Food was Peaſe, which they ſowed and reaped with their own Hands. It happened, that at the Court of Tſi, as they were talking of the antient Sages, ſome one mentioned Lay tſe as being equal to any one of them in Virtue: Upon this, the King was deſirous to have him at his Court; and to ſend him Preſents to invite him thither, but his Majeſty being given to underſtand, that probably Lay tſe would not come, he reſolved to go in Perſon, and to find him out. When he came to his Hutt, he found him making Baſkets for carrying Earth. I am, ſaid the King humbly to him, a Man without Underſtanding, and without Wiſdom. Yet I am charged with the Weight of a State, which I have received from my Anceſtors; help me to ſupport it, I have come hither to invite you. No, Sir, anſwered Lay tſe, I am a Huſbandman, and a Clown entirely unworthy of the Honour, and ſtill more uncapable of the Employment, which your Majeſty is pleaſed to offer me; I am young, and almoſt helpleſs, ſaid the King, renewing his Inſtances; you can form me to Virtue: I ſincerely want to improve by your Underſtanding and your Example: Lay tſe appeared to be ſatisfied, and the King retired.

The Wife of Lay tſe being return'd from gather'd ſome Wood for Fewel: What did this Man want, ſaid ſhe, what is the Meaning of theſe Chariots whoſe Tracts I ſee? It is the King himſelf in Perſon, anſwered Lay tſe, who is come to preſs me to take the Government of the State under him. And have you conſented to this, replies the Wife? How could I refuſe it, anſwers the Huſband? As for my ſhare, anſwers the Wife, I know the Proverb which ſays, he who eats another Man's Bread, ſubmits himſelf to ſuffer his Blows. This may be well applied to thoſe who are about a Prince's Perſon: To day, they are in Credit and Opulence, to morrow, diſgraced and puniſhed: And all this according to the Whims of their Maſters. You are then going to put yourſelf in the Power of another? I wiſh that you never have much cauſe to repent this, tho' I much fear you ſhall. As for me, I declare that I never will expoſe my ſelf to theſe Dangers: My Liberty is too dear to me, that I ſhould thus part with it, ſuffer me to leave you; upon this, ſhe went out and proceeded on the Road. Her Huſband cried out to her to return, and told her, that he had not yet determined himſelf; She would not deign ſo much as to look back: But going at one ſtretch towards the South of the River Kyang, there ſhe ſtopp'd. Then finding ſome Uneaſineſs within her with regard to the Manner in which ſhe was to live, ſhe anſwered herſelf in theſe Terms. The Birds and other Animals, every Year let fall more Feathers and Hairs, than will be ſufficient to ſerve me for Cloaths; and there is more Corn and Fruit left in the Fields, than will be ſufficient to nouriſh me.

Lay tſe, being touched with the Diſcourſe and Example of his Wife, followed her, notwithſtanding his Engagement, to the South of Kyang, a great many People followed them, and tranſported their Families thither: In leſs than a Year he formed a new Village, which in three Years grew to be a large Town.

Another. The King of Tſi, having heard the Wiſdom and Virtue of Yu leng tſe chong much praiſed; wanted to make him his Miniſter, and ſent off a Man to him from his Court, to make him this propoſal. Yu leng tſe chong having heard him, begged the Meſſenger to wait for a Moment, and that he would then come and give him an Anſwer. He then went into the Inner-part of his Houſe and addreſſing himſelf to his Wife: The King, ſays he to her, wants to make me one of of his Miniſters; what is your Opinion of this Propoſal? If I conſent, to morrow we ſhall be attended with a numerous Retinue, and we ſhall have a pompous Equipage: Our Tables ſhall be well ſerved, and every other thing in Proportion: I ſay again, what is your Opinion? For many Years,

Years, anſwered the Wife, we have gained our Livelihood by a little Trade that we have carried on, and we have wanted for none of the Neceſſaries of Life. Yet you have had leiſure enough for Reading, and from time to time to enjoy this fine Air: Even when you work, you are never without your Books on one ſide of you; your Kin on the other, and a placid Joy in the Middle. The Equipage of which you ſpeak, to me is but an empty Pomp; as to the Table, it may be ſet out with exquiſite Dainties, which at preſent you want: But is that worth your charging yourſelf with ſo many Cares? If you accept what is offered you, you muſt at the ſame time renounce that calm Joy which you taſte at preſent; and you will be happy, if in the preſent Situation of Things, you eſcape a fatal Death.

Tſe chong then came out and told the Meſſenger, that he could not accept of the Honour he did him, and that he begged the King would pitch upon ſome body elſe to fill that Dignity; he then packed up his Furniture, that he might retire elſewhere with his Wife; and in order to be more concealed, he changed his firſt Trade into that of a Gardener.

Chong eul, the ſecond Son of Hyen kong the King of Tſin, left the Kingdom, that he might avoid the Artifices of the Concubine Li ki, who had already by her Calumnies ruined his elder Brother Shin ſeng. When he was retiring to the Kingdom of Tſi, he paſſed through the State of Tſau. The King of that Country, far from doing honour to Chong eul, kept himſelf at a Diſtance in a retired Place, from whence, thro' a tranſparent Curtain, he could diſtinctly ſee Chong eul and his Retinue, as they paſſed along. The Prince was not ſingular in his Curioſity, for the Ladies of the Place had the ſame. One of them, the Wife of Hi fû ki, a great Man in the Kingdom, having ſeen Chong eul paſs by, and conſidered the Aſpect of thoſe who attended him, called for her Huſband with ſome Earneſtneſs, and ſaid to him; This fugitive Prince is ſo young, that no Judgment can yet be formed of his Character. But his Retinue is compoſed of a choſen Band. Above all, there are three who ſeem to me of diſtinguiſhed Merit, and they probably are Noblemen of that Kingdom: I am much deceived, if theſe People don't find the means of eſtabliſhing the Prince in his Throne, to which when he ſhall arrive, he doubtleſs will reſent the good or bad Treatment of the States, thro, which he paſſes, in this his Retreat. Our Prince, who uſes him ſo haughtily, will be the firſt that feels his Reſentment; and in that Caſe, you muſt be involved in his Misfortune. One of our vulgar Proverbs ſays; If you want to know how the Son will turn out, look upon the Father or the Tutor. Another Proverb ſays; One may know a great Man by ſeeing his Attendants, tho' he does not ſee himſelf. By theſe Rules we may judge, that this fugitive Prince will one Day be a great King, and in a Condition to revenge the Affronts he now receives. Take my Advice, and pay your Court to him.

Fû ki believed his Wife; and having no time to prepare any thing elſe, made the Prince a Preſent of excellent Wine: And to enhance the Preſent, he placed a Diamond of vaſt Value upon the Veſſel. Chong eul received the Wine, and returned to him the Diamond. When he was reſtored to his Father's Throne, the firſt Enterprize he undertook, was to ravage Tſau, that he might revenge the Neglect which the Prince of that Country had ſhewn to his Perſon. But he took care to give a Protection to Fû ki; prohibiting any one not only from doing him any Inſult, but from even paſſing the Bounds of his Encloſure. Every one endeavoured to carry what they held deareſt, to his Houſe; ſome their Fathers, ſome their Mothers; and all who fled thither were ſafe. The Orders of the King of Tſin, in this, were ſo punctually obey'd, that there was a public Market at the Gate, where Goods were quietly bought and ſold, as in Time of Peace. Fû ki gave his Wife the Honour of the wiſe Courſe he had taken, and ſhe received great Encomiums.

Shû ngau, while an Infant, one Day, as he was walking, met a two headed Serpent, which he killed and buried. When he returned home, he went a crying to his Mother. What makes you cry Child, ſaid the Mother? Becauſe, anſwered the Boy, I have heard it ſaid, that whoever ſees a Serpent with two Heads, dies. I happened on one to Day, as I was walking abroad. What became of the Serpent, ſaid the Mother? I killed it, replied the Child; and leaſt any one ſhould be ſo misfortunate after me, as to ſee the ſame Object, I buried it. Don't cry Child, anſwer'd ſhe, the Sight of that Serpent will never kill you: The Motive which made you bury it, defeats all the malignant Qualities that were in it. There is no Misfortune but what Charity can avert. Tyen, tho' raiſed far above us, hears and ſees all that paſſes here below. Does not the Shu king ſay? "Whang tyen protects Virtue wherever it is, without Acceptation of Perſons." Do not cry, my Child, you may be eaſy; you will live and arrive at a high Rank. In effect, Shu ngau became afterwards one of the firſt Officers of his Country Tſû. This Prediction which was verify'd in the Event, did great honour to his Mother; and ſhe was looked upon, as one very well verſed in the Ways of Tyen.

Pé tſong, by his Wit, arrived early at the higheſt Poſts in the Court of Tſin: But he carried about him a Failing which is dangerous every where, and ſtill more dangerous at a Court, than elſewhere. From an Exceſs of Honeſty, he refuſed every thing that was advanced, if he ſaw the leaſt Glimpſe of Falſhood in it: And he did this with ſo little Caution, that he frequently covered People with Confuſion. His Wife, who knew his Failing, was inceſſantly exhorting him to correct it. Huſband, ſaid ſhe to him, it is commonly ſaid, that People have a natural Inclination for their Prince, even before he does them any good. But it is likewiſe ſaid, that a Robber has a natural Averſion for the Perſon he robs, even tho' that Perſon has done him no harm. This proceeds from the People always expecting Good at the Hand of their Prince, and the Robber is always expecting Harm from the Perſon whom he robs. I conjure you to apply this Reflection to yourſelf, and be perſuaded if there are ſome who love Honeſty wherever it is found, there are many more who hate it, becauſe they fear it. Your Honeſty is feared at leaſt by every Man, who is not equally honeſt himſelf. You know there are a great Number of theſe: And they are ſo many Enemies which you have, who will make you ſooner or later feel the Effects of their Hatred: You ought to take a little more care of your Behaviour towards them.

Character of indiſcreet honeſty in a Huſband;

And of virtuous Prudence in a Wife.

Notwithſtanding the wiſe Advices of his Wife, Pê tſong marched on at his ordinary Pace. One Day as he returned from the Palace, he appeared more gay than uſual. I think, ſaid his Wife to him, that I ſee in your Face, a Joy and Satisfaction which I have not before obſerved. May I know the Cauſe? To Day, replied Pê tſong hugging himſelf, I was at Court with a great many Officers of my Rank. The Converſation, in which I had a good Share, laſted for a long time, and all of them unanimouſly did me the honour to compare me to the Philoſopher Yang tſe.

For my Share, anſwered his Wife, I have ſometimes heard Perſons who ſpeak little, and who do every thing in a ſimple Maner, compar'd to certain Trees who have but little Beauty, but whoſe Fruits are excellent. I ſhould love a Compariſon of that Kind much better for you, than the one you are ſo vain of. For as they compare you to Yang tſe, Yang tſe himſelf may be compared to a fair Tree without any Fruit. Yang tſe, it is ſaid, ſpeaks a great deal, without taking much care about what he ſays. And this proves very troubleſome to him in its Conſequences. In this Reſpect, the Compariſon holds juſt enough, but I don't ſee any Reaſon why you ſhould be vain of it.

Is not this, anſwered Pê tſong, the ſame Tune always thrumm'd over and over again? You adapt every thing to your own Notions. I want to reclaim you in good earneſt; and the Method I deſign to purſue, is this. I will give an Entertainment here to my Collegues, and before the Entertainment, we will enter into a Converſation. You ſhall, from your inner Apartment, hear all that paſſes, and you ſhall own yourſelf to be in the wrong. With all my Heart, ſaid the Wife, I am ſatisfied. The Day was then fixed, and they had a long Converſation, which was followed by a much longer Entertainment. Pê tſong being, as uſual, full of his Succeſs, after he had ſeen his Company go away, went to his Wife, that he might have her Opinion of the Matter. The Wife ſaw the Humour her Huſband was in, and knew that it would be in vain to endeavour at that time to diſabuſe him. She therefore reſolved to diſſemble and ſeemingly to agree with him; I own indeed, ſays ſhe, that your Companions eſteem you, and give you the Preference with Pleaſure However, being very firmly perſuaded, that her Huſband had every thing to fear from the Enemies he had made, ſhe took another Way, without his perceiving it, to withdraw him from their Vengeance: And for this Purpoſe, took Advantage of the good Humour in which ſhe had put her Huſband, by ſeeming to be of his way of thinking.

After all, adds ſhe, theſe Praiſes which they beſtow upon you, however ſincere they may be, ought never to render you blind to the preſent State of Affairs. The Kingdom is threatened with great Confuſion. Do you take your Meaſures ſo as not to be ruined in it? You know very well that the Royal Family is divided, and that the Diviſion encreaſes every Day. In ſuch Junctures as theſe, the ſafeſt Way is to retire elſewhere without any Noiſe: But this can never be done ſo long as you are in Poſt. Therefore let the Storm which threatens us, be never ſo dreadful, we ought to wait for it with Courage, but without being (*) lulled aſleep ourſelves. The Diviſion amongſt the Princes is ſo great, that the worſt Part we can act, is that of joining with no Party. Chew li is a Prince of great Merit; and he either will get the better, or at leaſt he will find ſome Reſourſe. For my Share, if my Advice is taken, you will join yourſelf with theſe who are at the Head of his Party, and engage yourſelf with him.

Pê tſong having muſed upon this for ſome time; you are in the Right of it, ſaid he to his Wife. In Conſequence of this Advice, he united himſelf ſtrictly with Pi yang, the Head of the Party of Chew li, at the very time that the Enemies of Pê tſong were about to ruin him by a Calumny, which certainly would have coſt him his Head. The Diviſion in the Royal Family broke out ſoon after. Pi yang conveyed Chew li out of the Kingdom: And Pê tſong joining them, ſhunned the Blow which he was about to have received, before he was aware. They who were acquainted with this Conduct, praiſed the Wiſdom and Foreſight of the Wife of Pê tſong.

Ling kong, the King of Wey, one time diſcourſing with his Queen, pretty early in the Night, they heard a great Noiſe of Horſes and Chariots, which came from the Eaſt: When this Cavalcade drew near the Palace, the Noiſe ceaſed all of a ſudden, and ſometime after began towards the Weſt. Whence can this happen, ſaid the King by way of diſcourſe? Doubtleſs, anſwered the Queen, it is Ti pe yû. How do you know that, ſaid the King, ſo as to be poſitive of it? I know, replied the Queen, that the Rite requires every Man to alight before the Gate of the Palace: And they who carry their Reſpect as far as it can be carried, order Matters ſo with their Retinue, as that they make very little or no Noiſe, when they paſs by the Gate. I likewiſe know, that a good Subject with Regard to his Prince, like a good Son with Regard to his Parents, does not ſerve him in Appearance only, but diſcharges his Duty when it is dark, as well as when it is broad Day. But I know none but Ti pe yû in your Kingdom, who has this Exactneſs: For which Reaſon, I aſſure you it is he that has paſſed. The King being curious to to know the Truth, left the Queen for a Moment, informed himſelf who it was that had paſt by, and found that it was actually Ti pe yû.

However, returning to the Room in which the Queen was; Madam, ſaid he ſmiling, I am puzled, but you have not hit upon the Matter. The Queen then filling out a Bumper, and preſenting it to the King, Since I am deceived, ſaid ſhe, you ought to be joyful. Why joyful, ſaid the King? Becauſe, anſwered the Queen, only one Ti pe yû hath hitherto appeared in your Kingdom: And you have diſcovered another as punctual as he is. On this Account, I wiſh you Joy. The Knowledge of this is worth all the Pains you have been at: For upon the Virtue of your Officers, depends the Happineſs of your State. This Anſwer at once ſurprized and pleaſed the King. He diſcovered his Satisfaction to the Queen, and told her that there was indeed no other Ti pe yû. You gueſſed right, continued he, for it was he who paſſed by. The thing took Air, and did honour to the Queen.

Love of Juſtice in a Queen.

Ling kong, the King of Tſi, at firſt married Shing ki of the Kingdom of Lû. By her he had a Son named Quang, whom he deſigned ſhould be his Succeſſor. Shing ki being dead, Ling kong took two Daughters of the Prince of Song; the elder Chong tſe, as his Wife; the younger Yong tſe, as his Concubine. Yong tſe endeavoured to ſet aſide Quang from the Succeſſion, and to ſubſtitute in his Room Tſû, the Son of Queeen Chong tſe, her Siſter. Yong tſe actually ſucceeded in perſuading Ling kong to agree to this Change, but the Queen Chong tſe endeavoured to diſſuade him from it, by repreſenting that it was contrary to Cuſtom, and that theſe Experiments had always fatal Conſequences. Quang, ſaid ſhe, is the elder, he is appointed to ſucceed, and why ſhould he be degraded without any Reaſon? This is deliberately ſeeking for Misfortunes. If I repent of it, anſwered the King, that is my Buſineſs. Chong tſe in vain oppoſed it after this, and was ridiculed, as oppoſing the Advancement of her own Son. Ling kong puſhed on by the intriguing Yong tſe, declared Quang to be degraded from his Rank, appointed Yu to ſucceed him, and gave him Kau lyew for his Governor. Some time after, when Ling kong fell ſick, and was at the Point of Death, Kau lyew made ſome Steps to prepare the Subjects for the advancement of Yu, but did not meet with the deſired Succeſs, for the Eyes of Ling kong were ſcarcely cloſed, when Tſoi ſhu cut the Throat of Kau lyew, and placed Quang upon the Throne. It was then ſeen, that the Queen Chong tſe was in the Right; and every one praiſed her Equity and Wiſdom.

Kong ſhing tſe pi, of the Kingdom of Lû, having interr'd his elder Brother, was touched, and even wearied out with the Lamentations of his Siſter in Law. Preſenting himſelf before the Gate of the Widow's Apartment, with a deſign to comfort her, he told her by way of Compliment, that ſhe ought to moderate her Affliction, for he would take care that ſhe ſhould be again happily married. However, he let ſeveral Years paſs without minding his Promiſe. The King of Sû having offered to make him one of his Miniſters, he conſulted with his Siſter in Law, if he ſhould accept of it or not. No! anſwered ſhe, you ought not. But why ought I not, replies Tſe pi? Do you aſk why, ſaid ſhe? My Huſband was ſcarce buried, when you came and told me by way of Comfort, That you would marry me again. This was ridiculouſly unſeaſonable, and a flagrant Violation of the Rites. My Mourning has been over for ſeveral Years, and you have neither done nor ſaid any thing, in order to know my preſent Diſpoſition. This is not acting like a Man of Senſe. Can a Man who is capable of theſe Kind of Faults, ſuſtain with Honour, the Poſt of a Miniſter,? For my Share, I think he cannot.

If you wanted to be married again, anſwered Tſe pi, why did you not tell me ſo yourſelf? A Woman ought never to make theſe Kind of Advances, anſwered the Widow: They upon whom ſhe depends, ought to make them for her. Beſides, what I have ſaid, does not proceed from the Deſire I have to a ſecond Marriage, for it has always been my Averſion. It is only to make you ſenſible, how incapable you are of the Poſt that is offered you. A Man, who pretends to judge of Colours with his Eyes ſhut, muſt be deceived. Is not this true? I tell you Sir, the Caſes are parallel. If a Man like you, who does not underſtand even the moſt common Things of Life, ſhould pretend to be a Miniſter of State, he cannot fail to draw down upon himſelf the Curſes of Men, and the Chaſtiſement of Tyen. Beware of this, and take my Advice, not to accept of the Poſt.

Tſe pe did not mind his Siſter in Law, whom he heard only by way of Amuſement. He accepted of the Poſt of Miniſter, and before the Year was expired, he died under the Hands of an Executioner. When he was dying, he did Juſtice to the Zeal and the Wiſdom of his Siſter in Law, whoſe Advice he had looked upon as a Piece of Female Revenge.

A Widow's Zeal for her Prince's Honour.

Ngay vang, King of Wey, ſeeing the Hereditary Prince at an Age of having Children, cauſed young Ladies to be ſought out, who might be raiſed to the Rank of his Wives. Amongſt thoſe who were brought to Court, there was one that pleaſed Ngay vang, who ſent the others to the Palace of the Hereditary Prince, and cauſed her to enter into his own. Yu eul, a Lord of the Court, told this Fact to his Mother. That is impoſſible, ſaid ſhe, it is a ſtrange Diſorder. You ought to oppoſe it ſtrenuouſly. Alas! The Kingdom has powerful Enemies, whoſe Forces are vaſtly ſuperior to hers. A perfect Virtue may ſupply ſome Deficiency in Point of Strength; this has frequently happened: But what muſt become of a State, whoſe Prince is deſtitute both of Strength and Virtue? The poor Prince does not perceive, for want of Underſtanding, he does not perceive the Wrong he does. You, and your Colleagues, ought to make him ſenſible of it. The Intereſt of your Families being joined to the Welfare of the State, you have a double Obligation upon you, to admoniſh him, that you may prevent, as much as lies in your Power, the Conſequences Conſequences of ſuch an Injuſtice. If others are too cowardly to ſpeak out, you, my Son, ought not to be wanting in your Duty. Speak out, this is a Duty you owe to the Prince, of whom you are a Servant, and to the State of which you are a Member.

Ye eul, animated by his Mother's Words, ſought a favourable Opportunity of diſcourſing with the Prince. But before it preſented, he was ſent to the Court of Tſi, upon a preſſing Negotiation. His Mother ſeeing that her Son had left the Court, without being able to ſpeak with the Prince, cauſed herſelf to be carried to the Gate of the Palace. There ſhe lifted aloft a Petition as uſual, the Contents of which were, The Widow of Kyo yo has ſomewhat at Heart, which troubles her. She wants to communicate it to his Majeſty. The King ordered ſhe ſhould be introduced to his Preſence. As ſoon as ſhe entered, addreſſing herſelf to the King, Sir, ſaid ſhe, your Servant has always heard the exact Obſervance of the Rites, eſpecially of thoſe due from Man to Woman, reckoned among thoſe things that are of the greateſt Importance to the Good of a State. Our Sex has commonly more Softneſs than Reſolution. Doubtleſs on that Account it is, that the Rites ordain, that Maidens ſhould be early married. Fifteen Years of Age is the common Time of betrothing, and twenty, of conſummating the Marriage. But according to theſe ſame Rites, when a Maiden receives the Preſents that are made her, ſhe is looked upon as the Spouſe of him, on whoſe Account ſhe accepts them. There are certain Ceremonies to be obſerved on this Head; and in all Times, our wiſeſt Princes have given the Pattern; Experience, having often ſhewn us that thereon depends the Happineſs and the Unhappineſs of States. As much as Ton ſhan contributed to eſtabliſh the Hya Dynaſty, ſo much did Mo hi promote its Ruin. We may ſay the ſame thing of Sin and Tan ki, with Regard to the Shang Dynaſty: And of Tay tſe and Pau tſe, with Regard to the Chew Dynaſty. Yet you, Sir, contrary to the Rites, take to yourſelf a Wife who was deſtined for your Heir; and without remembering that your Kingdom is ſurrounded with powerful Neighbours, and cannot ſubſiſt if the leaſt Confuſion happen, you yourſelf are introducing a Diſorder.

The King having attentively heard this Remonſtrance: I am in the Wrong, ſaid he: And immediately he cauſed the Woman he deſigned to keep for himſelf, to remove to the Apartment where the Wives of the Hereditary Prince were. He gave a conſiderable Preſent to this Widow, who alone had the Courage to admoniſh him. And when Yu eul had returned from executing his Commiſſion, he advanced him from the Regard he had to his Mother. Ever after that time, Ngay vang applied himſelf a great deal more to, and was more exact in, all his Duties. He eſtabliſhed ſuch Order in his Houſhold and in his Kingdom, that his Neighbours, tho' powerful, and very ill affected towards him, durſt never attack him. This Action did a great deal of honour to the virtuous Mother of Yu eul.

A young Woman of Shin, was promiſed to a young Man of Fong. When they were both marriageable, the young Man and his Relations came to demand the young Lady, but without making the regulated Preſents, or obſerving the Ceremonies; ſo that the betrothed Spouſe refuſed to leave her Father's Houſe. As they were preſſing her to get over theſe Formalities. It is a common Saying, anſwered ſhe, That a good Beginning is of Importance in all Undertakings; and that a Fault which at firſt appears ſlight, may have fatal Conſequences. What holds true, continued ſhe, in every thing, can it prove falſe in Marriage? Were not the Duties betwixt Man and Wife, the firſt that ſubſiſted among Mankind? And are they not the moſt important of all the Duties of civil Life? Beſides, the End of Marriage is to ſupport Families, and as much as poſſible, to perpetuate the Honours preſcribed by the Rites to our Anceſtors, by giving them Poſterity. But it is a common and a true Saying, That the Water, whoſe Spring is muddy, can never have a clear Stream. Threfore I never ſhall marry againſt the Rites. A Law-ſuit was then commenced, and ſhe ſuffered a great deal, but ſhe continued obſtinate, in ſaying, that ſhe would rather part with her Life, than give her Conſent. So ſhe lived a Maid all her Life.

Pe i, the Daughter of Swen kong, King of Lû, was promiſed to Kong quang, the Prince of Song. The time appointed for the Nuptials being come, Kong quang did not himſelf come to take away Pe i, and was ſatisfied with ſending a Nobleman as his Proxy. But Pe i refuſed to go along with him; tho' at laſt, in Obedience to her Father and Mother, ſhe conſented. At the End of three Months, the Prince of Song having performed the uſual Ceremonies, of ſeeing his new Spouſe in the Hall of his Anceſtors, he wanted to conſummate the Marriage. But Pe i refuſed to allow him, becauſe he had not obſerved the Rites in fetching her away. In order to induce her to conſent, he was obliged to procure a preſſing Order from the King her Father, and the Queen her Mother. Ten Years after, ſhe became a Widow. In this State of Life, as before, ſhe preſerved always an extreme Attachment to the Rites.

One Night her Palace being on Fire; Save yourſelf, Madam, cried one, the Fire gains Ground. According to the Rites, anſwered ſhe, a Woman in my Condition, ought not to appear even in her Hall, without two of her Maids of Honour. I wait for them, and then I will remove: The one came, but the other did not appear. They cried to the Princeſs again, to ſave herſelf, but ſhe would not conſent till the laſt Extremity: All the Princes of that Age, praiſed and admired her Conſtancy.

Conjugal Affection.

A Lady of Song, being married to a Native of Tſay, the Huſband was ſeized with a dangerous Diſeaſe. The Mother of the Wife, wanted to recal her Daughter home to her. No! anſwer'd the young Lady, I look upon this Accident that has happen'd to my Huſband, as happening to myſelf. Beſides, it is uſual for a Woman to live and die in the ſame Houſe where ſhe has been once placed. I will take care not to remove, for a troubleſome Diſtemper with which my Huſband is unhappily ſeized. When our Relations are ſick, if the Phyſicians preſcribe for them the Herb Few and the Herb I, we immediately go to gather them; and however noxious the Smell of theſe Herbs are, we fill our Hands with them, and put them into our Boſom if it is needful, in order to extract from them the Juice: Ought I to do leſs for my Huſband? Every one praiſed this young Woman; and her Mother made what ſhe ſaid upon the Herbs Few and I, the Subject of an Ode which ſhe compoſed in her Praiſes.

Mong i, the Daughter of Wha, was promiſed to Hyau kong, the Prince of Tſi. This Prince frequently endeavoured to get the Bride home without ſo many Ceremonies, but ſhe would never conſent to this. As Hyau kong delay'd making the nuptial Preſents, and doing the uſual Ceremonies, he was nick-named the Chaſte. This haſtened him to defray the Expences of his Nuptials; and he came according to the Rites, in Perſon, to carry Mong i from the Houſe of her Father Wha. Mong i being informed three times, that Hyau kong was come in Perſon, ſuffered herſelf to be conducted to her Spouſe's Houſe. When ſhe came thither, every thing paſſed according to the Rites, and her Delicacy had Reaſon to be ſatisfied.

But ſome Years after, Hyau kong going to Lyang ſye, wanted Mong i to go along with him; the Chariot which carried her over-turned, and broke in Pieces, yet Mong i was not wounded. Hyau kong immediately ſent off one of the beſt Chariots in his Equipage, to conduct her back to Tſi, for fear of ſome other Accident happening to her. But this Chariot not being a Womans, Mong i would not go into it; and ſpeaking through the Curtain which ſhe had drawn up, to the Officer, who was ſent to her by the King: A Woman of my Rank, ſaid ſhe, never appears, even in a Hall, without her two Maids of Honour. Does ſhe paſs from one Apartment into another? She muſt let the Noiſe, which ſhe makes on purpoſe with the Ornaments of her Cloaths, to be heard. Tho' ſhe ſeldom goes abroad; yet when ſhe does, the Rites preſcribe what ſhall be her Cloaths, and what her Equipage. All this is wiſely eſtabliſhed, both for preſerving exterior Appearances, as for keeping the Mind and the Heart upright. But this Chariot that is brought me, is not in Order, and I cannot uſe it. To ſtay longer here, is ſtill worſe. Death is the ſpeedieſt Courſe, and I will rather die than do any thing againſt the Rites. The Officer galloped back, to report this Diſcourſe to the King. A ſuitable Chariot was immediately fitted up, in which Mong i returned to Tſi.

A Queen dies to ſatisfie an obſtinate Obſervance of the Rites.

Chau vang, King of Tſin, going abroad in a Voyage of Pleaſure, carried along with him one of his Wives, a Daughter of the King of Tſi. One Day, as he left her in a pretty agreeable little Iſland, on the Banks of the great River Kyang, he received News, that the Water had riſen very high, all of a ſudden. Upon this, he immediately diſpatched ſome Lords, to bring the Princeſs from the Place ſhe was then in. Theſe Lords rode in Poſt-haſte to the Princeſs, to deſire her to make all the haſte ſhe could out of the Iſland, and to repair to the Place where the King was, and whether they had Orders to conduct her. When the King calls for me, anſwered ſhe, he gives his Seal to them whom he ſends off. Have you the Seal? The Fear, leaſt the Waters ſhould overtake you, anſwered they, made us ſet out in haſte, and neglect that Precaution. Then you muſt return, anſwered ſhe, for I won't follow you without it. As they repreſented to her, that the Riſe of the Water was very ſudden, and in all Appearance would be very great; if they ſhould return for the Seal, it would be impoſſible for them to return in time. I ſee plainly, anſwered ſhe, that by following you, I ſave my Life, and by remaining here, I periſh. But to paſs over a Matter of ſuch Importance, that I may eſcape Death, would be to fail in Fidelity and Courage at the ſame time. It is much better for me to die. They then ſet out in haſte to get the Seal; but notwithſtanding all the Diligence they uſed, the Iſland was laid under Water when they returned, and the Princeſs, with all her Attendants were drowned. The King regretted her mightily, but he yet more praiſed her Fidelity and Conſtancy.

Pe kong, King of Tſin, being dead, the King of U being informed of the Wiſdom, Virtue, and Beauty of his Widow, ſent off a Nobleman to her with a large Sum, two Diamonds of a vaſt value, and thirty Chariots well equipt, to court her for his Wife. In the Life-time of my Spouſe, ſaid ſhe, while he was acting abroad, I did my beſt to regulate the Inſide of his Houſe; I likewiſe was employed with his other Wives, in the Works that are proper for our Sex. At preſent, having loſt my Huſband, I deſign to paſs the Remainder of the Days that Tyen ſhall give me, near his Tomb. I know the Value of the Rank which your Maſter offers me: His Preſents to invite me, are magnificent, but I cannot accept of the Honour he offers me, without rendering myſelf unworthy of it; for it would make me forget my deceaſed Huſband, whom I want to honour in Death as I uſed to do in Life. The Grief of having loſt him, ought to have deprived me of Life; and it is failing in Point of Affection, that I have been able to ſurvive him: I often reproach myſelf for it, but I will take care not to forget myſelf ſo far, as to marry another. Carry back your King's Preſents, and retire yourſelf. The King of U, praiſed the Reſolution of this Princeſs, and honoured her with the Name of (*) Chin ki.

Ling vang, the King of Wey, died without leaving Children by the Queen his Wife, but left a Son by another of his Wives of the ſecond Order, who was immediately declared King. This Promotion made no Alteration in the Mother, who knew how to preſerve her Rank. She honoured and ſerved the Queen Dowager, without in the leaſt relaxing in her Cares. And the young King, after his Mother's Example, did the ſame. At the End of eight Years, the Queen taking the Mother of this Prince aſide, ſaid to her: I am charmed, both with the Manner in which you treat me, and the Care with which you inculcate on the Prince your Son, the ſame Sentiments: Perhaps I have been in the Wrong to admit of your Services ſo long, at leaſt, it is now time to return you Thanks. Your Son is on the Throne; and it is not convenient, that the Mother of a King ſhould ſerve in the Quality of a ſecond Wife. I am a Widow without Children. It is enough for me, if I am ſuffered to paſs the Remainder of my Days quietly here. I am poſitively reſolved to quit this Apartment of Honour, to yeild it to you, and never enter into it but at certain times, that I may have the Happineſs to ſee you.

What are you telling me, anſwered the Mother of the young King? Give me Leave to ſay, that you have not thought well of the Affair; the King your Spouſe, and my Maſter, had the Misfortune to die young: A hard Fate for a Prince! He was not ſo happy as to have a Son by his Wife; he had only one by me, who was but his Servant: This was another Matter of Grief to him when he was dying. What! would you give him a third after his Death, by degrading his Wife, to honour his Servant? Do you reflect upon this? It is a common and a true Saying, that the Zeal of a good Subject, and the Piety of a dutiful Son, ought never to relax with the Number of Years. It is as little allowable for me to be weary of the Rank which I hold with Regard to you. It is my Duty to honour and to ſerve you. If there is any Honour in having given a Succeſſor to your Huſband, this Honour cannot free me from what I owe you, as his Wife.

Do not let us talk more, anſwers the Queen, of what you and I were under the late King, my Huſband. His, and your Son, is now upon the Throne: Therefore, notwithſtanding the Frankneſs with which you offer to pay me Honours and Services, I cannot accept of them, without doing a Kind of Injury to the Prince, in the Perſon of his Mother.

The Concubine made no Reply: But going to the King her Son, Sir, ſaid ſhe, I have always heard, that a wiſe Man ought never to ſuffer any thing that is irregular: Regularity, in my Opinion, partly conſiſts, in maintaining the ancient Rites, ſo as that every one may keep their proper Rank. Yet the Queen Conſort of your Father, wants to quit her own Apartment, and preſſes me to take upon me the Rank which ſhe holds at Court. This is preſſing me to act irregularly: But I will rather die than do it: And as I ſee the Queen cannot be moved by my Remonſtrances, I will move her by my Death. When ſhe had ſpoken thus, ſhe put herſelf in a Poſture to give herſelf a mortal Blow, but ſhe was prevented. The King then diſſolving into Tears, endeavoured to appeaſe her, but ſhe would not conſent to live, till the Queen, being informed of her Reſolution, promiſed her, but with regret, to preſerve her own Rank, and to allow her to ſerve and honour her, as formerly. All the World was ſurprized and charmed, to ſee how forward theſe two Women were to pay a mutual Deference, the one to the other. This deſerves the Name of Wiſdom, and of a Virtue worthy the Encomiums of all Ages.

Surprizing Effect of Chaſtity.

A young Lady of ſingular Beauty, and of approved Merit, loſt her Huſband when ſhe was very young. The richeſt Men in the Kingdom courted her very earneſtly, but all in vain. The King himſelf hearing of her Virtue and Beauty, courted her in form, and ſent to her a great Officer, with the ordinary Preſents. Her Anſwer was as follows: My Huſband, tis true, ſoon left me a Widow, but I never will have another. I have wiſhed to have followed him, but he has left me a Son whom I muſt educate. Many have courted me, but all in vain; and when I thought myſelf delivered from their Importunities, the King himſelf renews them. Is it poſſible ſtill to doubt, whether I will forget my deceaſed Huſband, ſo far as to take another, and to ſacrifiſe my Duty to a ſplendid Fortune? I want to prove in good earneſt, that I am not capable of ſo much Meanneſs, and to undeceive every one, who does not know my Sentiments upon this Head.

After ſhe had ſpoken in this Manner, ſhe took a Mirror in one Hand, and a Razor in the other, and cut off her own Noſe. Now, ſays ſhe, I am puniſhed, for having ſuffered ſo many People to doubt of my Reſolution. Carry this Anſwer to the King, That if I do not put myſelf to Death, it is becauſe I have not Courage to leave my Son at ſo tender an Age. What I have done, is ſufficient. It was doubtleſs for my Beauty, that the King courted me. Tell him, that my Face is now only the Figure of Deformity and Uglineſs, and then he will eaſily deſiſt. The Officer related to the King what he had ſeen. The Prince praiſed the Reſolution of the young Widow, gave her the Title of Kau king, and decreed her other Honours.

A young Officer of Chin, married a Girl of ſixteen Years of Age; but a War ſuddenly breaking out ſoon after, he was obliged to ſerve in the Campaign. Before he left his Wife, he ſaid to her: It is uncertain whether I ſhall live or die. How can I be ſure that I ſhall eſcape the Dangers of this War? I leave you my Mother in Law, who has no other Child but me; in caſe I die, what ſhall become of her? Do you promiſe me, that you will take care of her? Yes, anſwers the Wife, I do promiſe.

A faithful Widow.

The Officer having actually died in the War, the young Widow took very great care of her Mother in Law, working Night and Day with her own Hands, that ſhe might want for nothing. The three Years of Mourning being over, as ſhe was young and childleſs, her Father and Mother wanted to bring her back to their Houſe, that they might marry her a ſecond Time, but ſhe rejected the Propoſal with great Reſolution. Faithfulneſs and Juſtice, ſaid ſhe to them, are our principal Duties; when you married me, you yourſelves recommended nothing to me, ſo much as Affection and Obedience to my Huſband. But you know that that dear Man when he went to the War, where he loſt his Life, expreſs'd to me the Uneaſineſs his Piety gave him, with Regard to what ſhould become of his Mother in caſe ſhe loſt him; and aſked me if I would promiſe him to take care of her. This I promiſed; but beſides my promiſe, there is a Duty incumbent on a Daughter in Law, to ſerve her Mother in Law. My Huſband's Death, far from freeing me from this Duty, puts me under freſh Obligations to perform it. Not to diſcharge it would render me guilty of Unfaithfulneſs and Injuſtice, my deareſt Huſband will paſs for an undutiful Son, who had neglected to provide effectually for the Support of his Mother, and who lightly truſted to a faithful Wife. Let me die rather than expoſe my Huſband or my ſelf to ſuch Reproaches.

Regard

The Father and the Mother, ſeeing the Daughter reſolute, ſpoke no more of marrying her a ſecond Time. The Mother in Law liv'd 28 Years longer, ſhe ſupplying her Neceſſities, and diligently ſerving her, to her laſt Breath. And after her Death, ſhe paid her the laſt Duties, and omitted nothing with Regard to the appointed Ceremonies. The Conſtancy, Faithfulneſs, and Diligence of this Widow in ſerving her Mother in Law, procured her a great deal of Eſteem. The Magiſtrate of Whay yang related them at Court, and the then reigning Emperor, ſent her forty Pounds Weight of Gold, gave her the Title of (*) Hyau fû, and decreed her other Honours.

Vû vong King of Lû, having gone to pay his Homages to the Emperor Swen gang, cauſed his eldeſt Son Ko, and his ſecond Son Hi, to attend him. Swen vang had no great Notion of the elder of theſe two Brothers, but took a great liking for the younger, ſo that he appointed him Succeſſor to the King his Father. In effect, when Vû kong died, Hi mounted his Throne, and reigned under the Name of I kong. He had a Son who was afterwards King, and named Hyau kong, but his Name in his infancy was Ching. This Child being yet in his Cradle, Pê yu the Son of (A) Ko, formed a Faction in the Kingdom, kill'd his Uncle I kong who was then reigning, cauſed himſelf be proclaimed King by his Party, and broke into the Palace; that he might diſpatch the little Ching.

A Loyal Nurſe.

At the firſt Noiſe of this Aſſault, the Governeſs of the young Prince ſtript him of his Cloaths, and put them upon her own Child, whom ſhe laid in the Royal Cradle. The Rebels kill'd this Child, and being perſwaded that it was Prince Ching, neglected the Reſt, ſo that the Governeſs eſcaped with the young Prince in her Arms. She ſcarce got out of the Palace when ſhe met one of the great Lords of the Kingdom; who was Uncle by the Mother's ſide to the young Prince. Governeſs, ſaid this Lord to her a-part, is my Nephew Ching dead? No! Sir, ſaid ſhe, here he is, I have put my own Son into the Prince's Cradle, and they have Murdered the One inſtead of the Other. This Nobleman then gave the Governeſs an Oppurtunity to eſcape ſafely with the Prince: He remained concealed for eleven Years; at the end of which, all the great Men of Lu unanimouſly addreſt the Emperor that Pê yû ſhould be put to Death; and the young Prince raiſed to the Throne of his Father. The Emperor's Conſent being obtained Ching was acknowleged King of Lû. When his Acceſſion to the Throne was celebrated, the Governeſs, who had ſaved his Life at the expence of her own Blood, was not forgotten.

A Modeſt young Lady.

After Ching vang King of Tſû had mounted the Throne, he placed himſelf upon an Eminence, where he might ſee all the Women who were appointed to Lodge in his Palace paſs by. Every one raiſed their Eyes to him, ſome more, and ſome leſs boldly, that they might look at the Prince as they paſſed. One Woman named Tſê vû, always keept her Eyes upon the Ground and modeſtly paſſed by without giving the leaſt ſign of Curioſity or Uneaſineſs. Ching vang being ſtruck with this Modeſty, and wanting to amuſe himſelf a little; Young Beauty, who are paſſing by, ſaid he, I beg you would give me one Glance. Tſe vû did not ſeem to hear him but went on, her Eyes being ſtill fix'd on the Ground: Ching vang would not reſt here; One Glance, ſaid he, and I will make you my Wife; but Tſê vû never raiſed her Eyes. The Prince added, that he would give her a certain Sum of Money, and raiſe her Family. His Promiſes never moved her: At laſt Ching vang came down from the Eminence, that he might approach and talk more conveniently to her. What, ſaid he, I offer to make you my Wife, together with other Advantages, if you will look at me as you go by, yet you obſtinately refuſe to do it. Do you then put ſo high a Price upon your Looks.

Great Sir, anſwer'd Tſe vû gravely, Baſhfulneſs and Modeſty are the Ornaments of our Sex; I thought it was againſt Decency, and againſt my Duty, to raiſe my Eyes to look at you on the Eminence whereon you was placed. This at firſt made me keep my Eyes on the Ground: If I had raiſed them afterwards on the magnificent Promiſes you were pleaſed to make me, I then had acted from Ambition and Intereſt, and ſacrifiſed my Duty to theſe two Paſſions, and thereby render'd myſelf unworthy the Honour you did me. Theſe are my Excuſes, and the Motives of my Conduct. Ching vang, being charmed with her Anſwer, took her for his Wife.

Tſi declared War againſt Lû. The Army of Tſi encamping on the Frontiers of Lû, the Centinels ſaw a Woman, who was holding one Child in her Arms, and dragging another after her by the Hand, flying towards the Mountains. Some Soldiers running after her, ſhe quitted the Child ſhe was carrying, took up the other and redoubled her Pace. The Child whom ſhe had quitted, followed at a Diſtance, and cried ſo pitifully that it was enough to melt the Hearts of the Soldiers; the Woman however fled without once looking back. The General of the Army of Tſi who was hard by, aſk'd the Child, whom they took up, if the Woman who fled was his Mother. The Child anſwer'd that ſhe was. They then aſk'd, if the Child whom the Mother carry'd away was his elder or younger Brother. The Child reply'd that he was no Brother (*) Hyau filial Piety. Fû a Woman who is, or has been Married. (A) It is Kia in the French.

Brother of his. The General's Curioſity was raiſed; and he ordered two Horſemen to gallop after the Woman full Speed, and to bring her back, which was immediately done.

When ſhe came up; Whoſe is that Child, ſaid the General to her, whom you carry in your Arms; and whoſe is the Child whom you dropt when you fled? The Child I carry, anſwer'd ſhe, is the Child of my elder Brother, and the Child I left behind me is my own Son; finding myſelf cloſely purſued and deſpairing to be able to ſave both, I quitted my own Child. How! ſaid the General, can any thing be dearer to a Mother than her own Child? Did you quit your own, to ſave your Brother's Son. My Lord, anſwer'd the Woman, I thought it was my Duty to ſacrifiſe my Tenderneſs, and my private Intereſt, to the common good of my Family. If by following another Courſe, I had eſcaped from your Soldiers, and ſaved my Son, by quitting my Brother's Child, I muſt have been look'd upon as an intereſted Perſon: And then adieu to my Reputation. Our Prince and all his Subjects have a mortal Hatred of all Self-intereſt.

Upon this Anſwer; the General cauſed the Van of his Army, which was then advancing, to halt: told the Woman that ſhe might return Home with her Son and her Nephew; and immediatly diſpatched an Officer to the Court of Tſi, with this Letter to his Prince.

" Your Majeſty has committed to me the Conqueſt of Lû: But I take the Liberty, to re-
" preſent to you, before I engage my ſelf farther in that Enterprize: That it is not time to under" take it. Even the Country-women of this Kingdom know and obſerve the Maxim of ſacri-
" fiſing all private Intereſt to the publick Good; what kind of Men therefore muſt the great " Men of the Kingdom, and the Officers of War, be? The Officer whom I ſend with this,
" will relate to your Majeſty an Adventure which proves what I had the Honour to write to
" you."

Upon this Letter and the Recital of the Story, an Order came for the Army to retire. The King of Lû being informed of what paſt, made handſome Preſents to this Woman, and gave her the Surname of (*) Iney. The Chineſe Hiſtorian has here the following Exclamation; Behold the force of perfect Diſintereſtedneſs, it having ſaved, by means of a Country Woman, a whole Kingdom.

A generous Mother.

Under the Reign of Sweng vang, as the Horſe Guards were ſcouring the Country, they met with the Body of a Man newly ſlain, and at ſome Paces from the Body, two Brothers, whom they took to be the Authors of the Murder. The Affair coming to be examined into, it was found that the Deceaſed had receiv'd but one Wound; from whence they concluded, that he had not been ſtruck at all by one of the two Brothers. The Queſtion then was, which of them had given him his mortal Wound. This was a difficult Point to clear up; for the elder Brother ſaid, 'Twas I. The younger on the contrary mantained, that his elder Brother was innocent, and that he alone was Guilty. The inferior Tribunals carried the Affair before the Miniſter who made his Report to the Emperor.

To ſet both free, ſaid the Prince, would be to pardon the Murderer and to countenance a Crime. To condemn them both to Death, would be againſt the Law, ſince it appears from the Wound that one of them is innocent: A Thought is come into my head; their Mother muſt know them better than any body elſe. One of them muſt die, but which of them, is the Queſtion. This is the Point, for which we muſt have recourſe to their Mother. The Miniſter having cauſed the Mother to be called; One of your Sons, ſaid he, has killed a Man and his Guilt muſt be expiated by his Death; each of them excuſes his Brother and takes the Crime upon himſelf. The Affair has been brought before the Prince, who has pronounced Sentence of Death againſt one of them, but has referred it to you which of the two ſhall die.

The poor Woman diſſolving into Tears; If there is a Neceſſity, ſays ſhe, that one of them muſt die, let it be the younger. The Miniſter having cauſed her to put her anſwer in Writing, did not fail to teſtify his Surprize how ſhe came to prefer the elder; contrary to the uſual Cuſtom of Women, who generally love their youngeſt Children beſt. He therefore told her that he was curious to know why ſhe behaved in that Manner.

My Lord anſwered ſhe, of theſe two Brothers, the younger only is my Son, the elder being of a former Wife; but I promiſed to my deceaſed Huſband, that I would look upon him as my own Son, and hitherto I have been as good as my Word. But to ſave the younger and not the elder would be to break that Word; and to liſten only to the Dictates of intereſted Tenderneſs. The Choice I have made, tho' I think it is a right one, has coſt me dear. Theſe laſt Words were interrupted with Sighs and Sobs. The Miniſter himſelf could ſcarce refrain from Tears, and went away to make his Report to the King, who, in Conſideration of the Mother, whoſe Virtue and generous Diſintereſtedneſs he highly praiſed, pardoned both the Brothers.

A Murder Prudently prevented by a ſerving Maid.

One of the Country Literati having a Poſt at Court, left his Wife at home. A Neighbour of his laid hold on this Occaſion to enter into a Criminal Correſpondence with her; but knowing that her Huſband was expected every Hour back, he ſeem'd to fear leaſt the Intrigue ſhould be diſcovered at his Return, and he expreſs his Reſentment by ſome fatal Blow. I will take care of that, anſwer'd the Wife, for I deſign to prepare a poiſoned Wine, of which I will make him drink. The Huſband returned in a few Days, and his Wife talked to him thus. You have been much fatigued, and you muſt reſt yourſelf, I have got ſome Wine for you, there is not much of it, but it is excellent in its kind. Bring that Flaggon, continued ſhe to her Maid, and let my Huſband taſte a little of that Wine. The Servant was much puzzled what to do; ſhe ſhe knew that the Wine was poiſoned, ſhe had not the Heart to diſpatch her Maſter, nor would ſhe diſcover her Miſtreſs's Crime. At laſt ſhe fell on an Expedient which was, to let the Flaggon fall on purpoſe, and the Wine to run about the Floor. Her Maſter who was naturally paſſionate and ignorant of the Service ſhe had done him, uſed her very ill ſeveral Days after; and her Miſtreſs, fearing leaſt ſhe ſhould diſcover her, found ſeveral Pretexts to beat her cruelly, deſigning to kill her, by her Blows.

(*) I, ſignifies Diſintereſtedneſs, a diſintereſted Perſon; Ney, youngeſt Siſter, as if we ſhould ſay, a diſintereſted Siſter, or the generous Siſter.

While all this was doing, the Huſband being inform'd by one of his Brothers, about his Wife's Conduct, and the Poiſon which ſhe was ſaid to have prepared for him, began to reflect upon what paſs'd in his Houſe, when he returned home, and to look on it as a ſtrong Proof of the Truth of the Information. He cauſed his Wife to be beaten to Death with thoſe very Rods, which ſhe had employ'd to murder her Maid. He then aſk'd the Girl why ſhe had not diſcovered the Truth rather than to ſuffer her ſelf to be uſed ſo ill. I took care not to do that, anſwer'd ſhe, for thereby my Miſtreſs muſt have loſt both her Life and her Character, and I choſe to die my ſelf rather than that ſhould happen. Her Maſter, partly from Eſteem and partly out of Gratitude for having ſaved his Life, wanted to take her for his Wife, but ſhe would not conſent. My Miſtreſs dy'd ſhamefully, ſaid ſhe, and I ought not to ſurvive her; how dare I preſume to take her Place? No! I will rather kill myſelf. He Maſter was then ſatisfied with making her conſiderable Preſents, and endeavouring to marry her agreeably. When the Thing was known in the Neighbourhood, a great Number courted her for Marriage.

A generous Conteſt betwixt a Daughter and a Mother in Law.

A rich Man named Chu yay having loſt his Wife, who left him only a Daughter very young, married again. Having ſome very fine Pearls, he gave them to his ſecond Wife, who made them into Bracelets, and ſix Years after Chu yay dy'd in a ſtrange Country. His Wife in the Exceſs of her Grief and Lamentation, threw aſide her Bracelets of Pearls, which a young Girl of nine Years of Age, her Daughter by a former Huſband, took up from the Ground, and without any bodies Knowledge put them into a Box, in which her Mother kept her looking Glaſs, and other little Affairs which ſhe did not uſe during the time of her Mourning. When her Brothers and other Friends heard of her Huſband's Death, they viſited the Widow, and then they were all to ſet out in ſearch of the Body of the Deceas'd; that they might carry it to the Burying-place of his Anceſtors. When they were on their Journey, they came to a Cuſtom-Houſe, where it was Death to every Perſon in whoſe Poſſeſſion any Pearls ſhould be found. The Box [which it ſeems the Widow had carried a long with her] being ſearch'd, the Pearl Bracelets were found in it. The Crime is evident, ſaid the Officer of the Cuſtoms, we muſt now know who is the Criminal. (*) Tſû being afraid for her Mother in Law to whom the Box belonged, addreſſing her ſelf to the Officer, It is I, ſaid ſhe, who ought to be puniſhed, you need ſeek for no other Criminal. How can that be, ſaid the Officer who was obliged to make a verbal Tryal of it. When my Father dy'd, anſwer'd Tſû, my Mother in Law threw the Bracelets away, and I thinking they were of Value, gathered them up and put them into this Box without her Knowledge. The Declaration of Tſû was reported to the Mother in Law, who immediately came running to know how Matters ſtood. Yes, my Mother, ſaid the Girl, you threw away theſe Bracelets, and with your Knowledge, I gathered them up and put them into this Box. They are now ſiezed at this Cuſtom-houſe, for which Crime the Law inflicts the Pains of Death, and I ought to ſuffer. Tſû was ſo confident in what ſhe aſſerted, that her Mother in Law almoſt believ'd ſhe ſpoke the Truth.

However, thro' Tenderneſs and Compaſſion, ſhe interupted the Officer who had taken the Evidence of Tſû. Sir, ſaid ſhe, I beg you would hear me; My Daughter is not guilty, and you are not to regard what ſhe ſays. The Bracelets belong to me, and not to her: When my Huſband died, I put them into this Box: Grief, Cares, and Fatigues, made me forget where they were, ſo that I am guilty, and ought to be puniſhed. No, anſwered the Daughter reſolutely, it was I who locked up the Bracelets: It was I, replied the Mother; my Daughter ſpeaks only thus out of Affection for me, and to ſave me at the Expence of her own Life. My Lord, anſwered the Girl, My Mother, out of Compaſſiion for me, has taken upon herſelf a Crime, of which ſhe is not guilty, and expoſes her own, to ſave my Life. In ſhort, neither being able to vanquiſh the other in this generous Combat, they embraced one another mutually, endeavouring to get the better by their Sighs and Tears. All the Relations were in Tears at this Sight, the moſt indifferent Spectators could not forbear weeping, and even the Commiſſary of the Cuſtom-Houſe, let the Papers drop from his Hands.

The Preſident of this Tribunal himſelf ſaid weeping, Behold, an amiable Generoſity of a Mother and a Daughter. Their Diſpute is which ſhall die. As for me, I will ſuffer Death myſelf, if there is Occaſion, rather than condemn either the one or the other. He then threw the Pearls on the Ground, ſent off the whole Company, and ranked this Crime among thoſe whoſe Authors are unknown. The Company held on in their Journey; and ſome time after it was known, that the Girl of nine Years of Age had locked up the Pearls, without any one's Knowledge. Thereby the generous Affection of the Tſû, and her Mother in Law, was the more valued.

The above Examples are tranſlated from an ancient Collection, whoſe Author lived 2000 Years ago.

(*) This was the Name of the young Girl, who was then thirteen Years of Age.

If we were to peruſe the particular Hiſtories of their Cities, we might find many more; for, as I have mentioned elſewhere, the Cuſtom in China, is for each City to print the Hiſtory and Annals of its own Diſtrict.

Theſe Hiſtories are divided into different Chapters, according to their different Contents. The firſt exhibits a Map of the Place, with its Situation after their Faſhion; another enumerates the Commodities produced by their Country: And a third, points out the Tribute that is paced to the Emperor. The fourth, the Number of Families it contains. The fifth, the ancient Monuments, if there are any ſuch, in the Diſtrict: And the laſt Chapters, the illuſtrious Men or Women, diſtinguiſhed by their extraordinary Merit, or any ſhining Inſtance of Virtue.

The great Number of theſe pretended Heroines, which they mention, are young Widows, who put themſelves to Death to avoid a ſecond Marriage, to whom they were to be forced.

We likewiſe ſee Examples of many others, who were diſtinguiſhed by their filial Piety, by their Modeſty, and by the Conſtancy with which they ſuffered Death even in the Flames, rather than to run the leaſt Riſque of being diſhonoured.

As all we propoſe, in relating theſe different Hiſtories, is to give the Reader a Knowledge of the Manner and Learning of the Chineſe Nation, and of the Heroiſm attributed to the Fair Sex, we thought it beſt to confine ourſelves to theſe few Examples, and the rather ſo, becauſe in the Books which we have mentioned, the Stories are much of the ſame kind, and generally told in a dry tedious Manner.

OF THE RELIGION

CHINESE.

THERE are three principal Sects in the Empire of China: 1. The Sect of the Learned, who follow the Doctrine of the ancient Books, and look upon Confucius as their Master: 2. That of the Disciples of Lau kyun, which is nothing but a Mixture of Extravagance and Impiety: And 3. That of Idolaters, who worship a God called Fo or Foë, whose Opinions were brought from the Indies into China, about 32 Years after the Crucifixion of Christ. Three religions among the Chinese.

Of these Sects, the first only make Profession of a regular Study, in order to advance themselves to the Degrees and Dignities of the Empire, by means of Merit, Wit, and Learning, proper for the Conduct of Life, and the Government of the Empire.

The second has degenerated into a Kind of Magic and Enchantment; for the Disciples of this Sect, pretend to the Art of making Gold, and of rendering Persons immortal.

The third is nothing but a Heap of Fables and Superstitions maintained by the Bonzas, who deceive the People, under the false Appearance of Piety: They have introduced the Belief of the Metempsycosis, or Transmigration of Souls, and promise more or less Happiness, in Proportion to the Liberality that is shewn to themselves.

That I may give some Information concerning these different Sects, I shall follow the Order of Time in which they took their Rise, and observe their Progress successively amongst the People. In doing which, I shall relate nothing but what is taken from the Chinese History, or the Memoirs of Persons of Judgment and Sincerity, who are well versed in the Language and Learning of China, where they have spent most Part of their Lives. Nor shall I act any other Part than merely that of an Historian, who confines himself to plain Facts; without entering into Discussions, which have already afforded Matter for so many Volumes, and occasioned Divisions, the Consequence whereof have been fatal to the Propagation of the [Romish] Faith in this vast Empire.

Of the Worship of the Ancient Chinese.

IT is a common Opinion, and almost universally received, amongst those who have searched after the Original of this ancient Empire, that the Sons of Noah having dispersed themselves over the Eastern Parts of Asia, some of his Descendants penetrated into China, about 200 Years after the Deluge, and there founded this vast Monarchy; that these first Planters instructed by Tradition, concerning the Grandeur and Power of the Supreme Being, taught their Children, and through them their numerous Posterity, to fear and honour the Sovereign Lord of the Universe, and to live according to the Principles of the Law of Nature, engraven in their (A) Hearts. Origin of the established Religion.

Of this, we find Traces in those ancient and valuable Books, which the Chinese call, by way of Eminence, The five Volumes; being the Cannonical, or Classical Books of the highest Rank, which they look upon as the Source of all their Science and Morality. Chinese Cannonical Books.

However, those Books are not professed Treatises of Religion, purposely made to instruct the People; for they only contain Part of their History. The Authors do not attempt to prove what they advance, but only draw natural Consequences from Principles already allowed, considering those Opinions as fundamental Truths, on which all the rest are built. For which Reason, by the Doctrine contained in these Books, we are best able to discover the System of Religion among the Chinese, and what was the real Object of their Worship.

Upon a general View it appears, that the Drift of these Classical Books, was to maintain Peace and Tranquillity in the State, by a Regulation of Manners, and an exact Obedience to the Laws: And Their Drift political.

that

(A) I cannot but take Notice here, of the Splutter this Author makes in accounting so often in this Manner, for the Original of the Religion of the Confucians. As if a Nation, which once began seriously to cultivate the Sciences and search after Truth, could not without the Help of any Tradition or Instruction from the Sons of Noah, by the mere Light of Reason, attain to a Knowledge of the Deity and his Attributes, from the bare Observation of the Works of Creation and the Course of Nature; especially if as he supposes the Law of Nature was written in their Hearts. But it is not the Interest of this Species of Men, to allow Reason to be of so much Use, that to attain this End, the ancient Chineſe judged two Things neceſſary to be obſerved: viz. The Duties of Religion, and the Rules of good Government.

Chineſe Worſhip Shang ti or Tyen.

The chief Object of their Worſhip, is the Supreme Being, the Lord and Sovereign Principle of all Things; whom they adored under the Name either of Shang ti, that is Supreme Emperor, or Tyen, which with the Chineſe, ſignifies the ſame thing: Tyen, ſay the Interpreters, is the Spirit that preſides in Heaven, becauſe Heaven is the moſt excellent Work produced by this firſt Cauſe. It is taken alſo for the material Heavens; the Senſe being to be determined by the Subject to which it is applied: The Chineſe ſay, that the Father is the Tyen of the Family; the Viceroy, the Tyen of the Province; and the Emperor, the Tyen of the Kingdom, &c. They likewiſe honour, but with a ſubordinate Worſhip, inferior Spirits, depending on the Supreme Being; which according to them, preſide over Cities, Rivers, Mountains, &c.

If from the Beginning of the Monarchy, they applied themſelves to Aſtronomy, their View in obſerving the Stars, was only to be acquainted with their Motions, and to ſolve the Appearances of the viſible Tyen, or Heaven. Neither do we find that in thoſe early Times, they minded to ſearch into the Conduct and Secrets of Nature: ſuch over curious Enquiries having been expreſsly forbidden, for fear of giving Riſe to dangerous Opinions and Syſtems, inconſiſtent with the Repoſe of the Government, and Tranquility of the Public.

Baſis of their Politics.

As for their Politics, which conſiſted in maintaining Regularity and Purity of Manners, they reduced them to this ſimple Maxim: That thoſe who command, ſhould imitate the Conduct of Tyen, in treating their Inferiors as their Children; and thoſe who obey, ought to look upon their Superiors as their Fathers.

If Shang ti or Tyen, be an intelligent Being.

But did they regard this Shang ti, or Tyen, who was the Object of their Worſhip, as an Intelligent Being, the Lord and Creator of Heaven, Earth, and all Things? Is it not likely, that their Vows and Homage were addreſſed to the viſible material Heaven; or at leaſt, to a Celeſtial Energy void of Underſtanding, inſeparable from the very Matter of Heaven itſelf? But this I ſhall leave to the Judgment of the Reader, and content myſelf with relating what is learnt from the Claſſical Books.

Account of Tyen, and his Attributes from the Shu king.

It appears, eſpecially from one of their Canonical Books, called Shu king, that this Tyen, or firſt Being, the Object of Public Worſhip, is the Principle of all Things; the Father of the People, ſolley Independant; Almighty, Omniſcient, knowing even the Secrets of the Heart; who watches over the Conduct of the Univerſe, ſo that nothing whatever happens but by his Orders; who is holy, without Partiality, and only affected with the Virtue of Mankind; ſuperlatively Juſt, puniſhing Wickedneſs in the moſt ſignal Manner, even in Kings whom he depoſeth, ſetting up others in their Room, according to his Will and Pleaſure: That public Calamities are the Warnings which he gives for beginning a Reformation of Manners, and are ſtill followed by Acts of Mercy and Goodneſs; as for Inſtance, when a furious Storm has made Havock with the Harveſt and the Trees, immediately after, an illuſtrious Innocent, ſome Prince Chew kong, is recalled from Baniſhment, juſtified againſt Slander, and reſtored to his former (A) Dignity.

The World not governed by Chance, or a general Providence.

One ſees there the ſolemn Vows they make to the Supreme Being, for obtaining Rain after a tedious Drought; or for the Recovery of a worthy Emperor, whoſe Life is deſpared off: Which Vows, as the Hiſtory relates, are always heard. Tis likewiſe acknowledged that an impious Emperor having been ſlain with Lightening, is not the mere Effect of Chance, but the viſible Puniſhment of Heaven, out of the common Courſe of Nature. The Variety of Events are not attributed to Tyen, only at the time they happen, and mentioned only after Vice has been ſuppreſſed and puniſhed; but Judgments are threatened before-hand, as Things that will certainly come to paſs, even while the wicked Perſon proſpers in his Iniquity. It appears from the Diſcourſes of theſe firſt Sages of the Nation, that their Minds were influenced by the Perſwaſion (whether true or falſe it matters not) that Tyen, by Prodigies or extraordinary Appearances, gives Notice of approaching Miſeries, wherewith the State is threatened, that Men may reform their Manners, as the ſureſt Way to appeaſe the Anger of Heaven.

It is reported of the Emperor Chew, that he rejected all the good Thoughts inſpired by Tyen; that he made no Account of the Prodigies, by which Tyen gave him Notice of his Ruin, if he did

(A) However plauſible this Doctrine may ſeem to ſome, it is plain the Juſtice of Tyen is not illuſtrated thereby: For how does the reſtoring one innocent Perſon from Diſgrace, make amends to a thouſand others whom he hath before ruined or deſtroyed? But Abſurdities muſt needs beget Abſurdities; this being but the Conſequence of the foregoing Principle, that all Events whatever happen by his ſpecial Orders: Which is indeed to make God the Author of Evil, not only in the Cauſe, but in the Effect. This is the grand Error in the Confucian Syſtem, whence proceed thoſe others they entertain of a particular Providence, of Guardian Spirits, and Tyen's perpetually ſetting aſide the Courſe of Nature, to reward and puniſh, as above. 'Tis true, this Doctrine ſeems to have been introduced purely with a View to be a Check on Governors, and particularly the Emperor himſelf; who being above all Laws, they thought was to be reſtrained only by inculcating ſuch a Principle, as appears among the reſt, from a Paſſage in the Life of Shin tſong, p. 210. But if on one Hand, this Doctrine may have had a good effect on ſome Emperors it has had a very pernicious one on others: As having been a Means of diſpoſing them eaſily to give into the abominable Errors and Superſtitions of the Bonzas; which by their Encouragement, quite over-ran the Empire in the Space of two or three Reigns, and have produced almoſt all the Evils that have befallen it ever ſince, as the Literati complain. So that this Principle has done infinitely more Miſchief than Good in China, as well as every where elſe where it has obtained: Which ſhews that Philoſophers and Legiſlators, in forming their Syſtems, had better ſuit their Doctrines to the ſettled Laws of Nature, tho' they don't ſeem at firſt Sight to anſwer their Views; and rather diſtruſt their own Judgments, than preſume to mend the Form of Government viſibly obſerved by the Deity with Reſpect to this World, or to repreſent the Courſe of Things otherways than the daily Experience of every body finds it. In ſhort, the Hiſtories of all Times and Nations, manifeſt that the Dread of a Deity has ſeldom any Influence on the Actions of Kings and Emperors, whatever little it may have on the more inferior Claſſes of People. If Men are not to be reſtrained by a Propenſity to Juſtice and Virtue engrafted by Education, nothing can reſtrain the former, but the Fear of their Subject's Reſentment; nor the latter, but the good Example of their Governors, and the Fear of Puniſhment.

did not reform his Life: And when Mention is made of the Emperor Kyé, they ſay; If he had changed his Conduct after the Calamities ſent from on high, Heaven would not have deprived him of the Empire.

It is there recorded, that two great Emperors, who were the Founders of two powerful Dynaſties, and admired by Poſterity for their rare Virtues, had a great Conflict in their own Minds, when it was propoſed to them to aſcend the Throne. On the one Side they were ſollicited by the Grandees of the Empire, as well as by the People; and perhaps even by the ſecret Motions of Ambition, hard to be diſtinguiſhed from thoſe of a more plauſible Kind: On the other Side, they were with-held by the Duty and Fidelity which a Subject owes to his Prince, notwithſtanding he may be very much, and that deſervedly, hated. This Principle inculcated and purſued. Inſtance.

This inward Conflict and Uncertainty that diſturbed theirs Minds, proceeded from the Fear of diſpleaſing Shang ti, either by taking up Arms, as they were urged, or by refuſing to take them up, in order to free the People from the Oppreſſion under which they groaned, and put a Stop to an Inundation of Crimes: By this Proceeding, they acknowledged their Dependance to be on a Maſter who forbids Diſloyalty, hates Tyranny, loves the People as a Father, and protects the Oppreſſed.

Almoſt every Page of the Canonical Books, and eſpecially the Shu king, continues to inculcate this juſt Dread, as the moſt proper Curb for the Paſſions, and the moſt effectual Remedy againſt Vice. There likewiſe we ſee what Idea theſe Princes had formed of the Juſtice, Holineſs, and Goodneſs of the Supreme Lord. In the Times of public Calamities, they were not ſatisfied with only addreſſing their Vows to Tyen, and offering Sacrifices, but they applied themſelves carefully to inquire into their moſt minute and ſecret Faults, which might poſſibly have drawn down this Puniſhment from Tyen: They examined if they were not too expenſive in their Habits, too luxurious in their Tables, too magnificent in their Equipage and Palaces; all which they reſolved to reform.

One of theſe Princes acknowledges ſincerely, that he had not purſued the ſalutary Thoughts inſpired by Tyen. Another Reproaches himſelf for want of due Application to the Affairs of Government, and for having too much Fondneſs for innocent Amuſements: He conſiders theſe Faults as ſufficient to draw down on him the Anger of Tyen; and in a humble Manner, confeſſes them to be the Source of public Calamities. In the Canonical Book called Chun tſyû, the Misfortunes of a Prince are ſpoken of as ſo many Puniſhments of Tyen, who, to make the Chaſtiſement ſtill greater, rendered him inſenſible of his Diſgrace. The Shu king ſpeaks often of a Maſter who preſides over the Government of Empires and Kingdoms; who has an abſolute Dominion over the Wills of Mankind, in order to conduct them to his own wiſe and juſt Ends; in ſhort, who rewards and puniſhes Men by means of one another, without any Detriment to their Liberty.

This Perſuaſion was ſo common, that Princes, naturally jealous of their own Glory, never in the leaſt attributed the Succeſs of their wiſe Government to themſelves, but referred it to the Supreme Lord, who governs the Univerſe; this appears from the ſingle Inſtance of the Emperor Sven vang. He told the Grandees of his Court, that all the wiſe Miniſters, who had been ſo uſeful to the State from the Foundation of the Monarchy to his Time, were ſo many precious Gifts granted by Tyen, in Regard to the Virtue of the Princes, and the Neceſſities of the People. Other Inſtances.

Almoſt from the Beginning of the Monarchy, it was appointed that the Emperor ſoon after his Exaltation, ſhould humble himſelf ſo far as to plough a few Furrows, and that the Produce of his Tillage ſhould be offered by him in ſacrifice to Tyen. The Shu king relates, that the ſame Emperor before ſpoken of, having neglected this Ceremony, attributes the public Calamities thereto; and all the Grandees of his Court talked to him in the ſame Language.

The Emperors, Yau, Shun, Ching tang, &c. are often mentioned in the Claſſical Books, as Patterns of Imitation; and it is a Maxim perpetually in their Mouths, that the moſt wicked Man, if he makes Uſe of the Aſſiſtance which Tyen offers him, may attain to the Virtue of thoſe Heroes.

Theſe wiſe Emperors are repreſented in the ſame Book, in a ſuppliant Poſture before Shang ti, deprecating the Evils wherewith their Deſcendants were threatened. An Emperor of their Race, declares, that his illuſtrious Anceſtors, notwithſtanding their extraordinary Talents, could never have governed the Empire as they had done, without the Aſſiſtance of Sage Miniſters, whom Tyen had given them.

It is farther worth obſerving, that they attribute nothing to Shang ti but what is ſeemly, and becoming the Sovereign of the Univerſe. They aſcribe to him Power, Providence, Knowledge, Juſtice, Goodneſs, and Clemency; they call him their Father and Lord; they honour him with Worſhip and Sacrifices worthy of the Supreme Being, and by the Practice of every Virtue. They likewiſe affirm, that all outward Adoration muſt fail in pleaſing Tyen, if it does not proceed from the Heart, and is not animated by the inward Sentiments. Their Ideas of Shang ti.

It is ſaid in the Shu king, that Shang ti is of infinite Underſtanding; that he ſees from the Top of Heaven what is doing here below; that he makes Uſe of our Parents to beſtow on us the animal and material Part, but that he himſelf gives an underſtanding Soul, capable of Reflection, which diſtinguiſhes us from Brutes; that he ſo loveth Virtue, that to offer him Sacrifice, it is not ſufficient for the Emperor, to whom this Function belongs, to join the Prieſthood to the Royal Dignity, but it is moreover neceſſary, that he ſhould be either upright or penitent, and that preparatory thereto, he ſhould expiate his Faults with Faſting and Tears; that we cannot fathom the Depth of his Deſigns and Councels, and yet ought not to believe that he is too exalted to mind what paſſes here; that he himſelf examines all our Actions, and has erected a Tribunal in our own Conſciences, whereby we are judged.

Emperor the chief Pontif or high Priest.

The Emperors have always thought themselves chiefly obliged to observe the primitive Rites, the solemn Functions of which belong to them alone, as being the Heads of the Nation: Thus they are Emperors to govern, Masters to teach, and Priests to sacrifice; to the End, that the Imperial Majesty humbling himself in presence of his Court, by the Sacrifices which he offers in the Name of the Empire to the Master of the World, the Sovereign Authority of the Supreme Being may still shine more resplendent, and exalted above any Equal. To this purpose we find it both in the I king and Shu king.

None else allowed to Sacrifice to Shang ti.

The Emperor is there say'd to be the only Person who is allowed publickly to render this solemn homage to Shang ti. Shang ti has adopted him for his Son, and appointed him the principal Heir of his Grandeur on Earth; he arms him with his Authority, charges him with his Orders, and heaps Benefits upon him. To sacrifice to the first Being of the Universe requires no less than the most exalted Person in the Empire. It is necessary that he should descend from his Throne, and humble himself in presence of Shang ti, that he might thus draw down the blessings of Heaven on his People, and cause their Vows to ascend thither. This Worship and Sacrifice have continued in being for a great many Ages; and the Chinese History takes care to inform us with how much zeal the Emperors of each Dynasty honoured the supreme Lord of the World. I shall go on with relating what we learn on this Head from the Classical Books.

Zeal of the first Emperors in performing this Rite.

Fo hi, who is supposed to have been Contemporary with Phaleg, was one the Heads of the Colony which came to settle in this extreme part of the East, and is acknowledged for the Founder of the Chinese Monarchy (A). He had nothing more at Heart than to give public Marks of a religious Veneration for the first Being. He bred in a domestic Park, six sorts of Animals to serve as Victims in his Sacrifices, which he solemnly offered twice a Year at the two Solstices, at what time the Tribunals as well as the Shops were shut up: Nor were the People even permitted on those Days to undertake any Journey; they were to think of nothing else but joyning with the Prince to honour Shang ti. The Book entituled Li ki, call these two Solemnities, The Festivals of Gratitude to Tyen.

Shin nong, who succeeded Fo hi, not content with the two solstitial Sacrifices, appointed two others at the Equinoxes: The first in Spring, to influence Shang ti in favour of Agriculture, the other in Autumn, after the Harvest, the Tithe of which he ordered to be gathered, and offered the first Fruits to Shang ti. And as Fo hi had brought up six sorts of Animals for sacrificial Uses, Shing nong, out of a pious Emulation, with his own Hands cultivated the Field which furnished the Corn and Fruits for the same Sacrifices.

Whang ti, who succeeded Shin nong, shewed greater Zeal than his Predecessor; for to prevent being hindred by bad Weather, from making the usual Sacrifices in the open Field, he built a large Temple, wherein they might be offered under Shelter in all Seasons, and the People instructed in their principal Duties.

The Empress Lwi tsu, Wife of Whang ti, undertook to breed Silk-worms, and make silken Ornaments befitting those Solemnities. Without the South-gate was a vast Inclosure of arable Land, which furnished the Corn, Rice, and other Fruits appointed for the Sacrifices; and without the North-gate was another great Inclosure full of Mulberry-trees, wherein were nourished abundance of Silk-worms. The same Day that the Emperor went to till the Ground with his principal Courtiers, the Princess repaired to her Mulberry Grove with the Ladies of her Court, encouraging them by her Example to make Silks and Embroidered Works, which she set a-part for Religious Uses.

None but devout Men elected Emperors.

The Empire becoming Elective, none were raised to the Throne but the Sons of Kings distinguished for their Wisdom, or wise Men who were Associates in the Government: But the Choice fell only upon such as performed the Duties of Religion with the greatest Veneration. It is an Honour to the Throne, (says the Shu king) that he whom Shang ti associates to himself to govern Mankind, should represent his Virtues on Earth, and be the most perfect Image of them.

This Motive alone induced Whang ti to consent, that his Son should succeed him with the Title of Shau hau, that is to say, young Fo hi; because from his Infancy he had been a zealous Imitator of the Virtues of the first Founder of the Empire, Tay hau Fo hi.

The Sequel made it appear that they were not deceived in their Choice: For he increased the Pomp and Solemnity of the Sacrifice offered to Shang ti, by harmonious Concerts of Music. His Reign was peaceable and quiet; only the last Years of it were disturb'd by the Conspiracy of nine Chu hew or feudatory Princes, who endeavour'd to destroy that beautiful System of Subordination established by the first Kings, both in religious Worship and the Government of the State.

Attempt to introduce the Worship of Spirits or Angels.

Their Design being to substitute the fear of Spirits in place of the fear of Shang ti, they had recourse to Magic and Enchantments. They disturbed Houses with evil Spirits, and so terrified the People with their Delusions, that assembling in the Temple on the solemn Days when the Emperor sacrificed, they made it resound with their Clamours, tumultuously requiring that Sacrifice should likewise be offered to these Spirits (B). The Emperor dy'd during these Troubles, and tho' he left four Sons, Chwen hyo, Nephew of Whang ti, was chosen for his Successor.

(A) The Chinese themselves are not very certain as to the Time when this Prince lived, the Canonical History beginning with the Emperor Yau. We may add that the Author's making him a Contemporary of Phaleg, and the Head of a Colony of the Noakides is all a Chimera, see before p. 237.

(B) We see here very early the evil effects of the Doctrine, of Guardian Angels, which is productive of Idolatry.

This

This Prince began by extirpating the Race of the nine Enchanters, who were the principal Authors of the Tumult; he appeaſed the Minds of the People, and reſtored order in the Sacrifices. Having reflected on the Inconvenience of aſſembling an active reſtleſs People in the ſame Place where the Emperor performed that Rite, he ſeparated the Place of Inſtruction from that of Sacrifices, and eſtabliſhed two great Mandarins as Preſidents, choſen from among the Sons of the deceaſed Emperor; one of whom was charged with the whole Ceremonial, and the other took care of the Inſtruction of the People. He alſo ſettled Rules for choſing the Victims, ordering that they ſhould neither be lame, nor defective, nor of any other ſorts of Animals but the ſix appointed by Fo hi: Likewiſe that they ſhould be well fed, and of a Colour agreeable to the four Seaſons wherein the Sacrifices were made. In a Word, he regulated their Age and Size. Regulations with Regard to the Sacrifice. Efficacy of this Rite.

Ti ko, Nephew of Chwen hyo, was raiſed to the Throne by the Suffrages of all the Orders of the State; and was addicted no leſs than his Uncle to the Worſhip of Shang ti, and the religious Obſervation of the Ceremonies. It is related in the Annals of this Prince authorized by the King, that the Empreſs Ywen kyang, who was barren, accompanying the Emperor to a ſolemn Sacrifice, prayed to Shang ti for Children with ſo much Fervency, that ſhe conceived almoſt at the ſame Time; and ten Months after brought forth a Son, called Hew tſye, who was the Anceſtor of a glorious Poſterity, dignified with a great Number of Emperors.

It ſeems ſurpriſing that ſo prudent a Prince as Ti ko, ſhould chooſe for Succeſſor, neither this miraculous Infant, nor Yau, whom he had by his ſecond Queen Kin tú, nor Ki lyé, Son of the third Queen Kyen tyé, but ſhould prefer to theſe young Princes, already ſo eminent for their Vertues, his Son Chi, by his fourth Queen Chang i, in whom there was no Quality worthy of the Throne: But he did not reign long.

It is ſayed in the Book intitled Kang kyen (A), that the Providence of Shang ti watched over the Welfare of the State; and that the People by his Appointment, unanimouſly depoſed this wicked Prince, to place in his ſtead the Vertuous Yau, who joyned the Quality of Legiſlator to that of Emperor, and became a Pattern for all his Succeſſors. The I king relates, that he could never have brought the Sciences to their utmoſt Perfection, within the firſt ſixty Years of his Reign, if it had not been for the extraordinary Aſſiſtance of Heaven. Chineſe Notion of Providence.

In the ſix Years of his Reign, the People being greatly multiplied, and the moſt beautiful Plains quite covered with Water, (ſuppoſed by ſome [Europerans] to be the Remains of the Deluge) the the great Yu applied himſelf to drain off the Water into the Sea, to raiſe the ſunk Lands, and divide them among the People.

Nine Years after, this great Emperor reſolving to aſſociate with him in the Empire ſome wiſe Perſon fit to ſucceed him: "As I perceive no Merit in my nine Sons, (ſayed he to his Miniſters) do you therefore find me out a Man, no matter of what Family, provided he is truly Wiſe and of known Virtue." Hereupon they mention'd a young Peaſant named Shun, who tho' he continually received ill uſage from his Parents and eldeſt Brother, ſtill behaved with the greateſt Reſpect towards them, and bore their injurious Treatment with unconquerable Patience and Meekneſs. This is the Man I want, ſayed Yau, he only is able to preſerve Order and Peace in the imperial Family, and regulate all the Families of this vaſt Empire after that Model. Having proved him yet three Years longer, he afterwards made him his Son in Law, aſſociated him in the Empire, and appointed him his ſole Heir, to the Excluſion of his own Children; and even in Oppoſition to all the Remonſtrances of Shun himſelf, who did not think himſelf qualified for being at the Head of ſo great an Empire.

When he was in Poſſeſſion of the Throne, the firſt thing he did, ſays the Shu king, was to pay his ſolemn Homage to Shang ti; after which he enacted thoſe wiſe Laws, whereon the Government of the Empire is founded. He created Mandarins, and gave excellent Precepts relating to the five principal Duties, of the King and the Subject, Father and Children, Huſband and Wife, elder and younger Brothers, and of Friends among themſelves: Inſomuch that from the Greateſt to the Leaſt, every one immediately knew whether he was to command or obey. Shun's great Veneration for Shang ti.

His Example gave great Weight to his Precepts; for all Perſons who ſaw his reſpectful Submiſſion to Yau, whom he looked upon as his Father and Maſter, were inclined to put in Execution ſuch wiſe Laws. Shang ti, ſays the Shu king, ſeemed to have made himſelf Shun's Colleague, and to have given him the ſole Direction of his Omnipotence, in Order to bring about his Deſigns. Yau dy'd univerſally lamented 28 Years after the Adoption of Shun, who now reigning alone, divided the Offices among ſeveral wiſe Men whoſe Capacity he had made trial of. After the Example of Yau, he chooſe no Succeſſor in his own Family, but appointed the Sage Yu, which Choice was generally approved of.

O amiable Shun! cries the Li ki, Was there ever a better Prince? While he lived he had nothing at Heart but the public Good, and at his Death inſtead of following the Dictates of paternal Affection, and placing his Son on the Throne, he conſulted nothing but the Intereſt of his Subjects. He ſhewed that he was their true Father, by giving them in the Perſon of Yu another Prince like himſelf, and worthy of inheriting his Love for the People.

Yu the Great, did not forget a Duty which he believed to be of the higheſt Nature; for the Worſhip of Shang ti never flouriſhed more than in his Reign: He even took Care to prevent the Negligence that might cool the Zeal of his Poſterity, by eſtabliſhing Mandarins at Court, and in the Provinces, as ſo many Sages, whoſe Buſineſs was to repreſent to the Emperors, their Religion flouriſhes in the Reign of Yu.

Obligation

(A) That is, The General Hiſtory.

Obligation to worſhip Shang ti, and to give them, whenever it was neceſſary, uſeful Inſtructions concerning the Practice of the nine Royal Virtues.

This Liberty which the Sages of the Empire enjoy'd of pointing out to the Prince his principal Duties, was interrupted in proceſs of time under the Tyrant Kyé; an impious and voluptuous Prince, who admitted none into his Councels but young Libertines, ever forward to promote his Diſregard for Religion and flatter him in his Crimes.

The ſeveral Orders of the State, no longer able to bear his Cruelty, and the Scandal of his pernicious Example, depoſed him, being the laſt of the Family of the Hya, and placed in his room Ching tang the Grandſon of Whang ti. The only Reaſon that is alledged for the fall of the one, and elevation of the other, is that Kyé was become a wicked Prince, and had forgotten the Oath which, on aſcending the Throne, he took to continue the ſupreme Worſhip of Shang ti.

Veneration of Shang ti, promoted by Ching tang.

Religion being as it were the Foundation of the Shang Dynaſty, Ching tang carried the Adoration, and reſpectful Dread due to Shang ti, much farther than his Predeceſſors had done; eſtabliſhing Mandarins at Court and in the Provinces, with a Priviledge of making him Remonſtrances, in Caſe he ſwerved ever ſo little from this Capital Duty.

The Emperor having offered ſeveral fruitleſs Sacrifices to appeaſe the Wrath of Heaven, on Account of a ſeven Years Famine which had reduced the People to the greateſt Miſery, he reſolved to offer himſelf as Victim of Expiation: Accordingly he diveſted himſelf of his imperial Enſigns, and went with the great Lords of his Court to a Mountain, ſome diſtance from the City; where with a bare Head and naked Feet, in the Poſture of a Criminal, he proſtrated himſelf nine Times before the ſupreme Maſter of the Univerſe.

"Lord, (ſayed he) ſince all the Sacrifices that I have offered to implore thy Clemency have been "in vain, it is doubtleſs I myſelf who have drawn down ſo many Miſeries on my People. Dare "I aſk wherein I have incurred thy Diſpleaſure? Is it owing to the Magnificence of my Palace, "theDelicacies of my Table, or to the Number of my Concubines, which however the Laws allow "me? I am reſolved to repair all theſe Faults by my Modeſty, Frugality, and Temperance; "And if this is not ſufficient, I offer myſelf as a Victim to thy Juſtice. Let me be puniſhed, "provided my People be ſpared: Let the Thunderbolt fall on my Head; provided at the ſame "Time that the Rain falls upon the Plains, and my Subjects be relieved from their Miſery." His Prayers being heard, the Sky was covered with Clouds, which ſending down Plenty of Rain on the Plains, produced a plentiful Harveſt.

The Happineſs of this Family was in good Meaſure owing to the great Number of Sages, who appeared at the ſame Time. Their principal Buſineſs was to attend the Emperor at the Sacrifices of Shang ti. Among theſe, the Ko lau (A), I in diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Reigns of Ching tang and his Son Tay kya.

Declines under Chew.

Under the Tyrant Chew theſe Sages firſt began to be neglected: Their Remonſtrances and Advice being rewarded with the moſt cruel Puniſhment and often Death itſelf. In that Reign we meet with the incomparable Wiſdom and Virtue of Ven vang and his Son Vû vang. All the Grandees of the Empire having conſpired to dethrone Chew, and ſet Ven vang in his Place, this latter ſtedfaſtly oppoſed their preſſing Sollicitations, contenting himſelf to poſſeſs the Virtues which conſtitute a great Monarch, without the Ambition to become one: He even made uſe of the Diſpoſition he found them in towards himſelf, to bring them back to the Obedience which he thought was due to the Tyrant.

For nine Years that the State was in the greateſt Confuſion, all the Orders of Chew were iſſued by this virtuous Prince. By his Hands alſo he offered Sacrifices to Shang ti; for otherwiſe the feudatory Princes would have refuſed to aſſiſt thereat. On this Occaſion the Book intitled I king, ſpeaks elegantly in its enigmatic Stile: That all the Oxen killed by Chew were not worth the meaneſt Offerings of Ven vang: becauſe the former offered his Sacrifices with a Heart polluted with Crimes, whereas the better part of the Latter's Offering conſiſted in the purity of his Heart.

After the Death of Ven vang, it was unanimouſly reſolved in an Aſſembly of the Chew hew, (or feudatory Princes) to dethrone the Tyrant, and that Vû vang ſhould head the Enterprize. However he ſingly oppoſed that Reſolution; at leaſt he demanded time to examine if it was really the Order of Tyen. He ſpent two Years in debating the Matter with himſelf, in which time his mind was in a continual Uneaſineſs, not knowing what part to choſe, and fearing to incur the Wrath of Tyen, whether he accepted or refuſed the Commiſſion.

In ſhort after many Conflicts within himſelf, he yielded to the Intreaties and Sollicitations of the whole Empire. Vû vang was but once out of humour, ſays Confuçius. In the firſt Battle the Tyrant being routed and abandoned by his Party fled to his Palace, where raiſing a funeral Pile out of the moſt valuable Things belonging to him, he ſet Fire to it, and ſo put an end to the Dynaſty of the Shang. Vû vang by unanimous Conſent was placed on the Throne, and quickly reſtored the Government to its former Condition.

It is true the pretended Orders of Heaven (B), and Zeal for the public Good, which ſerved to give a Colour to that Uſurpation, have not juſtified this Prince in the Opinion of ſome later Writers. Although Ching tang and Vû vang have always paſſed for great Emperors and Patterns of Virtue, yet the famous Chau kan tſye declares plainly that the Manner in which they aſcended the Throne, caſts a Blemiſh on their Glory. He alſo gives much the Preference to Shun, Yu, Ven vang and Chew kong;-who having been the Colleagues of Emperors, aſſumed nothing to themſelves of the Government but the laborious Part.

However

(A) A Name common to the Miniſters of State, whoſe Number is not limitted to four, there being ſometimes ſix or ſeven.

(B) Another bad Conſequence, of the Doctrine of a particular Providence.

However that be, it appears by the Inſtances taken from the Claſſical Books, that from the Foundation of the Empire under Fo hi, thro' a long Series of Ages, the Supreme Being, commonly known by theName of Shang ti and Tyen, was the Object of public Worſhip; and as it were the Soul, and Primum Mobile, of the Government of the Nation: That this Supreme Being was feared, honoured, reverenced; and that not only the People, but the Grandees of the Empire, and the Emperors themſelves were ſenſible there was above them a Lord and Judge, who rewarded ſuch as obeyed, and puniſhed ſuch as offended him. Dependance of the Emperors and Princes on Shang ti and Tyen

Of all natural Beings, ſayed Confuçius to his Diſciple Tſeng tſe, none is more eminent than Man; of all the Actions of Men, none is more Praiſe worthy than filial Piety; and among the Duties of filial Piety, the moſt indiſpenſable is reſpectfully to obey a Father's Orders: But to render him this Obedience, nothing was more effectual than to aſſociate him with Shang ti, that is to conſider him as inveſted with the Majeſty and Authority of the Moſt High.

Chew kong, the Brother of Vû vang, acknowledged that abſolute Dependance, which the Emperors, as well as their Subjects, had on Shang ti. He tenderly loved the Emperor; and ſeeing him ready to die in the ſecond Year of his Reign, he proſtrated himſelf before the Supreme Majeſty, to implore the Recovery of a Prince, whoſe Life was ſo neceſſary to the State. It is thou Lord, cried he, who haſt placed him on the Throne, and appointed him the Father of the People. Is it thy Will to puniſh us by taking him away? If a Victim be indiſpenſable, accept of my Life, which I offer thee in Sacrifice, provided thou ſpareſt my Maſter, my King, and my Brother. Manner of their offering themſelves in Sacrifice to Shang ti.

Ching vang imitated the Piety of his Father; and when on the Throne, obſerved the ſame Veneration for the Sovereign Lord of the Univerſe. How far ſoever I may be exalted above other Men, ſays he in the Shu king, yet am I no more than one of the leaſt of Shang ti's Subjects. How can I diſpenſe with paying him homage?

Chew kong was his Uncle, and had been his Tutor. The great Authority of ſo wiſe a Miniſter creating Jealouſies, ſome Grandees carried their Envy and Ill-will to ſuch a Pitch, that they obliged him to retire from Court, and baniſh himſelf into the Province of Shan tong. But a dreadful Storm which happened at that Time a little before Harveſt, having deſtroyed all the Produce of the Fields, Ching vang took it for granted, that Tyen was angry, and deſigned to avenge oppreſſed Innocence. He therefore ordered Chew kong to be recalled forthwith, and went himſelf to meet him, thereby to honour his Return. Stopping on the Road to make his Prayers to Shang ti, and repreſent the Neceſſities of the People, almoſt at the ſame inſtant there aroſe a Wind contrary to the former, which reſtored the largeſt Trees that had been bent down, to their natural Condition; and there was a plentiful Harveſt.

It is reported likewiſe in the Shu king, that three Princes of the Blood who had ſeized on the Regency during the Minority of Ching vang, having revolted becauſe he had put himſelf into the Hands of Chew kong, the Emperor took up Arms to reduce them, but firſt conſulted Shang ti. Tyen, ſays he, never favours the Arms of Princes, but when they make War for the Love of Peace.

The ſame Spirit of Religion animated Prince Kang vang: There ſeemed to be no other Emperor in China, ſays the Shi king, except Shang ti. The Dread of the Supreme Being, was alone ſufficient to keep the People within the Bounds of their Duty. Honeſty prevailed ſo much under the Government of this Prince and his Father, to whom he ſucceeded, that they had no Occaſion to ſtrike a Terror into their Subjects by the Rigour of Puniſhments. Criminals were only confined in Priſon, out of which they were let in the Day-time to work at their Trade; and they returned of their own accord in the Evening, to lodge there at Night.

A ſingle Paſſage out of the Shi king will inform us, with what Sentiments of Gratitude and intire Confidence Chau vang uſed to addreſs Shang ti. Rejoyce my People, ſayed he one Day to the Huſbandmen; Altho' the Spring is hardly at an end, you are going to reap the Produce of Autumn. Our Fields which were but newly ſown, are already loaded with the richeſt Harveſt. Thanks be to Shang ti, who puts us ſo ſoon in a Condition to enjoy his Gifts. For this Reaſon, I will not wait till the End of Autumn to preſent myſelf before him, and return him Thanks for ſuch forward Crops. Thankſgivings.

Mo vang his Son, followed the Examples of his Predeceſſors when he was upon the Throne; and as the People were no longer awed by the Fear of the Supreme Being, as they were in the Reigns of Ching vang and his Son, he conſidered himſelf as Shang ti's Miniſter of Juſtice,, and expoſed to the View of his Subjects, the Puniſhments which their Crimes deſerved. He ſays in the Shu king, that he is only the Miniſter of the Moſt High, to defend the Innocent from Oppreſſion, and hinder the Strong from oppreſſing the Weak. They conſider themſelves as the Miniſters of Shang ti.

Religion preſerved its exterior Form under the next four Emperors, Kong vang, Ye vang, Hyau vang, and I vang; But theſe Princes degenerated greatly from the Virtue of their Anceſtors: Like thoſe Trees, ſays the Shi king, which continue to make a beautiful Appearance with their Leaves; but for want of Culture bear no more Fruit, and begin to degenerate. Thus they became the Objects of Contempt, and the Subjects of 1000 ſatyrical Songs. Hyau vang was ſo exceſſively fond of Horſes, that to reward his chief Groom he made him Prince of Tſin; not dreaming doubtleſs, that one of his Deſcendants would found the Family of Tſin, which ſucceeded on the Ruin of that of the Chew. The Emperors degenerate.

Li vang, his Succeſſor, was deteſted for his Pride and Tyranny. The Silence of Shang ti, ſays the Shi king, was an Enigma; one would have ſayed, that he ſlept contrary to his Cuſtom. Every thing proſpered with this wicked Prince; the People durſt not fetch their Breath: The very Cenſors of the Empire, by their Office obliged to give him wholeſome Advice, were the forwardeſt to uphold him in his Crimes by their baſe Adulations. Whence comes this, cries the Author of the Shi king, is it that there is no more Juſtice in Heaven? Shall the Wicked peaceably enjoy the Fruit of his Crimes? Attend, continues he, and you ſhall ſee, that Shang ti never ſuſpends the Efforts of his all powerful Arm but to ſtrike the homer Blow.

In effect, the People revolving againſt Li vang, his Parents and Relations were cut in Pieces; the Tyrant eſcaped their Fury by flying and baniſhing himſelf. His Son Swen vang had met with the ſame Fate, if the faithful Chau kong, Ko lau of the Empire, had not made his own Son perſonate the Prince; and by thus ſacrificing him, ſaved the Life of the Heir to the Crown.

Shang ti omniſcient. Whereupon the Shi king makes this Reflection: It is in vain to hide one's ſelf in the dark; nothing is hidden from Shang ti: The Night is with him as clear as the Day: He penetrates into the moſt ſecret Corners, where the Malignity of Man's Heart would withdraw itſelf from his Sight: He is preſent every where, and darts his Light into the moſt obſcure Windings of the moſt impenetrable Labyrinth, where one would attempt to conceal himſelf.

On this Occaſion, Wey vû kong, a venerable old Man 95 Years of Age, made an Ode, which he cauſed to be ſung every Day at the inner Gate of his Palace. In vain, ſays he, does human Force pretend to eſtabliſh a State; if the Lord of Heaven does not lend a Hand to ſtrengthen it, it tumbles at the firſt Shock. 'Tis as Water, which not far from its Spring looſes it ſelf in the firſt Sand it meets with in the Plain: 'Tis a Flower which is blown in the Morning, and withers at Night. A whole Nation is corrupted by the Example of a wicked King.

Swen vang was more religious than his Father Li vang, nevertheleſs his Reign was perplexed with public Calamities. One Year of Drought layed waſte the Empire; whereof this Prince complains bitterly in the Shu king: To behold theſe dried up Fields, how can a Heart chuſe but be dried up with Sorrow? If Shang ti, who can do any thing, will not deign to caſt an Eye of Pity on me, while I am making the great Sacrifice to him for Rain; alas! what will become of my poor People, who muſt of Neceſſity periſh with Hunger? Would it not be better that the Wrath of Heaven ſhould fall upon me, and my People be relieved?

Omnipotent.

Chineſe Philoſophers preferd to the Greek and Roman.

I ſhall alledge no farther Inſtance: It may ſuffice to have ſhewn from the Authority of the Canonical Books, that the Chineſe Nation, for the Space of 2000 Years together acknowledged, reverenced, and honoured with Sacrifices, a Supreme Being and Sovereign Lord of the Univerſe, under the Name of Shang ti or Tyen. If theſe ancient Maſters of the Chineſe Doctrine, be compared with the Heathen Sages, we ſhall find a great Difference between them: For the latter ſeem to have taught Virtue only to give themſelves a Superiority over the reſt of Mankind, which they had not on Account of Fortune; beſides, they dogmatized in ſo haughty and oſtentatious a Manner, that it was evident they ſought leſs the Diſcovery of Truth, than to diſplay their own Talents: whereas the Maſters of the Doctrine, inculcated in the King (or Canonical Books) were Emperors and Prime Miniſters, whoſe Virtue gave great Weight to their Inſtructions, who firſt obſerved themſelves the ſame coercive Laws they eſtabliſhed, and conveyed their moral Precepts; not uſing Subtilties and Sophiſms, but with a plain and ſimple Air in a practical way, aiming at the ſhorteſt Method for the Reformation of Manners.

Methinks it would be doing an Injury to the ancient Chineſe, who followed the Law of Nature, which they received from their Fathers, to tax them with Irreligion, becauſe they had not ſo clear and diſtinct a Knowledge of the Deity, as the Chriſtian World have had ſince their Time: This would be to require too much of theſe People, ſince they could not be ſo well inſtructed as we are, by means of the Precepts of Chriſt.

Imperfect Notions of a future State and the Creation.

It is true, that tho' the Canonical Books, eſpecially the Shu king, exhort Men to fear Tyen; and tho' they place the Souls of vertuous Men near Shang ti, yet it does not appear, that they have ſpoken clearly of the everlaſting Puniſhments in the Life to come. In like manner, tho' they affirm that the Supreme Being created all Things, yet they have not treated of it ſo diſtinctly, as to judge whether they mean a true Creation, or a Production of all Things out of Nothing. However, it muſt be confeſſed, that tho' they are ſilent as to this Point, they have not denied the Poſſibility thereof; nor like certain Greek Philoſophers, aſſerted that the Matter of the Univerſe is eternal. We likewiſe do not find, that they have treated Explicity concerning the State of the Soul; on the contrary, they ſeem to have only confuſed Notions of it, no way agreeable to the Truth: Yet it cannot be doubted, but that they believe the Soul exiſts after its Separation from the Body, as well as the Certainty of Apparitions, of which that related by Confuçius is an Inſtance.

Belief of Apparitions.

This Philoſopher declared to his moſt familiar Diſciples, that for ſeveral Years he had ſeen in a Dream, the celebrated Chew kong, Son of Ven vang, to whom the Empire was indebted for ſo many excellent Inſtructions, relating to Morality and other Doctrines. And it is obſervable, that the learned Chu hi, ſo famous under the Dynaſty of the Song, being aſked if Confuçius ſpoke of a Dream, or a real Apparition, anſwered, without Heſitation, that he meant a real Apparition (A); however Chew kong had been dead 600 Years before. On this Occaſion, I ſhall relate out of the Chineſe Hiſtory, two other Paſſages, nearly of the ſame Nature, and no leſs extraordinary than the former. We read in the Shu king, that the Emperor Kau tſong having prayed fervently to (†) Tyen, in order to obtain a worthy Miniſter of State, fit for reforming the Manners of his Subjects,

(A) But this is no Proof that it was an Apparition, ſince Confuçius only calls it a Dream. Indeed, ſome of the Confuçian Sect, in Conſequence of their Notion of a particular Providence, have ran into ſome Extravagancies concerning Guardian Angels, Demons, Apparitions, &c. which is the Chief, or only foible of their Creed.

(†) Tyen ſtands for Shang ti, and Shang ti for Tyen, when ſpeaking of the Sovereign Being who hath created and governs Heaven and Earth.

Subjects, Shang ti appeared to him in a Dream, and ſhewed him the Perſon deſigned for him; By the Deſcription of whoſe Face the Emperor had him ſearched for, and he was found among a Crowd of ordinary People: Yet this Fû ywê, (for that was his Name) raiſed out of the Duſt, as it were to ſway the Empire, ſpake from the firſt, according to the Maxims of the ancient Sages; whence it is eaſy to judge that the Doctrine which he taught was commonly received all over the Nation.

Certain Hiſtorians ſince Confucius, relate a received Tradition concerning the Ruin of the Kingdom of Tſau, in the third Year of the Emperor King vang. One of the Lords of this Prince's Court ſaw in a Dream the Anceſtors of that Family, who, after they had lamented the Degeneracy of their Deſcendants, ſayed among themſelves: Our Race will certainly loſe the Crown, and the Country of Tſau will no longer continue to be a particular Kingdom, as it has been for theſe 600 Years paſt. Such a Man by Name will murder the Prince, and cauſe this Revolution.

This Lord was too much affected with this Viſion, to take it for a mere Dream: But not finding any Perſon at the Court of Tſau, who bore the Name of the appointed Traitor, he was content to warn the Prince to beware of ſuch a Man, whenever he ſaw him. The Prince made Uſe of the Council at firſt; but afterwards neglecting it, perhaps thro' Forgetfulneſs, a Man of that Name ſlew the laſt of the Kings of Tſau, which then became Part of the Kingdom of (A) Song.

No Idolatry among the ancient Chineſe.

It is obſervable, that in theſe ancient Books we find Proofs that the primitive Chineſe had Knowledge of the Supreme Being, and payed him religrous Worſhip for a long Series of Ages; nor can we perceive therein, the leaſt Foot-ſtep of idolatrous Worſhip. This will ſeem the leſs ſurprizing, when we reflect that Idolatry ſpread but ſlowly in the World; That accord ng to Euſebius, it firſt began in Aſſyria, where there were no Images, till a long time after Belus who introduced them; that China had no Commerce with other Nations, and that the Indies lying between it and Aſſyria, rendered the Communication ſtill more (B) difficult.

Had it been otherways, the Chineſe Hiſtory would not have failed to ſpeak of it, in the ſame Manner as it takes Notice of the Time when the Image of Fo was brought into China, ſeveral Ages after Confucius. 'Tis true, that from the Time of that Philoſopher, Magic, and divers other Errors had infected the Minds of many: It is alſo poſſible, that even before him there were Images, and a ſuperſtitious Worſhip to be found among the People in ſome Provinces: But this cannot be proved from their Hiſtory; and it appears that the Learned, adhering to the Doctrine which they received from their Fore-fathers, had no Share therein.

Ancient Religion ſtill the prevailing Sect.

That which has contributed greatly to the Preſervation of the Religion of the early Ages in China, and preventing its being wholly deſtroyed, is, that there has been a ſupreme Tribunal eſtabliſhed in the Empire, almoſt from the Time of its Foundation, with full Authority to condemn, or ſuppreſs any Superſtitions that might ariſe; which is called, The Tribunal of Rites.

This Precaution of the Chineſe would have proved effectual, was not the Mind of Man ſo very weak, and liable to be ſeduced; the ſtrongeſt Dykes being only the Work of Men, cannot withſtand very violent Inundations. We have obſerved elſewhere, that the whole Body of Philoſophers in China, [have been] Idolaters contrary to their own Conſciences, thro' fear of a People fond of Images (C), who were ungovernable, and had too much the Aſcendant in public Affairs: Nevertheleſs, the ancient Doctrine of the Chineſe, has always found Support from the Tribunal above mentioned, and does by the Aſſiſtance of its Degrees, ſtill continue to be the prevailing Sect. The Miſſionaries, who read the Decrees of the Mandarins, compoſing this Tribunal, have obſerved, that tho' they ſometimes in private practiſed certain Superſtitions, yet when they aſſembled in a Body to deliberate about them they openly condemned them.

Free from the Superſtition of other Religions.

It is poſſible that by the ſame Means, the Belief of a firſt and Supreme Being has been ſo long preſerved in China, ſuch as we find it in the Claſſic Books; and it is certain, it has not been deformed as it was among the Greeks and Romans, by the Fictions of the Poets. China, for many Ages, was a Stranger to the Superſtitions to be met with in other Nations, who having but a very groſs and imperfect Idea of the Deity, have fallen by degrees to honour the Heroes of their Country with the Title of Gods. Whatever Veneration the Chineſe have had for their greateſt Emperors, they never payed Adoration to any but the Supreme Being; and tho' they have diſcovered their Eſteem and Reſpect for the Memory of great Men, who have been diſtinguiſhed by their Rank, their Virtues, and Services, yet they have rather choſen to preſerve their Memory by Tablets inſcribed with their Names and ſhort Encomiums, than by Pictures or Images. Tablets of the ſame Kind are often hung up in honour of Magiſtrates, who have diſcharged their Truſts to the Satisfaction of the People, and are removed to another Government.

However, the Troubles that happened in the Empire, the civil Wars which divided it, and the Corruption of Manners, which became almoſt general, had entirely baniſhed the ancient Doctrine: But Confucius revived it, by giving freſh Reputation to the ancient Books; eſpecially the Shu king, which he recommended as an exact Rule of Manners.

(A) How fond the Author is to propagate the Doctrine of Apparitions, on the Authority of Dreams or any idle Fiction.

(B) The Author ſeems to forget, that the Idolatry of Fo ſprang up in that Part of India next to China, within 300 Years after Belus; and yet did not find Admittance into China for 1200 Years after, which is a much more ſurprizing Inſtance than the other.

(C) In the Original it is Idols: Where obſerve that the Romiſh Clergy give the Name of Idols to the Images of all Nations, tho' they uſe them only for ſake of Remembrance, as the Bonzas do, if you will believe themſelves. Whence it is plain, either that they maliciouſly bely other Religions, or really look on the Uſe of Images any way in Religion as Idolatry; and ſo diſtinguiſh between Images and Idols, in order to amuſe the Ignorant, and cloak their own Impiety.

I have

I have already ſpoken of the high Eſteem this Philoſopher was had in, who is ſtill looked upon as the Doctor of the Empire; and yet in his Time, the Sect of Tau tſe aroſe, whoſe Author came into the World about 52 Years before Confucius. The ſuperſtitious Doctrine which he taught, was agreeable for its Novelty; and however extravagant it might appear to reaſonable Men, yet it was encouraged by ſome of the Emperors, beſides a great Number of Followers, who brought it in Credit.

Of the Sect of TAU TSE.

Author of this Sect.

LAU KYUN, (A) is the Name of the Philoſopher who gave Riſe to this new Sect; and if you credit his Diſciples, his Birth was very extraordinary: For he lay fourſcore Years in his Mother's Womb, and came into the World, by making his Way thro' her left Side, of which monſtrous Child-Birth ſhe died.

His Books.

His Books are ſtill extant; but, as it is ſuppoſed, much altered by his Followers: Nevertheleſs, they contain ſeveral Maxims and Sentiments worthy of a Philoſopher, concerning the moral Virtues, the avoiding Honours, the Contempt of Riches, and that happy Solicitude of a Soul, which raiſing itſelf above terreſtrial Things, believes that it has a Sufficiency in itſelf.

Amongſt the Sentiments, there is one which he often repeated; eſpecially when he ſpoke of the Production of the World: Tay, ſays he, [that is the Law or Reaſon] hath produced One, One hath produced Two, Two have produced Three, and Three have produced all Things (B). By this he ſeems to have had ſome Knowledge of the Deity (C), but it was a very groſs one.

His Morality of the Epicurean Kind.

The Morality of this Philoſopher and his Diſciples, nearly reſembles that of the Epicureans; it conſiſts in putting away vehement Deſires and Paſſions, capable of diſturbing the Peace and Tranquility of the Soul. According to them, it ought to be every wiſe Man's Care to paſs his Life free from Anxiety and Uneaſineſs; and to this End, never to reflect on what is paſt, nor be inquiſitive after what is to come.

His Followers Quietiſts

They affirm, that to be agitated with ruffling Cares, to be buſied about great Projects, to give one's ſelf up to Ambition, Avarice, and other Paſſions, is to toil more for Poſterity than themſelves; and that it is Madneſs to purchaſe the Happineſs of others, at the Expence of our own Repoſe and Felicity: That we ſhould purſue our own Happineſs with Moderation, and not abandon ourſelves to over violent Deſires; becauſe, whatever we look upon as Happineſs, ceaſes to be ſo, if it is accompanied with Trouble, Diſtaſte and Inquietude, and the Peace of the Soul be ever ſo little diſturbed.

Pretend to the Liquor of Immortality.

For which Reaſon, thoſe belonging to this Sect, affect a Calm that ſuſpends, as they ſay, all the Functions of the Soul: But as this Tranquillity muſt needs be diſturbed by the Thoughts of Death, they boaſt of having found out a Liquor, by means whereof they may become immortal. They, are addicted to Chymiſtry, and much infatuated with the Notion of the Philoſopher's Stone. They are likewiſe fond of Magic; and are perſuaded, that by the Aſſiſtance of the Demons whom they invoke, they can ſucceed in their Deſigns.

The Hope of eſcaping Death, induced a great Number of Mandarins to ſtudy this diabolical Art: The Women eſpecially, being naturally curious, and exceeding fond of Life, madly gave into theſe Extravagancies. At length, certain credulous and ſuperſtitious Emperors, brought this impious Doctrine in vogue, and greatly multiplied the Number of its Followers.

Emperors infatuated with that Notion

The Emperor Tſin ſhi whang ti, that ſworn Enemy to Learning and learned Men, was perſuaded by theſe Impoſtors, that they had actually found the Liquor which made Men immortal, and was called Chang ſeng yo (D).

Vû ti, the ſixth Emperor of the Dynaſty of the Han, addicted himſelf wholly to the Study of magical Books, under a Leader of this Sect, named Li ſhau kyun. Some pretended it was out of Complaiſance for the Empreſs, who embraced this new Philoſophy, as being more favourable to her Paſſions than the Doctrine of the ancient Books, and of Confuçius, which ſhe deteſted.

It was not long before the Provinces were informed of the Emperor's Inclination, and the open Protection given by him to a Sect, which he had embraced himſelf. The Court was immediately filled with an innumerable Crowd of theſe falſe Doctors, who were famous for the Magic Art. That Prince about this Time, loſt one of his Queens whom he doated on to Diſtraction; and being inconſolate for her Loſs, one of theſe Impoſtors, by his Inchantments, cauſed the deceaſed Queen to appear before the Emperor: And this Apparition with which he was ſurprized and terrified, more ſtrongly attached him to the Impieties of this new Sect. He ſeveral times drank the Liquor of Immortality: But at laſt perceived he was as mortal as ever, and being at the Point of Death, lamented too late his eaſy Credulity.

Support this Sect.

However, the new Sect ſuffered no Prejudice by the Emperor's Death, for it found Protectors in the Princes of the ſame Dynaſty. Two of their moſt famous Doctors having been authorized to ſupport the Worſhip which was payed to the Demon in a great Number of Temples already erected

(A) He is alſo called Li lau kyun, and commonly Pe yang, or Lau tan [P. Couplet. Scient. Sinens. proem. Declar. p. 24.] His Name was Li, and his Surname Eul; but as he came into the World with white Hair, he was called Lau tſe, or the Infant old Man. Theſe Circumſtances we have by accident in another Place, of our Author, tho' they more properly come in here. [See the Novel relating to the Philoſopher Chwang tſe in the ſecond Vol.]

(B) The Chineſe Words are Tau ſeng ye, Ye ſeng eul, Eul ſeng ſan, San ſeng van ve. ſee Coupl. ubi ſupr.

(C) By Deity, here the Author doubtleſs means the Trinity: ſo earneſt he is to ſtrain Things his own Way, tho' he ſeems aſhamed to ſpeak out.

(D) Yo, medicine; Chang, eternal; Seng, Life.

ed thro' the Empire; they distributed every where, and sold at a high Price little Images, representing the Crowd of Spirits and Men, whom they had ranked among their Gods, and named Syen jin, that is, Immortals (A). This Superstition encreased to such a Degree, that under the Emperors of the Tang Dynasty, they gave the Ministers of this Sect the honourable Title of Tyen tsë, that is, Heavenly Doctors. The Founder of this Line erected a stately Temple to Lau kyun; and Hven tsong, the sixth Emperor of the same Dynasty, caused his Statue to be brought with great Pomp into the Palace.

The Successors of the Head of this Sect are always honoured with the Dignity of great Mandarins, and reside in a Town of the Province of Kyang si, where they have a magnificent Palace. Crowds of People flock thither from the neighbouring Provinces to procure Remedies for their Diseases, or to learn their Destiny, and what is to happen in the Course of their Lives: They receive of the Tyen tsë a Billet filled with magical Characters, and go away well satisfied, without begrudging the Sum they pay for this singular Favour.

They gain ground under the Song.

But the Doctors of this Sect gained Ground chiefly under the Dynasty of the Song, whose third Emperor Chin tsong was ridiculously led away with their Tricks and Forgeries. These Impostors having in a dark Night hung up a Book on the principal Gate of the imperial City, filled with the Characters and magical Sentences for invoking Demons, gave out that it had fallen from Heaven: Whereupon the credulous Prince, out of great Veneration, went on Foot to fetch it; and after receiving it with the most profound Respect, carried it in a triumphant Manner into the Palace, and enclosed it in a Gold Box, where he kept it with abundance of Care.

Introduced the Worship of Spirits.

These Tau tsë were the Persons who introduced the Multitude of Spirits, till then unknown, whom they worshipped as Deities independant of the Supreme Being, and honoured with the Name of Shang ti: They even deified some of the ancient Kings, and prayed to them.

Whey tsong, the eighth Emperor of the same Line, carried the Superstition to such a Pitch as to give the Name of Shang ti, or Supreme Lord, to a Doctor of this Sect called Shang i, (B) who had acquired a great Reputation under the Dynasty of the Han. Till that Time, the Idolaters themselves had distinguished Shang ti from other Deities. Thus a famous Ko lau, who has written on this Subject, attributes the Ruin of the Song intirely to this (C) Impiety.

This abominable Sect got footing by degrees, partly thro' the Protection of the Princes abovementioned, partly by flattering the Passions of the Grandees, partly by the Impressions of Wonder and Terror that it made on the Minds of the People. The Compacts of their Ministers with Demons, the Lots which they cast, and the surprizing Effects of their magical Arts (D) infatuated the Multitude, still extremely prejudiced in Favour of these Impostors, who are generally called to heal Diseases and exorcise (E) Demons.

Sacrifice to the Devil.

They sacrifice to this Spirit of Darkness three Sorts of Victims, a Hog, a Fish, and a Fowl; they drive a Stake in the Earth as a Kind of a Charm, and trace upon Paper odd Sorts of Figures, accompanying the Stroke of their Pencil with horrible Cries and Grimaces. They make a frightful Din with Kettles and little Drums: And sometimes to punish the Crimes of the Chinese, God permits them to take effect. And tho' often they do not succeed, yet these Gentlemen know how to procure Respect and Authority by their Inchantments, and the Assistance which the Demon gives them to deceive and seduce the poor deluded (F) People.

Their Methods of imposing on the Ignorant.

In China, great Numbers of profligate Fellows are sold to these Ministers of Iniquity, who follow the Trade of Divination. Tho' they have never seen the Person who consults them they tell his Name, and all the Circumstances of his Family, in what Manner his House is situated, how many Children he has, their Names and Age; with a hundred other Particulars which may be naturally enough supposed to be known to the Demons, and are strangely surprizing to weak and credulous Minds, such as the Vulgar among the Chinese often are.

Juggling Tricks.

Some of these Conjurers, after invoking the Demons, cause the Figures of the Chief of their Sect and of their Idols, to appear in the Air. Formerly they could make a Pencil write of itself without any body touching it, upon Paper or Sand, the Answers to Questions. They likewise cause all the People of any House to pass in review, in a large Vessel of Water; wherein they also shew the Changes that shall happen in the Empire, and the imaginary Dignities to which those shall be advanced, who embrace their Sect. In short, they pronounce mysterious Words without any Meaning, and place Charms on Houses as well as Men's Persons (G): Nothing is more common than to hear of these Sorts of Stories; and tho' it is very likely that the greater Part of them are only Illusions, yet it is not credible that all should be so: For many Effects ought in reality to be attributed to the Power of the (*) Devil.

(A) Here the Author represents their Saints or Heroes as Gods, and to countenance the Matter, misrenders Syen jin Immortals, instead of immortal Men.

(B) And have not the Popes been called Gods by some of the Romish Doctors, which is equally impious?

(C) And yet both the Sect itself, as well as the Popes, are still in being, which shews such Conclusions to be groundless.

(D) Observe how this Author all along acknowledges the Power of Magic, as he does Apparitions, Witchcraft, the Power of Demons, &c. If he can see the Chinese Superstitions, how can he possibly avoid seeing his own?

(E) One Imposture naturally begets another; and why may not the Priests of Asia make gain of them as well as the Priests of Europe?

(F) Is not this exactly the Case also with the Priests and Laity of the Church of Rome?

(G) In the same manner as the Romish Priests sprinkle Houses and People with Holy Water, or give them Relics and Agnus Dei's to keep in their Closets, or wear about their Persons. With what Face can the Author condemn the Chinese for Superstitions practised by himself?

(*) The wiser sort of People in China, say that these are false Reports spread by those Impostors; and that there is nothing real in them. [The wise and honest sort of People in Europe will say the same, whatever the Author would have them believe in order to keep up Priestcraft, and the Influence of the Clergy over the Ignorant.]

Of the Sect of F O, or (A) F W E.

Sect of Fo.

FOR the Space of 270 Years, the Emperors of the Han Dynasty possessed the imperial Throne; and about 65 Years after the Birth of Christ, the Emperor Ming ti introduced a new Sect into China, which is still more dangerous than the former, and has made a much more rapid (B) Progress.

Its Origin.

This Prince, on Occasion of a Dream which he had, called to Mind a Sentence often in the Mouth of Confucius, viz. That the Holy One was to be found in the West. Upon this he sent Ambassadors into the Indies to discover who this Saint was, and search for the true Law which he taught: The Ambassadors supposing they had found him among the Worshippers of the Idol Fo or Fwe, carried it into China, and with it the Fables and Superstitions, the Doctrine of the Metemphychosis, and the Atheism wherewith the Indian Books were filled.

And Progress.

This Contagion which began in the Court soon got footing in the Provinces, and spread thro' all the Empire, wherein Magic and Impiety had made already but too much Havock.

It is hard to say with certainty, in what Part of the Indies this Person appeared: But if the extraordinary Things that his Disciples relate of him, are not so many Fables invented by them, I should be apt to believe with St. Francis Xavier, that he was rather a Spirit than a real (C) Man.

Miraculous Birth of Fo.

They relate that he was born in that Part of the Indies which the Chinese call Chung tyen cho; (D) that his Father [named In fan vang] was the King of this Country, and his Mother called Mo yé, that she was delivered of him thro' her right Side (E), and died soon after he was born; that when she conceived, she almost constantly dreamed she had swallowed an Elephant (F); and that hence arose the Honours payed to white Elephants by the Kings of the Indies, who often make War upon each other to procure this Sort of Animal.

They say, this Monster stood upright upon his Feet as soon as he came into the World, and walked seven Paces, pointing with one Hand to the Heaven, and the other to the Earth; nay, that he even spoke and pronounced distinctly the following Words, There is none either in the Heaven or on the Earth, who ought to be adored but I alone.

Transform'd to a God at 30.

At the Age of seventeen he married three Wives, and had a Son called by the Chinese, Mo hew lo (G); at nineteen he forsook his Wives, and all earthly Cares, to retire into a solitary Place, under the Guidance of four Philosophers, called by the Indians, Joghi; at thirty, he was of a sudden transfused by the Divinity, and became (H) Fo, [or a Deity] called by the Indians, Pagod. Henceforward looking upon himself as a God, he minded nothing else but to propagate his Doctrine.

Works Miracles.

As the Devil was always ready to lend him a helping Hand, by his Assistance he did the most wonderful Things; and by the Novelty of his Miracles, filled the People with Dread, and procured their Veneration. The Chinese [of the Bonzian Sect] have described these Prodigies in several large Volumes, as well as represented them in Cuts.

Prodigious Number of Disciples.

It is scarcely credible how many Disciples this chimerical God gained: For they reckon fourscore thousand who were employ'd by him in infecting all the East with his impious Tenets. Among this great Number there were ten most distinguished for their Rank and Dignity, who published five thousand Volumes in honour of their Master. The Chinese call his Followers [or rather Priests] Seng and Ho shang; the Tartars, Lamas, or La ma seng; the Siamese, Talapoins; and the Japanese (or rather the Europeans) Bonzas.

Dies at 79.

However this new God found himself mortal as well as other Men: For at the Age of 79 his Strength failing, gave him Notice of his approaching End, and then to crown all his Impieties, he disgorged the Poison of Atheism.

Teaches contrary Doctrines.

He declared to his Disciples, that till that Moment he had spoken to them only in Parables; that his Discourses were so many Enigmas; and that for 40 Years he had concealed the Truth under figurative and metaphorical Expressions; but that being about to leave them, he would communicate his real Sentiments, and reveal the Mystery of his Doctrine: Learn then, sayed he to them, that there is no other principal of all Things but Emptiness and Nothing: From Nothing all Things proceeded, and into Nothing all will return, and this is the End of all our hopes. But his Disciples adhered to what he first taught, and their Doctrine is directly opposite to Atheism.

(A) Called also Fwë kyau.

(B) Couplet says it has infected all the Chinese Books and Sects, excepting the Mohammedan. Proem. Declar. ubi. supr. p. 27.

(C) Could the Bonzas themselves believe any thing more stupid than these Jesuits, who yet are every Moment ridiculing the Stupidity of the Bonzas? Or rather is it possible Jesuits can really be so stupid as to believe such ridiculous Nonsense?

(D) In the Original Chung tyen cho instead of Tchung tien tcho; the Author having forgotten to accommodate the Name as it occurs in Couplet, (from whom the Extract seems to be taken) to the French Orthography.

(E) On Occasion of his monstrous Birth, P. Couplet observes that this Saviour of Mankind, as his Followers call him, had more of the Nature of a Viper than a Man; and that the Name fer (as he writes it) by being compounded of Non and homo, intimates as much. I shall only observe on Occasion of this incarnate God of the Bonzas, that the Followers of every pretended Revelation ascribe a miraculous Birth to the Author of their Sect.

(F) Couplet has it, that the Mother dreamed a white Elephant passing down her Throat entered into her Womb, Whence she was reported to have conceived by an Elephant: But that others more rightly conjectured, that the Devil stealing some human Seed, got her with Child in the Shape of that Beast. (Coupl. ubi. supr. p. 28.) This is Philosophy and Divinity truely worthy of the Jesuits.

(G) According to Couplet, Lo hew lo.

(H) He was first named She, or She kya, (corruptly called Shaka by the Japanese) by which Name the whole Body of the Bonzas [or Clergy] as well as their Religion is understood. Coupl. ubi. supr. p. 28.

However

However these last Words of the Impostor gave Rise to the famous Distinction, which is made in his Doctrine of Exterior and Interior whereof I shall speak hereafter. His Disciples did not fail to spead a great Number of Fables after his Death (A), and easily persuaded a simple and credulous People, that their Master had been born eight thousand Times; that his Soul had successively passed into different Animals; and that he had appeared in the Form of an Ape, a Dragon, an Elephant (B) &c. This was plainly done with a Design to establish the Worship of this false God under the Shape of various Animals (C): Accordingly these different Creatures, through which the Soul of Fo was sayed to have passed, were adored in several Places; the Chinese themselves built many Temples to all sorts of Idols, which multiplied exceedingly throughout the Empire.

Fictions of his Disciples concerning him.

Among the great Number of this chimerical Deity's Disciples, there was one named Mo o kya ye more dear to him than all the Rest, whom he trusted with his greatest Secrets, and charged more particularly to propagate his Doctrine (D): He enjoyned him not to trouble himself with bringing Proofs and tedious Arguments to support his Tenets; but only to put at the Head of his Works, which he should publish, these few Words: It is thus that I have Learned.

His beloved Disciple.

This Fo in one of his Books, speaks of a Master more ancient than himself, called by the Chinese, O mi to, and corruptly by the Japanese, Amida; which other Monster appeared in the Kingdom of Bengal, and the Bonzas pretend that he attained to such a high degree of Sanctity, and had acquired such abundant Merit, that it is sufficient at present to invoke him to obtain Pardon for the greatest Crimes (E). On this account the Chinese of this Sect have continually in their Mouths these two Names, O mi to, Fo (F): thinking that the Invocation of these pretended Deities purifies them so effectually that they may afterwards give a Loose to all their Passions, being perswaded that it will cost them nothing but an easy Invocation to expiate their most enormous Crimes (G).

O-mi to, or Amida.

The last Words of Fo, when he was dying, gave rise to a Sect of Atheists among a few Bonzas: But the greater Part of them not able to shake off the Prejudices of their Education, persevered in the first Errors (H) their Master had taught.

Atheists among the Bonzas.

Many endeavoured to reconcile the two Doctrines by the Distinction of the Exterior and the Interior: The first being more suitable to the Capacity of the People, prepared their Minds to receive the second, which was fit only for elevated Minds, and the better to be understood, they made use of the following Example.

Distinction of Interior and exterior Doctrine.

The exterior Doctrine, say they, is with relation to the Interior, the same as the Center or Frame is to the Arch that is built upon it: For the Frame being only necessary to support the Stones while the Arch is building, becomes useless as soon as that is finished and is taken to pieces; in the same Manner the exterior Doctrine is layed aside as soon as the Interior is embraced.

Exterior Doctrine.

As to the exterior Doctrine containing the Principles of the Morality which the Bonzas are very careful to inculcate, they say, there is great difference between Good and Evil; that after Death there will be Rewards for those who have done well, and Punishments for those who have done evil; that there are Places appointed for the Souls of both, wherein they are stationed according to their Merit; that the God Fo was born to save Mankind, and to bring back those to the way of Salvation who had strayed from it; that it was he who expiated their Sins, and procured them a happy new-birth in the other World; that there are five Precepts to be observed, the first not to kill any living Creature, the second not to take what belongs to others, the third prohibits Impurity, the fourth lying, and the fifth drinking of Wine.

Containing their moral Precepts.

But above all things they must not be wanting in the Practice of certain charitable Works which their Guides prescribe: " Use the Bonzas well, say they, and furnish them with every thing " necessary for their Subsistance; build them Monasteries and Temples, that by their Prayers and " the Penances they inflict on themselves for the Expiation of your Sins, they may deliver you from Arts of the Bonzas to fleece the People.

(A) Our Author omits several very material Things related by others. P. Couplet tells us, that his Body was burned with odoriferous Wood, according to the Custom of the Country; and his Ashes, as they say, distributed among Men, Spirits and Dragons of the Sea; That one of his Teeth, was sent as a Present to the King of the Island of Ceylan, where it was worshiped, till Constantine the Duke of Braganza's Brother having taken it with other Spoil, burnt it and scattered the Ashes, refusing to release it for a vast Sum; and that the Portugueze Historians, in calling it the Tooh of an Ape, have not erred, since Fo is worshiped in Ceylan in the Figure of an Ape, as he is worshiped in other Places under various Forms and Names. [Coupl. ubi supr. p. 29.] By this Passage it appears, that the Religion of the Bonzas, has a great Connection with that of the Indians, if it be not at bottom the very same; Yet the Missionaries take little or no Notice of this Conformity.

(B) P. Couplet says his last Appearance was in the Form of a white Elephant; tho' a little before he is sayed to have been begotten by a white Elephant.

(C) 'Tis true these Asiatic Priests, by this Means, have set up more numerous Objects of Worship than the European; but they have no breaden God among them, or any such Monstrous Absurdity as Transubstantiation.

(D) But it does not appear that ever he thought of laying Claim to a Supremacy on these Words; as the European Popes have done on Words not so strong.

(E) Here these Asiatic Catholics have gotten the Doctrine of Merits and Supererogation. And indeed the European Catholics seem to have copy'd almost all their Religion from them.

(F) This is like the Papists Jesu-maria.

(G) This answers to the Popish Confession, and Invocation of Saints at privileged Altars, &c. whereby the most atrocious Sins are pretended in like manner to be expiated and done away.

(H) This is very hard and partial Treatment of the Bonzas, who are here first condemned for being Atheists, and then for not being Atheists. But it is almost impossible for the Clergy of one Religion, to represent those of another Religion fairly. They are fearful least other Religions represented fairly should appear better than their own, and therefore do all they can to blacken them. This Practice the Romish Clergy are guilty of most of all others, as they have most Occasion; and indeed were they to represent the Religion of the Bonzas truely, their Disciples would see very little difference between their own and it; and that their deceitful Guides teach the very same Errors, Impieties and Absurdities, which they condemn in others. Farther to disguise this Conformity, they have also given a very imperfect and confused Account of the Idolatrous Sects in China, and particularly this of the Bonzas.

" from the Puniſhments you are liable to (A). " At the Funeral Obſequies of your Rela" tions burn Gilt and Silver-Paper, together with Garments and Silks; all which in the other " World ſhall be changed into Gold, Silver, and real Garments: By this Means, your departed
" Kindred will be ſupply'd with the things they want, and have wherewithall to gratify the " eighteen Guardians of the infernal Regions, who without theſe Bribes would be inexorable and " treat them with great Rigour (B). If you neglect theſe Commands, you muſt expect nothing
" after Death but to be delivered over to the moſt cruel Torments: Your Soul, by a long Courſe
" of Tranſmigrations ſhall paſs into the vileſt Animals; and you ſhall appear again in the Form
" of a Mule, a Horſe, a Dog, a Rat, or ſome other Creature ſtill more contemptible."

It is hard to deſcribe what an Influence the Dread of theſe Chimeras has on the Minds of the credulous and ſuperſtitious Chineſe (C); which will appear from a Story related by P. le Comte, of a Paſſage that happened to himſelf when he lived in the Province of Shen ſi.

Story ſhewing how they gull the Credulous.

" They called me, ſays he, one Day to baptize a ſick Perſon, who was an old Man of ſeventy,
" and lived upon a ſmall Penſion given him by the Emperor. On entering his Room, he ſayed
" to me, I am obliged to you, my Father, for that you are going to deliver me from a grievous
" Puniſhment. That is not all, replied I, Baptiſm not only delivers Perſons from Hell, but con" ducts them to a Life of Bleſſedneſs. What Happineſs muſt it be to go to Heaven, there to enjoy
" the preſence of God everlaſtingly? I do not well underſtand, reply'd the ſick Perſon, what you
" ſay, and perhaps I have not ſufficiently explained myſelf: You know that I have lived for a long " time on the Emperor's Benevolence, and the Bonza's who are thoroughly acquainted with what
" paſſes in the next World, have aſſured me that out of Gratitude I ſhall be obliged to ſerve him af- " ter my Death, and that my Soul will infallibly paſs into one of his Poſt-Horſes to carry Diſpatches
" of the Court into the Provinces. For this Reaſon they exhort me to perform my Duty well, when " I have aſſumed my new Being; and to take Care not to ſtumble, nor wince, nor bite, nor hurt
" any body. Run faſt, ſay they, eat little, and be patient; by which Means you will move the Com-
" paſſion of the Gods who often convert a good Beaſt at length into a Man of Quality,
" and make him a conſiderable Mandarin: I muſt own, Father, that this thought ſhocks me, and I
" cannot call it to mind without trembling. I dream of it every Night, and ſometimes in my ſleep
" fancy myſelf harneſſed, and ready to ſet out at the firſt laſh of the Rider's whip. I then wake in a " Sweat and half diſtracted, not knowing whether I am ſtill a Man or a Horſe. But alas! what " will become of me, when it ſhall be no longer a Dream.

" This then, my Father, is the Reſolution that I am come to: They ſay that thoſe of your Religion
" are not ſubject to theſe Miſeries; that the Men will always be Men, and ſhall be the ſame in the " next World as they are in this: I beſeech you therefore to receive me among you. I know that
" your Religion is hard to be obſerved (D); but if it was ſtill more rigid I am ready to embrace it,
" and whatever it coſt me I had rather be a Chriſtian than become a Beaſt. This Diſcourſe and the " preſent Condition of the ſilk Perſon moved my Compaſſion: But reflecting afterwards that " God makes uſe of Simplicity and Ignorance to lead Men to the Truth (E), I took Occaſion
" to convince him of his Errors, and to direct him in the way of Salvation. After I had given " him Inſtructions a long time, at length he believed; and I had the Conſolation to ſee him
" die, not only poſſeſſed of the moſt rational Sentiments, but with all the Marks of a good
" Chriſtian."

The Tranſmigration uſeful for that end.

It is eaſy to conceive that ſince the Chineſe are the Dupes of a Doctrine, ſo abſurd and ridiculous as the Tranſmigration of Souls, the Bonzas who propagate it with great Zeal, draw no ſmall Advantage from it. It is exceeding uſeful in carrying on all their deceitful Tricks, by which they extort Alms and enlarge their Revenues. Being ſprung from the Dregs of the People, and bred from

(A) Can the Author be angry with the Bonzas for this, or think they do amiſs? Do not the Romiſh Clergy inculcate the very ſame Doctrine, among the Laity of their Church?

(B) The Reader may obſerve from hence, and what follows, that the Bonzas break three at leaſt of their five moral Precepts, by their impure Practices, and by inventing monſtrous Lies, in order to rob others, in a ſpecious ſanctify'd way, of what belongs to them. It being abſolutely neceſſary for every Religon to have the Appearance of Goodneſs, they have taken Care to teach the moral Doctrines; but as a due Obſervance of them is utterly inconſiſtent with their views of becoming rich and powerful, they have taken no leſs Care to ſet them aſide by other Doctrines, which to the unthinking or major Part of Mankind, may appear equally good and neceſſary. And this is the very Courſe taken by the Church of Rome. They admit the Decalogue, but by their ſanguinary Laws againſt Heretics (made to ſecure their Uſurpations) they have firſt repealed the Command againſt Murder; whence have ariſen their Cruſades, Maſſacres, Perſecutions, ſolemn Executions, Dragoonings, Confiſcations, Baniſhments, &c. By decreeing no Faith is to be kept with Heretics, they diſſolve one of the chief moral Bonds of Society; and by making it lawful to ſpoil Heretics, and ſeize their Poſſeſſions, they have abrogated the Command which forbids robbing and ſtealing; By the Doctrine of the depoſing Power in the Pope, they violate the Obedience due to Sovereigns and overturn civil Government. Thus after admitting the moral Principles, which are of a univerſal Nature, they teach their Followers to violate them with Reſpect to all Mankind, excepting thoſe of their own Perſwaſion, who make but about one fifteenth of the whole. Then they give all the Encouragement imaginable to Immorality and Vice in their Adherents, by making the Method of obtaining Remiſſion of the greateſt Sins very eaſy, either in this Life by an Indulgence, a Prayer before an Image or on their Beads, or by a verbal Pardon; or elſe after this Life by Maſſes and Prayers for the Dead: To which I may add the making their Monaſteries and Churches Sanctuaries for Villians of all kinds. To which infamous Doctrines ſet on Foot for the Intereſt of the Church are owing the frequent Aſſaſſinations, and numerous other Villanies, daily committed in Popiſh Countries: To them are owing thoſe profligate Diſpoſitions and wicked Practices, which render Papiſts ſo abominable in the Eyes of all the unbelieving Nations wherever they come.

(C) Why is it hard to conceive that the ſuperſtitious Chineſe ſhould be frightend with ſuch Chimeras, when the Author knows the Laity of his own Religion are frightend in no leſs a Degree with the like Chimeras; ſuch as Purgatory, no Salvation out of the Peal of their Church, Power of Demons, Witches, Sorcery &c.

(D) I ſuſpect this whole Story; but am almoſt morally ſure the Chineſe could not utter theſe Words, his own Religion being much more rigid as to Penances, Faſting, &c. than the Romiſh: Which Auſterities, inſtead of being a Mark of a true Church, are an infallible Sign of a falſe One.

(E) Obſerve how ſlily Ignorance, which is the Bonzian Maxim and the neceſſary Parent of Error, is here recommended as the Guide to Truth, and Mother of Devotion.

from their Infancy in an idle Profeſſion, this Doctrine is proper to authoriſe the Frauds and Artifices, which they contrive to excite the Liberality of the People, whereof one may judge the better from the following Relation of P. le Comte.

Another Story of the Bonzas.

" Two of theſe Bonzas, ſays he, one Day perceiving, in the Court-Yard of a rich Peaſant, " two or three large Ducks lying before the Door, began to ſigh and weep bitterly. The good " Woman, who perceived them from her Chamber, coming out to learn the Cauſe of their " Grief: We know, ſayed they, that the Souls of our Fathers have paſſed into the Bodies of theſe " Creatures; and the Apprehenſion we are under of your killing them, will certainly kill us with " Grief. I own, ſayed the Woman, that we had reſolved to ſell them, but ſince they are your Parents " I promiſe to keep them."

This not being what the Bonzas wanted: " Perhaps, ſayed they, your Huſband will not be ſo " charitable as yourſelf, and you may depend on it, that it will be fatal to us if any Accident hap- " pens to them.

" In ſhort, after a great deal of Diſcourſe, the honeſt Peaſant was ſo moved with their coun- " terfeit Grief, that ſhe gave them the Ducks to bring up for ſome time, which they received " with great Reſpect, making twenty ſeveral Proſtrations before them: But that very Evening " they made a Feaſt of them for their little Society."

Buy Children to propagate their Order.

In ſhort the Bonzas are diſperſed throughout the Empire, and brought up to this Trade from their infancy. Theſe wretches (A), to continue their Sect, buy Children of ſeven or eight Years old, and make young Bonzas of them, inſtructing them in their Myſteries for fifteen or twenty Years to qualify them for the Office: But they are generally very ignorant, few of them underſtanding the Principleswhereon their Doctrines are grounded.

Mendicants.

As all the Bonzas are not of equal Eminence, there being different Degrees of them, ſome are enploy'd in begging of Alms; others, who have acquired a Knowledge of Books, and ſpeak politely, make it their Buſineſs to viſit the Learned, and inſinuate themſelves into the good Graces of the Mandarins: But the Number of theſe is ſmall. There are likewiſe among them venerable old Men, who preſide over the Aſſembles of Women: However theſe Aſſembles are not very numerous, nor to be met with in many Places.

Superiors.

Tho' the Bonzas have not a regular Hierarchy, yet they have their Superiors, whom they call Ta Ho ſhang, that is, great Bonzas; and this Rank to which they are raiſed greatly adds to the Reputation they have acquired by their Age, their grave and modeſt Carriage, and by their Hypocriſy.

Monaſteries.

There are Monaſteries of theſe Bonzas to be found every where, but they are not all equally frequented by crouds of People.

Pilgrimages.

In every Province there are certain Mountains with Idol-Temples thereon, which have greater Credit than the reſt. To theſe they go very far in Pilgrimage, and the Pilgrims, as ſoon as they are at the Foot of the Mountain, kneel down and proſtrate themſelves at every Step they take in aſcending up (B). They who cannot go on Pilgrimage, requeſt ſome of their Friends to buy them a large printed Sheet, marked at one corner by the Bonzas, in the Middle of which is the Figure of the God Fo, with a vaſt Number of ſmall Circles drawn round about it and on its Garments.

Beads.

The Devotees of both Sexes wear on their Neck or Arm a ſort of Roſary, compoſed of a hundred middle-ſized Beads, and eight large ones; on the Top is a large Bead reſembling one of the little Snuff-Boxes ſhaped like Gourds. In turning theſe Beads between their Fingers, they pronounce theſe myſterious Words O mi to fo, the Signification of which they themſelves don't underſtand (C): They make above a hundred Genuflexions, after which they draw one of theſe red Circles upon the Sheet of Paper.

Paſports for Heaven.

They invite the Bonzas, from time to time, to come to their Houſes to pray, and to ſeal and make authentic the Number of Circles which they have drawn. They carry them in a pompous Manner to Funerals in a little Box cloſely ſealed up by the Bonzas: This they call Lû in, that is, a Paſſport for travelling from this Life to the next (D): This Paſſport is not obtained without paying ſeveral Taëls; but, ſay they, we ought not to begrudge this expence, becauſe we are ſure of a happy Voyage.

Images.

Among the Temples of the falſe Gods (E), there are ſeveral famous for the Beauty and Largeneſs of their Structure, as well as for the ſtrange Shapes of their Images; ſome are ſo monſtrous, that the poor Chineſe at the Sight of them fall proſtrate, and knock their Forehead ſeveral times againſt the Ground out of Fear and Dread.

(A) Here the Monaſtic Life is confeſſed to be an idle Profeſſion by a Monaſtic.

(B) How nearly do theſe reſemble Popiſh Pilgrimages.

(C) This is contradicted by what has been already ſayed, I have alſo obſerved that this anſwers to the Jeſu Maria of Papiſts. and here we ſee the very Roſary, or Beads, in uſe with them, from whom in all likelyhood the Papiſts took it.

(D) This anſwers to the Figure of the Croſs, and other Trumpery put into the Coffins of deceaſed Papiſts; burying in the Habit of ſome Religious Order and the like: Which Priviledges are not granted for nothing neither.

(E) I obſerved before [p. 647. Note A.] That the Miſſionaries to blacken the Sect of Tau ſe repreſent their Saints, and Heroes as Gods. They do the ſame by thoſe of the Bonzas, who yet make the very ſame Defence, when they are charged with Idolatry, as the Romaniſts of theſe latter times do. The Lamas, ſays a very intelligent Author, teach and practiſe the fundamental Rule of all rational Religion, which conſiſts in honouring God, offending no body and giving to every one what belongs to him. The Life which the Lamas as well as the Kâlmûks lead proves inconteſtably the two laſt Points; and the Diſcourſes which ſome Travellers worthy of Credit have had with them touching Religion aſſure us, that they proteſt ſtrenuouſly againſt adoring more than one God; That the Dalay Lama and Kûtûkhtû *are his Servants, with whom he communicates for the Inſtruction and Good of Men; That the Images which they honour are no more than Repreſentations of the Divinity and ſome holy Men; and that they expoſe them to the View of People, only to put them in mind of their Duty towards God, and the Acts of Virtue which he is pleaſed they ſhould perform. 'Tis true, I do not think this defence frees them from the Charge of Idolatry, which the Worſhip of Images neceſſarily includes: But I think it ought to ſtop the Mouths of the Miſſionaries, who, on their own Principles, cannot charge the Sectaries of Fo with Idolatry, without confeſſing themſelves guilty of it. Wherefore to avoid the Retort they have miſrepreſented the Bonzas, and made Gods of their Saints and Images. *Gen. Hiſt. of Turks, Moguls, &c. Vol. 2. p. 409.

Sanctified Outside of the Bonzas,

As the Bonzas have no other View than to get Money, and, whatever Reputation they may have acquired, are in reality nothing but the Dregs of the Empire, they are well acquainted with the Art of cringing before People. They affect Mildneſs, Complaiſance, Humility, and a Modeſty which deceive at firſt Sight; while the Chineſe who look no farther than the Outſide, take them for ſo many Saints: Eſpecially when to this ſanctified Appearance they join rigorous Faſting, and riſing ſeveral times in a Night to worſhip Fo; ſeeming to ſacrifice themſelves in ſome ſort for the public (A) Good.

And other Tricks to cheat the People.

That they may ſeem very meritorious in the Eyes of the Vulgar, and work them up to Compaſſion which diſpoſes them to Liberality, they appear in the public Streets and Places, inflicting on themſelves ſevere Penances. Some will faſten to their Neck and Feet thick Chains above thirty Foot long, which they drag thro' the Street with a great deal of Pain, and ſtopping at every Door: You ſee, ſay they, how dear it coſts us to expiate your Sins; cannot you afford us ſome trifling (B) Alms?

You ſee others in the moſt frequented Places and where croſs Streets meet, all over Blood by beating their Heads with a great Stone: But among theſe Kinds of Penances there is none more ſurprizing than that of a young Bonza, which is related by P. le Comte in the following Manner:

Story of a knaviſh Mendicant.

" I met one Day in the Middle of a Village, a young Bonza who was affable, mild, modeſt, " and conſequently a very proper Perſon for the Office of begging Charity. He ſtood upright in " a cloſe Chair ſtuck all over on the Inſide with long ſharp Nails, in ſuch a Manner that he could " not lean without being wounded; and was carried by two hired Porters very ſlowly into the " Houſes, where he beſought the People to have Compaſſion on him.

" I am, ſayed he, ſhut up in this Chair for the good of your Souls, and am reſolved never to go " out till all the Nails (which were above 2000) are bought. Every Nail is worth ſix Sols: But " then there is not one of them but what will become a Fountain of Bleſſings in your Houſes. If you " buy any you will perform an Act of heroic Virtue, and you will give an Alms not to the Bonzas " on whom you may beſtow your Charity otherways, but to the God Fo, to whoſe Honour we intend to " build a (C) Temple.

" I then paſſed near the Place where the Bonza was, who, as ſoon as he ſaw me, made me the " ſame Compliment as he had done the reſt. Whereupon I told him he was very unhappy to " give himſelf ſo much uſeleſs Torment in this World; adviſing him to leave his Priſon, and go to " the Temple of the true God to be inſtructed in heavenly Truths, and ſubmit to a Penance " leſs ſevere and more (D) ſalutary.

Good Sneer on the Jeſuit

" He replied very mildly, and without the leaſt Concern, that he was obliged to me for my " Council, but much more ſo if I would buy a dozen of his Nails, which would certainly make " me fortunate in my Journey. Here, ſayed he, turning himſelf to one Side, take theſe which upon " the Faith of a Bonza are the beſt in my Chair, becauſe they give me the moſt Pain: However they " are all of the ſame Price (E): He pronounced theſe Words with an Air and Action, which on " any other Occaſion would have made me laugh: But then his Deluſion excited my Pity, and " I was pierced with Grief at the Sight of this miſerable Slave of the Devil, who ſuffered more " to damn his Soul, than a Romaniſt is obliged to do to ſave his."

Bonzas inſinuate themſelves into Families,

The ſame Motive of getting Alms cauſes theſe Bonzas to repair to the Houſes of both Poor and Rich, the inſtant they are ſent for. They go, as many as are deſired, and ſtay as long as the Perſons pleaſe; and when there is any Aſſembly of Women, (which happens very rarely, and is never practiſed unleſs in ſome few Places, as has been already obſerved) they bring with them a grand Bonza, who is diſtinguiſhed from the reſt by the Place that he takes, by the Reſpect the other Bonzas pay him, and by his Habit, which is worn only by thoſe of his Rank.

Eſpecially among the Women.

Theſe Aſſemblies of the Ladies bring in a fine Revenue to the Bonzas, there being in every City ſeveral Societies, of ten, fifteen or twenty Women, who are commonly of a good Family and advanced in Years, or elſe Widows, and conſequently have Money to diſpoſe of. Theſe they make Superiors [or Lady Abbeſſes] of the Society in their Turns for one Year; and it is generally at the Superior's Houſe that the Aſſemblies are held: All the reſt contributing a certain Sum of Money to defray the common Expences, neceſſary for keeping up Order.

Religious Female Aſſemblies.

On the Day when the Aſſembly is held, there comes a pretty aged Bonza, who is Preſident, and ſings the Anthems to Fo. The Devotees join their Voices, and after they have ſeveral times cried

(A) This is the very Character of the Popiſh Prieſts, who by their hypocritical Outſide, impoſe on the unthinking Multitude, who led wholly by Appearances never look deeper.

(B) Is not this in effect, the Practice of the Mendicant Friers in Popiſh Countries.

(C) This Contrivance is not ſo oppreſſive and ſcandalous as that of the Prieſts preaching up and ſelling (or rather of the People being forced to buy) Indulgencies in Spain, Portugal, &c. but will doubtleſs be altogether as effectual for the good of the Soul.

(D) We hear a great deal of theſe Miſſionaries Reproofs and Arguments uſed to the Bonzas againſt their Religion, but no Defence or Reply of theirs; as if they had nothing to ſay for themſelves, or were very ignorant, as they are often repreſented. However, the contrary of this appears from the Relation of a Romiſh Gentleman, who in his Way to China, thro' the Country of the Mungals (or Mongols) having had an Opportunity of diſcourſing with ſome of the Lamas about their Religion, began to reproach them for ſo cruelly deceiving the Vulgar, by making them believe the Kûtûkhtû and the Dalay lama, are immortal; a Quality which, he ſayed, they could not be ignorant, did not belong to Human Creatures, ſuch as they could not deny thoſe two to be. But they knew ſo well how to turn the Reproach upon himſelf, by putting him in Mind of ſome delicate Doctrines of the Roman Church relating to the Infallibility and Supremacy of Popes, that he aſſured me, ſays my Author, whoſe Friend the Gentleman was, that he had Need of all his Skill to bring himſelf off with Honour. Which ſhews, continues he, that theſe People are not altogether ſo ignorant of the Religions of other Nations, as we are willing to believe. And as he is a Perſon of Merit, and a good Roman *Catholic, to whom this Adventure happened, there is no Room to doubt the Truth of the Fact. I ſhall only add, that if they are not ignorant of other Religions, it is not probable they are ignorant of their own, tho' they are ſhy in divulging it, as the ſame Author obſerves. * See Gen. Hiſt. of the Turks, Moguls and Tatars, Vol. 2. p. 489, 490, alſo p. 488.

(E) This is a curious Piece of Raillery from one idolatrous Prieſt to another: For the Bonza doubtleſs knew him to be a Popiſh Prieſt who traded with Relics, and ſuch ſort of Trumpery as well as himſelf.

cried O mi to, Fo, and beaten upon ſome ſmall Kettles, they ſit down to Table and regale themſelves: But this is only the ordinary Ceremony.

On the more ſolemn Days, they adorn the Houſe with ſeveral Images placed in Form by the Bonzas, and Numbers of groteſque Paintings repreſenting in a hundred different Manners the Torments of Hell. The Prayers and Feaſting laſt for ſeven Days; during which Time the grand Bonza is aſſiſted by ſeveral Bonzas, who join in the Conſort.

Conſecrated Trifles to relieve the Soul after Death.

During theſe ſeven Days, their principal Care is to prepare and conſecrate Treaſures (A) for the other World. To this purpoſe they build a little Palace with Paper painted and gilt, omitting no Part belonging to a Houſe: This they fill with a great Number of Paſteboard-boxes painted and varniſhed; containing Ingots of Gold or Silver, (that is to ſay of gilt Paper) whereof there are ſeveral Hundreds, deſigned to redeem them from the dreadful Puniſhments that Yen vang, or the King of Hell, inflicts on thoſe who have nothing to give him. They put a Score by themſelves, to bribe the Officers of the Tribunal of this King of Shadows; the reſt, as well as the Houſe, is for lodging, boarding, and buying ſome Employment in the other World. They ſhut all theſe little Boxes with Padlocks of Paper, and then lock the Doors of the Paper-houſe, keeping the Keys with great Care.

When the Perſon, who has been at this Expence, happens to die, they firſt burn the Houſe, in a very ſerious Manner: Then they burn the Keys both of it and the little Cheſts, that ſhe may be able to open them and take out the Gold and Silver, which is to be no longer mere Paper, but will be tranſmuted into fine Silver and Gold, againſt which tempting Metal Yen vang is not Proof, nothing being more eaſy than to corrupt (B) him.

Hope and outward Shew the Baſis of alſe Religions.

This Hope, joined to that outward Show which attracts the Eyes, makes ſuch an Impreſſion upon the Minds of theſe poor Chineſe, that nothing but an extraordinary Miracle of Grace can undeceive them (c). In a Word, this Exerciſe of Religion is perfectly free, for they celebrate the Feaſts whenever they pleaſe; and you are ſure always to have good Words from theſe Jugglers, who promiſe you long Life, great Honours for your Children, Abundance of Riches in this World, and above all Things conſummate Happineſs in the next. Such are the Extravagancies with which they abuſe the Credulity of the People: Whereby they have acquired ſo great an Aſcendant over their Minds that Images are every where to be met with, which the blind Chineſe invoke inceſſantly; eſpecially in Times of Sickneſs, when they are to go any Journey, or when they are in (D) Danger.

Superſtitious Ceremonies for appeaſing Storms at Sea.

P. Fontaney in his Voyage from Siam to China, in a Chineſe Veſſel, was an Eye-witneſs of all their Ceremonies, which are no leſs ridiculous than ſuperſtitious. They had, ſays he, on the Poop of their Veſſel, a ſmall Image quite black with the Smoak of a Lamp, which burns continually in Honour of it (E); before they ſat down to Dinner, they offered it ſome of the Victuals; and twice a Day they threw into the Sea little Gondolas made of Paper, to the End, that being employed in overſetting thoſe ſmall Boats, he might ſpare their own.

But if, notwithſtanding theſe Preſents and Offerings, the Waves are agitated in an extraordinary manner by the Spirit which as they believe governs them, they then burn a great many Feathers, whoſe Smoak and bad Smell infect the Air; pretending by this means to lay the Tempeſt, and to drive the evil Demon far enough off: But at the Sight of a Mountain, in paſſing the Channel of Cochin-china, where they have built an Idol-temple, they out-did themſelves in their Superſtitions.

A Naval Proceſſion.

After they had offered Victuals, burnt Perfumes, lighted Wax-candles, thrown ſeveral Figures of gilt Paper into the Sea, and proſtrated themſelves an infinite Number of times (F), the Sailors prepared a ſmall Veſſel made of Boards, about four Foot long, with Maſts, Shrouds, Sails, Streamers, Compaſs, Rudder, Boat, Cannons, Proviſions, Merchandiſes, and every thing even to the Book of Accompts. They had diſpoſed upon the Quarter-Deck, the Forecaſtle, and the Shrouds, as many ſmall Figures of painted Paper as there were Men in the Veſſel: They put this Machine upon a Raft, and lifting it up in a great deal of Form, carried it about the Veſſel with the Sound of a Drum and Copper-Baſon; the Proceſſion being led by a Sailor habited like a Bonza, who fenced with a long Staff, and ſhouted as loud as poſſible: Then they let it down ſlowly into the Sea, and followed it with their Eyes till it was out of Sight, while the Sham Bonza going to the higheſt Part of the Stern continued his Shouts, and wiſhed it a happy (G) Voyage.

(A) This, with Merits above mentioned, anſwers to the imaginary Treaſure of the Romiſh Church.

(B) This ſtands in Place of Indulgences for delivering out the Treaſure of the Church, and of Maſſes for the Dead. This is their Trick for getting Money, under Pretence of delivering the Souls from Purgatory. The Cheats of the Bonzas you ſee are exactly the ſame at Bottom, and all directed to the ſame Ends as thoſe of the Romiſh Church; from which they differ only in the Contrivance and Manner of carrying them on.

(C) This is the very Caſe of the Romiſh Laity, who are as it were inchanted, by the great Security and Hope given them by their Religion, which likewiſe is calculated by its exterior Pomp to dazzle the Eyes, and work on the Affections inſtead of the Underſtandings of its Votaries. So that as the ſame Cauſes produce the ſame Effects, the Romiſh Miſſionaries muſt expect the ſame Infatuation and Obduracy from the Chineſe Laity of the Sect of Fo, that the Proteſtant Divines experience from the Romiſh Laity, who are, generally ſpeaking, no leſs ignorant and bigotted in their Way than the Followers of Fo.

(D) This anſwers to the Papiſts aſcribing the Power of Protection and healing Diſeaſes to their Saints; whom they invoke for that Purpoſe, commonly at their Shrines, or before their Images in Romiſh Countries.

(E) Obſerve the Folly and Malice of theſe Miſſionaries, who cannot let ſo ſtifling a Circumſtance paſs them, as the Blackneſs of the Image, altho' they know it cannot be blacker than the Face of the Lady of Loretta herſelf, occaſioned by the very ſame Cauſe.

(F) The Parallel holds in almoſt every thing; this is like the Papiſts praying to their Saints, and throwing Reliques into the Sea to appeaſe a Storm.

(G) This reſembles the Racket made on Board a Portugueſe Ship in a Storm, with their Patron St. Anthony; whom they whip and throw into the Sea, if at length he does not become propitious. But it ſeems the Bonzas have more Reſpect for their Saints than to treat them in ſo ſcurvy a Manner.

As

Religious Assemblies of Men.

As there are Assemblies of Women where the Bonzas preside, there are likewise Assemblies of Men, which they call Chang chay or Fasters: Every Assembly has its Superior, who is as it were Master of the rest, and has under him a great Number of Disciples called Fû ti, to whom they give the Name of Tsë fû, which signifies Doctor-Father.

When they are industrious, and have gained any Reputation, they easily obtain this Office. They preserve in a Family some old Manuscript, handed down from Father to Son for several Generations: This Book is full of impious Prayers which no-body understands (A), and none but the Head of the Family can repeat. Sometimes these Prayers are followed with surprizing Effects; nor needs there any thing more to raise a Man to the Quality of Tsë fû, and gain a great Number of Disciples.

Luxurious Fasting.

The Days on which the Assembles are held all the Disciples have Notice to appear, and no Person dares stay away. The Superior being seated at the lower end of the Hall, towards the Middle, they all prostrate themselves before him, and then form two Ranks; one to the right, and the other to the left. When the Time is come, they recite these unintelligible and impious Prayers; after which they place themselves at the Table, and plunge themselves into all manner of Access: For nothing can be more pleasant than these Chinese Fasters. To say the Truth, they refrain all their Life-time from the Use of Flesh, Fish, Wine, Onions, Garlic, and every thing that heats the Blood; but they know how to make themselves amends with other Provisions, and especially by the Liberty of eating as often as they (B) please.

Fasting a rare Trick to get Money,

We are not to suppose that this Sort of Abstinence is any great Trouble to a Chinese; for there are great Numbers who do not profess the Art of Fasting, and yet are contented with Rice and Herbs for their Food, as not being able to purchase Flesh (C): Nor is it any Surprise that the Professors of this Sect should be so very strict with Respect to their Abstinence that nothing can prevail on them to break it, for it is an easy Trade to them, by which they gain considerable Revenues.

And a Cloak for all Vices

When once they have obtained the Degree of Tsë fû, and gained a great Number of Disciples, the Contribution which each of them is obliged to pay on the Days of Meeting, amounts to a considerable Sum in a Year. Besides the Practice of Fasting, is an excellent Device for covering all the Irregularities of an infamous and libertine Life, and for acquiring a Reputation of Sanctity at a very small (D) Expence.

Bonzas Arts to keep their Followers staunch.

In short, there are no Stratagems nor ridiculous Inventions which these Ministers of Satan have not recourse to, in order to keep their Followers staunch in their Devotion to the God Fo, and to alienate them from the Preachers of the Gospel (E). One while they persuade them, that the Missionaries seek only to strengthen themselves by the Number of their Disciples, in order to execute Designs destructive to the State; that they gain their Disciples by Help of Money, and that they never want Money, as having the Art of counterfeiting it. Sometimes they make them believe, that the Missionaries pluck out the Eyes of their Proselites to make Telescopes of, for observing the Stars; at other times, they pretend that their Design in coming to China is to make Converts, which are scarce in Europe; that when once a Person who has gone over to them comes to die, there is no escaping out of their Hands; and that by means of certain Charms which they cast upon Souls, they force them to pass over into Europe: Behold, say they, what Dangers we are exposed to from them.

These Extravagancies pronounced with an Air of Confidence and Authority do not fail to impose on credulous Minds. However it must be confessed, they do not make much Impression on the better Sort (F): For, notwithstanding the sanctified Looks which the Bonzas put on, they are known for the most Part to lead debauched Lives; nor have they much Access to a certain sort of People, who think of nothing but indulging themselves, and whose Religion consists only in odd Superstitions, which every one follows according to his Fancy.

Interior Doctrine of Fo.

But be this as it will, what has been mentioned hitherto relates only to the exterior Doctrine of Fo, accommodated to the Artifices which the Bonzas have contrived to impose on the Credulity of the People (G). As to the interior Doctrine, every one is not capable of comprehending its Mysteries,

(A) How then does he know they are impious? What Absurdities Malice betrays him into.

(B) This looks invidious, and is only a bare Assertion of an Enemy. But supposing it fact, it is no more than what is practiced by the Romish Priests themselves as well as the Laity; who regale themselves on fasting Days with the most delicious Things they are allowed to eat, besides drinking Wine and other heating Liquors, which the Bonzas abstain from

(C) This is a paultry way of running down the Bonzian Fasting; for is it not the Case of the poor and ordinary sort of People in Popish Countries, especially Spain, Portugal, &c?

(D) I cannot but admire the Weakness of the Author in making these Discoveries and using Arguments, which not only may be turned on the Priests of his Religion, but have actually often been retorted on them by Protestant Divines. All that can be sayed, is, that he writes not for Protestants, but for Popish Bigots, who never make Use of their Senses.

(E) Is not this the very Practice of the Popish Clergy themselves? Don't they for this End keep the Bible out of the Hands of the Laity, persuade them that all are damned but those of their own Communion, and that Protestants allow Salvation in their Church; forbid them to read Protestant Books, or hear their Arguments, and tell a thousand monstrous and ridiculous lies to inspire them with Hatred to their Persons as well as their Religion? The Motive to all this on both Sides, is the Fear of losing their Wealth and Power. But the greatest Security the Bonzas can have against the Progress of Popery among them, is the great Conformity between the two Religions: For by the Change, their Followers see they will be just in the same Condition they were before; there being nothing of Novelty to induce them, excepting what arises from the Difference of a few Forms. Besides, they must naturally have a greater Respect for the Saints, Images, and Ceremonies of their own, than those of a foreign Manufacture.

(F) Nor do the Romish Absurdities and Superstitions gain Credit with the better Sort; but such are called Heretics, and treated as Malefactors (by the sanctified Clergy of that Church) if they dare speak their Minds.

(G) On the whole, (not withstanding the Account here given, is very imperfect, and otherways disguised by the Author, or those who have sent him the Memoirs) this exterior Doctrine improved by the imposing Bonzas is manifestly so like Christianity, as metamorphosed and cooked up by the Romish Clergy, that I cannot but think one of them is copied from the other. The Jesuits indeed sensible of the Conformity, and not able to disguise it sufficiently, would have it thought to be a Corruption of Christianity, which they suggest once prevailed in Tibet, and other Parts whence the Bonzas came: But as it appears by their own Account, from the Chinese History, that the Religion of Fo was in those Countries a thousand Years before Christ, it may well be presumed they think the contrary, and that their own Religion was taken from thence, in all the similar Articles

Myſteries, not only the common People, but the Generality of the Bonzas themſelves, being too ſtupid to partake thereof; for thoſe who are initiated, muſt have a ſublime Genius fit for attaining the higheſt Perfection.

This interior Doctrine, which the Maſters of the Sect pretend to be the only true, and ſolid one, is the ſame that was taught by Fo in the laſt Moments of his Life, and which his Diſciples, in whom he moſt confided, have taken care to explain and propagate. We need only mention this ridiculous Syſtem, to ſhew what Exceſs of Folly and Extravagance Mankind is capable of running into.

Reckon'd the only true Doctrine

They teach that a Vacuum, or Nothing, is the Beginning and End of all Things; that from Nothing our firſt Parents had their Original, and to Nothing they returned after their Death; that the Vacuum is what conſtitutes our Being and Subſtance; that from this Nothing, and the Mixture of the Elements, all Things were produced, and to them ſhall return; that all Beings differ from one another only by their Shape and Qualities, in the ſame Manner as Snow, Ice, and Hail differ from each other; or as a Man, a Lion, or ſome other Creature made of the ſame Metal, differ from each other, which being melted down, loſe their Shape and Qualities, but remain the ſame as to Subſtance.

Nothing the begining and end of all things.

But one Subſtance in the World.

Thus, ſay they, all Beings, as well animate as inanimate, tho' differing in their Form and Qualities, are only the ſame Thing flowing from the ſame Principle. This Principle is a moſt admirable Thing, exceeding pure, entirely free from Alteration, very fine, ſimple, and by its Simplicity, is the Perfection of all Beings: In ſhort, it is very perfect, and conſtantly at reſt, without either Energy, Power, or Underſtanding; nay more, its Eſſence conſiſts in being void of Underſtanding, Action, or Deſires. In order to live happy, we muſt continually ſtrive by Meditation, and frequent Victories over our ſelves, to become like this Principle, and to this Purpoſe muſt accuſtom ourſelves to do nothing, to wiſh for nothing, to be ſenſible of nothing, and to think of nothing. Vices, or Virtues, Rewards or Puniſhments, Providence and the Immortality of the Soul are quite out of the Queſtion; all Holineſs conſiſts in ceaſing to be, and in being ſwallowed by Nothing. The nearer one approaches to the Nature of a Stone, or the Trunk of a Tree, the more perfect he is; in ſhort, it is in Indolence and Inactivity, in a Ceſſation of all Deſires, in a Privation of every Motion of the Body, in an Annihilation of all the Faculties of the Soul, and in the general Suſpenſion of all Thought, that Virtue and Happineſs conſiſt. When a Man has once attained this bleſſed State, all his Viciſſitudes and Tranſmigrations being at an end, he has nothing to fear afterwards, becauſe properly ſpeaking he is nothing; or if he is any thing, he is happy, and to ſay every thing in one Word, he is perfectly like the God Fo.

The firſt Principle void of Underſtanding.

Stupidity the greateſt Perfection.

This Doctrine is not without its Followers even at Court, where ſome Grandees embraced it: The Emperor Kau tſong was ſo bewitched with it, that he reſigned the Empire to his adopted Son, that he might give himſelf up entirely to theſe ſtupid and ſenſeleſs Meditations.

This Doctrine eſpouſed by Emperors

However, the greater Part of the Literati have oppoſed this Sect of the falſe Contemplatiſts, and among others a famous Ko lau, Pwey ghey, a Diſciple of Confuçius. They attacked it with all their Might, proving that this Apathy, or rather this monſtrous Stupidity, of neither doing nor thinking of any thing, overturned all Morality and civil Society; that Man is ſuperior to other Beings, only in that he thinks, reaſons, applies himſelf to the Knowledge of Virtue, and practiſes it; that to aſpire after this fooliſh Inactivity, is renouncing the moſt eſſential Duties, and aboliſhing the neceſſary Relation of Father and Son, Huſband and Wife, Prince and Subject; that in ſhort if this Doctrine was followed, it would reduce all the Members of a State to a Condition much inferior to that of Beaſts.

Is oppoſed by moſt of the Literati.

Thus China is become a Prey to all Sorts of ridiculous and extravagant Opinions: And tho' the Literati oppoſe the above-mentioned Sects, and treat them as Hereſies, altho' they have often inclined the Court to extirpate them throughout the Empire, yet they have hitherto been tollerated, either thro' Fear of exciting Commotions among the Commonality, who are ſtrangely addicted to Images, or becauſe they have had ſecret Favourers and Protectors among the Literati themſelves; many of whom being ſprung from the Dregs of the People, with Difficulty quit the Superſtitions wherein they were brought up: So that all they ever do, is to condemn them in general as Hereſies, which is put in Practice every Year at Pe king.

But embraced by the Weak or intereſted part of them.

It is this monſtrous Heap of Superſtitions, Magic, Idolatry and Atheiſm, that, having very early infected the Minds of many of the Literati, has ſpawned a Sect which ſerves inſtead of Religion or Philoſophy: For we cannot tell what to make of it, and it is well if they can themſelves.

Of the Sect of certain Literati of theſe later Times.

THE modern Doctors, who are Authors of a new Doctrine, by which they pretend to clear up whatever is obſcure in the ancient Books, appeared under the nineteenth Family, or that of the Song, above a thouſand Years after Idolatry had been brought into China. The Troubles that the different Sects, and the Wars cauſed in the Empire, entirely baniſhed from it the Love of the Sciences, and introduced Ignorance and Corruption of Manners, which prevailed there for many Ages.

Sect of certain modern Literati.

There were then not any Doctors capable of rouſing Men's Minds from ſo general a Lethargy; but the Taſte which the Imperial Family of the Song had for the ancient Books, and their Effects of Ignorance.

Eſteem for Perſons of Learning reviving by little and little an Emulation for Literature, There aroſe among the principal Mandarins, Men of Genius and Merit, who undertook to explain not only the ancient Canonical Books, but the Interpretation made thereon by Confuçius, his Diſciple Mençius, and other celebrated Writers.

Interpreters of the ancient Books.

Theſe Interpreters, who gained a great Reputation, appeared about the Year of Chriſt 1070: The moſt famous were Chu tſe and Ching tſe, who publiſhed their Works under the Reign of the ſixth Prince of the Song; Chu hi diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo greatly by his Capacity, that they honoured him with the Name of Prince of the Literati. Tho' theſe Authors have been in vogue for theſe 5 or 600 Years paſt, yet they are ſtill look'd upon as modern, eſpecially when compared with the ancient Interpreters, who lived fifteen Ages before them.

Ancient Doctrine reduced into a Body.

In a Word, about the Year of our Lord, 1400, Yong lo, third Emperor of the 21ſt Race, or Tay ming Family, made Choice of forty two of the moſt able Doctors, whom he commanded to reduce the Doctrine, fit for the Learned to follow, into one Body; and to adhere chiefly to the Commentaries of Chu tſe and Ching tſe, who flouriſhed under the Song.

But corrupted by the Compilers.

Theſe Mandarins applied themſelves to this Work; and beſides interpreting the Canonical Books with thoſe of Confuçius and Mençius, they compoſed another containing twenty Volumes, and gave it the Title of Sing li ta tſwen, that is, Of Nature, or Natural Philoſophy. They followed, according to their Orders, the Doctrines of the two Writers above-mentioned, who lived but three Ages before; and that they might not ſeem to deviate from the Senſe and Doctrine of the ancient Books which are ſo much eſteemed in the Empire, they endeavoured by falſe Interpretations, and wreſting the Meaning, to make them ſpeak their own Sentiments.

The Authority of the Emperor, the Reputation of thoſe Mandarins, their ingenious and polite Style, the new Method of handling the Subject, with their Vaunts of underſtanding the ancient Books, gave a Reputation to their Works, and many of the Literati were deluded thereby.

Their method of proceeding.

Theſe new Doctors pretended, that what they taught was founded on the I king, the moſt ancient of the Chineſe Books: But their Explanations were very obſcure, and full of equivocal Expreſſions as well as Contradictions. They made Uſe of certain Terms, aiming to have it thought they ſtill retained the old Doctrines, and yet in reality advancing a new Doctrine; ſeeming to ſpeak like the Ancients with Relation to the Object of the primitive Worſhip, and at the ſame time giving to thoſe Words ſuch an impious Senſe as deſtroys all ſort of Worſhip. The following is a Sketch of their Syſtem, which is hard to make Senſe of, and perhaps the Inventors did not well underſtand it themſelves.

Call the firſt principle Tay ki.

They gave the firſt Principle of all Things, the Name of Tay ki; and as this Name, by the Confeſſion of Chu tſe himſelf whom they follow in their Syſtem, was known neither to Fo hi, the Author of the I king and Founder of the Monarchy, nor to Ven vang, or Chew kong his Son, its Interpreters, (who lived but 1700 Years after Fo hi according to the Opinion of many Chineſe) they build on the Authority of Confuçius.

Nevertheleſs P. Couplet, who was well verſed in the Books of the Chineſe, informs us that Prince of Philoſophers mentions it but once; and that only in a ſhort Appendix at the End of his Book, containing his Expoſition of the I king, where he ſays: That the Tranſmutation contains the Tay ki, and that the latter produce two Qualities, the Perfect and the Imperfect; that theſe two Qualities produce four Images; and that theſe four Images produce eight Figures.

Excepting this ſingle Text, there is not a Word of the Tay ki, either in the five Canonical Books called U king(*), or in the four others of Confuçius and Mençius; ſo that the 42 Doctors ſay, they are beholden to the two Expoſitors who wrote under the Family of the Song, for having diſcovered this profound and hidden Doctrine, which was unknown to all Antiquity.

What this Tay ki is.

Altho' they ſay, this Tay ki is ſomething not to be expreſſed, that it is impoſſible to explain it, that it is ſeperated from Imperfections and Matter, and that one cannot find a Name ſuitable to it, yet they endeavour to give ſuch an Idea of it, as may authoriſe their Opinion. And as theſe two Words Tay ki, ſignifies Great Pole, or the Ridge of a Houſe, they ſay, it is with reſpect to other Beings, what the Ridge is with reſpect to an Edifice; that it ſerves to unite together and preſerve all the Parts of the Univerſe, juſt as the Ridge unites and ſupports all the Parts which compoſe the Roof of a Houſe.

They compare it alſo to the Root of a Tree, and Axel-tree of a Waggon; they call it the Pivot on which the whole turns; the Baſis, the Pillar, and the Foundation of all Things. It is not, ſay they, a chimerical Being like the Vacuum of the Bonzas, but it is a real Being which had Exiſtence before all Things, and yet is not diſtinguiſhable from them: For it is the ſame thing with the Perfect and the Imperfect, the Heaven, the Earth, and the five Elements, inſomuch that every thing may in ſome Senſe be called Tay ki.

A being immovable and ignorant of its own Operations.

They ſay likewiſe, that it ought to be conſidered as a thing immoveable and at reſt; when it moves, it produces Yang, which is a perfect ſubtile active Matter, and in continual Motion; when at reſt, it produces In, a groſs imperfect Matter, and without Motion: This is not unlike a Man who keeps himſelf at Reſt, while he profoundly meditates upon a Subject, and proceeds from Reſt to Motion when he has inveſtigated what he meditated upon. From the Mixture of theſe two Sorts of Matter, ariſe the five Elements, which by their Union and Temperament form the Univerſe, and the Difference that is found among Bodies: Hence ariſe the continual Viciſſitudes of the ſeveral Parts of the Univerſe, the Motion of the Stars, and the Immobility of the Earth, with the Fruitfulneſs or Sterility of the Plains. They add, that this Matter, or rather this Virtue diffuſed thro' Matter, produces, diſpoſes in proper Order, and preſerves all Parts of the Univerſe; That it is the Cauſe of all the Changes, and yet is ignorant of its own regular Operations.

However,

(*) U ſignifies five, King ſtands for the Canonical Book.

However, nothing is more ſurprizing than to read of the Perfections that theſe modern Commentators attribute to their Tay ki: They give it infinite Extenſion and Immenſity; it is, ſay they, a moſt pure and perfect Principle, without either Beginning or End; it is the Idea, the Model, and the Source of all Things, and the Eſſence of all other Beings: In ſhort, in other Places, they conſider it as an animated Being, and give it the Name of Soul and Spirit; they even ſpeak as if they looked upon it as the ſupreme Underſtanding which produced all Things, Did they not diſagree with themſelves, and in endeavouring to reconcile their Syſtem with the ancient Books, fall into the moſt manifeſt Contradictions. Some Paſſages alſo of their Books, have induced the Chineſe to raiſe Temples to Tay ki.

Yet infinite, perfect eternal, and intelligent.

To the ſame Being which they call Tay ki, they likewiſe give the Name of Li: Tis this, ſay they farther, which joined to Matter is the Compoſition of all natural Bodies, which conſtitutes each particular Being, and diſtinguiſhes it from all others. Their Method of reaſoning is as follows: You make out of a Piece of Wood a Stool or a Table; but the Li gives the Wood the Form of the Table or Stool, and when they are broken, the Li of neither ſubſiſts any longer.

In what ſenſe called Li.

They reaſon the ſame way with Reſpect to Morality: They call Li that which eſtabliſhes the reciprocal Duty between the Prince and Subject, Father and Son, Huſband and Wife; they give likewiſe the Name of Li to the Soul, becauſe it informs the Body; and when it ceaſes to inform it, the Li is ſaid to be deſtroyed; in the ſame Manner, ſay they, as frozen Water diſſolved by Heat, loſes the Li whereby it became Ice, and reaſumes its Fluidity and natural Being.

In ſhort, when they have diſputed in this perplexed and ſcarce intelligible Manner concerning the Nature of the Tay ki and Li, they neceſſarily fall into Atheiſm; in as much as they exclude every efficient ſupernatural Cauſe, and admit no other Principle than an inanimate Virtue united to Matter, to which they give the Name of Li or Tay ki.

But they find themſelves moſt embaraſſed, when they attempt to elude the numerous Paſſages in the ancient Books, which ſpeak diſtinctly of Spirits, of Juſtice, of the Providence of a Supreme Being, and the Knowledge which he has of the Secrets of Men's Hearts, &c. likewiſe when they endeavour to reconcile them to their own groſs Conceptions, they inevitably fall into freſh Contradictions, deſtroy in one Place what they eſtabliſh in another, of which I ſhall produce a few Inſtances.

They endeavour to elude the ancient Doctrines.

They teach diſtinctly that the Soul, by the Empire which it has over its Motions and Affections, may come to the Knowledge of the Supreme Soul, that Underſtanding which governs all Things; that likewiſe, the bare Conſideration of that wonderful Manner by which the ſeveral Beings propagate themſelves, each Species producing its Likeneſs, proves evidently that there is one great intelligent Being, which preſerves, governs, and conducts all Things to their proper Ends in the moſt convenient Manner: They go ſo far, as to deny this Being to be either inanimate or material; they even affirm that it is a Spirit, that it contains the Excellence of all other Beings, and gives Being to every thing which ſubſiſts.

It is no Wonder theſe modern Commentators ſhould torture their Wits to make their Opinions agree with the ancient Books, ſince the Principles which they admit were unknown to the ancient Chineſe.

I have already obſerved, that their Tay ki is to be found neither in the I king, which conſiſts ſoly of a Table of 64 Figures, compoſed out of 84 Lines, ſome intire, ſome broken; nor in the Interpretations made of them 1700 Years after Fo hi; nor in the Shu king, and the other Claſſical Books. In ſhort, it occurs only, and that but once in a brief Appendix which Confucius has added to his Expoſitions of the I king. As for the Li, it is no where ſpoken of in the Senſe given it by theſe new Commentators.

The Tay ki and Li new Inventions.

We ſee then the famous Tay ki has been hatched about 3000 Years after Fo hi, and 1600 after Confucius, who mentions it but once, and, as the moſt ſkilful Expoſitors affirm, meant nothing elſe by it than the firſt Matter.

However it muſt be allowed, that theſe Commentators have done a Service to the Empire in reviving a Taſte for the ancient Books: But then they have done a World of Miſchief to a great Number of the middling ſort of Literati, who minding leſs to dive into the Meaning of thoſe precious Monuments themſelves, than to fill their Heads with the Notions of the new Commentators, ſeem to have embraced a kind of Atheiſm; to which they were before not a little byaſſed, as well by the Depravation of their Morals, as by the Superſtitions wherein they were bred from their Infancy.

Many Literati infected with them,

However, if we may credit the Teſtimonies of a great Number of Miſſionaries, who have ſpent the chief Part of their Lives in the Empire, and gained an exact Knowledge of the Chineſe Affairs, as well by ſtudying their Books, as converſing with the moſt eminent Literati, The truely Learned have not given into theſe mad Notions; but without regarding the extravagant Opinions of modern Commentators, adhere ſtrictly to the Text of the ancient Books, according to a Maxim common among them: Sin king pû Sin chwen, that is, adhere to the Text, and never mind the (A) Commentary.

But not the more learned Sort.

In effect, it is to the Text and not the Gloſs, that all the Literati have right to appeal: In the Text alone, the Chineſe Doctrine is marked and fixed, and every thing which the modern Expoſiters have advanced is without Authority, ſo long as it appears to be repugnant to the Claſſic Books. Theſe truely Learned adhering ſoly to the Text of theſe Books, have the ſame Idea of the Supreme Being as the ancient Chineſe, and like them underſtand by the Words (B) Shang ti and Tyen

The Text not, the Expoſition, of Authority.

(A) This is the Proteſtant Rule alſo: But the Popiſh Clergy ſay to their People, adhere to the Interpretations of the Church, and never mind the Scripture or Text.

(B) Obſerve that it is not the truely Learned, but the Smatterers and Ignorant who fall into Errors.

Tyen (A), not the visible and material Heaven, or a celestial Virtue inanimate and destitute of Understanding, but the first Being, the Author and Principle of all other Beings, the Supreme Lord who disposes of all, who governs all, who enters into the Secrets of the Heart, and from whom nothing is hidden; who punishes Vice, and rewards Virtue, who exalts and casts down at his Pleasure, who ought to be honoured by the Practice of Virtue, &c.

Thus nothing is more common than to hear these Literati complain that the Innocence, Candor, and Simplicity of the primitive Ages is intirely forgotten; that the Learned neglect the ancient Monuments; that many of them are the Disciples of Confucius only in Name; and have no other View but to attain Employments and Dignities, and gain a Reputation by blinding the Eyes of the People with their vain Eloquence.

Mistake of several Missionaries.

Nevertheless as there are Literati, who, by following the modern Commentators and explaining every thing by natural Causes, give way to Atheism and acknowledge no other first Principle than a blind and material Celestial Virtue, the Missionaries newly come to China, were induced to believe it was the common Opinion of the Learned. They agreed however that if the Emperor should explain the true Signification of the Words Tyen and Shang ti, by declaring that he understands by those Words, the Lord of Heaven, and not the material Heaven, their Doubts would vanish, and they would not wrong the Learned of that great Empire so much as to consider them as real Atheists. It is absolutely necessary that the Emperor should speak, says Mr. MAIGROT, the Emperor must explain it. They knew that the late Emperor Kang hi was well versed in the Chinese Books; that it belonged to him as Emperor to examine the Doctors; that he was the Head of the Religion and Doctrine of the Literati; that it was he who judged Sovereignly of the true Sense of the Laws, Ceremonies and Customs, in Quality of High Priest, Legislator, and Master of the Empire.

Emperor Kang hi's Explanation of Shang ti and Tyen.

They therefore resolved in 1700 to consult that Prince, in such a Manner, that he should not perceive their Drift in applying to him for his Explanation. Whereupon he declared by an Edict which was preserved in the Archives, inserted in the public Gazets, and spread all over the Empire: That it was not to the visible and material Heaven that Sacrifices were offered, but only to the Lord and Master of Heaven, the Earth, and all Things; and that for the same Reason, the Tablet before which those Sacrifices were offered, bear this Inscription, to Shang ti, that is to say, to the Supreme Lord; that it is thro' Respect, that none dare call him by his proper Name; and that they use to invoke him by the Name of Supreme Heaven, Bountiful Heaven, and Universal Heaven; in the same Manner as when they speak with Reverence of the Emperor, they call him not by his own Name but say, the Steps of his Throne, the Supreme Court of his Palace; that these Names, tho' different as to the Terms, are yet the same, if Regard be had to the Signification. On another Occasion speaking in Public, he affirms, the learned Chinese say, like him, that the Principle of all Things is called Tyen, Heaven, in a noble and figurative Stile, just as the Emperor is called Chau ting from the Name of his Palace, which is the Place wherein the Imperial Majesty shines with greatest Splendor.

They consulted likewise the Princes, the Grandees of the Empire, the chief Mandarins and principal Literati, and among others, the first President of the imperial Academy, composed of the the moſt eminent Doctors, who are properly the Emperor's Literati. All appeared ſurprized to find there ſhould be learned Men in Europe who believed that the Literati of China honoured a lifeleſs inanimate Being, ſuch as the viſible and material Heaven; and unanimouſly declared that in invoking Tyen or Shang ti, they invoked the Supreme Lord of Heaven, the Author and Principle of all Things, the Diſtributer of all Good, who ſees every thing, who knows every thing, and whoſe Wiſdom and Providence governs this Univerſe. What! cried ſome of them, do we think that every Family ought to have a Head, every City a Governor, every Province a Viceroy, and the whole Empire an independent abſolute Maſter, and can we doubt that there is a firſt Intelligence, a Supreme Being, a Sovereign Lord of the Univerſe, who governs with Wiſdom and Juſtice? Do not our ancient Books teach us this? And have we not learned it from our primitive Sages? Sentiments of the Literati thereon;

We may alſo know the Sentiments of the ſame Emperor by the three Inſcriptions (*), which he wrote with his own Hand, and gave the Jeſuits of Pe king for the Church which they built near the Gate Shun chi mwen, and towards which in the Year 1705, he contributed by a Preſent of 10,000 Ounces of Silver. The Characters of the Inſcription of the Frontiſpiece are two Chineſe (†) Foot and a half high: Thoſe of the Inſcriptions on each Column are near one Foot high. Yong ching, who ſucceeded his Father Kang hi, had the ſame Idea of Tyen, with him and the Learned of his Empire; as appears from the Manner wherein he ſpeaks in an Edict, publiſhed on the following Occaſion. And of the Emperor Yong ching;

This Prince, always attentive to the Neceſſities of his People, being informed that the dryneſs of the Seaſon threatened one of his Provinces with a general Dearth, he immediately ſhut himſelf up in his Palace, faſted and prayed till he underſtood that Plenty of Rain had fallen; after which he publiſhed the above-mentioned Edict, wherein, teſtifying how much he was touched with the Miſeries of his People, he ordered all the great Mandarins to inform him carefully whenever any Calamity afflicted their reſpective Diſtricts, concluding with theſe Words: There is between Tyen and Mankind an Intercourſe of Faults and Puniſhments, of Prayers and Benefits. Do your Duty, and avoid committing Faults: For it is for your Sins that Tyen puniſhes us. When Tyen ſends any Calamity let us watch over ourſelves, mortify ourſelves, correct ourſelves and pray: 'Tis by praying and correcting ourſelves that we molify Tyen. I do not publiſh this Order as though I thought myſelf capable of moving Heaven, but I do it the better to perſuade you that there is the Intercourſe I have mentioned between Tyen and Men of Faults and Puniſhments, of Prayers and Benefits. Expreſſed in his Edict,

But he explains himſelf ſtill more clearly in an Inſtruction which he gives his People, on Occaſion of a Requeſt preſented him by one of the firſt Officers of the Empire. A Superintendant of two Provinces wrote to the Emperor, that in all Places where Temples had been erected in Honour of the General of the Army Lyew mong, neither the Graſhoppers nor Worms did any Damage to the Plains, and that on the contrary the Territories where they had raiſed no Temple to him always ſuffered by their Ravages. Other great Mandarins having propoſed to him ſeveral ſuperſtitious Expedients to obtain Rain or fair Weather in Time of Need, his Majeſty gave the following Inſtruction by way of anſwer, which was publiſhed throughout the Empire, and fixed up in the Cities at the Corners of Streets with the Mandarin's Seal.

" With Regard to my giving Notice to ſome of the principal Officers of the Provinces to pre- And in his " vent the Damage which the Inſects might occaſion in the Plains, they have miſunderſtood the Inſtruction.
" Intention of my Orders, and applied a Meaning which does not belong to them. They very " wrongly imagine that I give into the ridiculous Error of thoſe who put their Confidence in the " Spirits called Quey ſhin, as if I believed that thoſe pretended Spirits could relieve our Afflictions.
" This then is my Meaning:

" There is between Tyen and Mankind, a ſure and infallible Correſpondence as to Rewards and Correſpon-
" Puniſhments, When our Fields are ravaged, either by Inundations, Drought or Inſects, what dence be-
" is the Cauſe of ſuch Calamities? They proceed perhaps from the Emperor himſelf, who and Mankind,
" ſwerves from that Uprightneſs neceſſary for governing well, and conſtrains Tyen to employ thoſe
" Chaſtiſements, in order to oblige him to return to his Duty. Perhaps alſo they are owing to
" this, that the principal Officers of the Province, on which theſe Evils fall, do not ſeek the pub" lic Good, and make Juſtice the Rule of their Conduct. May not theſe Calamities likewiſe
" ariſe from hence, that the Governors of Cities neither act with Equity, nor give the People
" good Examples and Inſtructions; or elſe from hence, that in ſuch a Province or Country they " violate the Laws, deſpiſe the Uſages, and live in Diſorder? Then the Heart of Man being cor" rupted, that excellent Union, which ought to ſubſiſt between Tyen and him, is diſturbed and " broken; in Conſequence whereof Adverſities and Misfortunes pour down upon us in abun" dance. For Men failing of their Duty in this World, Tyen changes the gracious Inclination " which he had towards them.

" Being perſuaded that this Doctine is infallibly true, as ſoon as I am informed that any Pro- Influences
" vince ſuffers, either by a long Drought or exceſſive Rains, I immediately enter into myſelf, ex- the Emperors
" amine carefully my own Conduct, and reſolve to rectify the Diſorders introduced into my Pa- Conduct,
" lace. I remain all the Day long filled with Reſpect and Fear: I ſtudy to render Tyen Marks
" of Uprightneſs and Piety, in hopes that by a regular Courſe of Life I may change the Diſpo-
" ſition which Tyen is in to puniſh us.

" 'Tis your Buſineſs, great Officers who govern the Provinces, 'tis your Buſineſs to ſecond my " Intentions. It belongs to you Governors of Cities, it belongs to you People, Soldiers and " others, of what Quality and Condition ſoever ye be, to acquit yourſelves alſo of this Duty.
" Watch over yourſelves, ſtand in Fear, examine your Condition, labour to perfect yourſelves, (*) See the firſt Plate. Vol. 2. (†) The Chineſe Foot is ſomewhat larger than the Foot of the Chatalet of Paris.

" mutually aſſiſt and exhort one another, reform your Manners, uſe your Endeavours, correct " your Faults, repent of your Sins, follow the Path of Virtue, forſake that of Error, and reſt " aſſured that, if on our Parts we do all our Duties, Tyen will ſuffer himſelf to be molified by " our regular Conduct, and we ſhall draw down upon us his Peace and Protection. Scarcity and " Affliction will diſappear, while Plenty and Joy will ſucceed in their ſtead; and we ſhall have " the Pleaſure of ſeeing that renewed in our Days which was admired heretofore under the " happy Reign of the illuſtrious Prince Ching tang.

Way to avoid Calamities.

" For I cannot too often remind you, that to prevent Calamities, there is no ſurer way than " to watch over yourſelves, to ſtand in Fear, and labour to become perfect; you muſt examine " your Conduct, correct your Faults, ſincerely honour and revere Tyen: For it is by this At- " tention and this Reverence, that you muſt expect to touch and molify him. When we bid " you pray to and invoke the Spirits, what is our Intention thereby? 'Tis no more than to beſpeak " their Mediation, in order to lay before Tyen the Sincerity of our Veneration and Fervency of " our Deſires. To pretend then in any wiſe to rely on thoſe Prayers and Invocations for re- " moving from us Misfortunes and Afflictions ſo long as we neglect to perform our Duty, to " watch over ourſelves, and to keep our Hearts in the Reſpect and Fear proper to move Tyen, is " to expect to meet with Water in the Brook after cloſing up its Spring; it is to quit that which " is eſſential, to follow what is only incidental. How can you by ſuch a Conduct hope to obtain " the Accompliſhment of your Wiſhes?

Man the Author of his own Misfortunes.

" Moreover conſider that Tyen naturally delights to do good, to ſcatter his Favours, preſerve " and protect us. If he makes Uſe of Severity, 'tis the Man who draws it on himſelf. 'Tis he " alone who is the Author of his own Misfortune. And what is moſt deplorable, the common " People who are ignorant and incapable of Reflection, finding themſelves afflicted either with " exceſſive Rain or Drought, inſtead of entering into themſelves, examining their own Conduct " and correcting their wrong Steps, give themſelves over to Grief and Deſpair; and thus adding " Faults to Faults, and Crimes to Crimes, fill up the Meaſure of their own Unhappineſs. For " to proceed in ſuch a manner, is to deſtroy more and more the Union which ought to ſubſiſt " between Tyen and Mankind; it is in ſhort, to conſtrain Tyen to diſcharge upon us his moſt " dreadful Puniſhments. For my Part, I make no doubt, but the Dearth and other Calamities, " which has afflicted us for ſeveral Years paſt, are owing to the Diſorders that I ſpeak of.

" Obſerve then once more what my Opinion is, I am really and entirely perſuaded, that there " is between Tyen and Mankind a reciprocal Union and perfect Correſpondence. I am far from " putting my Faith in thoſe Spirits called Quey ſhin. 'Tis in order to inſtruct you, eſpecially " you the great Officers of the Crown and of the Provinces, that I have not diſdained to take " in Hand the Pen and explain clearly my Opinion, to the end that you may all conform your- " ſelves to my Sentiments, which is the ſole Aim of this Inſtruction."

The Exiſtance of God and his attributes proved from the Claſſical Books.

Several Years ago P. Favre, in a Diſpute which he had in Preſence of 300 Literati, proved from ſeveral Paſſages of the Claſſical Books, the Exiſtence of a God, his Juſtice, Goodneſs, Providence and other Perfections; nor did any of them offer to contradict the Interpretation which he put on their ancient Authors.

A great many Chriſtians, in the Compoſitions which they are obliged to make for obtaining the Degrees, or keeping them when obtained, have followed the ſame Method; and inſtead of incuring the Raillery of the Learned, have met with the Praiſes and Rewards which they deſerved. Shang king, during the Time that he aſpired to his Doctor's Degree, filled the Commentaries which he made on the I king with the like Principles and Maxims, whereby he merited the Approbation of the Learned.

Sect of Literati divided.

From what has been ſaid it appears, that the Sect of the Literati, which is the eſtabliſhed one, may properly be divided into two Claſſes.

Some adhere to the Commentaries,

The firſt are thoſe who, paying little Regard to the Commentaries of the Moderns, ſtick cloſely to the Text of the Claſſical Books, and have the ſame Notion of the Supreme Being the Author of the Univerſe, as the old Chineſe, that is, thoſe who lived between the Time of Fo hi, and the new Commentators.

Others to the Text of the Claſſics.

The ſecond are thoſe who, neglecting the Text, ſeek the Senſe of the ancient Doctrine in the Gloſſes of the new Commentators, and adhereing like them to a new Philoſophy think to gain a Reputation by their confuſed and dark Notions; endeavouring to perſuade People that they are able to explain every thing by material Cauſes: Whereto they attribute not only the Production but alſo the Government of the World, and even their Reaſon, and yet profeſs like the others a profound Veneration for the ancient Doctrine, and call themſelves the Diſciples of Confuçius! But the true Diſciples of Confuçius ſtudy him at the Fountain Head, whereas the others ſeek for his Doctrine only in a ſmall Brook turned out of its true Courſe, and fall it may be without deſign into the moſt frightful Mazes of Atheiſm.

Objections of certain Miſſionaries to theſe Proofs.

However this be, as I here only act the Part of an Hiſtorian in relating the Opinions of a great Number of Miſſionaries who have lived all their Lives in China, I ought not to conceal what ſome others, perſuaded that all the Learned of this Empire are Athieſts, oppoſe to theſe Teſtimonies of the Emperor and the principal Literati.

They ſay then, that the Emperor explained himſelf in that Manner, and the Literati gave their Teſtimonies merely thro' Politeneſs (*) and Complaiſance; that the Emperor's Declaration is conceived

(*) Obſequoſa quadam comitate ad mentem potius interrogantium quam ex propia ſententia reſpondere potuerant. Obſervationes Ep. Con. p. 134. ibid. pp. 123, 124. [It ſeems impoſſible the Emperor ſhould diſſemble in this Manner. Without doubt, conceived in equivocal Terms, and is an ambiguous Oracle; in ſhort that no Atheiſt would refuſe to ſubſcribe his Declaration: For tho' that Prince averred that it was not to the viſible and material Heaven that he offered Sacrifice, but to the Lord and Creator of Heaven and Earth and all Things, he might mean the Root and Origin of all Beings, which is nothing elſe but the Li, or celeſtial Virtue inherent in Matter, which is, according to the Chineſe Athieſts, the Principal of all Things.

Beſides, when we read in their Books, or hear the Chineſe affirm, (*) that Life and Death, Poverty and Riches, and all Events in general depend on Tyen or Heaven; that nothing is done but by his Orders, that he rewards the Good and puniſhes the Wicked, that he cannot be deceived, that he ſees all Things, hears all Things, and knows all Things; that he penetrates the ſecret Receſſes of the Heart, that he aſſiſts and comforts virtuous People; that his Heart is ſoftened at their Calamities, that he is ſenſible of their Complaints, and is molified by their Prayers; that he deteſts the Proud, abhors the Vicious, &c. All theſe Expreſſions, according to them, ought to be looked upon as metaphorical, by which they would have the People underſtand, that all Things happen as if in reality Heaven was an intelligent Being, rewarded Virtue, puniſhed Vice, &c (A).

In ſhort, they pretend, that as the Stoics aſcribed the Variety of Events to fatal Neceſſity, in like manner the Chineſe Literati attribute to Heaven (that is, to a ruling Virtue in Heaven which influences all Things) Good and Evil, Rewards and Puniſhments, the Revolutions of States, and in a word all ſorts of Events whether happy or unhappy that come to paſs in the World; And that it is in this Senſe they underſtand it when they ſay, that Heaven governs the Univerſe, rewards good Men, &c.

A new Sect made out of all the reſt.

Having thus given an Account of the Opinions of ſkilful Perſons, who living among the Chineſe Literati have thoroughly ſtudied the Doctrine of their Sect, as well as the Thoughts of others who cannot pretend to the ſame Advantage how good ſoever their Intentions may be in other Reſpects, I muſt not forget a particular ſort of Literati very numerous in China, who have compoſed a Syſtem of their own from all the different Sects, and have endeavoured to reconcile all together.

Cauſes to which it owe's its riſe.

As the Study of Letters is the Road to the higheſt Dignities, and as it is open to Perſons of all Conditions, there muſt needs be many Literati who being of mean Extraction have been brought up in Idolatry; and when they became Mandarins, either thro' the Prejudice of their Education, or out of a polite Complaiſance to the People and to maintain the public Tranquillity, ſeem to embrace the Opinions of the ſeveral different Sects, to which they are ſo much the rather inclined as the Chineſe of all Ranks ſeldom look farther than the preſent Life. The Mandarins, who are the living Deities of the Country, have generally no other God but their Fortune; and as that is ſubject to ſeveral troubleſome Turns, all their Care is employed to ward off ſuch Misfortunes and to keep themſelves ſafe in their Poſts. The Students, who may be looked upon as the leſſer Nobility, have nothing at Heart but a certain Honour, which conſiſts in ſucceeding in their Examinations and attaining to the higheſt Degree. The Merchants think of nothing from Morning to Night but their Buſineſs; and the reſt of the People are wholly employed in procuring a Livelihood, that is, a ſmall Quantity of Rice and Pulſe: In this Manner is the Time of the Chineſe taken up, who ſcarce ever think of any thing elſe.

Hypocriſy and Weakneſs of ſome Literati.

The Literati, of whom I am ſpeaking, are as forward as the other Literati in declaiming againſt I tû an, that is, falſe Sects; but Experience ſhews that they are as much Slaves to Fo as the Vulgar themſelves. Their Wives, who are ſtrongly attached to Idols, uſually have a kind of Altar in the moſt honourable Part of their Houſes, whereon they place a Company of Images finely gilt; and here, whether out of Complaiſance or otherways, theſe pretended Diſciples of Confuçius often bow the Knee. Tho' any of them ſhould have Conſtancy enough to reſiſt the Torrent, at leaſt he will have much Difficulty to withſtand the imaginary Methods made Uſe of for diſcovering what is to come. When any one of the Family lies a dying, he ſeldom fails to ſend for the Bonzas to burn gilt Papers and perform the other Ceremonies; unleſs he did this, inſtead of paſſing for a Philoſopher, he would be looked on as a very wicked Man.

The extreme Ignorance of the Chineſe greatly contributes to the Readineſs wherewith their Doctors, as well as the Vulgar, give into the moſt ridiculous Superſtitions: But this Ignorance has no Relation to their Skill in carrying on Buſineſs, for herein they generally exceed the Europeans; nor does it reſpect their Laws, for no People in the World have better, or are more eaſily governed; nor yet does it regard one kind of moral Philoſophy, which conſiſts of wiſe Maxims, whereof their Books are full if they would but put them in Practice: But their moſt ſkilful Doctors are ignorant of all other Parts of Philoſophy, excepting a little of the moral; for they know not how to reaſon juſtly on the Effects of Nature, concerning their Souls, or the Supreme Being, with regard to which they ſeldom trouble their Heads; nor do they employ their Thoughts much about a future State, or the Neceſſity of Religion. However, there is no Nation in the World more addicted to ſtudy: But then they ſpend their younger Years in learning to read, and the Remainder of their Years is taken up either in the Duties of their Poſts, or in compoſing elegant academical Diſcourſes.

doubt, the true Followers of Confuçius are free from Athieſm, and perhaps thoſe of the new Sect likewiſe. For thoſe Miſſionaries who condemn the new Sect, may wrong them as much as thoſe who condemn the old. In ſhort, the Diſpute between them in this ſingle Article (one Part affirming one thing, and the other Part affirming directly the contrary) proves what I have already obſerved, that they know not how to repreſent other Religions fairly, and are not much to be regarded in their Cenſures of them.]

(A) The Miſſionaries are ſo addicted themſelves to equivocations and mental Reſervations, that they cannot believe any body ſincere. (*) Ubi Supr. p. 111.

This

The Vulgar aſcribe all natural effects to Demons or Spirits.

This groſs Ignorance of Nature makes great Numbers attribute its moſt common Effects to ſome evil Genius: But this prevails chiefly among the common People, and eſpecially the Women, who endeavour to appeaſe it by impious and ridiculous Ceremonies. Sometimes this evil Genius is one of their Idols, or rather the Demon which inhabits it (A); Sometimes ſome high Mountain or great Tree, or an imaginary Dragon which they ſuppoſe to be in the Sky or at the bottom of the Sea; or elſe, which is ſtill more extravagant, it ſhall be the Quinteſſence of ſome Animal, for inſtance, a Fox, an Ape, a Tortoiſe, a Frog, &c. This is what they call Tſing, or elſe Yau quay, or Quay ſingly, which ſignifies Monſter, or ſome very ſuprizing Thing.

Ridiculous Notions infuſed by their vilainous Prieſts,

They affirm, that theſe Animals after they have lived a long Time have the Power of purifying their Eſſence, and of diveſting themſelves of whatever is groſs and earthly; and this moſt ſubtle Part which remains, delights to diſturb the Imagination of Men and Women. A Fox thus purified is terribly to be fear'd. When they are ſick, and the Fever begins to make them rave, it is undoubtedly the Demon that torments them: Preſently they ſend for the Tau tſe, and it is inconceivable how many jugling Tricks they perform and what Din they make in the Houſe.

It is thus the Demon deludes the People, and even the Smatterers among the Learned: But he makes Uſe chiefly of three Sorts of Inventions, which contribute greatly to keep them in Ignorance.

who propagate fortune-telling,

The firſt is what the Chineſe call Swan ming, that is, telling of Fortunes. The Country is full of thoſe People who calculate Nativities: They are generally blind, and go from Houſe to Houſe, playing on a kind of Theorbo, offering to tell one's Fortune for about a Half-penny. It is ſurprizing to hear the Extravagancies they utter concerning the eight Letters that compoſe the Year, the Day, the Month, and Hour of a Perſon's Birth, which for that Reaſon is called Pa-tſe. They foretel in a general Manner the Misfortunes wherewith you are threatened; they commonly promiſe you Riches and Honours with great Succeſs in Trade or Study; they will acquaint you with the Cauſe of your own Diſtemper, or that of your Children, and the Reaſon of your Father's and Mother's Death, which they always pretend is owing to ſome Image that has been offended and muſt be appeas'd, and a certain Bonza muſt be ſent for, &c. If what they have foretold comes to paſs by mere Chance then the People are confirmed in their Errors; but if their Predictions prove falſe, they are ſatisfied with ſaying: That this Man did not underſtand his Buſineſs, Pû ling.

Drawing of Lots,

The ſecond Thing is drawing the Lots called Pa qua or Ta qua; which is to conſult the Spirits often. There are ſeveral Ways of doing this, but the moſt common is to go before an Image and to burn certain Perfumes, knocking the Forehead ſeveral Times againſt the Ground. There is alſo near the Image a Box full of flat Sticks half a Foot long, inſcribed with Enigmatic Characters which paſs for ſo many Oracles: After making ſeveral Bows they let fall one at a venture, the Senſe of whoſe Characters is explain'd by the Bonza who preſides often at the Ceremony; or elſe they conſult a large Writing which is ſtuck againſt the Wall, whereby they diſcover all the Conjuration. This is what they practiſe when they undertake any Buſineſs or are ſetting out on a Journey, when they are going to ſell or buy any Thing, or are about marrying their Children, and upon a hundred other Occaſions, in order to ſecure a lucky Day and happy Succeſs.

And the Fong ſhwi or lucky Poſition of Houſes, &c.

But the third Contrivance is the moſt ridiculous of all, and what the Chineſe are moſt infatuated with, they call it Fong ſhwi, that is, Wind and Water, by which they mean the happy or unhappy Poſition of a Houſe, and eſpecially of a Burying-place. If by Chance a Neighbour builds a Houſe in a Situation ſo contrary to yours that one of the Corners of his is oppoſite to the Side of yours, it is ſufficient to make you believe that all is loſt; it creates a Hatred that cannot be extinguiſh'd as long as the new Houſe ſtands, and is even Grounds for a Proſecution before the Mandarin. But if this has no Effect, the only Remedy you have left is to ſet up a Dragon, or ſome other Monſter, made of baked Clay, on the middle of your Roof; the Earthen Dragon muſt give a terrible Look towards the fatal Corner, which threatens you and opens a dreadful Mouth, as it were to ſwallow up the evil Fong ſhwi, that is, the bad Air (*), and then you will be a little more ſecure.

Infatuation of a Mandarin.

This was the Method taken by the Governor of Kyen chang to defend himſelf againſt the Jeſuit's Church, which is built upon an Eminence, and overlooks his Palace ſtanding at the Foot of it. He had likewiſe the wiſe Precaution to turn the Apartments thereof a little ſideways; and raiſed about two hundred Paces from the Church a kind of Building or Gatehouſe three Stories high, to ward off the Influence of the Tyen chu tang, or, Church of the Lord of Heaven. By Misfortune this ſecond Gate became the ſuppoſed Cauſe of the ſecond Governor's Death: For this Mandarin having been troubled with a Defluxion of groſs Humours in his Breaſt, and ſpit very white Phlegm, it was taken for granted, that this Houſe of three Stories, whoſe Walls were very white, was the Occaſion of his Diſorder; whereupon they were immediately daubed over with black, in order to produce a contrary Effect: But this Expedient not ſucceeding, they imagined it was apply'd too late, and accordingly the Mandarin dyed. After which, upon a like Conceit, they were whitewaſhed again as at firſt.

(A) This Author makes Uſe of the Words Idol and Demon to delude his Readers, and make them imagin they are different from the Images and Saints of the Church of Rome, tho' they are exactly of the ſame Nature.

(*) By this Word Fong ſhwi, they underſtand not only a corrupt Air which cauſes Diſeaſes, but alſo a kind of Curſe which extends even to Poſterity.

Many

Many other ſuch Chimeras might be related with regard to the Situation of a Houſe, the Place for the Door, with the Day and Manner of building the Stove for dreſſing the Rice: But that wherein the Fong ſhwi triumphs moſt concerns the Sepulchres of the Dead. There are a ſort of Impoſtors who make a Trade of finding out all the Mountains and Hills, which have a lucky Aſpect; and when, after performing a great many jugling Tricks, they have fixed on ſome Place, no Sum of Money is thought too great for the Purchaſe of that happy Piece of Ground.

Chineſe bewitched with the Fong ſhwi.

The Chineſe look upon the Fong ſhwi as a Thing, in ſome Senſe, more precious than Life itſelf, becauſe they are perſwaded that the Happineſs or Unhappineſs of Life depends upon this ridiculous Chimera. In ſhort, if any Perſon has greater Talents and Capacity than others of the ſame Age, if he attains his Doctor's Degree early or is raiſed to a Mandarinat, if he has ſeveral Children, or lives to a good old Age, all this is owing neither to his Wit, Skill, nor Probity, but it is becauſe his Houſe is happily ſituated; it is becauſe the Sepulchre of his Anceſtors has an admirable Fong ſhwi.

Reflections on the Syſtem of the Materialiſts.

But to return to thoſe Literati, who ſeeking to ſtifle in their Minds the Idea of a firſt Intelligence, the Author and Governor of all Things, have Recourſe to Cauſes purely material to explain the Origin of all Beings: The Reader probably will not be diſpleaſed to hear one of theſe Philoſophers reaſoning while he explains his Syſtem concerning the Original of the World, his Phyſics or Doctrine of the Nature of Things, his Plan of Aſtronomy, the Principles of his Mechanics, his Opinion concerning ouls, and his Rules of Morality.

We ſhall ſee that he is equally in the wrong, whether he ſpeaks as a Natural or a Moral Philoſopher: We ſhall ſee how great is the Pride and Blindneſs of theſe imaginary learned Men, who, in the Principles and Concluſions of their Syſtem, agree ſo little among themſelves, who either prove not at all, or in a very bad manner, the Things which ſtand moſt in need of Proof; there being neither Juſtneſs nor Solidity in the Concluſions which they draw from the Principles they lay down.

We ſhall ſee likewiſe that they do not want Subtilty to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe, and with Difficulty admit any thing which is not ſupported by evident Reaſons, while they would be believed upon their own Word, and to elude the Difficulties they are preſs'd with make Uſe of Chicanry ſet off with trifling Eloquence.

Tranſlation of a Treatiſe written by one of them.

A modern Philoſopher named Chin, is the Author of the following Tract, which is written in Form of a Dialogue, and was tranſlated from the Chineſe by P. Dentrecolles. This Dialogue, wherein the Philoſopher explains his Sentiments concerning the Origin and State of the World, is the 12*th* Diſcourſe; for his Work contains ſeveral others on Hiſtorical and Moral Subjects, which have no Relation to this.

A DIALOGUE wherein Chin, a Modern Chineſe Philoſopher, declares his Opinion concerning the Origin and State of the World.

Dialogue. The Introduction.

IN a certain delightful Place, were one beheld as in Perſpective ſeveral fine Country Houſes, a curious green Arbor was formed, in which ſeveral Perſons aſſembled to enjoy the cool Breezes, and converſe together during the Heats of the Summer. Chance having conducted a Stranger thither, they invited him to ſit down; and as they judged him likely to contribute to the Pleaſure of Converſation, they intreated him to ſtay a few Days with them, and gratify the earneſt Deſire they had to hear him Diſcourſe. This he conſented to without any Difficulty, and ſoon drew together a Crowd of Auditors, who were extremely pleaſed with the free and lively Manner in which he handled ſeveral Points of Hiſtory and Morality.

The Fame of theſe Aſſemblies having ſoon reached the adjacent Towns, a learned Man belonging to a neighbouring City, deſirous of aſſiſting at them, came to the Place, where he found a great Number of Perſons together. As he entered the Arbor, one of the Company who perceived him roſe up, and approaching the Stranger who ſat in the Place of Honour: Sir, ſayed he in his Ear, this venerable Perſon juſt come in, is very famous for his profound Erudition, and his Name is Chin vû quey: He is a briſk lively Man, bigotted to his own Opinions, and who in a Diſpute will not ſubmit to the moſt learned Perſons in the Empire; he has ſpent his whole Life in ſtudy, and read all manner of Books; if he once begins to diſcourſe of the Doctrine relating to the Heaven and the Earth his Mouth is like an unexhauſtible River which glides ſwiftly along: I cannot imagine what could induce ſo great a Man to come hither.

At the ſame inſtant the Philoſopher entred, and looking round at the Aſſembly ſaluted them with a gracious Air, moving both his Hands in a complaiſant Manner: I am informed, Gentlemen, ſayed he, that Aſſemblies are held here, wherein a Man of Learning whom I ſhould be glad to call Friend entertains the Company; and I preſume he would not hinder me to profit by his Knowledge.

At this Harangue the whole Aſſembly looked upon each other with ſome Surprize: For the Stranger was a Perſon of no great Capacity, all his Merit conſiſting in an agreeable manner of relating Matter of Hiſtory; the reſt were Men of no Learning, being Followers either of the Sect of Fo or Lau, and very much bigotted to their Images.

We are only assembled here, replied the Stranger, to pass a few Hours in Discourses, fitter to divert the Mind than instruct it; and you know that such Conversation commonly turns upon the History of the Times, or popular Morality, which sort of Entertainment cannot be agreeable to a Person of your Learning.

The Modern Sect not in Vogue at Court.

Sage old Man, replied the Philosopher, it is your Modesty that makes you talk in this Manner, and you seem to have too advantagious an Opinion of me. To say the Truth, I have spent all my Time in study, and even own that I have acquired some Share of Knowledge; but this very Knowledge is a Motive of Concern (*) to me, when I consider that there is no Possibility of bringing into Vogue at Court, either the great Doctrine of Yau, Shun, &c. or the wise Instructions of so many illustrious Men of these later Times, such as the Chew, the Chin, the Chang and the Chu. I am uneasy to find that these Instructions are not relished by my Friends who possess the chief Places in the Government, but on the contrary that the false Sects overwhelm the Empire; every body runs after the Dilusion; nothing but Corruption and Darkness prevail, while the true literary Sect is as it were buried in shameful Oblivion.

How happy are we, replied the Stranger, to find a Person of your Reputation and Merit is willing to gratify our Desire of hearing you! Condescend then to take your Place here, and honour us with your learned Instructions: A great Soul like yours, which aspires to reform the World, should be always disposed to communicate its Discoveries; and our Understandings, narrow as they are, cannot resist the Truths which you will make known to us.

I am very ready to oblige you, replied the Philosopher; all I fear, is, that I shall fall short of your Expectations. At the same time he saluted the Company, and sitting down in the honourable Place which was appointed him, upon what Subject, sayed he, shall I entertain you? We are desirous, answered the Stranger in the Name of the rest, to be instructed as to what preceded the Heavens and the Earth.

What preceded the Formation of the World.

I consent to it, replied the Philosopher in a grave Tone, and therefore listen to what I shall say: Before the Heavens and the Earth were yet formed, there was in the midst of an immense Void nothing but an extremely confused Substance, When jen i ki. This Substance in its chaotic State was infinite and boundless, Vû ki: That which was subtile and spirituous in this indefinite Mass, being as it were the Form, Li ki, and the Soul of the Tay ki, the first and supreme State of the Universe, was the very Principle of the Heavens and the Earth, or the Bud which disclosed them: By the same Means an infinite Number of Beings were produced.

The Universe how produced,

In short, every thing that came forth, ought to be placed in the Rank of Productions, whose Springs are astonishing. The World having once gained all its Parts, these sorts of Productions, which as to the Manner of them escape our Senses, grew very rare: For we generally see that the Species are propagated by ordinary and sensible Methods; an Example will express my Thoughts much clearer.

Wood produces Worms within itself, and Vermin are engendered on the Body of Man; these Productions are of those Sorts which we call wonderful, and whose Manner of Generation we are ignorant of. Were not the spirituous Particles of Sweat found on the Body of Man, and likewise in the Wood when it is corrupted, what could be the Origin of these Insects? (†) By the same Rule we may say, that what is found of a more subtile and vivifying Nature in the Tay ki or (*) These Complaints of the Chinese Philosophers deserve to be taken Notice of: Had his System prevailed among the literary Sect, he had not complained as he does, that the principal Literati could not be persuaded to relish it.

(†) It appears from this Reasoning of the Chinese Philosopher, that he did not believe the Insects were ingendred from Eggs, but from Corruption. But the Falacy of this Principle would clearly appear to him, was he to view with Microscopes the admirable Structure of these little Insects with respect to the Variety, Minuteness, and Propiety of their Organs.

Our Philosopher, like all those who endeavour to suppress the Knowledge of a first Cause, is so weak in his System, that to form it he lays down the most absurd and chimerical Principles, and would have his own Fictions pass for fundamental Truths; Whence one may see he had to do with very despicable Adversaries. Is this Tay ki, as he calls it, this shapeless Mass, this supreme Indefinite which preceded all finite Being, self existant? Has this most subtile Part of the Tay ki, bestowed on itself the Motion which it gives to other Beings, or has it received the same from some other Being which was the first Mover? Could this fine Order of the Universe, this Disposition of its Parts always the same, these animated thinking rational Beings whose Actions are free, be the Effect of a blind Cause which acts by Chance, which prepares nothing, puts nothing in Order, and chooses nothing, is without Will and without Understanding? Yet his Principles establish these Doctrines, which none but a Man void both of Sense and Reason, would maintain. For on sight of a Palace, wherein Symetry and Proportion as nicely observed, would any one offer to assert that the Stones assembled in that curious Order, and ranged themselves so as to form the different Apartments? That the Wall and the Wood work erected themselves in order to support the Roof, which afterwards placed itself thereon? In a Word, that this Palace, furnished according to the most perfect Rules of Architecture, was the whimsical Effect of mere Chance? In reading a History or Poem fraught with the most remarkable Events, will any body say it is the fortuitous Concurrence of Characters, ranged by Chance in the Order necessary to describe such a Series of Events, and connect them together? A Child of there Years old would laugh at such Reasoning. These Works of Art plainly shew, that they were raised by wise and industrious Operators. But what must we think of the Structure of this World, which comprizes the most astonishing Wonders? This suspended and immoveable Earth which bears us; those Riches which annually spring out of its Bosom, to supply the various Wants of Mankind; that immense Arch of Heaven, which moves continually round this Globe, and covers us; those Abysses of Air and Water which encompass us; that spacious Reservoir of Water called the Ocean, which surrounds the Earth, and is so restrained within Bounds, that it never passes beyond them, but in its greatest Fury dashes its foaming Billows against the Shore; that Sun and those Stars which give us Light; and whose Motions are so constant and regular, that for so many Ages not the least Change has happened in them; those Animals of so many different Kinds; that natural Instinct which directs them to pursue what is for their Benefit, and avoid what is hurtful to them; the Manner in which they are renewed every Day by the Assistance of Food, and their Species propagated by Means of Generation; the Human Body, that Masterpiece of Art, formed out of vile Matter, its several Parts and their Uses: That Soul which animates it, is intimately united with it, and sets all the Springs of it in Motion; which thinks, reasons, deliberates, forms distinct Images of Things destroyed as if they were still in being, preserves the Remembrance of what is past as if it was present; which is free, and determines to act just as it pleases. To say that all this can be explained by certain Combinations of a most subtile Matter, indued with an inherent animating Power, is to abuse Reason, and stifle the clearest Convictions: It is to shut ones Ears, and refuse to hear the Voice of all Creatures which are marked with the Seal of the Supreme Intelligent Being who made them, and are incessantly telling us that they are the Work of his Hands. Yet thus it is, that while all Creatures to the vilest Insects proclaim the Power of the Creator, we meet with pretended Philosophers, who wholly given up to frivolous Systems and lost in their own vain Thoughts, endeavour to root out of their Hearts the Opinion of a Deity; and raise Clouds to darken that pure Light which shines about them, in Spight of all their Attemps to extinguish it.

or the Supreme Indefinite, which immediately preceded all infinite Beings, was as it were the Bud from whence the Heavens and the Earth were produced: But that you may underſtand me thoroughly I will draw a Figure on Paper, which will lay the whole at one View before your Eyes.

A MAP of the Heavens and the Earth, at the Time of their FORMATION.

1. THE Particles Yang, as the moſt pure, moſt ſubtile, and moſt light, fly off, riſe up, flutter about and embrace the reſt. 2. The Particles In, leſs pure, and by Conſequence more heavy, ſubſide, and by that Means unite together in the Middle. 3. All that which encompaſſes whatever is viſible are Particles of the Univerſe ſo very ſmall, that they have no ſenſible Figure, that is Hyu ki. Explained by Gravitation.

But how do you underſtand, ſays one of the Company, that the Yang, that is the more ſubtile Particles, and the In, or the more groſs Particles, ſhould be ſeparated from what you call Tay ki; and in Conſequence of this Separation there ſhould be formed a Sun, a Moon, and all the Stars? Formation of the Sun and Planets.

I'll explain this to you, replied the Philoſopher: The fineſt Matter of the Yang, or of the Aſſemblage of the more ſubtile Particles, formed the Sun; the leſs groſs Subſtance of the In or of the groſs Particles, compoſed in their Turn the Moon; the Stars were formed of the ſame, took their Places, and made their Revolutions in the Heavens: All which Things became viſible, becauſe thenceforward they had their determinate Figure.

The In on their Side being united together, and the groſs Particles being linked one to another, formed the Earth, which is placed in the Middle of theſe immenſe Spaces. Shortly after the Earth had in its Boſom, and on its ſuperfices, all the Elements well fixed, as Fire, Wood, &c. and in a Word, all the reſt of the Beings here below, which having every one their particular Configuration, were eaſily diſtinguiſhed. Attend to this Compariſon, which will explain what I have been ſaying: The Air which we continually breathe when expired is rarified and dilated; it has likewiſe ſome Degree of Heat, and muſt be referred to the Yang: But when by Inſpiration it enters into our Lungs, it is compreſſed and condenſed; it alſo partakes ſomething of the Coldneſs which it ought to bring, and is by that Means of the Nature of the In. Of the Earth Water and Air.

Let us return to the firſt Combinations of the World: Theſe kinds of Corpuſcles which make what is called In being joined and fitted to each other, the Earth and the Water were formed of it, and the five Elements began to exiſt. The Yang and the ſmalleſt Atoms remained ſuſpended and ſurrounded all this inactive Maſs, fluttering and wheeling round about it without ceaſing. A Hen's Egg may afford a ſlight Image hereof; may not the Earth be ſaid to be the Yolk of the Egg, which appears ſuſpended and fixed in the Middle, where it remains immoveable? May not the Heavens be looked upon as the White, which embraces the Part that is in the Center, moves about it, and continues in the ſame Condition without any thing changing Place. Of the five Elements.

The Motion of the Heavens is thus conſtant and durable; that ſubtile and fluid Matter moves and circulates without ceaſing; and by this Motion which is peculiar to itſelf cauſes the Variety of Seaſons, and forms the Winds, Clouds, Thunder and Rain. Of the Cauſe of Motion.

The Production of Mankind and other Beings came afterwards, and the whole Univerſe was then brought to Perfection: In ſhort, all that one can imagine of what is lively, ſpiritual, and excellent in the Heavens and the Earth, becoming collected and united together in the higheſt Degree of Perfection poſſible, has given a wonderful Birth to theſe extraordinary Men, who in their Turn have contributed to the Improvement of Nature. But for fear you have not yet juſtly conceived my Meaning, I ſhall make Uſe of a ſecond Figure by which you will eaſily underſtand it. Of Mankind and other Beings.

The

Motion of the Heavens.

1. THE Heavens encompaſs and ſurround the Earth, moving from the Left to the Right: There are two fixed Poles, one in the North, the other in the South; there is in the Univerſe no fixed Points of either Eaſt or Weſt; nor is there any thing in a proper Senſe high or low.

2. The Space which the Sun runs thro' in the Heavens diſtinguiſhes the Hours; when it is exactly at the Point marked U, then it is Noon; when exactly in the Point Tſé, it is Midnight: And ſo of the Reſt.

The Sun is the pure Yang; it begins to take its Courſe from the Hour of Midnight, and comes to us. When it riſes every thing in the Univerſe depending upon Yang ferments and reſumes freſh Strength: From Noon it begins to decline, and then every thing of the Nature of Yang grows weak; on the contrary, that which belongs to In, aſſumes new (*) Vigour.

But, ſayed one of the Auditors, if the Heaven is a fluid and light Body, in what Place will you fix the Deity Yo whang, Ta hi? If the Earth is only an Aſſemblage of thick and heavy Particles, where will be the Abode of (†) Yen vang? Where do the Spirits lodge that are the Executioners of his Juſtice? In ſhort, where will you place Hell?

Local Hell of the Bonzes denied, and their Chimerical Fictions.

You may be certain, replied the Philoſopher, that the Heaven is a very fine and light Subſtance, which is continually agitated and in Motion: Judge then if it be capable of containing any heavy Thing; it can ſupport nothing but what is of the ſame Nature with itſelf; how then can the Deities, ſuch as you repreſent them, inhabit there? In the Day-time, a clear Sky rolls over our Heads, while the dark Sky advancing by little and little, brings Night along with it; the Day afterwards appears again, and this Motion is conſtant and regular: Suppoſe then that Yo whang, and his Train of inferior Gods, had their Palace in the Sky, theſe Gods would be carried along conſtantly with the Sky, and make an infinite Number of Circumgirations. Is this a well contrived Syſtem?

Let us come now to the Earth: This is manifeſtly an enormous Maſs, a Compoſition of Water, Mud, Clay, and Stones, which are heaped up, and kept together by their own proper Weigh: If then you ſtation Yen vang and his Train in this Place, the Court of this eſſential God muſt then be in this Heap of Water and Mud: Don't you ſee that theſe Things are nothing but mere Fictions?

Let us leave the Deities then, replied one of the Aſſembly, becauſe you are too much prejudiced againſt them: But what are become of thoſe great, thoſe extraordinary Men, of whom you have ſpoken in ſuch pompous Terms, and have put on an Equality with Heaven and Earth? For as the Heaven and Earth are real, and ſubſiſt theſe Heroes of Antiquity, ought likewiſe to exiſt: Are we to ſuppoſe, according to your Principles, that a Fo hi, a Whang ti, a Yau, or a Confuçius, ceaſe to exiſt when they ceaſe to appear here below?

What becomes of the Soul after Death.

You are to underſtand, replied the Philoſopher, that before thoſe Sages were born among us, the Li and the Ki, the two Parts whereof they are compoſed, prexiſted in the Heaven and the Earth. The ſame Inſtant that a great Man is formed, theſe Li and Ki are united together; and from this Union he takes his Origin. When he dies, his fine Qualities and Endowments, his Perfections and Doctrine, becomes the Admiration and Standard of future Ages; they continue to ſubſiſt,

(*) On ſeeing theſe two Figures drawn by the Chineſe Philoſopher, the Reader perhaps may aſk if in China they ſtill believe the Earth to be ſquare. The Philoſopher ſeems to follow the ancient Opinion, that favours the Name of Chong quê, or the Kingdom of the Middle, which the Chineſe gave to their Empire: Imagining the Earth to be ſquare, that they poſſeſſed the greater Part of it, and that all the reſt conſiſted only of certain Pieces of Land placed round about it by way of Ornament. This Notion is not ſuitable to a Globe, where the Middle may be found on any Part of the Surface. But ſince the Europeans have been at Pe king, the Chineſe who viſited them, or are any way verſed in Mathematics, have forſaken that groſs Error, which obtains at preſent only among thoſe who are ignorant of Aſtronomy: Juſt as we erred for many Ages in Europe, with Reſpect to the Rotundity of the Earth, the Antipodes, &c. The Chineſe Mathematitians ſuppoſed the Earth to reſemble in Shape, a Hen's Egg. The Word Fang, which ſignifies Square, ought to be rendered Solid, Firm.

(†) This is the Pluto of the Chineſe Idolaters, who worſhip Fo.

ſubſiſt, and their Duration is equal to that of Heaven and Earth. Indeed the Body of a Sage is deſtroyed, but his Li, or the thing which makes him what he is, that noble Part of himſelf, goes to be reunited to the Heaven and Earth as it was before; and as it may be truely ſayed that the Heaven and Earth will always endure, there is likewiſe Ground to ſay that real Sages exiſt for ever (†).

The ſame Perſon who had juſt been ſpeaking to the Philoſopher replied: You acknowledge that Confuçius is a real Sage, and yet Tradition informs us that he went to conſult the illuſtrious Lau kyun (*), by which Circumſtance it appears that Confuçius was afraid of Death, and wanted to learn the Secret of becoming immortal.

Principle of Lau tſe, who would have every thing ſoft, refuted,

Don't talk to me of your Lau-tſe, reply'd the Philoſopher, I conſider him no otherwiſe than a common Perſon, notwithſtanding he ridiculouſly pretended to make himſelf immortal: What a fine Doctrine has he left behind him, which has nothing for its Principle, and only teaches Indolence and Inactivity. I'll cite but one Paſſage from the Inſtructions he gave his Diſciples: Conſider my Tongue, ſay'd he to them, does it not ſubſiſt while it remains ſoft and flexible? On the contrary, Is not that which deſtroys our Teeth their own Hardneſs? What do you think of this delicate Reaſoning? Nature, in the Production of the Univerſe, has made ſoft what ought to be ſoft, and hard what ought to be hard: Suppoſe that the Teeth which adorn the Mouth were ſoft and flexible like the Tongue, could we then take any Nouriſhment that was in the leaſt hard, ſuch as the Grains of Rice boil'd in Water, which is our ordinary Food? And if we were not in a Condition to take this Food, how could we poſſibly live ſeveral Ages, as they make us vainly hope? Theſe are idle and chimerical Notions.

as contrary to Nature and Experience.

Let us apply this curious Principle of Lau-tſe, who would have every thing ſoft, to Natural Philoſophy and Morality: We divide the Metals into five Kinds, according to their Colour. Now if you tell me that Gold and Silver, which are ſo highly valued, are naturally inclinable to be ſoft, becauſe the Ornaments made of them are eaſily wrought, I anſwer: That theſe Metals are not deſerving of ſuch great Eſteem, at leaſt with reſpect to the Uſe they have in Life, for after all they are good for nothing but to make Veſſels and other Ornaments not very neceſſary; whereas Iron, which is of a lower Rank among Metals, ſerves purely by its hard Property to open the Furrows which enrich us with Grain, and furniſh Proviſion for our Subſiſtence, the Hardneſs of Iron renders it fit for ſeveral other Occaſions: For inſtance, to prepare our Food, which we could not make Uſe of without its Aſſiſtance; to make Weapons of, which by putting an End to War are the Cauſe of Peace and Plenty to the Nation, which terrify or extirpate Robbers, and ſecure the public Safety.

Inconſiſtent with Morality.

Let us come to Morality: Thoſe fond and languiſhing Paſſions for the Female Sex, don't they proceed from a ſoft and effeminate Heart? If Women had any Reſolution, durſt we take the leaſt Liberty in their Preſence? There would be no coming near them but as we do Fire, which no Man plays with unpuniſhed: Our I king, that precious Gift of Fo hi, greatly exalts the Character Kang, that is to ſay, whatever has Firmneſs; on the contrary, your Lau tſe praiſes nothing but Yew, which ſignifies Softneſs, and is entirely oppoſite to the Doctrine of our Canonical Books.

His Doctrine of making Man immortal;

Moreover it is certain, that the Life of Man never exceeds a hundred Years, and yet he flatters them with the Hopes of holding out for many Ages: He alſo pretends that the Yang, which is the Soul of Man, is never deſtroy'd; and that he has found Means to ſteal from Nature the vivifying Virtue which he can diſpoſe of juſt as he pleaſes.

Vain and ridiculous.

After ſuch Pretences as theſe, he who had the moſt vaſt and ambitious Deſires of all Mankind, is ſo ſilly as to tell us that all is Vanity; that we ought to ſet our Hearts on nothing, tho' he himſelf was more fond of Life than any other Perſon; that there is nothing commendable but a State of Inactivity and Indolence, yet he himſelf was always extremely vigorous in his Purſuits: To affect Immortality in this Manner is only to rebel againſt Nature, and againſt the Laws of Heaven and Earth.

Hiſtory of Lau tſe.

But it may not be amiſs to give you ſome Account of this Lau tſe, whom you ſo highly eſteem. The following is the Subſtance of his Hiſtory. He was born towards the End of the Dynaſty of the Chew, near the City of Lin pau, in the Diſtrict of Ho nan. His Father, ſurnamed Quang, was no more than a poor Peaſant, who from his Infancy ſerved as a Labourer in a wealthy Family: He was ſeventy Years old before he could meet with a Wife, but at length having gained the Affections of a Country Wench of the Age of forty he married her.

His wonderous Birth.

This Woman being one Day in a ſolitary Place, of a ſudden conceived by the ſimple Commerce and Union of the vivifying Virtue of Heaven and Earth, and went with Child of him fourſcore Years. The Maſter whom ſhe ſerved, vex'd that ſhe ſhould be ſo long without being delivered, turned her out of Doors; upon which ſhe was conſtrained to lead a wandering Life about the Country, till at length under a Plumb-Tree ſhe brought forth a Son with Hair and Eyebrows as white as Snow. The Mother, who was ignorant of her Huſband's Family Name, and knew only his Surname, called the Infant after the Tree under which it was born: Then (†) Every one of the Literati, let his Talents be ever ſo indifferent, muſt obſerve certain Meaſures when he ſpeaks of the Prince of Literature, and the principal Sages of the Empire: Thus our Philoſopher takes a pleaſant Method to give Confuçius a Duration equal to that of the Heaven and Earth. But what he calls the Duration of Confuçius, will equally be the Duration of Millions of Men, whoſe Souls have in like Manner returned to the Etherial Maſs, and become part thereof. 'Tis the ſame as if one ſhould make Images of Princes, Philoſophers and Emperors out of Snow contained in a Veſſel; the Snow coming to melt all Diſtinctions ceaſe, and the whole is reduced to one uniform identical Maſs.

His Name. obſerving that the Tips of his Ears were exceeding long, ſhe took from thence his Surname and called him Li eul, Plumb Tree Ear; but the People, who ſaw him ſo very white, called him Lau tſe, or the old Boy. When he had attained a certain Age, he became Library-keeper to an Emperor of the Chew; by whoſe Favour he obtained a ſmall Mandarinat. He made himſelf a Courſe of Life. Proficent in ancient Hiſtory, and the Knowledge of the Rites of the early Ages; and it was that which induced Confuçius to go and diſcourſe him about the Ceremonial, and the Talents of a good Mandarin. Lau tſe in his old Age foreſaw the approaching downfal of the Chew Dynaſty. He got on the Back of a black Cow, and bending his Courſe Weſtward arrived at the entrance of a diſmal And Death. Valley: This Paſſage was guarded by an Officer named I, and ſurnamed Hi. The Book Tau tſe, containing five thouſand Sentences, was compoſed by him in the City of Chew ſhé, in the Diſtrict of Tſin chwen. At length he died, and his Tomb is to be ſeen at U.

This was the Beginning and End of Lau tſe: He could not while he was living prevent the Ruin of the Race of the Chew, whoſe Subject and Mandarin he was; and yet they would have us believe all the Fables which are confidently reported about his pretended Merit, and among the reſt, that after his Death he was placed at the Top of all the Heavens in Quality of the three Purities.

Well! what do you think, Sir, of the Doctrine of Fo, which has been brought to us from the Eaſt, cried out thoſe of the Aſſembly, who were devoted to the Worſhip of this Idol?

Fo, his Doctrine of the Vacuum, Fo, (†) replied the Philoſopher, is another Viſionary, who likewiſe pretended to make himſelf immortal. According to him the whole World is a mere Vacuum without any thing real in it: Purſuant to which fine Principle he would have us think of nothing, but reduce the Heart to a mere Vacuum, that is, empty it of all Affections, and go ſo far as even to forget ourſelves, as tho' we had no Exiſtence. We have Eyes and Ears, and yet we muſt neither ſee nor hear any thing: Theſe Organs ought to be void of every Object; that is their State of Perfection: We have Mouths, Hands and Feet, and yet all theſe Members muſt be inactive. His great principle is, that the wonderful Ternary of the Tſing, the Ki, and the Shin, that is, the fine, the ſubtile and the And Ternary. ſpiritual, comes to its greateſt Perfection when it is united and makes but one: As for the Soul, its Duration, ſays he, is infinite, for it never is deſtroy'd.

Don't you ſee that this fine Doctrine of annihilating oneſelf and univerſal uncaſing ends at length in Expectation of a chimerical Immortality, and in deſiring that which cannot be obtained. They would ſeize upon and appropriate the vivifying Virtue of Heaven; they refuſe to reſtore it one Day to Heaven and Earth, and pretend thereby to attain the pure Vacuum.

His Miraculous Birth. But perhaps, continued he, you are ignorant of the Hiſtory of this Enthuſiaſt: His Mother ſaw in a Dream a great white Elephant, and at the ſame Inſtant perceived herſelf with Child: It grew conſiderably every Day, and at length making its way thro' its Mother's ſide, and tearing her Bowels, deprived her of Life from whom he received his own. 'Twas thus the Monſter came into the World, and ought not he who was to turn it upſide down to be reckoned among the Peſts of human Race? Is it becauſe he killed his Mother at his Birth that the Idolatrous People faſt, make Proceſſions, and perform a hundred other Things of the ſame Nature to obtain all kind of Happineſs for their Mothers? Can it be imagined that this Fo, who could not ſave his own Mother, is able to protect another body's Mother (A)?

Unable to defend his Dominions he abandons them. But to proceed: He lived in one of the Kingdoms Weſtward of this Empire, where he was at the ſame time Supreme both in Temporals and Spirituals, that is, a King and Head of his Religion. He had a Queen and a Concubine of very great Beauty, of whom he made Goddeſſes. His Kingdom abounded with Gold, Silver, Merchandiſes, the Neceſſaries of Life, and eſpecially precious Stones: But tho' it was rich and fruitful, the Extent of it was ſmall and its Inhabitants had neither Strength nor Courage; on the contrary thoſe of the ſeveral Kingdoms wherewith it was ſurrounded were ſtrong, active, and breathed nothing but Blood and Slaughter, inſomuch that the Dominions of Fo were ſubject to frequent Invaſions. Tired out with ſo many Inſults which he could not reſiſt, he abandon'd his Kingdom, and embraced a ſolitary Life: He then applied himſelf to exhort the People to the Practice of Virtue, and publiſhed the Doctrine of the Invents the Metempſychoſis to terrify his Enemies. Metempſychoſis which he had invented, whereby the Soul was to migrate backwards and forwards from one body into another; obſerving however a certain Order by which Virtue was rewarded, and Vice puniſhed. He infatuated the neighbouring Nations with theſe ridiculous Imaginations; his Deſign being to intimidate his Perſecutors, and to perſuade them that if they continued to ravage his Territories they ſhould after this Life be changed into Dogs, Horſes, and even into wild Beaſts.

Re-aſcends the Throne and grows very powerful. During the Space of twelve Years, in which he laboured in propagating his Doctrine, he drew after him a prodigious Number of ignorant People whoſe Brain he had quite turned: With their Aſſiſtance he re-aſcended his Throne, became very powerful, and marrying again had a numerous Iſſue. Such was the Effect of his Artifices; and while he talked to his Diſciples about nothing but the Emptineſs of earthly Poſſeſſions, he eagerly ſought after them himſelf, and procured as many as he poſſibly could.

In ſhort, you are not to judge that the Doctrine of Fo is excellent, becauſe it has ſpread ſo much through this Empire, it came in Vogue only in Conſequence of the Doctrine of our ancient Sages having

(†) The Account which this Chineſe Philoſopher gives of Fo, is mixed with Particulars not to be met with elſewhere. 'Twas he we find who invented the Metempſychoſis or Tranſmigration of Souls, he lived 500 Years before Pythagoras; and as this latter is known to have travelled over Egypt and India, there is no Reaſon to doubt but he took his Doctrine of the Metempſychoſis, which he brought into Greece, from the Diſciples of Fo.

(A) This is like the Proteſtant Argument againſt the Romiſh Saints, who cannot be ſuppoſed able to protect their Votaries, when they cannot protect their own Images, Reliques, &c. And we ſhall find that moſt of the Author's Arguments, conclude equally againſt Popery and the Religion of this Impoſtor.

having been almoſt extinguiſhed. The Ignorance and Corruption of the Heart have given Admittance to the groſſeſt Errors; thus the People having neglected the admirable Leſſons of Yau, Shun and Confuçius, could only reliſh the Religion of Fo. This Sect preſcribes nothing but a few idle Prayers, for the Attainment of Happineſs and a State of Serenity; whereas our Sages exhort us to ſubdue our Paſſions, to govern our Deſires, and to perform our ſeveral Duties, which is a very difficult Taſk. Univerſality no Mark of a true Church

This Diſcourſe exaſperated a great many of the Auditors: It is to no purpoſe to ſay, cried one of them, that every thing is empty in the viſible World, and that the Yang or Spirit only is immortal; the great Doctrine of Fo and Tau ſwallows up all in nothing, the Soul only excepted, which will exiſt and live for ever. Any one may ſee that it is Prejudice, and the Spirit of Partiality, which ſets you ſo vehemently againſt this Doctrine; and is what you ſpoke juſt before concerning the Syſtem of the World any better grounded?

Nothing could poſſibly have diſguſted the Philoſopher more, and it was eaſy to ſee that he was nettled with the Reproach. Your Lau tſe, replied he, raiſing his Voice, muſt needs have been greatly in love with Life, ſince he ſought ſo many ways of prolonging it, and yet he could not get beyond a hundred Years of Age; but he flattered himſelf that his Yang, or vivifying Spirit, ſhould never periſh. Was not Fo tſe equally fond of Life? However he lived no more than ſixty three Years, but he was perſuaded that his Soul, which was properly himſelf, ſhould exiſt for ever. Pretence of Lau and Fo to Immortality vain, and inſolent.

The Life of all Mankind has a fixed Term: But Lau and Fo have ridiculouſly imagined, that they were the only priviledged Creatures in the World; that every thing which has appeared and ſhall appear on the Earth will return to nothing; but that as for them they are to be immortal, and that beſides what was viſible in their Perſons, they had an intelligent Spirit, the true Principle of Life: Thus we find in the Doctrine of theſe Sects this unintelligible Language Fo ſhi i, Shin eul, Yew ſang ſyang; that is, according to the Sect of Fo, the Body of Fo, the Trunk or Subſtance is one, but it hath three Images. Lau ſhi i, Shin eul, Fwen ſang tſing; that is, according to the Religion of Lau, the Body of Lau, the Trunk, or Subſtance is one, but it is diſtinguiſhed into three Purities.

Theſe Sectaries, to make themſelves underſtood, have recourſe to Compariſons: A Branch of an Elder-Tree, planted in the Earth, leaves at length a Quinteſſence of the Nature of the Elder-Tree; a Fox dying in his hole leaves behind him the vivifying Spirits wherewith he was animated (*). It is thus they pretend that, after the Death of their Maſter, there remained ſomething of his Perſon which was born again in this lower World. Explained by Vegitation.

Theſe Whims, as you may perceive, place Lau and Fo in the Rank of Trees and Beaſts: But as the wild Conceits of the Sect of Fo have infatuated an infinite Number of People, it is neceſſary that I ſhould enter into a more particular Account of them, which I ſhall reduce to ten little Articles. Evil Effects of the Doctrines of Fo.

1. In the Book of the Diſciples of Fo, intitled, the Utility of the Houſe, it is ſayed, that the Body is our Habitation; that the Soul is an immortal Gueſt who lodges there, and like a Traveller paſſes from one Inn to another; that a Child is nouriſhed with its Mother's Milk, in the ſame Manner as the Inhabitants of a Country drink of the River wherewith it is watered: Hence the Bodies of our Parents are nothing but a Lodging, and it is natural to look upon them, with the ſame contempt as a heap of Wood and Stones deſigned for the building of a Houſe. Has not this a Tendency to root out of People's Hearts the Virtue Hyau, or reverential Love for Parents? Does it not ſtifle thoſe Sentiments which unite us ſo ſtrictly with them, as being nothing but the Participation of the ſame celeſtial and vivifying Subſtance. Tranſmigration tends to root out filial Affection.

2. The ſame Book, which repreſents our Bodies as mere Habitations where we take up our Lodging, tends to make us neglect them, and refuſe them the Affection as well as Compaſſion ſo neceſſary for their Preſervation. This is what inclines the Diſciples of Fo, who are diſguſted with the preſent Life, to ſeek the Means of procuring a better as ſoon as poſſible: There are ſome who go on Pilgrimage to Pagods ſituate on the Top of ſteep Rocks, and after they have ended their Prayers, as if they were ſure of being heard, caſt themſelves headlong into ſome dreadful Abyſs; others are laviſh of their Lives in giving themſelves up to the moſt ſhameful Exceſſes; others who meet with obſtacles to their unlawful Paſſions go by conſent and hang or drown themſelves, that when they are born again they may become Huſband and Wife; theſe are the evil Conſequences of that ſenſeleſs Doctrine of the Tranſmigration of Souls. Promotes Self-Murder,

3. Being accuſtomed to look upon the Body as a kind of Inn, or reſting Place, it is natural to forget the Eſteem, Reſpect and Regard that is due to it: On this Account Women and Maids, who are generally greatly devoted to Fo, are eaſily ſeduced by the Bonzas and Tau tſe, a ſort of People very ſkilful in amorous Intrigues; they inſinuate to them, that the Body which they only paſs thro' is nothing but a contemptible Cottage, which they ought not to give themſelves any Trouble about, and that many of their Sex, when they grant the Favours required of them, have been enjoyed by Fo without knowing it: At preſent, continue they, you are the weak and ſervile Sex, but we promiſe you faithfully that when you are born again into the World you ſhall become Men. It often happens that Ladies and young Girls of excellent Parts, and topping Families, are diſhonoured by theſe Varlets, and at length arrive to ſuch a Pitch by their Inſtructions as to renounce all Shame: They are not contented with one or two private Intrigues, but make And debauchery, thro' the Arts of the Prieſts.

(*) The Women Idolators believe they often ſee Spirits in the Shape of Foxes, and call them Hû li tſing. [Thus Apparitions are propagated; prepoſſeſs but the Mind with any Abſurdity, and People will fancy, nay ſwear, they have frequent Demonſtrations of its Truth. Of this all times have furniſhed Inſtances: Witneſs at preſent the Affair of the late famous Abbè Paris; one half of the Pariſians proteſting Miracles are daily wrought at his Tomb, tho' the other half proteſt to the Contrary. An unanſwerable Proof of the Uncertainty and Inſufficiency of human Teſtimony.]

make a Trade of Libertiniſm, which they never forſake (A); ſuch is this abominable Doctrine, that brings Infamy on many of the beſt Families.

Encourages Frauds,

4. Thoſe who give into theſe ridiculous Chimeras affirm, that the Good or Evil of the preſent Life is the Conſequence of their Actions while they were in a pre-exiſtent State, and ſo think they have a Toleration by this goodly Principle to abandon themſelves to Debauchery, and ſeize the Property of other Perſons with Impunity: You muſt underſtand, they will ſay, that we only take back what belongs to us, for we are very poſitive that you owed us ſuch a Sum in a former Life.

And other Diſorders.

If a Libertine, who lays Snares for a young Girl, knows ſhe is addicted to the Worſhip of Fo, he will ſay to her: Don't you remember, that before you were born again you promiſed to marry me? But your haſty Death deprived me of the Right which I at preſent demand; from thence proceeds the tender Diſpoſition of our Hearts, and the favourable Opportunity we now enjoy. You may perceive that this monſtrous Doctrine (*) ſerves as a Veil to cover the moſt flagrant Wickedneſs, and moſt ſhameful Diſorders.

Vilainy promoted by giving falſe Hopes and Security.

5. The Sectaries of Fo are perſuaded, that they may give themſelves up to the moſt criminal Actions with Impunity; and that, provided they burn a little Incenſe in the Night-time, or repeat a few Prayers before an Image, their Crimes are not only blotted out (B), but being under its Protection, they are ſkreened from the Purſuit of Juſtice: One ſingle Inſtance will make this plain.

A Thief found means to get into the moſt inner Apartment of the Imperial Palace, but was diſcovered and ſeized by the Officers in waiting; who, after they had thoroughly ſearched him, ſtript him of his Cloaths and found his Body covered over with Slips of Paper filled with Sentences of Fo (C): He imagined that by Virtue of theſe Papers he would never be diſcovered, but might go on ſtealing with Impunity, or at leaſt would find Means to eſcape.

Families impoveriſhed by Offerings at Altars &c.

6. The Devotees of this Sect are entirely taken up with making Pilgrimages to certain Mountains, and live exceeding ſparingly that they may be able to purchaſe Perfumes to burn before the Images: They are inſenſible to the Neceſſities of a Father or Mother who ſuffers from Cold or Hunger for want of Cloaths and Food; their only Care being to gather a Sum of Money ſufficient to purchaſe a rich Picture-Frame for the Altar of Fo, and other ſtrange Deities. They abandon their Kindred (D), and leave their Anceſtors without a Tſe tang (†). Muſt not this inſpire one with Horror for a Doctrine which makes us forget our deceaſed Relations, and deprives thoſe who are living of all manner of Aſſiſtance?

Lewdneſs and Impudence the neceſſary Conſequence of a Monaſtic Life.

7. How many do we ſee among the Vulgar, who believe every thing they are told concerning their Pagods [Churches and Monaſteries] which are built in the moſt ſolitary and inacceſſible Places? They take it for granted that they are the Manſions of Virtue and Innocence; even many are tempted to paſs their Days in theſe ſorts of Retreats, that they may imitate Fo in his ſolitary Life: To this End you will ſee them all of a ſudden renounce their Wives, Children and Poſſeſſions. What monſtrous folly is this? Do not they know that their Bodies are compoſed of Fleſh, Blood, Bones and animal Spirits? Do they think to make them as inſenſible as a Log of Wood, or a Stone? Do they imagine they ſhall no longer feel the Paſſions ſo natural to Mankind? All the pompous Exhortations of Fo and Lau upon the Vacuum, and upon the Perfection ariſing from an abſolute Renunciation of all Enjoyments, are ſo many Snares by which a great Number of People have ſuffered themſelves to be caught, thinking they could really put theſe Leſſons in Practice; but they ſoon found them to be impracticable. The Empire of the Conſtitution prevailing, the Paſſions by being curbed and reſtrained have only become more ungovernable, and led them into the moſt enormous

(A) How often do we hear of the like Diſorders among the Female Sex and Prieſts in the Church of Rome? How often do the Intrigues of Monks and Nuns come to Light? What Libertiniſm was lately diſcovered in ſome of the Convents at Paris? All Europe has rang of the late Story of P. Gerard and Miſs Cadiere, with many others. The Bonzas make Uſe of the Doctrine of the Tranſmigration, and the Romiſh Prieſts that of Confeſſion, to debauch the Sex; But of the two, this laſt is by much the fitter for the Purpoſe.

(*) Whatever Grounds the Chineſe Philoſopher might have to conſider the Doctrine of Fo as the Sourſe of infinite Diſorders, we may with much more Reaſon reproach his Syſtem. For if, according thereto, this Univerſe is neither created, nor governed by a firſt and ſupreme intelligent Being; if the Heaven and Earth preſerve themſelves in ſuch excellent Order, merely by their natural and neceſſary Motion; if in ſhort, all Things move mechanically in this great Machine, every body may ſay to himſelf, I have no Expectations beyond my own Perſon, I ought only to think of my preſent Happineſs: The Term of Life is ſhort and uncertain, by what Authority do they pretend to preſcribe Laws to me, which Force, not Duty, compels me to ſubmit to? The Encomiums beſtowed on this Submiſſion make but a poor Amends for the Conſtraint: To ſay that the Authority which is exerciſed over me proceeds from Heaven, is mere Nonſenſe, ſince the Heaven itſelf is no more than Matter: Let them not tell me of either Virtues or Vices, they are idle Terms which convey no Ideas, but ſuch as ariſe from the Prejudice of Education imbibed in our Infancy: Thus all Inſtructions, Reproofs, Laws, Puniſhments, and Government is uſeleſs or unjuſt. And Inclination ought to be the ſole Rule of our Conduct, Theſe Conſequences neceſſarily follow from this Syſtem, and evidently lead to all manner of Crimes. The better to comprehend this rightly, one ought to be in a City wholly conſiſting of Atheiſts: Altho' indeed the like never yet was, nor ever will be found. For if there be Atheiſts in Heart, that is, ſuch as would be glad if there was no God to puniſh Crimes, it is rare to find Atheiſts in underſtanding, that is, whoſe Reaſon is ſo depraved as wholly to forget the Author of their Being, and be ignorant of a Truth, which is ſtamped on every Part of the Univerſe. But ſuppoſing there was ſuch a City, what Confuſion and Corruption muſt reign therein? It might at firſt glory in being ſet free, and no longer in Fear of divine Vengeance: But would it remain long without throwing off every kind of Yoke, and attempting to live in a State of Independance? And would it not give itſelf up to the moſt monſtrous Exceſſes?

[This is an idle Harrangue of the Editor, for which he has no Ground from any thing ſpoken by the Author, whoſe whole Diſcourſe is a lively Invective againſt Rebellion, Immorality and Wickedneſs, which he charges as the neceſſary Conſequences of the Doctrines of a Religion in every thing almoſt the ſame with Popery; ſo that ſuppoſing the Chineſe to be an Atheiſt, Popery muſt be worſe than Atheiſm.]

(B) Is there not the ſame eaſy Remiſſion of Sins promiſed in the Church of Rome, on ſaying two or three Prayers before an Image or priviledged Altar, over and above what is obtained by Indulgences, Pardons, &c.

(C) Theſe are like the Papers containing what they call the Goſpel of St John, Prayers or Sentences out of the Litanies of Saints, the Legends or other Books, which as well as the Croſs and Agnus Dei's Papiſts carry about them as Charms to protect them againſt Harms, and drive away evil Spirits.

(D) The ſame ill Conſequences happen daily in Popiſh Countries. How many Parents have diſinherited their Children, and reduced their Families to Beggary, in order to leave all their Subſtance to the Church; not for the Good of their Souls, as they imagine, but for the Good of the Prieſts.

(†) A common Hall, wherein they pay Honours to deceaſed Perſons of the ſame Family.

enormous Exceſſes. To carry off Youth of both Sexes, to gratify their carnal Luſts, to ſeduce virtuous Ladies, to debaſe themſelves to Beaſts, and to glory in this Abaſement; in ſhort to renounce all Reaſon and Shame, are the inevitable Conſequences of being ſeduced by this Doctrine.

Superſtitions of Fo and Lau ruinous to ſeveral Emperors.

8. How many other Perſons have we ſeen, who, being infatuated with plauſible Diſcourſes about the Vacuum, have neglected all the Duties of ſocial Life, and been wholly taken up in Purſuit of the Happineſs promiſed in the Life to come! This Deluſion is not confined to the People only, but has made its Way even into the Palaces of Princes: If we have ſeen Rebels aſſemble, and forming an Army beſiege the Capital City; if Barbarians have entered the Empire and rendered it tributary; theſe Misfortunes have happened purely through the Princes Heads being turned with the Maxims and Superſtitions of Lau and Fo, whereby they have become incapable of governing their Subjects. Was not Lyang vû ti reduced to die of Famine at Tay ching? Was not Whey tſong carried captive into the ſandy Deſarts of Tartary? Did not Hven tſong ſhamefully fly to the Mountains of Se chwen? And what Miſery did he not ſuffer there? Thus have theſe falſe Sects made Dupes of our Emperors, and brought the Empire to the Brink of Ruin.

Juggling tricks of their Prieſts to delude the People,

9. Among the Artifices wherewith the Miniſters of the Sects of Fo and Tau, ſeduce the Minds of the Credulous, I muſt not omit a common Stratagem well calculated for the Purpoſe. When they initiate any Perſon into their Myſteries they oblige him to look into a Veſſel of Water, where he ſees himſelf in the Condition he then is; they then bid him look a ſecond time, and he appears in the Condition he ſhall be when born again, provided he continues ſincerely devoted to their Deities. By their Skill in the Magic Art it is ſo ordered, that a rich Man firſt beholds himſelf in the Shape of a ſick Perſon, or a common Beggar in the utmoſt Want, and thereupon takes a Reſolution to conſecrate all his Subſtance to the Idol-Temples: After this good Work is performed, they perſuade him to look a ſecond Time into the Veſſel of Water, and then he ſees himſelf in the Habit of a King, a General of the Army, or Prime Miniſter of State. If it is a Maid, ſhe beholds herſelf dreſſed in the Robes and Jewels of an Empreſs, a Queen, or favorite Concubine of the Prince; and this is to be their happy State when they enter a-new into the World. By theſe kind of Inchantments they cunningly diſpoſe the People to Rebellion: Thus prepared, they readily take Arms, fight Battles, and plunder opulent Cities. By ſuch Methods, during the Han Dynaſty, two Rebels cauſed infinite Miſchiefs; which were renewed under that of the Ywen, and more lately in the Reign of the Ming, by other Ringleaders of Rebellion, who ought to be looked upon as public Peſts, becauſe they deſtroyed ſeveral Millions of Men. You might have ſeen thoſe Monſters in Nature, for whom no Puniſhments could be great enough, boaſt of their Crimes even under the Executioner's Sword; and ſtill influenced by the Inchantment, cry out: We die content, we are upon the Point of entering into that delightful Abode in the Weſt, where Fo waits to receive us, and make us partake of his Bliſs (A). 'Tis plain, theſe falſe Doctrines are the Spring of many public and private Miſeries.

and excite them to Rebellion.

Enemies to Induſtry, Society and Truth.

10. There are four ſorts of Profeſſions of abſolute Uſe in the Empire, for providing Neceſſaries and maintaining good Order therein, viz. Thoſe of the Literati, Huſbandmen, Mechanics and Merchants: But the Diſciples of Fo and Lau are continually exhorting People to abandon theſe Profeſſions, and to embrace the four following, Thoſe of Ho ſhang and Tau tſe for the Male, and thoſe of Kû and Mi for the Female Sex. Theſe Bonzas and Bonzeſſes live at the Expence of the Public, and ſtick at no Lies, Tricks, and Frauds, to procure Alms: They likewiſe give themſelves up to Sloth and Luxury, not denying themſelves any Pleaſures that a corrupt Imagination can ſuggeſt, and even trampling under Foot the Laws of Nature and Society. What Difference is there between ſuch a kind of Life, and that of the vileſt Animals? Tamo, the Perſon ſo much cried up, who came out of the Weſt into China, ſpent, as reported, nine Years in the Mountain Tſong in continual Contemplation. He remained immoveable with his Eyes fixed upon the Wall, without changing his Situation; and yet this contemplative Sluggard wanted none of the Neceſſaries of Life, but was plentifully ſupplied with all Sorts of Proviſions and Cloaths. Suppoſe, after his Example, every private Perſon ſhould take it into his Head to imitate this kind of Life, what would become of the moſt neceſſary Profeſſions? Who would take care of cultivating the Fields, and carrying on the Manufacturies? Whence would they have Garments and Food to ſupport Life? Can it be imagined that a Doctrine, whoſe Practice if it were univerſal would overturn the Empire, ſhould be the true Doctrine?

The Folly and Miſchief of a ſolitary Life.

Beſides, it is incredible how much Money is ſquandered in building and repairing their Temples, gilding and adorning the Images, celebrating Feſtivals, and making Proceſſions to their Honour; all theſe Inventions ſerve for nothing elſe but to ſwallow up the Riches of numerous Families. I have but lightly touched theſe ten Articles; for there would be no end of relating all the Diſorders theſe Sectaries have cauſed in the Empire.

Images, Feſtivals, and Proceſſions ruinous to Families.

As this Account could not be pleaſing to the Auditory, one of them made the following Reply: 'To hear you talk, Sir, ſaid he, Fo, Lau, and the reſt of our Deities, muſt deſerve nothing but Contempt; thus we muſt bid adieu to Rewards and Puniſhments, good and evil Spirits: In ſhort, with one Stroke of the Tongue you demoliſh the whole Syſtem of our Doctrine.'

Love of Novelty and Credulity,

Thoſe who are fond of popular Notions, replied the Philoſopher, paſs their Lives in a kind of Drunkenneſs, and finiſh them in a Dream; they are ſwallowed up in a Heap of raſcally Fables, from which it is not poſſible for them to get looſe; and the Hopes of obtaining a happy Life, thro' the Protection of Spirits, increaſes their Infatuation.

(A) This Paſſage frees the Confucians from the Charge of ſuch wicked Stratagems, and ſhews how much the Bonzian Doctrines, whereever they have prevailed, have deſtroyed thoſe lovely Sentiments of Humanity and Compaſſion inculcated in the Chineſe Morality. The like we find to be the Effect of ſome Popiſh Doctrines, which have changed the Chriſtian Spirit of Meekneſs, Mercy and Love, into Violence, Cruelty and Hatred.

Gives rise to Impostors.

This Inclination of the greater Part of Mankind, joined to their Credulity, was what put it in the Heads of Fo and Lau to eſtabliſh a Place of Rewards, a Hell, a Palace for the Ruler of the Waters and the reſt of the Deities, without mentioning Spirits of an inferior Order, and extraordinary Men who are become immortal. They have above all diſplayed the Advantages which their Gods beſtow, and have placed in Heaven a Yo whang, Chief of all the pretended immortal Beings, who delegates to theſe Spirits their Employs, ſuch as to preſide over Rain, to diſtribute Rewards and Puniſhments, &c.

Hiſtory of Yo whang, King of the Spirits,

In the Book Yo whang, we find theſe Words: In the Weſt there was a Prince of the Kingdom of pure Virtue. This King being forty Years old without having a Son, he and the Queen Pau ywê, obtained one thro' the fervent Prayers they addreſſed to Lau kyun; and this Son is the Yo whang of whom we ſpeak. Another Text of the Book Hven û, affirms, that in the Weſtern Parts, there is a Place called the Kingdom of pure Joy; that the King thereof being without Children obtained one of Lau kyun; and it is he who is honoured under the Names of Hven û Tſû tſe.

And of Fo,

Let us add what is related in the Hiſtory of Fo, wherein it is aſſerted, that in the Weſt there is a Kingdom of pure Innocence, and the Prince who is Heir to the Crown is Fo himſelf; ſhe, whom he eſpouſed, was called Na to, and they had a Son whoſe Name was Mo hew lo; ſoon after the Father ſpent twelve Years in Solitude, and during his Contemplations was transformed into Fo.

Contrary to Reaſon and Nature.

According to theſe Traditions it appears, that the Dynaſty of the Chew had reigned 700 Years before the Sect of Fo began. Let us argue of the Time paſt by the Time preſent, and of the preſent by the paſt; the World has gone on, and will go on in the ſame Manner: Can it be imagined that the thing, whereof no Footſteps are now to be found, was formerly the Wonder of the World? Run over the Countries Weſt of China and you will meet with nothing but Barbarians, where then ſhall we find the Kingdom of pure Virtue &c. which theſe Books mention? Or a Race of Men with three Heads, ſix Shoulders, and eight Hands (A)? Or People who live two or three hundred Years, and yet experience none of the Inconveniences of old Age? How then can you fancy ſuch Places to be the Abode of immortal Beings? In ſhort, the Fables they relate concerning the King of Heaven and Generaliſſimo of the Spirits, are invented only to abuſe the Credulity of the Vulgar.

But ſaid one of the Auditors, How dare you treat Yo whang with ſo much Contempt, ſince he is the ſame as Shang ti, mentioned in your Books, for whom you have ſo profound a Veneration? It is he the Emperor Kau tſong (*) ſaw in a Dream, and who gave him Fû ywê for his Prime Miniſter; it is of him Meng tſe [or Mençius] ſpeaks, when he ſays, we muſt faſt, examine, and purify ourſelves, before we offer him any Sacrifices (†): Dare you deny that there is a Shang ti?

Original of giving Shang ti a bodily Form.

In the Times of the Emperors Yau and Shun, replied the Philoſopher, the People entertained falſe Notions concerning Spirits (‡); which gave Riſe to the extravagant Fancy of giving a Form to Shang ti. I own, that the Emperor Kau tſong was a virtuous Prince; that he ſaw in a Dream a Man, who in Shape and Features exactly reſembled Fû ywê, tho' the Prince was then ignorant of his Name; that he cauſed his Picture to be drawn upon the Strength of his Memory; and that giving Orders to find out the Man thus repreſented, he was in reality brought to him. All this is true; but how comes it to paſs, that tho' we have neither ſeen the flying Dragon, nor the fabulous Bird called Fong whang, they yet appear very often in Dreams? I anſwer; People having ſeen ſuch Figures in Pictures they enter into their Imaginations while aſleep.

If you inſiſt that Shang ti appeared to Kau tſong in a human Shape, with the Crown and Robes ſuitable to the Imperial Dignity, I may eaſily make you this Reply: That as it was the Emperor Whang ti who firſt inſtituted thoſe Ornaments which diſtinguiſh the Emperors from their

(A) The Images of Fo, &c. are repreſented in ſuch Form.

(*) This Objection gravels the Chineſe Philoſopher. He might have come off by anſwering, that their Yo whang was not the Shang ti of the Literati, but he whom the Sect of Tau had honoured with that Name under the Dynaſty of the Han, and whoſe Name was Chang i: But inſtead of this Anſwer, which would have been ſatisfactory, he falls to trifling about the Garments which Shang ti ought to have, and endeavours to make this Piece of Hiſtory paſs for a Fable, or a mere Dream, juſt as if one ſhould ſee in a Dream the fabulous Bird called Fong whang: However, reſtrained by the Authority of the Claſſic Books, he has Recourſe to the modern Interpreters, and will have Shang ti to be nothing elſe but his Tay ki. Had the Chineſe the ſame Idea of the Li, that Pere Mallebranche (who ſeems to be unacquainted with their Doctrine) has of it, our Philoſopher might eaſily have anſwered, that the Emperor ſaw his future Miniſter in the Li. For that Father aſſures us, that according to the Syſtem of the Chineſe Philoſophy, all Truths appear in the Li; and agreeably to that Syſtem which he has framed in the Work, intitled A Dialogue between a Chriſtian Philoſopher and a Chineſe Philoſopher, he makes the latter ſpeak thus: We admit only of Matter and the Li, that Sovereign Truth, Wiſdom, and Juſtice, which eternally ſubſiſts in the Matter, which faſhions and diſpoſes it in that beautiful Order wherein it appears, and likewiſe informs this refined and organized Part of Matter of which we are compoſed: For to this Sovereign Truth (the Li) all Men are of Neceſſity united, ſome more, ſome leſs; that they ſee the eternal Truths and Laws, which are the Bonds of all Societies, &c. This being advanced, one is not ſurpriſed to hear the Chriſtian Philoſopher anſwer: Your Li, your Sovereign Juſtice approaches infinitely more the Idea of our God, than that of this powerful Emperor Shang ti. Unfortunately this Language is new and unheard-of in China; and there is not one of the Literati, but would be ſtrangely ſurprized to hear he was made to ſpeak in ſuch a Manner.

(†) The Objection, had it been urged home, was ſtrong and perplexing: "If the Shang ti of the Literati (ſay they to him) was without Life and Underſtanding, could he have given Kau tſong a faithful Miniſter, as a Reward of his Virtue? Would it be neceſſary for a Man to purify himſelf inwardly, in order to offer ſolemn Sacrifices to Shang ti in a decent Manner"? — Our Philoſopher eludes the Difficulty by having Recourſe to his Tay ki; But he does not offer to ſay of the Tay ki, what Confuçius ſays of Shang ti: He knows the Bottom of my Heart, Chi ngo, and as moſt juſt, Chi kung, let him puniſh me, if my Intentions are criminal. Our Atheiſt thinks quite otherways of his Tay ki, on which he beſtows very fine Names taken in a metaphorical Senſe: It is, ſays he, that which governs and reigns in Heaven, the Earth, and all other Beings. In ſacrificing to him, it is ſufficient to turn one's ſelf reſpectfully towards Heaven. He dares not diſapprove the Rite of ſolemn Sacrifices, in Uſe among the literary Sect, and makes a ſtrange Medly by accommodating his Atheiſm and Acts of Religion together. All this ſhews that what moſt perplexes theſe Atheiſts is the Doctrine of the Canonical Books, which not daring openly to reject they vainly endeavour to reconcile with their Syſtem.

(‡) Here the Philoſopher not knowing how to reconcile with his Syſtem the Idea, which the Claſſic Text naturally gives us of Shang ti in his Apparition to Kau tſong, falls into a manifeſt Contradiction. He ſays, that Error and Superſtition as to Spirits were introduced in the Times of Yau and Shun, whereby he confeſſes, that his Doctrine was not the ſame with that which prevailed in the Reigns of thoſe Princes, which yet was called the Golden Age for its Religion and Morality. He acknowledges that Yau and Shun were Sages of the firſt Rank, and liſtened to as Oracles appointed to reform the Empire committed to their Care: And yet charges them with authoriſing, and even introducing groſs and pernicious Errors. How is he to be reconciled with himſelf.

their Subjects, it will thence follow that Shang ti did not exiſt before that Emperor; or if he did exiſt, that he continued naked till the Time of his Reign, when they began to wear a Crown, and cloath themſelves with imperial Robes. But I chuſe rather to anſwer thus: That what they call Shang ti is that which rules in Heaven and Earth, and generally over all other Beings; for which Reaſon it is ſtiled Ti, that is, Sovereign Maſter. It appears likewiſe, by the Manner in which ſome of our learned Men explain themſelves, that Shang ti is at Bottom the ſame thing as the Tay ki, which I have diſcourſed to you about. Has ever any body ventured to affirm that Tay ki hath appeared in a viſible Shape? Whence it is eaſy to ſee, that when it is ſaid Sacrifices muſt be offered to Shang ti they only ought to be made to Heaven with a pure Heart.

That he ever appeared in a viſible Shape deny'd.

Your Arguments, cried one of the Aſſembly, tend to diſprove a Hell, and its God called Yen vang, who ſways this ſubterranean Empire; alſo the Lo han, that is to ſay, Spirits who rule the Deſtiny of Mankind; yet theſe are the Spirits which, we are told, convey the Soul into the Body at the Moment of Birth, and drag it away, at the Moment of Death, to the Place of Puniſhment, where it is cruelly tormented by other Spirits. If a Man in this Life has practiſed Virtue, he will certainly be born again to a State of Wealth and Splendor; if even Beaſts themſelves have lived well, according to their Condition, they will find themſelves transformed into Men: On the contrary, a Perſon who gives himſelf up to ſhameful Vices, and follows his irregular Appetites, ſhall become a brute Beaſt. If Animals are more cruel than is ſuitable to their Nature, they paſs not into a new Life after Death, but their Souls are entirely extinct. Theſe are the Things which we are taught, and yet according to you they are ſo many Falſities.

That both Man and Beaſt enjoy a future State,

To ſpeak freely, replied the Philoſopher, I do affirm they are all falſe. Two married Perſons cohabit together, they both concur in producing the Embryo which is conceived in the Womb of the Mother, and grows by inſenſible Degrees: If, according to your Notions, the Fœtus muſt wait till it is brought to Perfection before the Soul inſinuates itſelf therein, by what Place can it find a proper Entrance? Or we may ſay rather, that a certain Quantity of Blood being united in the Mother's Womb forms the whole, which there undergoes a Fermentation and begins to have the Power of Motion; it is then a Being of a particular Sort. Thus Man is a Compoſition reſulting from the Union of a ſenſible Thing with another that is inviſible; and this is what we call Ki: While this Union ſubſiſts we are capable of Pain; when it is diſſolved we become inſenſible. If a Man has the Palſy on one Side of his Body, you may apply Fire to the paralitic Part and he will feel no Pain. When he dies, the Hing, or that which is viſible in him, is ſeparated from the Ki, or that which is inviſible: This Ki is evaporated (‖) into Atoms, which flutter here and there, or are changed into a cold Wind deſtitute of all animal Heat. What then remains of the Deceaſed, upon which your Miniſters of Hell can exerciſe their mercileſs Cruelty?

Deny'd by the Philoſopher on natural Principles.

But ſuppoſe that the grand Demon of all He kang ſang, (who is one of the 36 Kang of the Tau kya) has a Mind to ſeize upon the Soul of ſome Wretch after it has been diſperſed, and is able to blow all its Parts dexterouſly together again, in order to puniſh it for its Crimes at the Tribunal of the Infernal Judge: Do you believe that theſe Demons would have Leiſure and Patience to re-aſſemble all the ſubtile Particles ſcattered here and there?

This Reaſoning of the Philoſopher was not without Reply: We are aſſured, ſayed one of them to him, that the God Yen vang, and the other Judges his Miniſters, fix the Moment of the Birth of all Mankind; alſo if they ſhall marry, and to whom; if they ſhall have Children, and what their Diſpoſition will be; and whether rich or poor; in ſhort, all that is to happen to them is written in the Book of Yen vang; hence their Fate is inevitable, and no Alteration can be expected. Have you any thing to ſay againſt this Doctrine?

Abſolute Predeſtination of the Bonzas.

Don't you remember, replied the Philoſopher, a Paſſage in the Hven ſi chwen, one of your Books? A certain Demon called Yau mo (*) was continually devouring Mankind, but the God Hven ſi came to their Aſſiſtance, and preſerved a great Number from his Fury. Upon which I reaſon thus: Either Yen vang had determined the Number of thoſe who ſhould be devoured, or he had not. If he had not, your Hypotheſis falls to the Ground of itſelf; but if he had determined the Number, why did the God Hven ſi make ſuch uſeleſs Efforts to ſave People who were irrevocably condemned to be devoured? But ſince we are fallen upon this Topic, pray liſten to another Fable, which is pleaſant enough: A Perſon called Pung, lived to the Age of 800 Years, and married 72 Wives one after another. The laſt dying in her Turn went into the other World, and aſked the Anceſtors of Pung, what might be the Reaſon that her Huſband lived ſo many Ages? Is it becauſe his Name, added ſhe, was not recorded in the Regiſter of Yen vang (†)? Yet none can eſcape him. I will teach you the Myſtery, replied the Grandfather of Pung: The Name and Surname of my Grandſon your Huſband are certainly in the Book, but in the following Manner; when it was neceſſary to Refuted by their own Principles and Legends.

(‖) This Philoſopher runs down the Opinion of the Sectaries, who make the Body a tranſitory Lodging for the Soul, ſuppoſing it to be united to the Body in his own Way; but he does not allow it to be ſpiritual and immortal. He pretends it is a mere ſubtile Portion of Matter, which is deſtroyed as well as the Body by the Separation of its Parts. But ſuppoſing this, how is the Soul united to the Body? Being Matter, it can be united no otherways than as one Body is united to another; and it is evident that two Bodies can only be united by the Surface. But is ſuch a Union ſufficient to explain what we experience, touching the ſeveral Parts of the Body and the Senſation of the Soul? Beſides, if the Soul conſiſts of Parts as well as the Body, each Part muſt have Functions peculiar to it. In what Part then will he place the Faculty of thinking? Can Matter become a thinking Being? He muſt needs maintain farther, according to his Hypotheſis, that the Soul, being no more than a Collection of Matter put in Motion, is not a free Agent; that the leaſt Motion which I made with my Hand Yeſterday was a neceſſary Effect, and could no more be avoided than the Sun can avoid riſing above the Horizon; and in ſhort, that if I had not moved my Hand it would follow, that from the Beginning of the World Matter had received a natural Motion quite different from that which it had at firſt. What Abſurdities are Men obliged to maintain, when they are reſolved not to quit the falſe Principles they have ſet on Foot!

(*) St. Epiphanius writes, that Pythagoras invented the Doctrine of the two Principles, which he might have taken from the Diſciples of Fo. It appears, that they hold two Genii of very different Characters: One who ſeeks to devour as many Men as he can; and the other, who makes it his whole Buſineſs to ſave thoſe whom the wicked Genius would ſwallow up.

(†) All that is ſaid here, relates to the Syſtem of the Bonzas, and the idolatrous Worſhip brought from India. They admit a kind of Paradiſe, Hell, a God called Yen vang, &c.

to bind up the Leaves, the Officer employed to do it took by Miſtake the Leaf on which the Deſtiny of Pung was written, twiſted it like a Lace, and with it ſewed the reſt together (*). As the Woman could not keep the Secret, Yen vang ſoon heard of the Story; ſo that taking the Book and examining the Lace, he blotted out the Name of Pung, who died that very Inſtant. This Example, continued the Philoſopher, proves the direct contrary of your Doctrine, for here is an Inſtance of one who eſcaped the Penetration of Yen vang. Can you be certain that others have not eſcaped by a like Trick? But to convince you that all this is fabulous, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that in the Times of Confuçius and Meng tſe, no Paper Books were in Uſe, they wrote upon the Rind of Bambû, or Tables of Wood. Beſides, as your ſubterraneous Hell is nothing but a Heap of Earth, Water and Stones, it is plain, Paper Books and Regiſters could not be preſerved there: You ought therefore to look upon what you read in thoſe Books as ſo many romantic Fictions.

Marks of its Forgery.

But, replied another, however you may ridicule Hell and its Spirits, dare you ſay the ſame of the Guardian Spirits of walled Cities called Ching whang; or of divers other Places named Tû ti, which are revered thro' the Empire? And can ſo univerſal a Worſhip be falſe?

Original of Guardian Spirits and Patron Saints

Hear me, replied the Philoſopher: In the Reigns of Yau and Shun, Dwellings were not encompaſſed with Walls and Ditches, which Cuſtom was firſt introduced under the Dynaſties of the Hya and Shang, in order to defend them from Thieves and Rebels: At length, they erected a Ching whang (‖), and built Places deſigned for its Honour; they alſo built others in Honour of the Tû ti (§). When they took it in their Heads to give the Spirits the pompous Name of Ti ti, becauſe they were looked on as the Nurſing Fathers of the People, they divided them into different Claſſes: Thoſe to whom they attributed the Care of the Fields and cultivated Lands, they honoured with the Title of Shê ſhin (⁎); thoſe whoſe Office was to preſide over the Villages, to look after the Health of the Inhabitants, and maintain Peace among them, were honoured under the Title of Tû ti; the Spirits, aſſigned to the Inſide of Houſes, and Places of public Aſſemblies, as Guardians thereof, were reverenced with the Name of Chung lyew (†); they aſſign'd to others the deſart and mountainous Countries, in Hopes that they would facilitate the Tranſportation of Proviſions and Merchandiſes, and theſe were honoured under the Title of Spirits of the high Mountains: In ſhort, thoſe who were placed in the Cities, encompaſſed with Walls and Ditches, were worſhipped by the Name of Ching whang, as Spirits who preſerved ſuch Cities from public Calamities.

Blaſphemous to repreſent the Deity by an Image.

I am now coming to the Point, continued the Philoſopher, inreality all theſe Spirits (::) are nothing but Lumps of Earth differently formed; when the Memory of them is preſerved in the Soul, it is juſt as when I am drinking Water, I think of the Spring from whence it ariſes, and am obliged to it for the Pleaſure and Benefit I receive from it. Dare any one carry the Blaſphemy ſo far as to take for the Image of the true Spirit (†) of Heaven and Earth, who is Purity itſelf, thoſe groteſque Figures of Clay repreſenting Men, or Women, either on the Inſide or Outſide of the Pagods, or the Figure of an old Man, ſuch as is placed in private Houſes?

Here the Philoſopher was thus interrupted: Many Prodigies have been performed by the Ching whang and the Tû ti, which Prodigies demonſtrate their Power; and as they are often ſeen in the Shape of living Men, how can you ſay they are nothing but a Lump of Earth?

Old way of accounting for extraordinary Effects

We muſt go a little round about, replied the Philoſopher, to (‡) explain the Wonders and Apparitions of which you ſpeak: There are Men whoſe Talents are extraordinary, and who diſtinguiſh themſelves from the reſt of Mankind, by their Courage and Virtue; it appears ſometimes, that they are oppreſſed with Slander, or a ſudden Death carries them off without leaving any Poſterity behind them: Now theſe very extraordinary Perſonages are endued with Souls of an uncommon kind, which are not eaſily diſſipated, but generally retire into the Pagods, and there work ſurpriſing Events. They talk of one Wen tyen tſyang, maſſacred under the Dynaſty of the Ywen, and of a Yu chung tſyau, who miſerably periſhed under the Ming; whoſe great Actions have made the People believe, that after their Death they became Ching whang, or Guardians of Cities.

The Abſurdity of making Guardian Spirits.

That which conſtitutes the Merit of a Man during his Life is the Ki, that ſpiritual Air which may

(::) We ſee here how much the Philoſopher is perplexed by his inability to account for ſtrange and miraculous Events, which can be wrought only by Demons, and yet he would attribute them to natural Cauſes. He is indeed honeſt enough not to deny ſuch wonderful Effects, as others would do, who, to get out of the Difficulty, are reſolved to admit nothing that is contrary to the Courſe of Nature: But then it is certain, that the Conjuration and Operations of the Devil are too common in China to be denied. 'Tis very remarkable, that in all the Countries where Chriſtianity is not eſtabliſhed, the Devil exerciſes a great Power over the People; and that this Power ceaſes as ſoon as the true Religion takes Root there: Nay, this Power of the Spirit of Darkneſs is entirely reſtrained by the bare Preſence of a Chriſtian Child, of which there have been infinite Inſtances, [REMARK. But theſe Inſtances du Halde means, will probably be ranked by Proteſtants among other pretended Miracles of the Romiſh Church. And the Reader will find Reaſon to doubt of ſeveral other Poſitions he advances, where his Religion is concerned.]

(†) The Text is Tyen, Ti, Tje, Jen, Chin, Chi, Shin. It appears that by theſe Terms Spirit of Heaven, our Atheiſt intends nothing elſe but the material Heaven: Juſt as by Spirits of the Mountains and Rivers he means no more than the viſible Mountains, and Rivers themſelves.

(‡) That there are Guardian Spirits of Cities and the principal Places of the Empire, is an Opinion of great Antiquity in China. The Mandarins at this Day, moſt averſe to the Idolatry among the People, have ſtill Recourſe to the Ching whang, with Regard to which, our Philoſopher does nothing but quibble in this Place; his Way of reaſoning being not unlike that which ſome of the Chineſe uſe with regard to the Name Tyen chu, that is, Lord of Heaven, which the Miſſionaries give to God: Before Heavens was created, ſay they, there could not be a Tyen chu, or a Lord of what there was not: Therefore your Tyen chu and the Heaven began to exiſt both at the ſame Time. As they relate many remarkable Facts, whether true or falſe, to prove the Protection granted by the Ching whang to the Cities and their Inhabitants; and as this Worſhip is profeſſed and practiſed by the literary Sect, our Atheiſt is puzzled how to accommodate theſe common Notions with his Syſtem. There are certain Souls, ſays he, which are not diſſipated on leaving the Body, but ſtill ſubſiſt, and ſeeking out for a Tenement ſtop at the Dwellings of the Ching whang, where they work the Miracles that are reported. He had been much more puzzled if the Auditors, turning his own extravagant Syſtem againſt him, had replied: You, who boaſt of having thrown off the Yoke of a Supreme Maſter, by refuſing to acknowledge any, how are you ſure but the Souls of your greateſt Enemies may be amongſt thoſe which ſubſiſt after Death? Theſe Souls being no longer reſtrained by Laws and you not having the Power to avoid them, what have you not to fear from their Anger and Revenge?

may exiſt ſome time after his Death. When this Air produces wonderful Effects they are attributed to Spirits, either of craggy Rocks, mountainous Places, Rivers, or Cities; but indeed every thing that is done happens of Neceſſity, and according to the Laws of Nature. Can you believe that theſe Spirits take their Rank by Means of an imperial Mandate, which appoints their ſeveral Offices? Is it in the Power of any Mortal to aſſign to this or that Spirit the Office of preſiding over ſuch and ſuch Productions? The Spirits you talk of are nothing but the Mountains, Rivers, Fields, and Cities themſelves, wherein according to the natural Courſe of things there ſometimes happen uncommon and ſurpriſing Effects; it is then ridiculous to ſay, ſuch a Man, whoſe Name and Surname we formerly knew, is at preſent a Spirit that ought to be worſhipped.

Permit me to ſay, replied one of the Aſſembly, that your Anſwer does not ſatisfy me: You ſay the principal Part of a great Man is his Ki or Soul: Will you then attribute to theſe remains of a great Man every thing extraordinary that happens, and which ſeems to be contrary to the Courſe of Nature? I lived ſome time ago at Ching chew, where I ſaw Willow-Trees produce little odd Figures in the Shape of a Man about two Inches in Height: About the ſame time it rained black Rice in Kyang ſi; at Chu chew there fell out of the Sky Men's Heads about the bigneſs of a Pea, wherein the Eyes, Mouth and Noſe were very exactly formed. Theſe events are publickly known, and believed by wiſe Men, and you can't ſay they are according to the Courſe of Nature.

Confucius, replied the Philoſopher, thought it not worth while to mention theſe Spirits, which are known by their ſtrange Operations: Yet it was not becauſe he was ignorant, that when a Kingdom is threatned with a Revolution, theſe Prodigies ſometimes happen, and are a kind of Forerunners of ſome approaching Calamity. This excellent Sage thought it ſufficient to ſay, that we ſhould not give Credit too eaſily to theſe Sorts of Miracles, which are of no uſe but to fill the Mind with Uneaſineſs and Dread; and becauſe the Sect of Fo has recourſe to this Artifice to terrify the Vulgar, it is reckon'd a falſe and dangerous Sect. I acknowledge (*) that when ſome dreadful Event is near at Hand, for inſtance, a Famine or a great Mortality, the five Elements are in Confuſion and produce Monſters: But if at theſe Conjunctures Men ſeriouſly ſet about to reform their Manners, and practiſe Virtue, all theſe Omens will be attended with no ill Conſequence. Omens and Prodigies forerunners of public Calamities.

You are unwilling then, replied one of the Standers-by, to look upon the immortal Spirits as Authors of theſe Prodigies: But to attribute them to natural Cauſes only ſeems very unaccountable. I ſhall endeavour to convince you by a ſingle Example: Under the Dynaſty of the Ming, in the City of Yen tſe, of the Province of Ho nan, there died one of the common People called Chew, ſurnamed Tyen pau. The third Day after his Interment his Wife took Wine and Pulſe, and went to the Burying-place to make this ſmall Offering: But ſtopping in the Way, not far from a Rock, there ſuddenly proceeded from it Lightning, accompanied with the moſt dreadful Noiſe. At the ſame Inſtant, part of the Rock fell down and diſcovered in a hollow Space within it a Stone Cheſt; which the Woman having a Curioſity to peep into drew near it, and thro' a large Slit therein, perceived that it contained a Sabre with a very rich Handle, and a Book which much reſembled a Book of Magic. This ſhe took and returned to her own Houſe, where ſhe ſet herſelf to peruſe it, and find out the Senſe; after which ſhe undertook to fortel ſeveral Events among the Neighbours, which fell out exactly according to her Predictions. Ridiculous Story of an Inchantreſs.

The Inhabitants of the Place, who were Witneſſes of theſe Things, conceived ſo great an Eſteem for her that they ſtiled her the Mother of Fo; and in leſs than a Year this new Propheteſs grew into ſuch Reputation, that ſhe was followed by more than ten thouſand People, and continued to work ſurpriſing Miracles. By the Aſſiſtance of her magical Book, if ſhe did but blow upon a Field of Corn, or Rice, it was immediately changed into Swords and Spears, and every one thought he ſaw an Army in Battle-array: With one ſingle Word ſhe could turn a Joint-ſtool into a Leopard or Tyger; and a weak Fence of Pales into high Walls ſurrounded with Ditches. But now to ſhew what all this tended to.

One Day, when it was leaſt expected, there happened an almoſt general Revolt; whereupon the Mandarins of the Army march'd immediately with Troops to ſeize the Ringleaders, but found greater Reſiſtance than they imagined, and a bloody Battle enſued. However, at length the Rebels were overcome, and the Enchantreſs being among the Priſoners was thrown into a Dungeon loaded with Irons, where ſhe remained three Days, unable to ſet herſelf at Liberty, her Art forſaking her as ſoon as ſhe was in Irons. But you muſt own, that this Woman could not have worked ſuch Prodigies without the Aſſiſtance of the immortal Beings.

All that I ſhall admit, ſayed the Philoſopher, is that certain Magicians, or ſuch ſort of People who pretend to the Rank of Immortals, having been able to ſteal (†) from Heaven and Earth the Knowledge of a Change which was to happen in Nature, compoſed the Book of future Events, and hid it within the Rock. When the fatal time of the Revolt drew near, according to the natural Courſe of Things, the Enchanters appeared, whoſe Predictions being liſtened to, favour'd the Rebellion, wherein ſo many periſhed. In ſhort, tho' theſe Calamities neceſſarily happened in Conſequence of the Situation of the Heaven and Earth, yet the criminal Boldneſs of the Magicians, who intrenched upon the Rights of Heaven by ſearching into the ſecrets of Futurity, will not eſcape the Puniſhment Ridiculouſly accounted for. Impious to enquire into Futurity.

(*) Our Philoſopher durſt not deny what is ſo often repeated in the Shu king: That certain Signs which happen, are Notices given Mankind by Shang ti, of ſome approaching Calamity, unleſs they prevent them by reforming their Manners: But to reconcile this Doctrine with his Syſtem, he argues in a moſt wretched manner. For in ſhort, how can there be, according to the Laws of Nature as he ſuppoſes, certain Preſages of Events, that are uncertain, and which depend on the free and changeable Will of Men? Can we avoid acknowledging a Superior Intelligent Being, which connects the Preſage of a Comet or Earthquake, with the Event of a Rebellion, or dethroning of a Monarch?

(†) This Theft from Heaven and Earth by the Magicians, is, as plainly appears, a mere Abſurdity: which proves that to expoſe the Syſtem of a Philoſopher, who attributes all things to natural Cauſes, you need only ſet him to reaſon upon Nature: for nothing is more likely to diſcover his Extravagance and confound his Pride.

Puniſhment due to them; and thoſe who conſult or liſten to theſe pretended Immortals, (ſuppoſed to aſſociate themſelves with Spirits) have always proved dangerous to their Country.

Pretended Miracles.

I muſt not paſs by your laſt Words, ſayed one of the Aſſembly: You cannot be ignorant that the King of Kin (*) flying after a defeat paſſed the deep River of Yang tſe, and by an unlooked-for Miracle the Water only reached his Horſes Girths. In like Manner the laſt Heir, of the Race of the Ywen, having beheld almoſt his whole Army cut in Pieces, was obliged to fly with Precipitation towards the North; when coming, as you know, to the Side of a great River, and not finding a Ferry-Boat, there ſuddenly appeared in the Air a great metal Bridge, by which he croſſed the Stream. You ſay that theſe are Prodigies not worthy to be mentioned?

Idly admitted and accounted for.

My thoughts concerning it, replied the Philoſopher, are theſe: That which both in Heaven and Earth is the Principle of the moſt wonderful Productions, this Being, this Ki, ſtrengthens the Weak, and weakens thoſe who are too ſtrong (†). Before the Dynaſties of the Hya and Shang, the Earth being very thinly peopled, and the Number of Mankind but ſmall, Heaven which was then in its full Vigor was more likely to produce Sages and extraordinary Men, who ſupported and propagated their Species: But it degenerated in after Times, and Men being greatly multiplied, the Malice and Corruption of their Hearts prevailed, whilſt Integrity and Virtue the Ways of Heaven, (‡) Reaſon and Order were hardly diſcover'd. Heaven could not ſuffer ſuch a Multitude of wicked Mortals; wherefore he ſent his Plagues among them, thoſe Blood-thirſty Villains who delight in nothing but War. He raiſed up a Pe chi who cauſed the Ruin of Chau, and the numerous Troops that he commanded. Lyew tau ché was another Firebrand of War, who carried Rapine and Deſolation into all the Provinces. As for your two Citations from the Hiſtory: You ought not to doubt that this Favour was granted to theſe Princes, in order to preſerve ſome Remains of the Ywen Dynaſty, and the Kin Nation, which without this extraordinary Aſſiſtance had become extinct. 'Tis certain, the Conduct of Heaven (‖) is not blind, nor void of Reaſon: If it croſſes Proſperity (§), 'tis becauſe it proceeds beyond Bounds; of which I'll give you an Example.

Tyen not blind or void of Reaſon.

'Twas the Deſign of Heaven to reſtore the Han Dynaſty; for which Reaſon, when Quang vû was ſtopped on the Banks of a large and rapid River, it cauſed the Waters to freeze in an Inſtant, that he and his Troops ſhould find no Difficulty in their Paſſage. When the Order obſerved by Heaven (*) for the Government of the World is ready to produce any great Change, for inſtance, when Heaven is on the Point of abandoning a reigning Dynaſty, there then happen extraordinary Events, as ſo many fatal Preſages: But theſe are not always the ſame, tho' they always proceed from the ſame Cauſe.

Always Danger in oppoſing Superſtition and Error.

The Auditors having praiſed the Philoſopher's Subtlety and Penetration, one of them ſayed: After all, Sir, the Religion of Fo and Lau are ſpread thro' the Empire, and have long ſince taken deep Root in Mens Hearts. Conſider you alone oppoſe them: I wiſh you attacked them with even ſtronger Arguments than are uſed againſt them in the ancient Books; but ſtill, that would not ſecure you from the Aſſaults of an infinite Number of Adverſaries who follow thoſe Doctrines, and you have no more than one Mouth and one Tongue to anſwer them. Do you think you would be able to withſtand them? And are you not afraid leſt by endeavouring to teach others the Source of true Happineſs, you ſhould bring upon yourſelf real Misfortunes?

The Philoſopher took the Meaning of this Compliment; and judging he had diſplay'd his Learning to no purpoſe, as ſoon as it grew duſkiſh he roſe to return into the City. The Chiefs of the Aſſembly accompanied him as far as the Bridge; and ſo this Converſation ended.

Mohammediſm increaſes in China.

Theſe are the principal Sects which prevail in China: For there is no Occaſion to ſpeak of the Mohammedan Sect, ſettled above 600 Years ago in divers Provinces; where they live in quiet, becauſe they take no great Pains to extend their Doctrine and make Proſelytes. In ancient Times they encreaſed their Numbers ſolely by the Alliances and Marriages they contracted; but for ſome Years paſt they have made a conſiderable Progreſs by help of their Money: They every where buy up Children, whoſe Parents, unable to educate, make no Scruple to ſell them. During a Famine, which waſted the Province of Shan tong, they purchaſed above 10,000. They marry them, and either buy or build a conſiderable Share of a City, and even whole Country Towns to ſettle them in. Hence, by little and little, they are grown to ſuch a Head in many Places as not to ſuffer any to live among them who goes not to the Moſk; by which Means they have multiplied exceedingly within theſe hundred Years.

Judaiſm diminiſhes.

Neither ſhall I ſpeak of the Handful of Jews, who entred China under the Dynaſty of the Han, which began 200 Years before Chriſt. There were at firſt many Families of them: But they are now reduced to ſeven, which marry among themſelves, without mixing wth the Mohammedans, having nothing in common with the latter, either as to the Books or Ceremonies relating to their Religion. They have but one Synagogue, which is in Kay fong fû, the Capital of Ho nan. If the Reader would know more concerning them, he may peruſe the Letter of P. Gozani, inſerted in the 7th Tome of the Edifying and Curious Letters written by certain Jeſuit Miſſionaries, till the Publication of farther Particulars ſince ſent from China.

But I can by no Means omit giving an Account (A) of the Riſe and Progreſs, in this vaſt Empire, of the Chriſtian Religion, introduced by the Miſſionaries about two Centuries ago.
